Date.—König thinks that the preterite of the substantive verb in the phrase, " Now Nineveh was an exceeding great city," is equivalent to fuit in "Troja fuit," and consequently wd. regard it as evidence that Nineveh had ceased to be; but there are scores of cases in the prophets where such a rendering wd. make nonsense, e.g. Is. 50.[11]; Jer. 15.[18]. The connection does not require this sense; J.'s audience wd. not be familiar with the size of Nineveh, a city distant fm. them by 500 miles; further, when one considers means of communication, than London is fm. Tokio; so information as to its size was natural if not necessary. The short relative wh. is regarded as evidence of lateness is really, since it is found in the " song of Deborah," evidence of a northern origin. The use of the short form of 1st person is really a question of emphasis, not of date. The presence of Aramaisms is no evidence of late date; Aram. is as old as Heb.; the inscription of Mesha has many Aramaisms. Some of the Aram. words are technical, as ṣephinah and ṭaʿam, much as xebec and ukase are with ourselves. In identifying the sense in wh. manah is used in J. with its sense in Dn. 1.[11], and identifying it with the Aram. manni (Dn. 2.[49]), Drs. König and Driver have fallen into a mistake: there surely is a great difference between " appointing " and " preparing "; it savours of the ludicrous to think of a whale having an appointment to swallow a prophet, or of Nebuchadnezzar " preparing " the food of the Heb. hostages. As to the alleged identity of J.'s meaning with the Aram. it is convincing evidence of the contrary that neither in the Peshitta (E. Aram.) version of J., nor in the Tg. (W. Aram.), is the word transferred. There is nothing in the linguistic evidence pointing to any later date than that of the son of Amittai. The accurate historical setting above referred to points to the same conclusion.

Aim.—While several subordinate lessons are taught, the fact is made plain that J″. regards even the heathen as objects of His care. We can understand Jonah's fleeing fm. the presence of J″. if he foresaw that Asshur wd. revive and eventually crush Isr. He would be in no way anxious to carry a message of warning to Nineveh, since he did not wish the Ninevites to repent. Jonah's mind is therefore gradually prepared to receive the truth. He is shown the better side of the heathen sailors, who generously strive to save him: and his interest is drawn out by the fate of the gourd.

For the use made by our Lord of Jonah's experience see Mw. 12.^{39}.

JONATH ELEM REHOKIM. See Psalms.

JONATHAN. (1) S. of Gershom, grandson of Moses (Jg. 18.^{30}). The latter name was changed to "Manasseh" by inserting "n," prob. to prevent it fm. appearing that Moses had such a degenerate desct. He was the Levite who became priest to the Ephraimite Micah, was carried away by the Danites to Dan, and became priest in the idolatrous temple there (Jg. 17., 18.). (2) S. of Saul, k. of Isr. (1 S 14.^{49}), perhaps the most chivalrous and winsome figure in the OT., who carried his friendship to David to the verge of Quixotism. The monarchy, but newly established, was of course not acknowledged as hereditary. Yet the eldest son of the reigning k., with J.'s qualities and popularity, might well have hoped for the succession. J. laid aside his own claims in the interest of his friend, whom he assisted and defended at the risk of his life (1 S. 18.$^{1-4}$, 19.$^{1-7}$, 20., 23.$^{16ff.}$). He was also a skilful and intrepid soldier, whose manly char. endeared him to the people (1 S. 14.$^{1ff.}$). His fall on Gilboa with his fr. became the subj. of one of the most beautiful and pathetic elegies in all Lit. (2 S. 1.$^{17ff.}$). His body was exposed on the walls of Beth-shan, whence it was rescued and buried by the men of Jabesh Gilead. David, at a later time, brought the bones of his friend, and laid them with the dust of his frs. at Zela in Benjamin (2 S. 21.$^{12ff.}$). J. left a son, Mephibosheth, whom David kindly entreated for his fr.'s sake (2 S. 21.^{7}, &c.).

No fewer than 13 J.'s are mentioned in Scrip. See also Apocrypha, Maccabees.

Jaffa

JOPPA (Japho, Jo. 19.^{46}), a city of the Phil. on the border of Dan, the anct. seaport to wh. the wood fm. Lebanon was brought in floats for transport to Jrs. (2 Ch. 2.^{16}; Ez. 3.^{7}; Heb. Yāphō). Here Jonah found a ship going to Tarshish (1.^{3}). In J. Peter raised Dorcas fm. the dead (Ac. 9.$^{36ff.}$). Hence fm. the house of Simon the tanner he was called to Cæsarea (Ac. 10.$^{1ff.}$).

On a rock hard by Perseus is said to have rescued the chained Andromeda fm. the monster. J. is mentioned as a Can. town in the Egyptian inscrs. of the 18th dyn., and in the Travels of the Mohar. In Asyr. inscrs. it is named Ya-ap-pu-u (COT.^{2} i. 160f.). At the Isr. invasion it was a Phil. town. In Solomon's time it was prob. in the hands of the Phœnicians. J. next appears in the hist. of the Maccabees. In revenge for an outrage by the inhabitants Judas destroyed the haven and the shipping with fire (2 M. 12.$^{3-7}$). Jonathan forced an entrance into the town, wh. was held in the interest of the Syrians (1 M. 10.^{74}). Simon drove out the inhabitants, placed in it a Jewish garrison, completed the harbour, and fortified the town (1 M. 12.$^{33f.}$, 13.^{11}, 14.$^{5-34}$). Taken fm. the Jews by Pompey (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; BJ. I. vii. 7), it was restored to them by Cæsar (Ant. XIV. x. 6). Given to Cleopatra by Antony (ib. XV. iv. 1), Cæsar afterwards bestowed it upon Herod (ib. XV. vii. 3; BJ. I. xx. 3). In the division of Herod's kdm. it fell to Archelaus (Ant. XVII. xi. 4; BJ. II. vi. 3). By the soldiers of Cestius Gallus it was taken with great slaughter (BJ. II. xviii. 10) and left desolate. It became a resort of such as escaped fm. the cities destroyed by the Romans, who, reduced to great straits, turned pirates, and preyed upon the shipping in the neighbouring waters. Driven to their boats by the troops of Vespasian, a fearful storm came down upon them, hurling their vessels upon the rocks, so that vast numbers perished. The city was taken and utterly destroyed. Its usefulness as a seaport insured its restoration, and in the fourth cent. it was the seat of a bishop. It is represented by the mod. Yāfā, built upon a rocky hump on the edge of the sea. A little way fm. the shore is a reef of rocks wh. may be rounded in calm weather by light craft, affording indifferent shelter. Rowing-boats meeting the steamers pass to and fro through a gap in the reef. In high storms, however, the passage is perilous. Figures as to population are in a state of chaos (HDB., 8000; Baedeker, 15,000; Harmsworth's Ency., 23,000; EB., 35,000; KB., 40,000). No trustworthy authority is available; but the smaller figures are prob. nearer the truth. It is now an important centre of trade, and it draws large revenues fm. the annual streams of pilgrims. It is famous for its beautiful and fruitful orange groves.

JORAH. One of the men who returned with Ezra (2.^{18}), the ancestor of a family of 112. His name is given in Ne. 7.^{24} as Hariph. The latter is poss. correct.

JORAM. (1) The son and successor of Ahab on the throne of Israel (2 K. 8.[16], &c.); see JEHORAM. (2) The son and successor of Jehoshaphat on the throne of Judah (2 K. 8.[21], &c.); see JEHORAM. (3) One of the priests who, under Jehoshaphat, carried round a copy of the law and taught the people in the cities of Judah (2 Ch. 17.[8], "Jehoram"). (4) The son of TOI, king of Zobah, whom his father sent to felicitate David on the defeat of Hadadezer (2 S. 8.[10]). (5) A Levite in the days of David (1 Ch. 26.[25]).

JORDAN (Heb. Yardēn, gen. with the art., ha-Yardēn). The J. is the main river of Pal. The name may be derived fm. yārdan, "to descend." The Arabs now call it esh-Sharî'ah, "the watering place," or Nahr el-'Urdunn. The Heb. name may poss. be connected with the Arb. warada, "to go with one to water."

JORDAN: THE FOUNTAIN AT BĀNIĀS

The sources of J. lie in the district SW. of Mt. Hermon. The longest tributary is the Ḥasbāny, rising near Ḥasbeiyah; the largest is the Leddān, wh. rises at Tell el-Qāḍy (see DAN); and the most picturesque is Nahr Bāniās, wh. rises under the cave, sacred to Pan in olden times (see CÆSAREA PHILIPPI). Those streams unite to form the J., five miles S. of Tell el-Qāḍy. Through mud flats the river pursues a sluggish course, winding among cane and reed thickets, to the little lake el-Ḥûleh (see WATERS OF MEROM). Many smaller tributaries discharge their waters into these streams, draining all the great hollow between the S. slopes of Hermon and the W. uplands.

At its exit fm. el-Ḥûleh the J. is 60 ft. broad, and about 15 ft. deep. Some two miles lower down the old road by way of Quneiṭera, between Damascus and the sea at Acre, crosses by a bridge, Jisr benāt Ya'qūb. Fm. this point the river descends rapidly, in a narrow rocky bed, between steep banks, until it reaches el-Baṭeiḥah, the fertile plain through wh. it flows, with an average width of about 60 ft., into the Sea of Galilee. A wide sandbank stretches across the mouth, by wh. it is easily forded, and here an anct. caravan road passed over it. In quiet weather the current may be traced far out on the calm surface of the sea: hence the belief, held firmly by the local Jews, that its waters never mingle with those of the lake.

Fm. the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, a distance of 60 miles, the J. follows a sinuous course, covering no less than about 200 miles. Some six miles below the Sea of Galilee it is spanned by a bridge, Jisr el-Majāmi'a, beside wh. is now the graceful new bridge of the Haifa-Damascus Railway. The J. has hollowed out a lower vale in the floor of the valley, in the bottom of wh. the bed of the river lies. This is called the Zōr. It varies in width fm. half a mile to two miles, and in depth fm. 20 ft. in the N. to 200 ft. in the S. The bed of the river also varies in width fm. 30 to 70 yds., being narrowest where the current flows swiftly. The soil of the Zōr is very rich, and is covered, esp. in the lower reaches, by a dense jungle of tropical plants, cane, and tamarisk, referred to as the "swelling" or "pride" of J. (Jr. 12.[5], &c.). This continues to within a couple of miles of the Dead Sea, where all vegetation ceases. During the heavy rains, and at the time of the melting snows, the river overflows its banks, covering all the bed of the Zōr, and becomes, indeed, a formidable stream (Jo. 3.[15]). A sudden spate at times carries away unwarily placed tents and their occupants.

Receiving the waters fm. Mt. Gilead, and fm. the E. slopes of Ephraim and Benjamin, the main tributaries of the J. are, on the E., Nahr Yarmūk, Wādy Yābis, Wādy 'Ajlūn, Nahr ez-Zerqā (Jabbok), Wādy Nimrīn, and Wādy el-Kefrain: on the W., Wādy Fejjās, Wādy el-Bīreh, Nahr Jalūd, Wādy el-Jōzeleh, and Wādy el-Qelt.

The total length of J. fm. Ḥasbeiyah to the Dead Sea as the crow flies is 113 miles. The source at Hasbeiyah is 1700 ft., that at Bāniās 1100 ft., and that at Tell el-Qāḍy 505 ft. above, while the Dead Sea is 1292 ft. below, the level of the Mediterranean. The most rapid descent of the full river is between el-Ḥūleh, 7 ft. above, to the Sea of Galilee, 682 ft. below sea level.

Save in times of flood, the J. may be crossed by many fords. Fm. el-Ḥūleh to the Dead Sea there are some 60 fords, at wh., for the greater part of the yr., the passage may be made without danger. Fm. the mouth of the Jabbok, however, until we come over agst. Jericho, the river is practically unfordable. In 1 K. 7.[46]; 2 Ch. 4.[17], the ford at Tell ed-Dâmieh is intended: in this neighbourhood were the fords of Jg. 12.[5ff.]; those E. of Jericho are referred to in Jo. 2.[7]; Jg. 3.[28]; 2 S. 19.[17], &c. See BETHABARA.

The Jordan Valley (see PALESTINE) is a feature unique upon the planet. The river, flowing in the bottom of this mighty gorge, formed the natural boundary between E. and W., but, as we have seen, it offered no serious barrier to frequent intercourse.

The construction of dams, wh. shd. not be difficult, wd. make much of the water of J. available for irrigation, and the rich land on either side might become a dream of beauty and fertility. The river is stocked with many kinds of fish: birds of bright plumage flash over its surface: the leopard, the hyæna, the jackal, and other beasts of prey, are found in the jungle through wh. it flows.

The water in the Sea of Galilee is valued as "light" and wholesome, but the natives, save in extremity, will not drink fm. the river, their reason being that "he who drinks Jordan drinks fever."

The stoppage of J. for the crossing of Isr. at a time when, the river being in full flood, the passage wd. have been otherwise imposs. (Jo. 3., 4.), was paralleled in A.D. 1267, when, by the fall of overhanging marl-cliffs wh. had been undermined by the stream, the waters were dammed back to the N. of Tell ed-Dâmieh for some ten hours, greatly facilitating the repair of the bridge at Dâmieh, built the previous yr. by Sultan Beybars I. of Egp. (PEFQ. 1895, 253ff.).

JORKOAM, RV. JORKEAM, a Calebite, great-grandson of Hebron (1 Ch. 2.[44]). It should perhaps be taken as the name of a city in Judah, in the district of Hebron, and may be identical with Jokdeam (Jo. 15.[56]), site unknown.

JOSAPHAT = JEHOSHAPHAT, king of Judah (Mw. 1.[8]).

JOSEDECH (Hg. 1.[1], &c.), JEHOZADAK (1 Ch. 6.[14f.]). Son of Seraiah, who was High Priest in the time of Zedekiah. His father was slain at Riblah (2 K. 25.[18, 21]) and J. was taken captive to Babylon, where he seems to have remained for the rest of his life. He was the son of one High Priest, and father of another (Jeshua), but never enjoyed that honour himself (Zc. 6.[11]).

JOSEPH ("Let him," i.e. God, "add"). (1) Elder s. of Jacob and Rachel, born in Mesopotamia (Gn. 30.[23f.]). Jacob loved J. as a son of his old age, and as a token of affection gave him a long coat with sleeves, wh. prob. indicated the fr.'s belief that he was marked for future distinction. J. seems to have accepted the omen, and, if he posed somewhat in consequence, it wd. not endear him to his brs. His boyish tactlessness in publishing his self-magnifying dreams came near to costing him even his fr.'s favour (Gn. 37.[10]). He had already angered his brs. by carrying home discreditable tales about them (v. 2). Fm. Hebron Jacob sent J. to see how it fared with his brs. who were tending the flocks. He found them at DOTHAN. They proposed forthwith to kill him. Fm. this Reuben dissuaded them, and had him put into one of the dry, bottle-shaped cisterns in the neighbourhood, intending to set him free. On the advice of Judah he was drawn up and sold to a caravan of Eastern merchantmen, who passed on their way to Egp. His coat, dabbled in blood, was taken to Jacob, who sorrowfully drew the natural inference. The merchants sold him in Egp. to Potiphar, a high officer of Pharaoh, in whose household faithfulness and ability won for him the first place. The Lord was with J., and he was a prosperous man. Swift reverse of fortune followed a false accusation by his master's w.; but, committed to prison, he so gained the confidence of the governor that he was entrusted with the oversight of the other prisoners. He was thus brought into contact with the chief butler and baker of Pharaoh in their misfortune, and his interpretation of their dreams received immediate vindication (Gn. 40.).

Two yrs. later, dreams of the k. wh. the sages of Egp. cd. not interpret brought J. his opportunity, and the wisdom of his counsel in view of the predicted famine so impressed the monarch that J. was entrusted with the carrying out of the great scheme proposed for the preservation of the people. He was raised to the second place in the empire, and, girt with the insignia of authority, he moved in a state only less than royal. He received the Egyptian name Zaphenath-Paneah (poss. "God spake and he came into life"), and married Asenath (poss. "belonging to Neith"), dr. of the priest of On = Heliopolis of the Greeks. During the seven yrs. of plenty a host of overseers under his direction collected a fifth part of the produce in each yr., and stored it at convenient centres throughout the country. His great powers now found a congenial sphere. Occupied in a task mighty in itself, and beneficent in its effects, he had the joy of making "the rough, stubborn current of events move to the rhythm of his own thoughts." Happy, too, in his domestic life, at the birth of a son he appears suddenly to have realised how utterly the old life of bitterness and repression was left behind him, and he calls his son Manasseh, "forgetting" (Gn. 41.[51]). A second son he calls Ephraim, "For God hath made me fruitful in the land of my affliction."

The famine, for wh. provision had been made, affected the neighbouring countries, and Jacob, hearing that there was corn in Egp., sent his sons thither fm. Can. to buy. Joseph alone cd. authorise the sale, so they had to appear before him. He knew his brs. at once, but they failed to recognise in this great Egyptian officer the poor lad whom they had maltreated. He used the opportunity to subject their char. to the most searching tests; and also to prove the sincerity of their affection for their aged fr. and Benj. his br. This involved an hour of anguish for Jacob, when Benj. must needs be taken and presented to "the lord of the land." But when satisfied upon these points, J.'s magnanimity was strikingly shown in the interview when he made himself known, and in the ample provision he made for them and his fr. in the land of his adoption. With the good-will of Pharaoh he sent and brought down his fr. and brs. to Egp. The land of GOSHEN, a district suited to their pastoral calling, was assigned to them, and there, for 17 yrs., Jacob spent an honoured and tranquil evening of life.

In the earlier stages of the famine the money of the Egyptians passed into the royal treasury in the purchase of corn: next their cattle—horses, flocks, herds, and asses—were given up: finally the people themselves and their land became the property of the Pharaoh. An allowance from the k. supported the priests, so their land did not need to be sold. The people thus became the serfs of Pharaoh, and tilled his land on terms specified by J. At the ingatherings they were to give "a fifth unto Pharaoh," a proportion wh., in the light of Oriental practice, seems eminently reasonable.

J. undertook to bury his fr. in Pal. (Gn. 47.[29ff.]), and presented his sons for the blessing of the dying Jacob (48.), who bestowed upon J. the "shoulder" or "mountain slope" wh. he had conquered for himself fm. the Amorites—doubtless Shechem is intended.

Jacob's funeral was conducted with great pomp to the cave of Machpelah (Gn. 50.[1ff.]). J.'s brs. feared lest, the restraint of his fr.'s presence being removed, he might now avenge himself upon them; but they were reassured by J., who saw the hand of God, and His purpose of good, in the evil wh. by them had befallen him. J. lived to see his children's children, to the third generation. Full of faith in his people's destiny, he directed his bones to be taken with them on their return to Pal. Then he died, being "an hundred and ten yrs. old." The fulfilment of his direction is recorded in Ex. 13.[19]; Jo. 24.[32]. Tradition points out his tomb in the opening of the valley E. of Nāblus.

The supremacy of Ephraim in later days led to "Joseph" being used as an appellation of the tribes forming the Northern Kdm. (Am. 5.[6]; Zc. 10.[6], &c.).

There is no good reason to doubt that the story of J. is in the main strictly historical. As the work of a Heb. writer at a long subsequent time, it naturally lacks details wh. a contemporary author wd. have supplied, e.g. the personal name of the Pharaoh. The colouring of the story is clearly Egyptian, altho' there is nothing sufficiently distinctive of any time, to fix definitely a particular date. The Pharaoh of the oppression is usually identd. with Ramses II., of the 19th dyn. (B.C. 1275–1208). If we accept Petrie's date for the Exodus, B.C. 1204, and add the 430 yrs. of Ex. $12.^{40}$, this carries us back to the reign of the Hyksos k., Apepa II., c. B.C. 1634, a date wh. there is nothing to contradict.

Famines of long duration are not unknown in Egp., owing to failure fm. various causes of the Nile overflow. Such a dearth prevailed in the yrs. A.D. 1064–1071. But it is of special interest to note that an inscr. found at el-Kab, in Upper Egp., dating fm. almost J.'s time, records a famine wh. may have been identl. with that of Gn. 41.

Critical analysis recognises two strands in the nar., E. and J., wh., with additions fm. P., are woven together in the story of Joseph (for details of analysis see Driver, LOT. 166). The act. given in the two sources was practically identical, with variations in minor points: e.g. in J. Judah, in E. Reuben, plays the leading part. In J. Joseph is sold to the Ishmaelites; in E. he is stolen by the Midianites, &c.

(2) The husband of Mary the mr. of Jesus, a native of Bethlehem in Judah, settled as a carpenter in Nazareth (Lk. $1.^{27}$, $2.^{4}$; Mw. $1.^{18ff.}$, $13.^{55}$); see GENEALOGY. He appears in the journey to Bethlehem, in the Temple at the presentation, in the flight to Egp., and the return to Nazareth. After 12 yrs. he goes to Jrs. with Jesus and Mary. There is no reason to think that his influence and protection were soon removed fm. the home. He and Mary seem to have brought up a large family (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). There is no act. of his death, wh. may have taken place before Jesus began His public ministry (cp. Jn. $19.^{26f.}$). The apocryphal Gospels contain nothing of value concerning J. The motive of the tradition wh. describes him as a very old man at the time of his marriage to Mary is sufficiently obvious.

(3) Joseph of Arimathæa, a rich man (Mw. $27.^{57}$) and honourable (Mk. $15.^{43}$), a member of the Sanhedrin (Lk. $23.^{50}$), and a secret disciple of Jesus (Jn. $19.^{38}$) who, poss. owing to the fear mentioned by John, either was absent fm., or did not vote at the trial of Jesus. The crucifixion seems to have roused his courage; taking all the risks involved in such an act, he begged the body of Jesus fm. Pilate, and, with Nicodemus (Lk. $23.^{50}$, &c.), prepared it hastily, and laid it to rest in his own, as yet, unused tomb. Nothing further is known of J. An anct. legend says he was sent to Britain by St. Philip, and settled on a small island in the river Brue, where Glastonbury now stands. A later tradition makes him bring the Holy Grail (see William of Malmesbury, De Ant. Glastonburgs. Eccl. i.; Nutt, Studies on the Legend of the Holy Grail). He is also said to have banished poisonous reptiles fm. Ireland (Ussher, Antiq. Eccl. Brit. 16).

(4) Joseph Barsabas (prop. "Barsabbas"), one of the early followers of Jesus, nominated with Matthias for Judas' place among the apostles (Ac. $1.^{23}$), surnamed Justus; poss. br. of Judas Barsabbas (Ac. $15.^{22}$). He is said to have been one of the Seventy (Euseb. HE. I. xii. 2). Eusebius quotes Papias to the effect that J. Barsabbas drank a deadly poison and suffered no injury (HE. III. xl. 11).

JOSES. (1) One of Jesus' brs. (Mw. $13.^{55}$; Mk. $6.^{3}$). (2) Br. of James the Less (Mw. $27.^{56}$; Mk. $15.^{40}$). (3) J., prop. Joseph (see BARNABAS, Ac. $4.^{36}$).

JOSHAH, one of the "princes in their families" of the tribe of Simeon, who, in the time of Hezekiah, raided the peaceful shepherd people in the neighbourhood of Gerar, children of Ham, and utterly destroyed them, taking possession of their pastures (1 Ch. $4.^{34ff.}$).

JOSHAPHAT. (1) The Mithnite (1 Ch. $11.^{43}$), one of David's mighty men. (2) One of the Levites who blew "with the trumpets before the Ark of God" (1 Ch. $15.^{24.}$ RV.).

JOSHBEKASHAH, one of the sons of Heman, who were set "under the hand of their father for song in the house of the Lord, with cymbals, psalteries, and harps, for the service of the house of God" (1 Ch. $25.^{4}$).

JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH. Instead of the AV. rendering, "that sat in the seat," to wh. no meaning can be attached, RV. gives the proper name (2 S. $23.^{8}$). The text is in disorder. The parallel passage in 1 Ch. $11.^{11}$ reads "Jashobeam the son of a Hachmonite" (RV.). This may prob. be taken as correct.

JOSHUA, BOOK OF. The canonical books of the OT. have been handed down by the Jews in three great divisions: Law, Prophets, and "Writings" (or Hagiographa). The first division is the Pentateuch. The second is twofold; the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, wh. are of a historical char., being called the "Former" Prophets, the "Latter" being the prophetical books properly so called, viz. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve Minor Prophets. The terms "former" and "latter" simply indicate the order in which the books stand in the collection, and not the order of date or composition; yet the designation of the historical books as prophets is a significant reminder that the collectors of the Canon regarded them as the work of prophetic men who were not mere annalists, but writers of hist. fm. a theocratic point of view. The Book of Joshua covers the period fm. the death of Moses to the death of Joshua. It is complete in itself, and falls into two main parts, the first relating the invasion and conquest of Pal., and the second the partition and allotment of the territory to the several tribes. In the first part (chaps. 1.–12.) we have the sending of the spies to Jericho, the miraculous passage of the Jordan, the capture of Jericho, the sin and punishment of Achan, the taking of Ai, and the confirming of the Covenant at Ebal and Gerizim. Then follows an account of the craft of the Gibeonites and the league of the southern kings, wh. is broken up by the great battle of Bethhoron. Another battle near the waters of Merom breaks a similar confederacy of northern kings. With this the subjugation of the whole country is practically assured, and a list is given of the conquered kings. In the second part (fm. chap. 13. onwards) the extent of the land to be divided being indicated, and particulars being given of the territory already assigned to the tribes to the East of Jordan, Joshua and Eleazar proceed to the allotment of the Western territory, the Tabernacle being meanwhile erected at Shiloh. The cities of refuge and the Levitical cities are designated, and the two tribes and a half are sent home to their inheritance. The last two chaps. contain Joshua's solemn farewell addresses to the people, the renewal of the Covenant, and a brief account of the death and burial of Joshua and of Eleazar.

Although self-contained, the book of J. links itself closely to the series of books wh. precede, especially to Deut., as is implicitly stated in the opening verses. It also forms a natural introduction to the historical books wh. follow, beginning with Judges, when the Israelites had to secure the occupation of the conquered country, and continuing, through Samuel and Kings, the hist. of the nation to the Exile. Accordingly, as might have been expected, it exhibits literary features of composition similar to those found elsewhere; and it is to be noted that, while in the canonical arrangement it heads a new series of historical works, it has closer literary affinities with the five books wh. precede. The same "sources" wh. critics discriminate in the Pnt. are found here; so that it is now customary to speak of the Hexateuch, or sixfold work, as a more exact designation than Pentateuch. There is nothing, however, to indicate that J. ever formed an integral part of such a composite work. On the other hand, critics are agreed that, though the "sources" out of wh. it is composed are the same, the disposal and relation of these are not the same as in the Pnt. For, whereas in the Pnt. the priestly source P. constitutes the final framework, in J. it is D. that controls and colours the presentation of the matter. It is, however, well to observe that what is called the Deuteronomic style is more than a merely literary feature, and that it belongs more to the matter itself than to its presentation. If we admit, what seems most credible even if it were not actually stated, that Moses delivered addresses in the sense of those contained in the book of Deut., there is no other style in which he could have done so than the Deuteronomic. Now Joshua, who had been closely associated with Moses, had the task assigned him of carrying out the work sketched by his predecessor. Consequently, in the earlier part of the book, where the situation and outlook are the same, the style and tone of Deut. are most observable. In the middle chaps., where the work to be done is of a statistical and administrative kind, and Eleazar the priest is associated with Joshua, the formal priestly style and phraseology appear; while, again, the closing address of Joshua is precisely after the manner of Moses in Deut.

The book does not profess to come fm. the hand of Joshua, but, like so many other OT. works, is anonymous. The great events it records, however, would make a deep and lasting impression on the national memory, and wd. be often rehearsed during "all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, and had known all the work of the Lord, that He had wrought for Isr." (24.[31]). Nor is it conceivable that the weighty words of the dying leaders, Moses and Joshua, shd. be dissipated into air, and find no echo till the reign of king Josiah. The book is far fm. complete as a record of the yrs. wh. it covers. The conquest is narrated in a brief and general fashion, as if the whole was accomplished in a few great battles, although it was the work of several yrs., and much remained to be done after Joshua's death (11.[8], 14.[7, 10]). It is remarkable that the subjugation of the great central division of the country is only mentioned in very general terms, although it must have been an arduous and continued operation (17.[14-18]). On the other hand, the boundaries of the tribes are drawn with such a regard to the natural features of the country, and the lists and order of the towns are so exact, that the chaps. containing these details have been called the Domesday-book of Isr., and have been of material assistance to mod. explorers in the identification and situation of anct. sites.

JOSIAH ("J″. supports"). (1) S. of Amon, who succeeded his fr. on the throne of Judah at the age of eight, c. B.C. 639. A reaction under Manasseh and Amon followed Hezekiah's attempt at reformation, and idolatry was once more rampant in the land. His fr.'s early death was a blessing in disguise to the youthful king. It placed him in his tender yrs. under more wholesome influences. The weakening of Asyr. freed Judah fm. anxiety, and the opening period of his reign is passed over in silence. The Scythian invasion of Syr., c. B.C. 630 (Herod. i. 100ff.), in wh. the prophets (Jr. 6.[1]; Zp. 1.[14ff.]) saw a threat of Divine vengeance upon faithless Judah, prob. roused J. to reforming zeal.

In his 18th yr., while repairs were being executed on the Temple, the bk. of the law was found, brought, and read before him. Its contents show it to have been practically identl. with our bk. of DEUTERONOMY. The k.'s fears were excited by its threats agst. disobedience of its requirements. These were confirmed by the prophetess HULDAH, who predicted disaster to Jrs., not, however, in J.'s time (2 K. 22.). Measures were at once adopted for thoroughly cleansing the Temple, the high places, and the whole land fm. idolatry. Worship was centralised in the Temple, and a great Passover was celebrated, the k. and people entering into a solemn covenant with God. Fm. this time forward the Heb. relg. is definitely associated with a sacred bk. Then, poss., the first step was taken towards the formation of a Canon of Scrip. J. seems to have availed himself of the Assyrian weakness to establish his authority over the province of Samaria (2 K. 23.[15, 19]). Thirteen yrs. of peace and prosperity followed. Then, B.C. 608, Pharaoh Necho marched agst. Syr., apparently intending to secure his position first in the N. Prob. fearing lest Egyptian success might ultimately mean the loss of Judah's independence, J. sallied forth to intercept the forces of Necho. He attacked them at Megiddo, and was defeated and slain.

The Chronicler varies somewhat the order of events. He records Necho's unwillingness to fight J., and also the great lamentation caused by J.'s death (2 Ch. 34., 35.).

(2) S. of Zephaniah, contemporary of Zechariah (Zc. 6.[10]). The text is corrupt.

JOSIPHIAH, the father, or perhaps rather the grandfather of Shelomith, one of Ezra's companions in the return (Ez. 8.[10]). In MT. a name has evidently fallen out before Shelomith. LXX (A) reads "and of the sons of Bani, Shelomith." This supplies the transliteration of the Heb. בָּנִי, wh. when written without the vowels is exactly the same in form as בְּנֵי, "sons." It might thus have been easily passed over in transcription.

JOT, a transcription of iῶτα, the name of the ninth and smallest letter of the Gr. alphabet. It is used by our Lord to indicate the very smallest thing (Mw. 5.[18]). More emphatically is yod, the corresponding letter of the Heb. square character, the smallest. Consonantally the word means "hand," and in the earlier scripts, e.g. in that of the Moabite Stone and of the Siloam Insc., it assumes the form of a roughly drawn conventionalised hieroglyph of a "hand." Even in later scripts as that of the Nāblus roll, and that of the Maccabean and Herodian coins, the resemblance is not lost.

As subsidiary evidence of the meaning of the word we may refer to the fact that the corresponding letter in Ethiopic is called yaman, "right hand."

In Egypt the small form of yod first appears on ostraca and on papyri. The fact that our Lord mentions in this connection, "tittle" (keraia), makes it almost certain that He referred to the Heb. letter; but this cannot in fairness be urged as a proof that He spoke ordinarily Aramaic. The phrase was a proverbial one taken over fm. Heb. much as it has come to be used in English. There is more plausibility in producing it as evidence that the "square character" was in use in the days of our Lord, that is, two centuries earlier than the Kefr Bir'im inscription. Even this conclusion is rendered insecure by the fact, mentioned above, that in the Heb. and Aram. script in Egp., yod is small. See TITTLE.

JOTBAH was the native place of Meshullemeth, daughter of Haruz and mother of Manasseh's son and successor Amon (2 K. 21.[19]). There is nothing to show that it was in Judah. It may be identical with Jotbathah (which is just the same name with locative ending), one of the stations in the wanderings described as "a land of rivers of waters" (Dt. 10.[7]), to the N. or NW. of EZION-GEBER (Nu. 33.[33f.]). Cheyne (EB. s.v.) would regard J. as a popular corruption of Jiftah "(God) opens (the womb)," Jiftah being a place in the Shephelah.

JOTHAM ("J". is perfect"). (1) Gideon's youngest son, who alone escaped the massacre by Abimelech (Jg. 9.[1ff.]), who warned the Shechemites agst. the usurper and fratricide, by the fable of the trees of the wood choosing a king. The fable emphasises the folly of the Shechemites in rejecting the legitimate sons of Gideon, and submitting to Abimelech. Incapable of protecting them, he cd. only work them harm. And so the event proved (Jg. 9.[22ff.]). (2) S. of UZZIAH, who acted as regent during his fr.'s sickness (2 K. 15.[5]), and then succeeded him on the throne of Judah. He built the upper gate of the Temple. He strengthened the country's defences, and made tributary the children of Ammon (2 Ch. 27.[1ff.]). The historians praise him, but recount few of his deeds. He reigned fm. 751 to 735 B.C. In his time the combination of Syr. and Samaria agst. Judah first showed itself (2 K. 15.[37]).

JOZABAD. (1, 2) Two men of Manasseh who, before battle was joined at Gilboa, left Saul and went over to David, going with him to Ziklag, and helping him in the pursuit and punishment of the raiding Amalekites (1 Ch. 12.[20f.]). (3) The Gederathite, who also came to David at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.[4]). (4) A Levite who prepared and supervised storehouses in the Temple, under Hezekiah, for the oblations, tithes, and dedicated things (2 Ch. 31.[13], 35.[9]). (5) The son of Jeshua, one of the Levites who took an inventory of the vessels of silver and gold in the Temple, wh. they had brought from Babylon, noting both number and weight (Ez. 8.[33f.]). (6) A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[22]).

(7) One of those who explained the law as read by Ezra (Ne. 8.[7]). (8) One of the Levites in Jerusalem after the Exile, who had charge of the outside business affecting the Temple (Ne. 11.[16]). The longer form Jehozabad occurs in 2 K. 12.[21], &c., of one of the servants of Joash, who conspired against and murdered their master: also in 2 Ch. 17.[18], 26.[4].

JOZACHAR, RV. JOZACAR ("J". remembers"), one of the murderers of Joash of Jrs. (2 K. 12.[21]). He is called Zabad in 2 Ch. 24.[26]. There seems to be some confusion in the text.

JOZADAK = JOSEDECH (Ez. 3.[2]; Ne. 12.[26]).

JUBAL, son of Lamech and Ada, described as "the father of all such as handle the harp and the organ" (RV. "pipe," Gn. 4.[21]). The name is from the same root as yōbēl, "ram's horn," wh. gave the title to the Jubilee. The ascription of the invention of harp and pipe to one whose brother was the first to follow the nomad life (see Jabal) is in harmony with the thought of the ancient world, wh. associated their origin with the shepherd life. With the Greeks, Pan was the inventor of the pipe, Apollo of the lyre, both being devoted to pastoral occupations.

Wilderness of Judæa

JUBILEE (Heb. yōbēl, "the sound of a trumpet" [Ges.], "a ram" [Fuerst, following Aqiba]). After the seventh Sabbatic year, another year wh. had all the characteristics of that wh. had preceded it was added. By this additional year the septennial system was brought into harmony with the centennial, as the J. was half a century. The J. was inaugurated on the Day of Atonement, the 10th of Tishri, by the blowing of a trumpet. While Tishri, as the 7th month, fitted into the septenary idea that permeated Jewish chronology, it was also the month when the ploughing and sowing for the following year's harvest had to be accomplished; hence the blowing of the trumpet of J. forestalled the beginning of tillage: the J. thus was really the latter half of the 49th year and the 1st of the 50th. Ewald thinks that the purpose of the J. was primarily to prevent the accumulation of the land in the hands of a few. If the Isr. sold his field he cd. not alienate it absolutely; it returned at the J.; hence the six months during wh. agriculture was possible wd. be spent in adjusting ownership. The case of houses in a walled town was different; they became the absolute property of their purchaser unless redeemed within a year. To that exception there was an exception—houses in a Levitical city. They returned to their original owners at the J. That there is no mention of the J. in pre-Exilic literature till Ezekiel is not conclusive agst. its being in force; one wd. learn little of the laws of inheritance in England fm. Goldsmith's History. The fact that Isaiah and Micah denounce those who "lay field to field" (Is. 5.[8]) only proves that the law was evaded; while the comparative rarity of the references to that form of oppression indicates that some process not unlike the restoration of lands at the J. had real existence. The relation of the J. to the Sabbatic Year will be treated under that head. The account of the J. in Lv. 25. is attributed to H. ("the Law of Holiness"), supposed to date fm. the time of Ezekiel; but his references (Ek. 7.[12, 13]) imply the restoration at the J. to be a usage well known. Sabbatic Year.—The land was to be tilled six years, but on the seventh it was to lie fallow. This rest-year is brought into close relationship with the weekly Sabbath (Ex. 23.[10, 11]). While it is a possible, it is by no means a necessary interpretation, that every seven years the whole country wd. remain untilled: the absence of the phrase in the account of the Sabbatic Year "throughout all your land," wh. is used in regard to the J., is to be noted. Its relation to the service of the Heb. who sold himself confirms this view (Dt. 15.[12]); after he had served six years, "then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free fm. thee": the seventh year of release was individual in its application, not general. The fact that "seven sabbaths of years" were to be numbered for the J. at first implies that the Sabbatic Year was general, but it really is to be taken as "weeks of years" (cp. Lv. 23.[15]).

JUDÆA was the name given to the land reoccupied by the Jews after the Exile (Ant. XI. v. 6, &c.; 1 M. 10.[38], &c.). The boundaries varied fm. time to time. It may be said genly. that the province extended fm. Samaria in the N. to Arabia

Petræa in the S.; and fm. the Mediterranean in the W. to the Jordan in the E. (BJ. III. iii. 5). To it belonged cert. cities on the sea coast, including Ptolemais. It was divided into 11 toparchies, Jrs. forming a district by itself, and presiding over the others. In NT. the name usually indicates the most southerly of the three great divisions of western Pal. (Lk. 4.[44], RVm.; Ac. 10.[37], &c.). It formed part of Herod's kdm. given to Archelaus. When he was deposed it was attached to the province of Syria. The wilderness of J. (Mw. 3.[1]) prob. indicates the "Jeshimon" or desert W. of the Dead Sea.

nated to act for Judah at the future allocation of the land of promise (Nu. 34.[19]). To this tribe belonged Achan, whose sin brought the first discomfiture to the army of Isr. (Jo. 7.).

As the records stand it is not easy to construct a self-consistent narrative of the capture of the territory occupied by J. Jo. 11.[21ff.] attributes the conquest to Joshua. In Jo. 14.[6ff.], 15.[13ff.], this honour is, in part at least, assigned to Caleb. Again (Jg. 1.[3ff.]) this part of the country is said to have been conquered by Judah, with the assistance of Simeon. The conquest of the Phil. cities named in the nar. proved only temporary; that of Jrs.

Uplands of Judah near Hebron

JUDAH (Heb. Yehūdāh, "praised"), fourth son of Jacob and Leah (Gn. 29.[35]), born at Padan Aram. The part he played in the experience of Joseph at Dothan compared favourably with that of his brs. (Gn. 37.[26f.], &c.). A story greatly to his discredit is told in Gn. 38. He appears early to have taken a leading position among his brethren. It is not darkly indicated that on account of Reuben's infamy, and the crime of Simeon and Levi, he was promoted to the place and honours of the first-born (Gn. 34., 35.[22], 49.[5ff.]). In the Blessing of Jacob he is compared to "a lion's whelp" (Gn. 49.[9]), and a long supremacy is promised him (v. 10; see Shiloh). The children of Joseph clearly felt that they had strong claims to the leadership (Gn. 49.[22ff.]; 1 Ch. 5.[2]). Thus were planted the seeds of discord and rivalry wh. were destined later to bring forth such bitter fruit. J. died, and appears to have been buried in Egp. (Ex. 1.[6]).

For the strength of the tribe of Judah at the two numberings in the Wilderness, see Numbers. The standard of the camp of J. was on the east side of the Tabernacle, toward the sunrising. The "prince of the children of J." was Nahshon, s. of Amminadab. Along with J. were the tribes of Issachar and Zebulun (Nu. 2.[3], &c., 10.[14], &c.). Among the spies J. was represented by Caleb, the s. of Jephunneh (Nu. 13.[6]). The same "prince" was desig-

(Jg. 1.[8]) did not include the fortress of Jebus; and the city was assigned to the Benjamites (v. 21).

The actual boundaries of the territory occupied by Judah, part of it being assigned to Simeon (Jo. 19.[1ff.]), cannot be traced with certainty. According to Jo. 15. it lay between the Dead Sea on the E. and the Mediterranean on the W. It marched on the N. with the S. frontier of Benjamin fm. the Jordan to Kirjath-jearim; thence it ran westward to the sea. On the S. it reached to a line drawn fm. the S. end of the Dead Sea. Thro' the Ascent of Akrabbim, Zin, Kadesh-barnea, Hezron, Adar (RV. Addar), Karka, and Azmon, to the River of Egypt, Wādy el-'Arīsh. This comprised the southern end of the central range, sloping away into the desert, the Shephelah, and the Phil. plain. Of this last, however, Judah never became the acknowledged master. Much of the mountain land was rocky and barren. The hills W. of the Dead Sea formed a dreary and forbidding wilderness. There were many fertile tracts, however, and the vales were fruitful. The traces of ancient terraces show with what industry the inhabitants must have improved such opportunities as there were for the cultivation of vines and other produce. Withal, the country was better adapted for pastoral than for agricultural pursuits.

The poverty of the land may be said to have constituted its safety. It might be approached along the line of the main road fm. the N. The valleys running into the mountains fm. E. and W. were possible avenues of attack. The country was also accessible fm. the S. But the approach was in every case beset with difficulties; and involved perilous enterprise, wh. even in the case of complete victory, there was little to reward.

While owning a common ancestry, and dwelling in the same land, the relations between the various tribes seem to have been loose. Judah furnished no Judge to Isr., and does not appear in the song of Deborah. Judah acquiesced in the choice of Saul as king, the more easily no doubt, as he did not spring fm. Ephraim; and the hist. of David affords evidence of Judæan loyalty to the son of Kish. Judah, however, gave to Isr. her greatest kings, David and Solomon, in whose line He was destined to come, who should be the glory of Isr. and the Saviour of the world.

From the point of union under Saul, the story of the tribe passes into that of Israel. Details of the hist. will be found in the articles dealing with the kings of Judah.

JUDAH. (1) A town marking the E. end of the N. boundary of Naphtali (Jo. 19.34), called "Judah upon (or "at," RV.) Jordan, toward the sunrising." Many scholars think that the text is corrupt. Thomson (LB. ii. 466) wd. ident. it with Seiyid Yehûda, lit. "Lord Judah," a small white-domed sanctuary, c. three miles S.E. of Tell el-Qâḍy. (2) A city of Juda (RV. "Judah"), the home of Elizabeth and Zacharias (Lk. 1.39), prob. ident. with Jutah.

JUDAS. In the NT. six men bear this name. (1) Judas of Damascus.—All we know for certain about him is contained in Ac. 9.11. To him belongs the honour of having sheltered Saul under his roof, while the latter was passing through a great spiritual crisis.

(2) Judas Barsabbas, referred to in Ac. 15.22, 27, 32, 33. Though not an apostle he ranked as a chief man among the brethren and, along with Silas, was the bearer of letters fm. the Jrs. Church to the Church in Antioch, relating to certain difficult points of conduct wh. had emerged. He exhorted the wavering Christians and helped to confirm them in the faith.

(3) Judas of Galilee, mentioned in Ac. 5.37. He figured as leader of a popular revolt agst. a tax imposed by the governor of Syria. The movement ended in disaster, and it is believed that Judas perished. To this rebellion some have attributed the formation of the party called Zealots.

(4) Judas, not Iscariot.—The only word ascribed to him in the Gospels is found in Jn. 14.22, "Lord how is it that Thou wilt manifest Thyself unto us and not unto the world?" He is generally identified with Thaddæus (Mk. 3.18), and with Lebbæus (Mw. 10.3), and is therefore known as the three-named apostle.

In Lk. 6.16 and Ac. 1.13 we find the words, "Judas of James." This means son of James, not brother, as in AV.

(5) Jude, the Lord's brother (Mw. 13.55; Mk. 6.3), author of Epistle of Jude. In v. 1 he calls himself br. of James. This is explained by the fact that in his view the spiritual relationship took precedence of the physical: and James was then so well known that to be styled his brother was a sufficient identification. Verse 17 leads us to believe he was not an apostle. Though, like the rest of his brethren, he may not have been in sympathy with Christ at the first (Jn. 7.5), he was among the believers immediately after the resurrection (Ac. 1.13).

(6) Judas Iscariot, the chief facts of whose history, as recorded in NT., are these. He was the only Judæan among the twelve—the other eleven hailing fm. Galilee—and came fm. Kerioth, a town on the south border of the tribe of Judah; hence the surname Iscariot, or man of Kerioth. In the lists of apostles he is always mentioned last in the last group of four (Mw. 10.4; Mk. 3.19; Lk. 6.16). He was made purser of the little band, no doubt on the ground of fitness and trustworthiness (Jn. 12.6; 13.29). When Mary anointed the Saviour's feet he voiced the displeasure felt by himself and others at the waste of ointment (Jn. 12.4). He went forth to cast out demons and heal diseases (Mw. 10.1; Lk. 9.1), and it is thought he even partook of the Last Supper. For thirty pieces of silver he sold his Master, and afterwards, in a fit of remorse and self-loathing, destroyed himself. He has come down through history as "Judas, who also betrayed Him"—

> "The base Judæan, who sold a pearl > Richer than all his tribe."

Choice of Judas.—Why did Christ admit him to the inner circle? He did so, say some, in order that he might be the instrument of His betrayal, and so lead to the fulfilment of Scrip. Agst. this our moral sense revolts. It is Christ's way to give every man a chance. There were elements in Judas that developed into a traitor, but there were also elements in virtue of wh. he might have become a great apostle. By introducing him to the circle of His influence Christ gave him a magnificent opportunity. He gambled it away, but the fault was all his own. He went out into the night and his own hand opened the door.

Motive of Betrayal.—One theory is that he meant well. Christ seemed lacking in the power of self-assertion, and the betrayal was a tactical move for the purpose of forcing His hand and hastening His triumph. This opinion is ingenious but, while more than just to Judas, it is much less than just to Scrip. A mere tactical blunder wd. never be ascribed to possession by Satan (Jn. 13.[27]). Nor wd. Christ have spoken as He did speak, of the man who made the blunder (Mw. 26.[24]). The following points shd. be noted :—

(1) Judas was the only Judæan in the band. In this, human nature being what it is, lay the materials of friction between him and his fellow-disciples—a little thing, but sufficient, in an aggravated situation, to turn the balance to the wrong side. (2) Judas was avaricious and a thief (Jn. 12.[6]). It has been argued that had greed been a factor he wd. have bargained for a larger sum. Agst. this may be set the thought that a man free fm. avarice wd. have made no bargain at all. (3) Judas was a disappointed man. His aspirations had not been realised. And as the days went by, and Christ refused to pander to the popular desire (Jn. 6.[15]), he became more sullen and restless. Add to this the fact that Christ saw through Judas, and that Judas knew he was seen through. These things, when put together—his position as an alien, his avarice, his disappointed ambition, his uneasiness under the penetrating glance of Christ—make the crime at least intelligible.

Two accounts of his end, difficult to harmonise, are given in Mw. 27.[3-10]; Ac. 1.[16-20]. The one clear thing is that he was urged on to a violent death by despair. There was grace enough in him to make life intolerable. And one lesson fm. his career is that a favourable environment does not, of itself, ensure goodness. S. M. Riddick.

JUDE, EPISTLE OF. This epistle, "full of strong words and heavenly grace, tho' it be but a few lines in length" (Origen), found very general acceptance by the end of the second cent., and by the end of the third, notwithstanding its use of apocryphal books, wh. was a stumbling-block to many, it found its way into the Canon. That Jude the br. of the Lord was the author, was also admitted, and the majority of writers who accept the book as belonging to the apostolic age accept the tradition, without, however, identifying the author with Judas the apostle, as was done by earlier writers fm. a misreading of Lk. 6.[16] (the RV. reads "son," not "brother"). If Jude the br. of the Lord was the author, the epistle could not be later than A.D. 80, for we know fm. the incident of Jude's grandchildren being brought before Domitian that Jude was dead by that time, and on the other hand it cd. not be earlier than about A.D. 70, for it is the last time—apostolic prophecies are being fulfilled and apostolic teaching is a memory. The probability is that it was written about A.D. 70–75, and fm. Palestine. The occasion was an outbreak of Antinomianism in some of the churches that had enjoyed apostolic teaching—where we cannot say, but it is likely fm. v. 5 to have been a Gentile church or churches, not Jewish, as has been commonly held. The epistle has literary affinities wh. are important and interesting. The author is familiar with the LXX, and with the apocryphal writings, also with Paul, while his resemblance to the Didaché is so strong as to suggest the same author. But most interesting of all is his relation to 2 Peter. Wh. of the two is the original will probably never be settled, but at the present time the tendency is to give the priority to Jude—his epistle is so much of a piece, and it is difficult to see why he shd. so alter Peter's words if (as some say) he quoted him for authority ; while on the other hand it is quite intelligible that Peter, quoting fm. memory, shd. make many changes.

Summary.—Salutation.—He greets his readers as called and kept, and as for himself, he is the servant of Jesus Christ ("reverential awe," says Clement of Alexandria, keeps him fm. writing "brother") ; but when he adds "and br. of James," his relation to the Lord will be seen at once, for James was universally known as the Lord's br. (vv. 1, 2).

His purpose.—He was to have written at any rate about the "common salvation" (a Greek phrase, "the safety of the state," pressed into Christ's service), but this outbreak of Antinomianism makes him all the more insistent that they should contend earnestly for the faith (as embodying the principles of morality and religion), wh. was once for all delivered to the saints, and to reject the plausible sophistries of men who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness (vv. 3, 4).

The Antinomians described ; their moral affinity, their genealogy, and their impending doom.—These men who deny the Lord that bought them are like the backsliding Israelites who perished in the wilderness ; like the angels who kept not their own principality, and who are kept under darkness unto the judgment of the great day (founded on Gn. 6.[1-4] as amplified in The Book of Enoch, a collection of apocalypses written between B.C. 95 and A.D. 70) ; like the men of Sodom and Gomorrah, who went to shameful excess in fleshly lust and perished with their cities. Insolent also in their wickedness, these men rail at constituted Church authority, following the example, not of the archangel Michael, who restrained himself even in argument with the devil (quoted fm. the Jewish apocalypse, The Assumption of Moses), but of Cain, who killed his br., from whom he differed in religious worship ; of Balaam, who cursed God's people and then enticed them into sin, for money ; of Korah, who had the hardihood to gainsay Moses and Aaron ; and as all those sinners perished so will they (vv. 5–11). Then in vv. 12, 13, he reveals in detail their true char. ; they are hidden rocks (Peter has "spots"), greedy, neglectful shepherds, clouds without water, disappointing hope, autumn trees twice dead, not only for the winter but for ever, wild waves of the sea foaming out their own shame, wandering stars, comets wh. leave their course and disappear for ever in the darkness. The doom of such was foretold (vv. 14–17), even so long ago as by Enoch, the seventh fm. Adam (quoted fm. The Book of Enoch); the apostles also, in later ages, foresaw it, and now the time has come. They need not think that they will escape. They may deceive men by their blustering and their cringing, but they will not deceive God. They will assuredly perish; but as for the saints they need have no fear (vv. 17–23), only let them persevere in holiness, keeping themselves in the love of God. And as for any who have fallen they are not at once to be given up as hopeless; some may be rescued, esp. at the earlier stages—let them discriminate.

Doxology.—There is no need for falling, Christ can keep them—to Him be glory! (vv. 24, 25).

JUDGES, THE BOOK OF. The book of Judges, though not history in the proper sense of the word, is, nevertheless, one of the most important books in the Bible for the right understanding of the early history and religion of Israel. The word "Judges," as the title of this book, is not used in its modern sense. The Hebrew judges were men of war, not men of peace; men of the sword, not men of the wig and gown. The conclusion to which this title might lead an ordinary reader, viz., that these Hebrew judges held some judicial office, is erroneous. In point of fact, with few exceptions, they were all men of such martial prowess as to be able not only to lead the Israelites in war but to lead them successfully. The judges belonged to various tribes; and for the time, at least, the tribe of which the judge was himself a member generally exercised a kind of hegemony over the other tribes. This fact points to a most striking characteristic of the period. It was a time of great political division.

This book practically covers the period during which the loosely confederated tribes of Israel were being gradually welded into a political and religious unity. It fills up the gap between the books of Joshua and Samuel, Samuel being regarded as the founder of the monarchy. The period of the judges is in the history of Israel precisely what the Heptarchy is in the history of England. When the reins of power fell from the strong hands of Joshua, the disruptive tendencies, which neither the forty years' wandering in the desert nor the legislative enactments of Moses had eradicated, were not long in manifesting themselves. Indeed, the very variety of fortune which attended the several tribes in their attempts to gain a firm hold over the parts of the Promised Land assigned them, tended to perpetuate and increase tribal jealousies; but, had it not been for the book of Judges, we should not have been able to realise the bitterness of feeling that sometimes arose between kindred tribes worshipping the same God. The level of the social, moral, and religious life so graphically described in this book cannot be said to be high.

The book itself naturally divides into three very unequal parts. The first part extends only to the fifth verse of chap. 2., and is historically of quite a different character from the other two parts. The second forms the main body of the work, and consists of chaps. 2.[6]–16. This is "The Book of Judges proper." The third part consists of chaps. 17.–21., and is made up of two unconnected episodes, introduced without any regard to chronological order, but intended to illustrate the moral and social, the political and religious characteristics of the age. Had such dark incidents not been narrated, it would have been difficult to believe that a people, specially chosen to hand on to coming generations of mankind the knowledge of the true God, could have remained, long after they were thus chosen by Jehovah, so very low in the scale both of personal and of national morality as these incidents prove that the Israelites did remain. That the descendants of such men as we find depicted here were able to learn the Divine lessons at all ought to convince us that the days of progress are not yet ended. Surely a generation like our own, which realises so much more clearly than any previous generation the sins and imperfections of its own time, should be capable of advancing at once further and more rapidly than any of those that have preceded. Any one inclined to doubt whether the world is really becoming better, cannot do anything more likely to dispel such doubts than turn to this book of Scripture and thus learn how far the world has travelled towards the light of Divine righteousness since those old days when "every man did that which was right in his own eyes."

The first section, chap. 1.–2.[5], appears, at first sight, to be an introduction intended to connect the book of Judges with that of Joshua. But, on closer examination, this section is found to be written from quite a different standpoint. For instance, it represents the tribe of Judah as assuming, immediately after Joshua's death, the leadership of the other tribes, or at any rate as the tribe which showed the others how to conquer the Canaanites. Yet in the chief section of the book, which we have called "The Book of Judges proper," there is not a single instance of this premier tribe doing anything at all except tamely surrendering Samson to the Philistines (Jg. 15.[13]), after having humbly acknowledged that the Philistines were their suzerain lords: "Knowest thou not that the Philistines are rulers over us" (15.[11]). Judah is indeed commanded to go up first against the children of Benjamin (20.[18]). But this is in the third section, and is just one of the statements which prove that this third section likewise possesses a distinct character of its own. This first section of Judges shows us how we must interpret passages in Joshua which, if taken by themselves, would mean that the whole of Palestine had been conquered by the Israelites in the time of Joshua, and that "there had not stood a man of all their enemies before them" (Jo. 21.[43-45]). So far from that being literally true, this section tells us that tribe after tribe was unable to drive out the idolatrous inhabitants of the districts of Canaan assigned it by Jehovah. In fact, of the tribes of Asher, Naphtali, and Dan, it is here explicitly said that they dwelt among the Canaanites (1.[31, 33, 34]), and not, as in the case of the other tribes, that the Canaanites dwelt among them (e.g. 1.[29, 30]). Hence this section clearly proves that in many districts the Canaanites had not been so utterly vanquished as is stated in Joshua.

The second section is the most characteristic part of Judges, and practically covers the period during which the often more than semi-independent tribes of Israel were being gradually welded into a compact and homogeneous whole, and it also contains the religious philosophy of Israel, which the author desired to commend to all pious and patriotic readers. For this purpose the author set the main events of his narrative in a religious framework, if we may so speak, which is indicated by the constantly recurring formula: "The Israelites did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah, and served the Baalim and the Asheroth. So the Israelites provoked Jehovah, their God, to anger, and He sold them into the hands of their enemies. Then when they cried unto Jehovah He raised up for the Israelites a saviour who saved them from the hand of their enemies; and the land had peace for many years." This religious interpretation of Israel's history is seen most distinctly in chaps. 2.[6]–3.[6], and must unquestionably be much later than the histories of the individual judges. It has quite a Deuteronomic colouring, whereas the histories of the several judges bear distinct traces of their local or tribal origin, and are beyond a doubt very early. They may indeed, in some cases, have been originally handed down by oral tradition, sometimes in poetry, sometimes in prose, and sometimes even in both forms, and may well enough have been put into their present literary form about the beginning of the monarchy. On the other hand, the religious framework into which these separate stories were subsequently set, is in all probability as late as the end of the kingdom of Judah itself, when Jehovah's plan was most clearly revealed by the events of history. The late Professor A. B. Davidson affirms that "to bring this reading of history down to our own level, we must read second causes into the movements and the operations of the people's mind. The author speaks of Israel as an ideal unity, and attributes to this unity defections which no doubt characterised only fragments of the whole; for a falling away of a whole people to Baal and then a conversion of it to Jehovah, to be followed by a similar falling away again 20 or 40 years later, is not after the manner of history nor in accordance with the operations of the human mind or heart." The book is not simply history, restricted to an exact statement of facts, but is written for the purpose of showing that the lives of all the judges teach one and the same lesson—the lesson, namely, that Israel's apostasy from Jehovah invariably resulted not merely in spiritual loss but in temporal misfortune. The regularity with which this lesson is drawn in almost the same words from occurrences of the most diverse kind, is conclusive proof that the author's object was not to describe historical facts but to impress his readers with his own interpretation of such facts. It was not without good reason, therefore, that the Jews included this book among "the earlier prophets," for, although the historical garb has been donned with such skill that it is often the only thing that attracts attention, no intelligent reader has difficulty in detecting underneath that garb the same spirit that animated the prophets of Israel. There are six principal judges and six minor judges, the number 12 being doubtless chosen to correspond with the number of the tribes. But the times of declension and deliverance are to be regarded as six, not twelve, being determined by the principal judges only. These are Othniel, Ehud, Deborah, Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson. It is noteworthy that five of the minor judges arose before and after Jephthah, Tola and Jair before him (10.[1-5]), and Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon after him. It is still more noteworthy that Abimelech is never called "judge," but king (9.[6]) or prince (9.[22]). Moreover it was after Abimelech's coronation as king that Jotham, standing on the top of Mt. Gerizim, shouted aloud to the men of Shechem the exquisite parable of the trees desiring to anoint a king over them (9.[7-21]). From 10.[1] it might be plausibly argued that Abimelech is nevertheless regarded as a judge, thus making the needed twelfth. On the other hand, it has been argued with still greater plausibility that the shadowy Shamgar of 3.[31] has been brought into being for the purpose of taking the place of Abimelech, whose death by the hand of a woman unfitted him, in the estimation of this redactor, for being reckoned as one of the twelve. It is certainly a strange coincidence that in one Greek version this verse about Shamgar should stand as the final verse of the second section, viz. after 16.[31].

It is fortunate that, in this book, we find one remarkable instance of the same historical event being recorded both in prose and poetry, viz. the victory of Deborah and Barak over Sisera. A careful comparison of this double narrative leads to the conclusion that, despite the license both in thought and language allowed to the more vivid imagination of a poet, the poem is more trustworthy even in details than the prose narrative. Yet this is exactly what the laws of criticism wd. lead us to expect. The culture and civilisation of Israel, during this stormy transition period, when it was slowly changing from a nomadic life to that of a settled, agricultural people, were not such that we could reasonably expect any Literature except poetry, which would at first be handed down by successive generations of travelling minstrels,* whose profession was the singing of national songs and the telling of folk-lore stories, both secular and religious, in the market-squares of the larger towns, by the cross-ways where the village fathers met in council, and in the scattered homes of a hospitable, intelligent, but as yet illiterate peasantry. In this way the Song of Deborah may have been handed down through several generations before it was ever committed to writing. Now, according to the prose narrative of chap. 4., who was suzerain lord of the land? Jabin, described as sole "King of Canaan," whose commander-in-chief was Sisera. In the poem, however, there are several kings of Canaan, of whom Sisera was the chief. Again, from 4.[6, 10] it is clear that the 10,000 picked men who defeated Sisera, Jabin's commander-in-chief, were drawn from only two tribes, Zebulun and Naphtali. But in the poem no less than six of the tribes are praised for the part they played in the decisive struggle (5.[14-18])—Ephraim, Benjamin, Manasseh, Zebulun, Issachar, and Naphtali. From v. 15 the inference might be legitimately drawn that both Deborah and Barak belonged to the tribe of Issachar, and that to the impetuous onset of Issachar's princes, with Barak at their head, the victory was mainly due. It is, however, to be noted that Zebulun alone is mentioned twice, and that the emphatic praise given to Zebulun and Naphtali for their reckless bravery in the high places of the field would entitle us, especially as they are named last, to infer that the author regarded them as the bravest of the brave, by whose prowess, at the critical moment, victory was snatched as it were from the very jaws of defeat. Notice, also, which tribes the poet satirises for their refusal to fight the battles of Jehovah: Reuben, Jacob's first-born, Gilead, or the tribes on the E. of Jordan, and those dwelling by the Western Sea, Dan and Asher. But the most remarkable fact of all is that Judah is not even mentioned. It does not seem a far-fetched inference that this foreshadows the cleavage which eventually resulted in the disruption of the Davidic kingdom. Benjamin is indeed mentioned as an enthusiastic member of the Northern Confederacy; and though its fortunes were ultimately identified with those of Judah, the fact that Benjamin at this juncture separated itself from Judah, its most powerful neighbour and also its natural ally and protector, is the strongest testimony to the strength of the patriotic enthusiasm aroused by Deborah's resolve to overthrow the tyranny of the Canaanite over-lords, despite their having succeeded in disarming all the able-bodied men of war in Israel. The most illuminating verse in this whole poem, and indeed in the whole book of Judges, is that which gives us the "contemporary" estimate of the number of fighting men Israel cd. put into the field:

> Was there a spear or a shield seen
> Among Israel's forty thousand fighting men? (5.[8])

What a contrast this estimate is from the figures given in Numbers, viz. 600,000 men of war. We do not need the acumen of a practised statistician to tell which estimate must come nearest the historical fact. See NUMBERS.

The outstanding religious characteristic of this poem is that the author had a firm conviction that Jehovah and Israel were indissolubly connected, that there was an ideal Israel that belonged to Jehovah and was assured of victory. Jehovah was the God of Israel and Israel the people of Jehovah. That this intense consciousness of the ideal unity of Israel being due to Israel's worship of Jehovah is found in the very earliest of Hebrew poems is surely the best possible proof that Israel's religion was, from the first, the ruling factor in Israel's national life, a factor which continued to dominate its national development till it ceased to have a land which it could call its own. The poem begins and ends by extolling Jehovah, the God of Israel, who destroys His enemies and blesses all who love Him. This beautiful and artistic poem, though predominantly lyrical, contains the germ, and indeed more than the germ, of dramatic poetry, for this pæan of victory could with the utmost ease be expanded into a drama. This is obvious from the two final stanzas or "scenes," as these stanzas might well be called. In the first we are transported in fancy to a solitary tent in the desert plain, where we see Jael standing erect with Sisera dead at her feet. The next takes us, with lightning speed, to the royal palace in Harosheth Haggoyim, from the lighted windows of which we see the face of Sisera's mother peering out into the darkness of the night as she sleeplessly watches for her son's return, ever and anon anxiously saying to her attendant maidens: "Why is his chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariots?" Then, with consummate irony, this great poet of Israel lets us hear the answer of the wisest ladies of Sisera's court, an answer characteristic of that age: "Have they not found? Have they not divided the spoil? A damsel or two for every man: for Sisera a spoil of divers colours, a spoil of divers colours of embroidery fit for the neck of his queen." What irony to make words like these be heard by the victorious Israelites at the very moment they are themselves dividing the spoils of Sisera and his vanquished host!

* The Tel el-Amarna tablets show, however, that writing was then well known, although its use may have been confined mainly to correspondence, wh., while not "Literature," suggests possibilities.

It is quite safe to infer from the artistic finish of this "gem of Hebrew poetry" as Reuss calls it, that the literary sense of the Hebrew people had already become well developed; otherwise such a poet as the author of this song could not have found a suitable environment for the development and exercise of his poetic genius. Though there may not have been much writing, if any, there must certainly have been much reciting and singing of poetry. As there was not as yet even the beginning of a prose Literature among the Israelites, it is the retentiveness of the Oriental memory that we have to thank for having preserved to us this splendid specimen of early Hebrew poetry.

From the moral point of view, this poem is equally interesting, giving, as it does, a true picture of the moral character of the people in that rough and barbarous age. Note the ferocity of the curses hurled against the inhabitants of Meroz for failing to come to the help of Jehovah against the mighty, and the delight with which the ruthless treachery of Jael is lauded, so that she is even declared to be "blessed above women." Nay more, though she had been guilty of breaking the law of hospitality, a law regarded with special reverence by all who "dwell in tents," the poet actually emphasises this blessing by adding: "Blessed shall she be above women in the tent." The poet therefore can hardly have been himself "a dweller in tents." It was only because Israel had already left the age of tents behind it that this benediction of Jael was possible.* This poet stood, as it were, where the two streams of nomad life and of settled life had for a while commingled. The process of transition may still be seen in the borderland between the settled districts and the "circuits" of the nomads. Jael's tent had often been pitched in places where the dwellers in houses far outnumbered the dwellers in tents. Despite these blemishes, however, this poem is a worthy monument of a crisis in Israel's history that was never forgotten. As König so happily puts it, in alluding to the artifice of Epanaphora which so frequently occurs, "Its verses go tumbling on, foaming like the waves of the Kishon on whose banks the victory was won."

* There are, however, certain Arabs who, for what seems to them sufficient reason, do not hesitate to slay the guest. If the deed were done in a popular cause, it would undoubtedly find laudators. To this day the settled peoples in Pal. reverence the laws of hospitality. The text does not, of course, suggest that Deborah and Barak were nomads.

Though the song is universally called the Song of Deborah, the phrase is not to be taken to mean that Deborah herself was the author. No doubt the redactor to whom is due 5.[1] followed the tradition that Deborah had not only sung it but written it, a tradition strengthened by the mistranslation of v. 7, "Until that I, Deborah, arose," which ought to be translated, "Until that thou, O Deborah, didst arise: until that thou didst arise, a mother in Israel," exactly as in v. 12, "Awake, awake, O Deborah." The very awkwardness of the construction in the original of 5.[1] shows us that this verse is the work of a redactor, for it states that the Song was sung not only by Deborah, but by Barak, and that, too, on the very day of the battle, a literary feat infinitely more difficult of accomplishment than the winning of the victory itself. Could this magnificent poem have been composed the very day the momentous events it celebrates took place? To put the question is to answer it.*

The poet evidently belonged to one of the Northern tribes, probably to Barak's own tribe, Naphtali, the most northern of all, and the tribe, therefore, that could deservedly claim the greatest éclat from Barak's triumph, and among whose members that triumph would create the wildest enthusiasm. The author may have been not merely a contemporary of the events he describes so well. He may have been an actual eye-witness of them, or at all events have heard these events described by those who were themselves eye-witnesses of them. The poem has all the freshness and vivid local colouring which a recent personal experience might be expected to give to the poet's words. It is impossible to believe that a poem so exquisite in its finish should be the only one of its kind in Israel; and the very perfection of the sole survivor deepens our regret at the greatness of the loss, both historical and literary, which subsequent generations have sustained through the disappearance of all the rest of these early oral Hebrew poems.

Though this book, therefore, contains the earliest Hebrew poem we possess, nevertheless it was put into its present form by redactors, some of whom were actually post-exilic. This is proved by the traces of the Priestly Code contained in chaps. 20. and 21., e.g. the 400,000 foot soldiers that assembled at Mizpeh to punish the Benjamites for their treatment of a Levite. Hence most scholars have now come to the conclusion that in Judges we have the same four great strata that exist in the Hexateuch—viz. narratives from E., the prophetic school of writers belonging to the Northern tribes; from J., the prophetic school of writers belonging to the Southern tribes; from D., writers belonging to the Deuteronomic school; and from P., the school of priestly writers to whom are due the parts dealing with the details of religious ritual.

* The nucleus of the song may have been composed by an eye-witness, Deborah, or another. Additions would be made as it passed from lip to lip, the name of the original composer being retained. So it happens in Pal. still. E.g. a Syrian youth was drowned in the Sea of Galilee. His sister, Miriam, on hearing the sad news, at once composed two or three verses of mournful song. These, wedded to appropriate music, floated over the whole country. Wherever it came local singers added verses of their own, many of which were accepted as parts of the song, which, nevertheless, as a whole, continued to be known as "Miriam's Elegy." The Scottish ballads furnish illustrations of the same process.

JUDGMENT HALL. See Prætorium.

JUDGMENT SEAT. The word usually so trd. in the NT. is bēma (Mw. 27.[19], &c.), lit. a "raised place" or "tribune," from wh. one spoke in a public assembly. In the Greek law courts there were two bēmata, one for accuser, and one for defendant. In Js. 2.[6] the word is kritērion, "a means for trying," or "a court of judgment." In 1 Cor. 6.[2, 4] RV. trs. this word "tribunal."

JULIA, a female Christian in Rome saluted by Paul (Rm. 16.[15]), along with Philologus, perhaps her husband.

JULIUS, "a centurion of Augustus' Band" (Ac. 27.[1]), to whose custody Paul was committed. He showed kindness to Paul in many ways during the voyage, and at the shipwreck.

JUNIA, or JUNIAS (RV.), saluted by Paul (Rm. 16.[7]), along with Andronicus. It is not certain whether J. is a masc. or fem. name; altho' the latter is favoured by Chrysostom and Jowett, yet "of note among the apostles," taken in its natural meaning, implies that both were in some sense "apostles." They were kinsmen of Paul, and had become Christians before him.

JUNIPER (1 K. 19.[4], &c., RVm. "broom"). "Juniper" is wrong, and "broom" is misleading. The plant is the Arb. ratam (Heb. rōtem), a white flowering shrub growing in the desert, affording a scanty, but often the only available shade. Charcoal is made of its roots (Ps. 120.[4]).

JUPITER, name of the principal deity of the Romans, used to translate Zeus in Ac. 14.[12, 13], EV. following in this not only the Vlg. but common usage. The inhabitants of Lystra, awestruck by the healing of the lame man, had come to the conclusion that, as in the old myth, "the gods had come down in the likeness of men," and Barnabas they called J. and Paul Mercurius. The Roman identification in this instance had more justification than that of Hermes with Mercurius. Both primarily represent the extended heavens; both are etymologically connected with Dyaus of the Vedic Aryans; both unite with the function of sky-god that of god of thunder. Among the philosophers, especially the Stoics, there was a tendency to identify Zeus with the Supreme God whom the Greeks recognised as behind all the lesser and limited deities of popular worship. This may be seen in the Hymn of Cleanthes quoted by St. Paul, Ac. 17.[28]. It has to be observed that in the tongue of Lycaonia the names of the deities wd. probably be very different from the Hellenic designations used by Luke, and not improbably their attributes differed to at least as great an extent. The Greeks, as will be acknowledged by all readers of Herodotus, were wont to parallel the deities of every foreign pantheon with their own gods sometimes on a purely superficial resemblance. Hence we are told that the Tyrians worshipped Herakles (Hercules) under the name "Melkarth," the full name of the deity being Baal-Melek-Kerioth, "Baal, king of the city."

KADMIEL, a Levite who, with his family, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[40]; Ne. 7.[43]). He was one of the overseers at the rebuilding of the Temple, who also directed the service of thanksgiving when the foundation was laid (Ez. 3.[9ff.]). He took a leading part in the service on the day when "the children of Israel were assembled with fasting, and with sackcloth and earth upon them," confessing their sins (Ne. 9.[4f.]). He was also among those who sealed the covenant (10.[9]). See also 12.[8, 24].

KARKOR, a place wh. Gideon approached " by the way of them that dwell in tents, on the east of Nobah and Jogbehah." Hither came Zebah and Zalmunna with the broken remnants of their host. Apparently thinking none would venture to follow them into the wastes beyond the settled land, they relaxed their vigilance, and were surprised and overwhelmed by Gideon (Jg. 8.[10ff.]). No name resembling this has been recovered ; but the district prob. lay to the east of Rabbath Ammon, in the desert. The identification of OEJ. with Karkaria, about a day's journey from Petra, is out of the question.

It was taken by Tiglath-Pileser (2 K. 15.[29]). Here Demetrius was defeated by Jonathan (1 M. 11.[63, 73]). It lay between Hazor and Edrei (Jo. 19.[37]), N. of the plain of Asor (1 M. 11.[63, 67, 73] ; cp. Ant. V. i. 24 ; XIII. v. 6 ; IX. xi. 1 ; BJ. IV. ii. 3). The mod. vill., Qedes, lies on the height W. of el-Ḥuleh, with a spring and cistern. The extensive ruins date fm. Rm. times. There are many fine sarcophagi. The country around is fertile, diversified with wooded knolls. Fm. its elevated position K. commands a wide prospect.

KEILAH, a city in the Shephelah of Judah (Jo. 15.[44]), the people of wh. were ready to betray David to Saul (1 S. 23.[1ff.]) ; occupied after the Exile (Ne. 3.[17f.]) : prob. = Khirbet Kīlā, c. seven miles E. of Beit Jibrīn.

KELAIAH, known also as Kelita (Ez. 10.[23]), was one of the company who returned from exile with Ezra, who married a foreign wife. He helped in explaining the law as read by Ezra (Ne. 8.[7]), and was one of those who sealed the solemn covenant (10.[10]).

KELITA. See preceding article.

KEMUEL. (1) Son of Nahor and Milcah, and father of Aram (Gn. 22.[21]). In Gn. 10.[22], Aram is named among the sons of Shem. (2) The son of Shiphtan, who represented Ephraim at the casting of lots for the division of the land (Nu. 34.[24]). (3) Father of Hashabiah, and prince of the Levites during David's reign (1 Ch. 27.[17]).

KENATH, a city E. of Jordan, with a chequered hist. (Nu. 32.[42] ; Dt. 3.[14] ; Jo. 13.[30] ; 1 Ch. 2.[23]). It is prob. = mod. Qanawāt, a vill. with extensive and beautiful ruins fm. Græco-Rm. times, c. 16 miles N. of Bozrah. It stands on the brow of a hill, on the W. slope of Jebel ed-Druze, commanding a magnificent view of the great breadths of the Ḥaurān, the Jaulān, and Mt. Hermon. See Arab and Druze at Home, 64ff. See also Nobah.

KENITES (Heb. Qēnī), a nomadic tribe mentioned along with the Kadmonites and Kenizzites as dwelling in Canaan in the time of Abraham, whose land was promised to him. Their tents are visible to Balaam fm. the mountains of Moab (Nu. 24.[22]) ; they are regarded then as inhabiting the highlands of what was afterwards southern Judea. They appear to be associated with the Midianites ; for Jethro, fr.-in-law of Moses, who is called in Ex. 3.[1], 18.[1] " the priest of Midian," is in Jg. 1.[16] called a Kenite. They were afterwards associated with the Amalekites. When Saul made his expedition agst. Amalek he warned the K. to come out fm. among them, and they did so (1 S. 15.[6]). While in the references already considered the K. seem to be dwelling in the S. of Pal., in Jg. they appear in Galilee; JAEL, the murderess of SISERA, was the wife of HEBER the K. (Jg. 4.[17]). The treachery of her deed was made all the more heinous that there was a special treaty of friendship between the family of her husband and JABIN, whose general SISERA was. Dr. Sayce suggests that the K. were a tribe of smiths; a view that suits their association with different tribes. In 1 Ch. 2.[55] the RECHABITES are called K. Latterly the K. were absorbed among the Jews.

KENIZZITE (Heb. Qĕnizzī). A tribe inhabiting the S. of Pal. whose land was promised to ABRAHAM. The Gentile name given to Caleb, "the Kenezite," is in Heb. the same word (Nu. 32.[12]; Jo. 14.[6, 14]). The K. may have joined Jacob's cara van when he went down to Egp. and been absorbed in the tribe of Judah.

KERCHIEFS. The word occurs in a passage of great difficulty, referring to the equipment required for the practice of certain "black arts" (Ek. 13.[18, 21]). They were intended to cover the head, and must also have hung down over the person, as they were made to suit the stature of the wearer (v. 18). It is impossible to determine either their exact shape or use; but something like a long veil of ample folds seems to be intended.

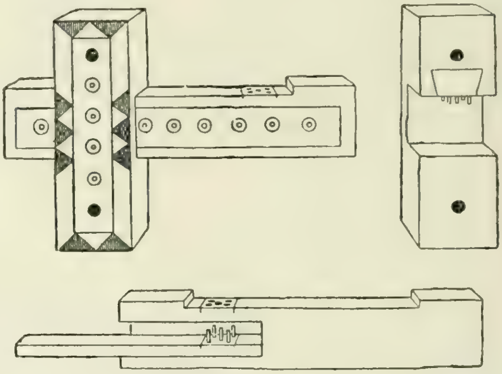
KEREN-HAPPUCH, the name of the third of Job's daughters born to him in the time of prosperity after his proving (Jb. 42.[14]). It denotes lit. "horn of antimony," the dye with wh. eastern ladies colour the eyelashes. The name wd. draw special attention to her eyes, wh. it may be presumed were of unusual beauty.

KERIOTH. (1) A city of Moab named between Beth-maon and Bozrah (Jr. 48.[24, 41]). Here was a sanctuary of Chemosh (Moab. Stone, line 13): prob. = mod. Qureiyāt, between Dibān and 'Aṭṭārūs. (2) A city in the extreme S. of Judah, K.-Hezron (Jo. 15.[25], RV.): poss. = el-Quryatain, NE. of Tell 'Arād. It may be the birthplace of Judas Iscariot—"the man of Kerioth."

KETTLE. This word appears in EV. only in 1 S. 2.[14]. It trs. Heb. dūd, which elsewhere is rendered "basket" (2 K. 10.[7]), "caldron" (2 Ch. 35.[13]), "pot" (Jb. 41.[20]). It is a vessel that may be used for sacrificial or culinary purposes.

KETURAH ("incense"), second w. of Abraham (Gn. 25.[1, 4]), fm. whose sons many Arb. tribes traced their descent (1 Ch. 1.[32f.]): of these little is known.

KEY. The ancient Eastern lock as seen in Egyptian remains, and in some survivals, e.g. in Lebanon, was essentially a wooden bolt held in its place by small pins or tumblers that fell into holes that had been cut in the bolt. The K. was generally a piece of wood with upright pins set in it so arranged that they exactly fitted the holes in the bolt, so the tumblers were forced up and the bolt set free to be moved back by the K. Sometimes the K. was made of iron, but the principle of its construction was the same. It is the symbol of authority (Rv. 1.[18]); it appears sometimes to have been borne on the shoulder as the insignia of office (Is. 22.[22]).



WOODEN LOCK

KEZIA, elder sister of KEREN-HAPPUCH (Jb. 42.[14]). Her name signifies "cassia."

KEZIZ, VALLEY OF, RV. EMEK-KEZIZ, a valley on the eastern border of Benjamin, apparently in the neighbourhood of Jericho (Jo. 18.[21]); unident.

KIBROTH HATTAAVAH ("the graves of lust"), where so many died of plague and were buried (Nu. 11.[34]). It was a day's journey fm. Sinai (33.[16]). It is usually placed to the N. of Naqb el-Hawa ("mountain path of the wind"), a pass called by Palmer "the gate of the Sinai district" (Desert of the Exodus, p. 160), leading to the plain of er-Rāhah, before the traditional Sinai.

KID. See GOAT.

KIDNEYS (Heb. kĕlāyōth). The word is used lit. of animals slain in sacrifice: the K. and the fat about them were burnt on the ALTAR (Ex. 29.[13]; Lv. 3.[10], &c.). As the fat about the K. was regarded as the most delicate it is applied to the finest of the wheat (Dt. 32.[14]). To the Jews all the bodily organs were associated with mental acts; with the K., or REINS, feelings of joy (Pr. 23.[16]) or of grief (Ps. 73.[21]). Hence God, as knowing and estimating the real source of a person's joy or sorrow, is said to "try the reins" (Ps. 7.[9]).

KIDRON. The "brook" K. is mentioned (2 S. 15.[23]; Jn. 18.[1]; BJ. V. ii. 3) as separating Jrs. fm. the Mt. of Olives. There Asa burned his mother's idol (1 K. 15.[13]; 2 Ch. 15.[16]), and Josiah the Asherah, the idolatrous vessels of the Temple (2 K. 23.[4, 6]); there also was thrown the dust of the idolatrous altars in the Sanctuary (2 K. 23.[12]). Similar acts are attributed to Hezekiah (2 Ch. 29.[16], 30.[14]). The valley, wh. was not without cultivated fields, was regarded as unclean (2 K. 23.[12]; Jr. 31.[40]), and had near to it, prob. on the slope below the S. end of the Mt. of Olives, the "graves of the common people" (2 K. 23.[6]). The Bible, and also Josephus, apply the name K. only to the valley E. of Jrs. The continuation of it at Enrogel Jos. calls the "valley of the spring" (BJ. V. xii. 2); and further down, "the big valley" (Ant. X. viii. 2). It seems strange that the Hebrews shd. speak of the "brook" K., since, before the time of Josephus at least, the valley contained no stream. At the present day, only in a winter with abundant rain, a small rivulet rises below Job's Well (Enrogel), and may run for some weeks. But En. 27.[3f.] seems to regard just this lower part of the valley as dry, and that between the Sanctuary and the Mt. of Olives as provided with a stream, wh. cd. not be the outflow of the Gihon. Job's Well furnishes proof that water flows underground, in the bottom of the K. valley. It is therefore not imposs. that, at a time when less débris and alluvium had accumulated in the valley, a small stream might occasionally be seen in winter, especially below the flat ground E. of the Sanctuary. It may have been thought that a brook ran underground the whole length of the valley, becoming visible at Enrogel. This might account for the name Kidron, "the dark one," and might also explain the phrase, "the brook that flowed through the midst of the land" (2 Ch. 32.[4]). The winter spring, 'Ain eṣ-Ṣūwān, sending its waters fm. the ridge N. of the Mt. of Olives down to the bottom of the K. valley, may have been regarded as the real spring of the brook. This is poss. = En Shemesh, "the spring of the sun," mentioned (Jo. 15.[7], 18.[17]) as N. of Enrogel. The name wd. suit the situation, as, fm. Jrs., the rising sun may be said to have its most northerly position over this spring (cp. Jn. 18.[1], χείμαῤῥον τῶν κέδρων, "winter torrent of the Kidron"). G. H. DALMAN.

KIN, KINSHIP, KINSMAN. Among the anct. Semites kinship rested upon affinities of blood. All who counted descent fm. a common ancestor—or, as seems prob. at one time, fm. a common ancestress—were regarded as sharers in one life, participation in wh. constituted the bond of kinship. The kin was thus a much wider organisation than the family. One belonged to the kin by right of heredity. But beyond this, membership of the kin might be acquired by one born of other ancestry. Temporary membership was secured by eating food with any member of the kin. If two ate together, their life was nourished fm. a common source, and for the time each became inviolate to the other. By frequent repetition, this relation became permanent, and the new-comer was bound to every member of the kin in exactly the same way as to the one with whom it was his custom to eat. Among the Arabian tribes many Nubians are to be found enjoying full tribal rights and privileges, who were bought as slaves in their childhood. The concession of freedom and perfect equality to one sharing the common life, and eating from the one dish (dhabiḥāh, "sacrifice"), seems to be taken as the natural course. Within the sacred circle of the kin, mutual rights and duties were recognised; beyond it, right and duty had no meaning. Individual interests are merged in those of the kin. Insult or injury to one is resented, not as personal, but as wrong done to the kin, wh. every member is under equal obligation to avenge. It is thus a close society organised for offence and defence over against the world. The conditions here sketched are those that prevail practically throughout Arabia to this day. See HOSPITALITY.

In Isr. degrees of nearness within the kin were recognised, involving correspdg. degrees of obligation. Within certain degrees marriage was forbidden (Lv. 18.[6], &c.). If a man fell on evil days and was forced to sell his patrimony, it was the duty of his nearest kinsman to buy, if he were able (Jr. 32.[8ff.]). Of land that had been sold, the right of redemption lay with the nearest kinsman of the former owner (Lv. 25.[25], &c.): the object being to prevent the property falling away to others outside the kin. In the case of a man who died childless, failing his brother, it appears that his next of kin was called on to marry his widow, as well as to buy back the property he might have parted with (Ru. 4.). For an unfortunate man who had sold himself as a slave, freedom might be purchased by any near kinsman (Lv. 25.[47ff.]).

In the Arabian kin we have seen that the duty of avenging injury rests equally upon every member of the kin to wh. the injured, or slain, man belonged. In Isr. this duty is laid explicitly upon the nearest kinsman, the Avenger of Blood. It was his business, as representing the kin, to secure blood for blood. But on occasion all the members of the circle might join in the demand for vengeance (2 S. 14.[7]). It is clear that in old time, if the actual offender could not be found, justice was satisfied by the slaughter of any member of his family or clan. This is the law still, among certain Arabian peoples, and the sacred duty of bloody reprisal is transmitted from fathers to children for many generations.

The Deuteronomic law limited the infliction of vengeance to the guilty person (Dt. 24.[16]). Arrangements were made whereby one who slew his neighbour unintentionally might be protected fm. the extreme penalty (see CITIES OF REFUGE, HOSPITALITY). But the deliberate manslayer was to be slain by the Avenger of Blood (Nu. 35.[19], &c.). At times, among the Arabs, a payment in money or kind is taken as settling claims to blood-vengeance. Such ransom was not permitted in Israel (v. 31).

We have seen that kinship in the OT. depends on physical affinities. Jesus came to reorganise society on a new basis. In virtue of his spiritual nature, man is made in the image of God. Faith enables men to realise this Divine sonship (Jn. 1.^{12}), and obliterates all the distinctions and barriers that separate men on earth. In other words, in the new society, kinship rests on spiritual, not on physical, affinities; and its manifestation is found in personal obedience to the will of God (Mw. 12.$^{48ff.}$).

KINAH lay upon the extreme southern boundary of the territory of Judah, bordering upon Edom (Jo. 15.^{22}). OEJ. knows no more than that it was "in the tribe of Judah." There is yet no guide as to its position.

KING. The Heb. word for king (melek) is derived from a root implying wisdom as well as authority. This harmonises with the main functions assigned to the king, as supreme judge and generalissimo.

A King's Dress (Egyptian)

From the earliest times we meet with great and powerful kings in the valleys of the Nile and the Euphrates. Kings are also found in the countries surrounding Pal., ruling over fairly extensive territories. In Pal. itself at the time of Joshua the kings were numerous. We need not be misled by the name. Each king controlled a "city" with its adjoining land. But recent investigation has shown that these "cities" were little more than fortified villages. The circumstances then attached more of dignity and responsibility to their position than belongs to that of the modern village sheikh: but they were far from realising our conceptions of royalty.

In early Israel the king is unknown. Moses, indeed, is described as "king in Jeshurun" (Dt. 33.^{5}); but this is rhetorical, to exhibit his greatness. During the march through the wilderness a "prince" had exercised authority over each tribe. After the settlement in Pal. the tribal prince disappears, and the people seem to fall into a series of loosely confederated republics, in which an uncertain authority is wielded by the "Elders" (zĕqēnīm). Each tribe apparently comprised a number of associated townships, each township being ruled by a bench of Elders. When a Judge arose claiming a Divine commission, like the successive Mahdis in the Sudān, he drew after him a following of the tribes proportioned to his own character and influence. A later writer implicitly contrasts the anarchy and insecurity of these days, when "there was no king in Israel" (Jg. 17.^{6}, &c.), with the happier conditions prevailing under kingly rule.

The lack of coherence, and anything like an acknowledged national leadership, necessarily exposed Israel to the attacks of such a warlike people as the Philistines, organised and disciplined under the sway of their king. The disadvantage was felt, and an offer of the supreme place was made to Gideon (Jg. 8.^{22}), who, however, declined it, both for himself and for his children; maintaining that the Lord was Israel's true King. Abimelech his son was not so scrupulous: but while he is described as "prince over Israel three years" (9.^{22}), his attempt to establish a monarchy failed. Samuel seems to have recognised that this state of things contained the elements of national dissolution. He endeavoured to introduce greater stability by the appointment of his sons as under-judges: perhaps in the hope that they might succeed to his position and influence. But the people were now fully persuaded that the interests of national security demanded a king. If "the thing was evil in the eyes of Samuel" we must remember that he was human, and felt like other men the disappointment of his hopes.

Acting under Divine guidance, Samuel declared to the people "the manner of the kingdom" (1 S. 8.$^{9ff.}$, 10.^{25}), wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord. The powers of the king over his subjects in relation to the army and measures necessary for defence of the country, and in relation to the service and maintenance of the royal household, are set forth in 1 S. 8.$^{10ff.}$ What further this document contained as to the constitution of the kingdom we cannot say with certainty; but it probably embodied the provisions found in Dt. 17.$^{14-20}$.

If we may venture to consider it not absolutely certain that the "Book of the Law" found in the reign of Josiah contained only "Deuteronomy," and hold that the denunciations of Hosea and Amos against worship at Bethel and Gilgal imply a knowledge of that code, then we may regard it as not impossible that Samuel added those verses to the code and laid it up before the Lord. Such an addition wd. not, according to Eastern ideas, militate against the claim of the whole book to Mosaic authorship.

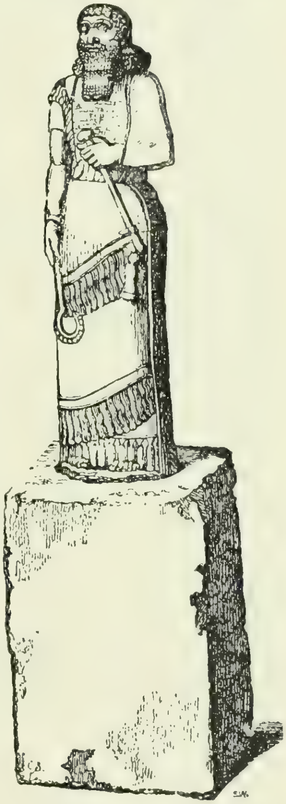
The king must be the choice of Jehovah: he must not be a foreigner: he is prohibited from multiplying horses, wives, and silver and gold: he is required to write a copy of this (i.e. the Deuteronomic) law, and preserve it by him for daily study, that he may learn to "fear the Lord," and be preserved from arrogance in dealing with "his brethren": the hereditary principle seems to be recognised.

Israel was a theocratic State: the king was only God's vicegerent: his appointment therefore must have the Divine sanction. Of Saul and David it is explicitly stated that they were chosen of God (1 S. 9.$^{15ff.}$, 16.$^{1ff.}$). A foreigner would lack national feeling, and might be tempted to arrogance and tyranny.

He might imperil the land and its inhabitants by introducing heathen deities and their worship. Probably this last furnished the main reason for the prohibition. While there is no case recorded of an attempt to crown a foreigner, the episode of Abimelech's reign showed the possibility. He was half a Shechemite—he got his power by hiring mercenaries, and his authority was apparently pretty widely acknowledged. One who belonged wholly to the "strangers" that were still left in the land by a similar process mt. secure some hold on a few cities, and in a time of distress might be chosen, as Jephthah was, leader even of all Israel. The peoples in the plains depended greatly upon their cavalry and chariots: but altho' in later times these were regular features of Israel's armies, they were not essential to her safety, her mountain lands being ill-suited for their evolutions. Egypt was especially strong in chariots and horsemen. Traffic in horses must inevitably lead to close relations with that country which, in the interests alike of faith and freedom, it was necessary to avoid. The disastrous influence of sensuality and worldliness is strikingly illustrated in the cases of David and Solomon. The Oriental harem has been the hotbed of mischief from time immemorial. It was no doubt thought congruous with the magnificence and luxury in which these two monarchs indulged. Saul's absorption in the defence and consolidation of his kingdom probably saved him from the temptations to which they succumbed.

The king was set apart to his office by anointing. This might be done by a prophet (1 S. 9.[16]; 1 K. 19.[15], &c.), or by a priest (1 K. 1.[39]; 2 Ch. 23.[11], &c.). Hence the king is frequently called "the Lord's anointed." From the ceremony recorded in 2 Ch. 23.[11] we gather that a crown was placed on the king's head, and a copy of the law (the testimony) put in his hand. The bracelet taken from the arm of Saul (2 S. 1.[10]) probably formed part of the royal insignia. No king of Israel is said to have wielded a SCEPTRE, but probably, as in the surrounding countries (Am. 1.[5, 8], &c.), something of the kind was used. The spear held by Saul may have been the symbol of authority (1 S. 22.[6]). Solomon's costly throne is described in 1 K. 10.[18ff.] The example of splendour in buildings and royal establishment set by David and Solomon must at times have pressed heavily on the national resources.

It was much in the king's favour to be of commanding personal presence (1 S. 10.[23]). His success as supreme judge depended on his natural shrewdness and practical wisdom (1 K. 3.). To lead and inspire the men of war composing his armies he must be a brave and skilful soldier. These were the principal functions of the king in Israel. Government, or administration, in the modern sense, was not associated with the office. It was the king's business to see justice done among his subjects, and, especially, to take the necessary measures to secure the safety of his kingdom against all enemies. He was generalissimo; the officers, from the commander-in-chief downwards, holding their positions by his favour, and acting in subordination to him if he were in the field (2 S. 12.[26ff.], &c.). In the neighbouring countries the regal and sacerdotal offices seem to have been conjoined in the person of the king. In Israel also the first kings, Saul, David, and Solomon, offered sacrifices. When the kingly and priestly functions were more distinctly separated, the king still remained the fountain of authority; he appointed and deposed the High Priest at will. David's generous attentions attached the growing power of the priesthood to his house with a devotion which even the favour shown by Solomon to heathen superstitions did not alienate. The definite adhesion of the Levites at the disruption of the kingdom contributed materially to the permanence of his dynasty. The relations of the king with the prophetic order are less definite, but it is clear that in both the Southern and Northern Kingdoms these men, acknowledged as speaking under Divine inspiration, exercised a powerful influence upon the policy and destiny of kings. There were thus both prophetic and priestly limitations upon the royal authority. Unless he were a man of exceptional ability and force of character, a king's success depended greatly upon the maintenance of good relations with each order, the one representing mainly the spiritual, the other the ceremonial aspect of the religion of Israel. Saul alienated the prophets by his neglect of Samuel, and the priests by his murder of the community at Nob. In consequence his position in the later years of his life may be compared with that of a mediæval monarch who had been excommunicated by the Pope.



STATUE OF KING, SHOWING SCEPTRE IN RIGHT HAND

Another limitation arose from the theocratic

constitution of the State. The king might not act tyrannically, or oppress the heritage of Jehovah. The people were his "brethren," not his "subjects," and must be ruled with brotherly consideration.

In succession to the throne the principle of heredity was recognised; but the law of primogeniture did not hold. The succession was in the gift of the reigning sovereign, as it frequently is in the East to-day, and as it was in mediæval times. As William the Conqueror selected his second son, so King David chose as his successor Solomon, one of his younger sons. But the principle of heredity was liable to suspension. The weakness of Ish-bosheth and Mephibosheth made easy the advancement of the brave and accomplished warrior chief anointed by Samuel. The Northern tribes seem always to have retained something of the republican feeling. They acknowledged no absolute hereditary right. To be lawful king of Israel the son of Solomon must be accepted by the whole congregation of the sons of Israel (1 K. 12.[1ff.]). In later days, an insurgent chief who could secure the favour of the army had no difficulty in disposing of the king, and reigning in his stead. The value of prophetic support is well illustrated in the history of Jehu's dynasty. In the Southern Kingdom there were no revolutions; the sceptre remained in the house of David till the captivity: but in Jerusalem "the princes," that is, the great officers of State, came to exercise weighty influence, and, with some of the weaker monarchs on the throne, were practically all powerful.

In the NT. the title is applied to Herod the Great (Mw. 2.[1]), Herod Antipas (14.[9], &c.), Agrippa I. (Ac. 12.[20, 23]) and II. (25.[13], &c.), and Aretas the ruler of the Nabatæans (see ARABIA). So far as the subject allies of Rome were concerned, rulers could use the title of "king" only on permission by the emperor. Thus, to take a modern parallel, the Rajah of Johor, when the permission of Queen Victoria was granted, assumed the title of "Sultan." Herod the Great received the title from Augustus. Herod Antipas, although called "king," was never more than tetrarch. Agrippa I. was made king by Gaius, and Agrippa II. by Claudius. It is probable that, although he was not a subject ally of Rome, the kingship of Aretas was acknowledged by Claudius. The Jews in their frenzy applied the title to the emperor: "we have no king but Cæsar" (Jn. 19.[15]). Jesus does not disdain the title "King of the Jews" (Mw. 27.[11], &c.). Absolute kingship is ascribed to God (1 Tm. 1.[17], 6.[15], &c.).

KINGDOM OF GOD, KINGDOM OF HEAVEN. Fm. Lk. 14.[15] we learn that among the Jews the glories and happiness of the days of the Messiah were designated by this term. The prophets pictured in glowing colours the universal peace and joy that wd. illustrate those times. The ascendency of the Jew in the prophetic vision is mainly spiritual; the material benefits of the time were to be shared by all mankind. Later Judaism exhausted the powers of imagination to picture the lordship over the Gentiles to be exercised by the Jew. The more the Jew was thrown into the background by the might of the great world-Empires, the more he indemnified himself in thought by making more and more august the imperial glories of Jrs. when the Messiah shd. come and the K. of God be set up. Our Lord assumes the designation thus in common use, but deepens its meaning. While the Jews of His day had a less spiritual view of this hoped-for time than the prophets, His exposition of it makes the K. of H. more spiritual than the prophets had guessed. The great conflict of Christ with Jewish rulers sprang largely fm. this. This spiritual conception of the K. of H. involved many conclusions, all unpalatable to the Jew. Mere descent fm. Abraham was not enough, spiritual congruity to the aims of the Kdm. was essential; they, Jews, children of the kdm. tho' they were, were to be thrust out, cast into the outer darkness. This was abhorrent to them, but worse that Gentiles fm. the East and fm. the West shd. occupy the places they shd. have filled. The pictures our Lord gives of the K. of H. in parables suit this idea and develop it. Here we may note that Matthew's designation of the Messianic kdm. as the K. of Heaven rather than K. of God, wh. is the usage of the other evangelists, is probably due to that feeling of reverence wh. leads the Jews to avoid pronouncing the sacred name. In His parabolic discourses our Lord exhibits the beginning of the kdm. as the sowing of seed; in two aspects is this used: (a) each individual of the children of the kdm. is a good seed that transforms the dead mass around it into living replicas of itself; (b) also the whole kdm. is a seed, small but living, cast into a dead world to grow. The great purpose is not accomplished until the whole human race shall be leavened, absorbed in the Heavenly Kingdom. It is to be a spiritual state; while permeating the kingdoms of this world, it is yet separate fm. them and independent of them. The designation, K. of God, is found in the Acts and the Pauline Epp., but the idea is not developed. When Christianity passed into the Greek world, to wh. the ideal constitution of society presented itself as a republic, what had before been hē basileia tou Theou became hē ekklēsia tou Theou. The K. of G. may never be realised in this world, yet it holds up an ideal before men towards the attainment of wh. they are to strive. While it wd. tend to misunderstanding to identify the Church, split up into sects, and rent by controversies as it is, at once with the K. of G., yet we may say that the Church as Christ meant it to be cd. be so identified. The end is not here; there is another world wh. shall see the realisation of God's purpose: "Our city is in heaven, whence we look for a Saviour."

KING'S VALE, RV. See DALE, THE KING'S.

KINGS, THE BOOKS OF. These books are appropriately enough so named, as they contain a history of the kings of Israel and Judah, from the time of David to the Captivity. They are indeed but one book, the partition having been first made in copies of the LXX, where they are reckoned along with the books of Samuel in a series of four, which are called the four Books of the Kingdoms. This arrangement was followed by the Vulgate, and hence arose the alternative titles of these four books in our AV., where 1 Samuel is said to be "otherwise called the first book of the kings," and so forth. The history of the kings does indeed commence in the books of Samuel, and the narrative of David's reign, which is left unfinished at the end of 2 Samuel, is resumed and completed in 1 Kings. Nevertheless, Samuel and Kings are independent compositions; for, even if common material was drawn upon by both for the history of David, the literary form of the books is different, and the writer of Kings evidently lived at a much later time than the author of Samuel, for he brings down the history to the time of the exile, whereas in Samuel there is no reference even to the downfall of the Northern Kingdom. The time covered by Kings extends to about four centuries, from the accession of Solomon in B.C. 970 to the 37th year of the captivity of Jehoiachin, B.C. 562. It falls naturally into three parts. There is, first, the time of the undivided kingdom till the accession of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, and the schism in his time of the Northern tribes under Jeroboam the son of Nebat. This period is treated of in 1 K. I.–II., and extends to about 37 years. Secondly, there is the time of the divided monarchy, lasting about two centuries, which occupies the remainder of the first book and 17 chapters of the second. And, lastly, there is the time of the surviving kingdom of Judah, in the remaining 8 chapters, from the fall of Samaria in B.C. 722 till the date just mentioned, B.C. 562, a space of 160 years.

As the aim of the book is to present an account of the successive reigns in both kingdoms, a formal method of treatment is adopted, which is very simple and stereotyped, especially in the period of the double monarchy. Up to the time of the schism, of course, the writer is less hampered; and, after the opening section (1 K. I.–2.[11]), which falls in the lifetime of David and greatly resembles in style the preceding narrative in 2 S., he describes with a free hand the magnificence and prosperity of Solomon's reign, dwelling particularly and with evident predilection on the building and dedication of the Temple; not, however, without significant hints of impending trouble, and forebodings of the danger that lurked in the luxury and ease of the court. Then, after relating the events that led to the schism, he carries on the history of the contemporaneous kings in the following manner. The accession of a king in the one kingdom is dated according to the year of the reign of the king in the other, the length of his reign is given, the notable events of the reign related or referred to, and a favourable or unfavourable judgment pronounced upon his character. In the case of the kings of Judah, the age of the king at his accession and the name of the queen-mother are also stated. Each king's reign is followed to its close, and the history is thus carried forward by taking the two kingdoms alternately. The treatment becomes again more free after the disappearance of the Northern Kingdom. The reign of Hezekiah occupies three chapters, a great part of which is found again in almost identical terms in the book of Isaiah. Two chapters are devoted to the reign of Josiah and the reformation accomplished in his time. But it is remarkable that the last days of the monarchy, and the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, in regard to which many details are given in the book of Jeremiah, are passed over in very few words.

Owing to the wide extent of the period to be covered, it is plain that the writer could not, in the compass of the book before us, give a complete hist. of the time. At the same time it is evident, from the unequal space devoted to different reigns—some being described at length, while others, which we know to have been eventful, are dismissed in few words—that the book is designed to be something other than a mere chronicle of events, or political annals. Nor is it difficult to perceive what were the guiding ideas in the selection and presentation of details. First of all, this book, though possessing, more than other OT. works, the character of a formal history, is, like all the books of the OT., composed from the point of view of the religion. This appears in the prominence given to the Temple and its worship, in the space devoted to the doings of prophetic men, and in the manner in which the characters of the successive kings are described: "he did that which was right," or "that which was evil in the eyes of the Lord." It will be observed that the judgments on the kings of the Northern Kingdom are always unfavourable. The sin of "Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin," is echoed throughout the book, whereas it is said in praise of the better kings of Judah that they followed in the steps of David their father. Yet even in regard to these kings it is particularly to be observed that, in almost all cases, it is mentioned to their disparagement that the "high places" were not taken away; for it is not till the reign of Hezekiah that a serious attempt seems to have been made to abolish that worship, an attempt which came to a successful issue in the time of Josiah. Accordingly, it is customary to speak of the books of Kings as written from the Deuteronomic standpoint, seeing that such emphasis is laid on the law of the central sanctuary prescribed in the book of Deut. The position of the author of our bk., as expressed in 1 K. 3.[2], is that, till the erection of the Temple as a central sanctuary, worship at the high places (which he assumes may be genuine Jehovah worship) was excusable, but that thereafter it was illegitimate. One can understand, supposing the law of Deut. to have been of Mosaic date and authority, how national public sacrifice, if it was to be observed at all, especially after the destruction of Shiloh, must have been practised at different places, and how the custom, having gained long prescription, should have been found so difficult to eradicate. But it is always to be remembered that worship at high places, even when it was meant to be the worship of Jehovah, was liable to be contaminated, and was actually contaminated, with abuses borrowed from the local Baal-worship of the Canaanites.

Although we speak of the " author " of Kings as if one person may have composed the book, it is evident that no one person could have had cognisance of the details of a history extending over so long a period ; and we have here a clearer example than in many of the OT. books of the literary practice of Hebrew writers, which consisted in incorporating in their works other compositions which lay to their hands. There are three written sources of this kind mentioned in the book. At the conclusion of Solomon's reign it is said (1 K. 11.[41]), " Now the rest of the acts of Solomon, and all that he did, and his wisdom, are they not written in the book of the acts of Solomon ? " The expression, " the rest of the acts," suggests that the acts which find a place in the book have been drawn from the same source. Similarly, for the reigns of the Northern Kingdom there is a reference to " the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel," and, for the Southern Kingdom, to " the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah." Such references occur at the end of almost every reign, being apparently only omitted when there was something exceptional in the close of the reign. Now, since among the court officials of several of the kings a " recorder " is mentioned, the conclusion is warranted that it was the function of such an official to keep a register or chronicle of important transactions, and that, from such archives, or from some kind of histories based upon them, the compiler of Kings obtained the particulars which he has incorporated into his book. It is, however, much more than a mere state record, or chronicle of political events. As in other OT. books, there is no sharp distinction drawn between what we call secular and sacred, and the religious aspect is always prominent and primary. Accordingly, attention is pointedly directed to the activity and utterances of prophets and prophetic men, whose influence was so marked during the whole course of Hebrew history. The doings of Elijah and Elisha are related at length, and we are told not a little of those " schools of the prophets " with which these men were associated. The style of the portions dealing with these matters is such as to suggest that here also the author is drawing from written or oral accounts current in his day. In short, the author or editor of the bk. is a compiler ; and we may observe this in the manner in which he gives the dates of things recorded. The last date mentioned, which must be taken as the last possible date of the final redaction, is B.C. 562, or 24 years after the destruction of Jerusalem in B.C. 586. Yet, in several places of the book, we find the expression " unto this day," which must in some cases certainly refer to a time antecedent to the Babylonian captivity when the Temple was still standing (see 1 K. 8.[8], 9.[21], 12.[19], &c.). It would seem, therefore, either that we have to assume two (at least) successive redactions to have taken place, or that the compiler transferred to his pages documents which bore an earlier date, without adapting them to the time at which he was writing. The general opinion of critics is that the book underwent successive redactions ; and, it may be observed, the LXX version gives reason to suppose that the Greek translators had before them a text which, in some particulars, did not coincide with the Hebrew text as it has been handed down to us.

The chronology of the book of Kings is noteworthy. There are three factors that enter into the calculations. First of all, the length of the several reigns seems to be given with an attempt at strict accuracy ; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that the compiler may have derived the figures directly from the official archives. As, however, the reigns are given in years, and no account is taken of parts of a year, it remains uncertain whether the months of a year within which a new reign may have begun were reckoned to the new king or to his predecessor, or to both. Then there are the synchronisms of the reigns in the two kingdoms. These must have been based upon the former numbers ; but, owing to the relations that subsisted between the two kingdoms, they are less likely to have been found in the archives, and may therefore be ascribed to one or other of the editors through whose hands the book passed. And, lastly, there are indications of an attempt at a wider chronological scheme. It is stated in 1 K. 6.[1] that Solomon began to build the Temple in the 480th year after the Exodus. Now, if we take the sum of the reigns of the kings of Judah, beginning from the foundation of the first Temple, we get 430 years, and if we add 50 years for the Exile (B.C. 586 to 536), we obtain another cycle of 480 years, as the interval between the first Temple and the second. This looks like an attempt at stating the figures in round numbers of 12 generations of 40 years. A similar predilection for the number 40 is to be found in the chronological statements of the book of Judges; and the "generations" in Mw. 1.[17] are also periods of 40 years. This scheme of Temple reckoning was probably introduced after the Exile, when a survey was taken of the whole period of Israel's history. Though convenient as an aid to memory, very much as we reckon by centuries, this computation by generations and round numbers can only be taken as approximate. It will be found that the sum of 480 years does not agree with the figures given or implied in other passages for the interval between the Exodus and the building of the Temple (comp. Jg. 11.[26]; Ac. 13.[20]). Even the LXX in 1 K. 6.[1] gives the number 440, while Josephus makes the period 590 years. Again, by adding the figures contained in the book of Judges, with the necessary allowance for the years preceding and succeeding the period of that book, we obtain a total of 498 years. But, even if we regard this computation as merely approximate, there are other perplexing discrepancies in the chronology, the complete solution of which has not been discovered. For example, the total of the years of the kings of Israel up to the fall of Samaria is given as 242, while the number for the kings of Judah during the same period is 260, and there are other differences. For the precise dates of certain outstanding events the Assyrian monuments come to our aid; and, on a comparison with these, so far as data are available, "it may be said that the examination is surprisingly favourable, so far as the durations of the reigns are concerned, to the soundness of the Hebrew tradition" (Skinner, Century Bible, 1 and 2 Kings. See also Burney, Notes on the Heb. Text of the Bk. of Kings, and Art. KINGS in HDB.).

Thus, in the limited compass of this book, is contained the history of the bloom period of the Jewish state. Looked at as a portion of political history it is no less remarkable for what is omitted or merely implied than for what is explicitly told. There is little of the massive grandeur or military glory of the great world-powers of the time. The kingdom of Israel seems to be rather on a level with those smaller States in its neighbourhood which have disappeared and left no record. What we see is a series of 20 kings of the dynasty of David ruling at Jerusalem, and another series of as many kings, but of no fewer than nine different families or dynasties, in the Northern Kingdom; and the annals of both as here recorded are for the most part uneventful, some of them inglorious. In course of time the Northern Kingdom first falls before the power of Assyr a, and then the Southern in turn is broken down by the Babylonians, the capitals are destroyed, the peoples carried into captivity, and the territory, like that of the small contiguous States, is absorbed into the great Empire of the East. To all human appearance, the people of these two kingdoms are doomed to vanish from history like their neighbours. That they lived on, a separate people, when these smaller States disappeared, and when even the colossal Eastern Empires crumbled to ruins, and that their influence has been world-wide, is proof that there were vital elements in their history deeper than political forces, and that they were destined to play a very special part in the Divine dealings with the human race.

In a sense it is true that their history, instead of reaching its culmination and decline in the period of the monarchy, was then only a preparation for a larger and richer history that was to follow. It is therefore important to note what these elements were which operated towards the persistence and coherence of the people and fitted them for their mission to the world. And, first of all, it is evident that the long stretch of time and the organisation of the monarchy favoured the consolidation of the people and the growth of national feeling. The tribal rivalries which appear before and at the time of the establishment of the monarchy give place to a sense of national unity. The Northern Kingdom, even while regarded as schismatical and heretical, is still recognised as forming with the Southern one people. Then again, though we have no systematic account of the general advance of the people in civilisation, there are indications at various points of the history of progress in agriculture, commerce, and wealth, sufficient to show that they had become fitted to take their place among the nations in the cultivation of the arts of peace. It is specially to be noted that, though little is said of education or a learned class, the people had before the Exile become possessed of a varied and unique literature, which not only formed a powerful bond of union when the Temple and State were ruined, but has come through them to be the world's inheritance. Above all, there are three features in the history which, in the mind of the author, are of prime importance, as shown by the prominence he gives them in his narrative. (1) The dynasty of David is invested with peculiar dignity. This had two aspects. It pointed back to the Divine election of the nation in the past, and gave the guarantee of indefinite national perpetuity in the future. The promise of "the sure mercies of David" was a powerful uniting influence in the Exile, drawing the heart of the nation back to their old home; and it enkindled, kept alive, and refined that Messianic hope, which glowed ever brighter as time went on, and had issues of a far-reaching character in the distant future. (2) The Temple and its service, for which the writer has such special regard, contributed greatly to the phase of national character of subsequent times. With all the drawbacks and defacements of pure worship, there was the stated regular performance of sacred rites, the development and regulation of priestly order and ritual law, which stamped themselves so firmly on later Judaism. This, no doubt, tended to a hard legalism; but it had this in its favour, that it held the people together as a religious community when their existence as a political State was no longer possible. Nor must we leave out of account the educative influence on pious souls of solemn ritual and sacred song. The exiles did not forget the Lord's song in a strange land; and their first care, on their return, was to rebuild the Temple and to set in order the daily service. The Temple was the home of sacred psalmody, the place of resort to the devout who waited for the consolation of Israel. (3) Above all, this was the period of bloom of OT. prophecy. Though more is said of men like Elijah and Elisha, who have left no written words, we must not forget the series of pre-exilian prophets, whose writings have come down to us—men who, against the opposition of rulers and the indifference of the people, testified to the moral foundation on which the nation was constituted, vindicated Divine righteousness, rebuked sin, and held up the ideal to which the nation was called. And thus, before the long winter of exile and subjection set in, there were implanted in this people those seeds of Divine truth which in the fulness of time were to spring up and be for salvation to the ends of the earth.

JAMES ROBERTSON.

KIR, the original home of the Aramæans (Am. 1.[5]), the place to wh. they were carried captive (2 K. 16.[9]), is named along with Elam (Is. 22.[6]); may be = the plain N. of the Tigris, S. of Elam.

KIR HARASETH, or HARESETH (2 K. 3.[25]; Is. 16.[7]), KIR HARESH, or HERES (Is. 16.[11]; Jr. 48.[31, 36]), KIR OF MOAB (Is. 15.[1]), all seem to indicate the one city. Tg. gives "Kerak" (Is. 16.[11]; Jr. 48.[31, 36]), and "Kerak in Moab" (Is. 15.[1]). It was a strong position, evidently the capital, towards the S. border of Moab (2 K. 3.[25ff.]), conditions that are well met by el-Kerak, c. eight miles E. of the Dead Sea, on the N. of the Wady of the same name, 3323 ft. above the Mediterranean. It is a position of great strength, surrounded by deep gorges, and, in anct. times, approached only by two tunnels cut in the rock. The ruined wall, with five towers and a strong castle to the S., date mostly fm. Crusading times, the substructions alone being ancient. For water it depended upon great cisterns and deep wells. The mod. inhabitants are a wild and fearless, half nomadic people, who, until 1893, resisted all attempts to bring them in any effective way under Turkish rule. Estimates of population vary fm. 7000 (Meistermann, New Guide) to 22,000 (Cheyne, EB. s.v.). A few Gr. and Latin Christians maintain themselves among the Moslems.

KIRJATH, RV. KIRIATH (Jo. 18.[28]), the first part of a place name, the second having dropped out of the text. It is prob. = K.-Jearim (LXX).

KIRJATHAIM, RV. KIRIATHAIM. (1) A city of Reuben, taken fm. Sihon (Nu. 32.[37]; Jo. 13.[19]). Later it appears as Moabite (Jr. 48.[1, 23]; Ek. 25.[9]; Moab. St., line 10, Kirjathen). OEJ. places it 10 Rm. miles W. of Madeba. Some wd. ident. it with Qareiyāt, c. 11 miles SW. of Madeba, and 5 miles E. of Machærus. But the site is quite uncertain. (2) An unidentd. Levite city in Naphtali (1 Ch. 6.[76]), called Kartan (Jo. 21.[32]).

KIRJATH-HUZZOTH, between Ar of Moab and Bamoth-Baal (Nu. 22.[39]); unidentd.

KIRJATH-JEARIM, a city of the Gibeonite league (Jo. 9.[17]), given to Judah (Jo. 15.[60]). The ark rested here after its return by the Phil. (1 S. 7.[1f.]), and hence David carried it to Jrs. (1 Ch. 13.[5, 6]; 2 Ch. 1.[4]). Here was born Micah the prophet (Jr. 26.[20]). It was reoccupied after the Exile. It was known also as K.-Baal (Jo. 15.[60], 18.[14]), and is poss. referred to in Ps. 132.[6] as "the field in the wood."

The city lay on the border of Judah and Benjamin, to the E. of Mahaneh Dan (Jg. 18.[12]), wh. was between Zorah and Eshtaol. It is prob. identical with Khirbet 'Armā, a ruin on the S. of Wādy eṣ-Sarār, 2½ miles SE. of Eshtaol. The ident. is not free fm. difficulties. It brings the border of Judah further S. than seems otherwise probable, and it is a great distance fm. the other members of the Gibeonite league.

KITE OR VULTURE
From Wood's "Bible Animals," by permission of Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

KISH. A Benjamite, s. of Abiel and fr. of Saul. Owing to confusion in the text, Kish's br. Ner is called his fr. (1 Ch. 8.[33]). He seems to have been a prosperous farmer. The name may be compared with Arb. Qais. Others so named are mentioned (1 Ch. 8.[30], 23.[21]; Est. 2.[5]).

KISHION, a Levite town in Issachar (Jo. 19.[20], 21.[28]). In 1 Ch. 6.[72] it is called Kedesh, poss. a scribal error for Kishion. The Kishon may be named fm. it. Conder suggests Tell Qedes, near Taanach.

KISHON (Heb. naḥal Qīshōn, "water-course of K."), on the banks of wh. Sisera was defeated (Jg. 4.[7], &c.), and beside wh. the prophets of Baal were slain by Elijah (1 K. 18.[40]), is the mod. el-Muqaṭṭa'. It drains all the plain of Esdraelon except what lies E. of a line drawn fm. Iksal to Nain, and thence by el-Fūleh to Zer'īn, the waters of wh. flow to the Jordan. The strong perennial spring at Jenīn is entirely absorbed by irrigation in the dry season, and in the late summer there is no water in the deep torrent bed that winds through the soft soil of the plain to the foot of Carmel. It is doubtless "the brook that is before Jokneam"—Tell Keimun (Jo. 19.[11]). Where it sweeps past the E. base of Carmel, and through the gorge N. of the mountain into the plain of Acre, it is seldom dry. It is joined by the waters fm. Sa'adiyeh, c. three miles E. of Ḥaifa, and thence it flows in a sluggish stream through soft marsh-land to the sea. A fall of rain on the surrounding hills swiftly turns the K. into a rushing torrent, while the soil of the plain becomes soft, deep mud, in wh. chariots and horsemen wd. be at the mercy of active foot soldiers. What is meant by naḥal qedummīm (Jg. 5.[21]; EV. "anct. river") is quite uncert. Some think it denotes another stream: and Benjamin of Tudela (A.D. 1173) clearly identifies it with the Belus (Nahr Na'amein) in the plain of Acre.

KISS. See SALUTATION.

KITE (Heb. 'ayyāh), an unclean bird (Lv. 11.[14]; Dt. 14.[13]); the Heb. word is trd. VULTURE in Jb. 28.[7]: in every case RV. tr. "Falcon." The LXX tr. gryps, a fabulous bird mentioned as such by Pliny, HN. x. 49. There are three species of milvus, "kite," in Pal.

KITHLISH, RV. CHITHLISH, a town in the Judæan Shephelah named with Eglon, Makkedah, &c. (Jo. 15.[40]), not identified.

KITRON, a town in Zebulun, from which the Canaanites were not driven out (Jg. 1.[30]). It stands next to Nahalol. It is not named in Jo. 19.[15], but there its place is taken by KATTATH. The Talmud identifies it with Sepphoris, the mod. Ṣaffūrieh, north of Nazareth.

KNEE. The fr. or grandfr. seems to have acknowledged the legitimacy of a child by allowing it to be placed on his knees (Gn. 50.[23]; cp. 30.[3]). Weakness of body, e.g. fm. hunger (Ps. 109.[24]) or fear (Ek. 7.[17], 21.[7]; Dn. 5.[6]), &c., shows itself in the knees. The knees were liable to attack by a special disease (Dt. 28.[35]), poss. "joint leprosy." To bow the K. is to worship (1 K. 19.[18], &c.). Kneeling is a frequent posture in prayer (Ez. 9.[5], &c.). It is also an attitude of reverence and entreaty before a superior (2 K. 1.[13], &c.). The suppliant will sometimes kneel down and kiss the feet of his superior. In a court of law a man will often make his plea upon his knees.

KNIFE (Heb. ḥereb, usually trd. "sword"; ma'akeleth', "a K. for eating with"). The earliest occurrence of K. as tr. of ḥereb is in Jo. 5.[2, 3], when JOSHUA was commanded to make "K. of flint" (RV.) to circumcise the Isr. In regard to CIRCUMCISION the operation seems to have been originally performed with K. of flint, as we see fm. the action of ZIPPORAH (Ex. 4.[25]). The priests of Baal use K. to cut themselves (1 K. 18.[28]). The 2nd Heb. word is used in the nar. of the sacrifice of ISAAC (Gn. 22.[6, 10]), and in the nar. of the Levite and his concubine (Jg. 19.[29]). The natives of Pal. always have a K.; they are also frequently delineated in the sculptures of Asyr. and the paintings of Egp. The "pen"-K. (Jr. 36.[23]) is lit. "knife (ta'ar) of a scribe"; the K. used by them for sharpening their reed pens. The Heb. word is elsewhere trd. "razor."

KNOP, a word for an ornament; it represents two Heb. words: (a) Kaphtōr, used solely of the Golden Candlestick (Ex. 25.[31-36], 37.[17-22]). Judging fm. the representation on the Arch of Titus, the knops were globular expansions of the stalk, &c. The Heb. word is also trd. "lintel" (Am. 9.[1]; Zp. 2.[14]). (b) Peqā'īm ("gourds"), used of ornaments carved in cedar in the Temple of Solomon (1 K. 6.[18]), and of ornaments round the Brazen Sea (7.[24]); probably gourd-like forms.

Knops: Ornament from Nimroud. (Layard's Nineveh)

KOA (Heb. Qō'a), name of a people mentioned in Ek. 23.[23] as subject to Bab. There is some difficulty in identifying the people intended, but the probability is that K. represents the Quti of the monuments, also called Guti. If Hilprecht's identification of the river Chebar with the "canal" Shatt-el-'Arab is correct, Ezekiel wd. be in the neighbourhood, not only of K., but also of the places he associates with it, Pekod and Shoa. It ought to be noted that Jerome renders K. as principes.

KOHATH (Heb. Qĕhāth), KOHATHITES. Kohath was the second s. of Levi (Ex. 6.[16]); he had four sons—Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel (Ex. 6.[18]). As the whole tribe of Levi were raised to a specially sacred position relatively to the other tribes of Isr., by the fact that fm. them sprang the priestly family of the Aaronites, so for a similar reason among the Levites the family of the K. was distinguished. Although K. was not the eldest s. his descendants took the precedence of the Gershonites, as to them, not the Gershonites, was entrusted in the desert the conveyance of the sacred "vessels of the sanctuary, the ark, and the table, and the candlestick, and the altars," with the sacred hangings; these they had to bear on their shoulders, while the other two families had wagons assigned them to enable them to convey along the pillars and curtains of the Tabernacle and its court (Nu. 3.[27-32], 7.[9]). Thirteen cities in the tribes of Benjamin, Judah, and Simeon are assigned to the Aaronites as sons of K. (Jo. 21.[4]); and to the rest, ten cities in Dan, Ephraim, and Manasseh (vv. 20ff.). In the Temple Service the non-Aaronite families of the K. took a prominent place, especially in regard to Music.

KOHELETH. See Ecclesiastes.

KORAH (Heb. Qōraḥ, Ex. 6.[24]), KORHITES, KORATHITES (Nu. 26.[58]). Korah was the s. of Izhar and therefore cousin of Moses and Aaron. In Nu. 16. and 17. K. appears as heading a rebellion against Moses, and as joined in this by the leaders of the Reubenites. Yet it seems clear that the interest of K. must have been divergent fm. that of Dathan and Abiram. As Reuben was the first-born his tribe claimed the precedence at once in rule and worship; a Reubenite ought to be leader instead of Moses, and Priest instead of Aaron. But K. wd., if the Reubenites succeeded, lose the sacerdotal distinction wh. as a Levite and a Kohathite he had. What K. seems to have resented was the restriction of the priesthood to the Aaronites; hence "K. and his company" are required to bring their censers (Nu. 16.[6]). Along with these questions of precedence they murmured also at the privations they were called upon to endure. It might be that, taking advantage of this general discontent, K. hoped not only to wrest the leadership fm. Moses, but by dint of clever manœuvring to gain the supremacy for himself. There have been instances both in France and Britain in wh. parties diametrically opposed have united to upset a government. The rebellion of K. and that of Dathan may have been separated fm. each other by a considerable space of time, but are put together in the nar. for the sake of brevity. The fates of the two sets of rebels is different: Dathan and Abiram and all their households were swallowed up; whereas K. and those with him were burnt up. The descendants of K. form a guild of Temple singers. In the Psalter, Ps. 42.–49., 84., 85., 87., and 88., are attributed to the "Sons of Korah."

L

LABAN. (1) S. of Bethuel, br. of Rebekah, and so maternal uncle of Jacob, fr. of Leah and Rachel (Gn. 28.[5], &c.). He dwelt in Haran, the city of his grandfr. Nahor (Gn. 11.[31], 12.[1f.]), in "Aram of the two rivers" (Gn. 24.[10], Heb.), therefore he is called an Aramæan (AV. "Syrian," Gn. 25.[20], &c.). He appears first as bargaining about his sister's marriage (see Rebekah, Gn. 24.), when his own interests were attended to. What further is recorded of him concerns his dealings with his son-in-law (see Jacob). Avaricious and crafty by nat., at first he overreached and deceived Jacob, but in the later stages of the battle of wits and guile the younger man bore off the palm. As a fr. he seems to have inspired no deep affection in his children (Gn. 31.[14ff.]). (2) An unidentd. place in the desert wanderings, apparently between Horeb and Kadesh (Dt. 1.[1f.]).

Sennacherib on his Throne before Lachish

LACHISH, a royal city of the Can. taken by Joshua and assigned to Judah (Jo. 10.[3, 31ff.], &c., 15.[39]). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[9]). Here Amaziah was murdered (2 K. 14.[19], &c.). It was denounced by Micah (1.[13]). In B.C. 701 L. was besieged by Sennacherib, and hence he sent his messengers to Hezekiah (2 K. 18.[13, 17], &c.). Hither Hezekiah sent his tribute to the Asyr. (18.[14ff.], &c.). It was captured by the army of Nebuchadnezzar (Jr. 34.[7]). It was occupied after the Exile (Ne. 11.[30]) and then disappears fm. history.

Since the excavations of Prof. Petrie and Dr. J. F. Bliss at Tell el-Ḥesy, this mound is generally accepted as the site of L. Ruins were found of eight successive cities, dating fm. Can. times to about B.C. 500–400. This agrees well enough with what we know of the hist. of L. (see Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities). OEJ. places L. 7 Rm. miles S. of Eleutheropolis—Beit Jibrīn. Tell el-Ḥesy is 11½ Rm. miles SW. of Beit Jibrīn, on the S. bank of Wādy el-Ḥesy. Umm Lāqis, a ruin c. 2½ miles to the NW., was formerly identd. with L.; but the remains are insignificant, and the q of the name is a difficulty. There is no serious rival to Tell el-Ḥesy. It was a position of considerable strength. The last city was c. 120 ft. above the bed of the Wady, and ridges to the W. made it easy of defence.

LAHAI-ROI. See Beer.

LAHMAM, poss. textual error for "Lahmas" (RVm.), a town of Judah in the Shephelah (Jo. 15.[40]): prob. = el-Laḥm, 2½ miles S. of Beit Jibrīn.

LAHMI. Accdg. to 1 Ch. 20.[5], L. was the br. of Goliath of Gath slain by Elhanan, son of Jair. In 2 S. 21.[19] the text is in some confusion. Elhanan, son of Jaare-oregim the Bethlehemite, slays Goliath. Oregim ("weavers") has evidently slipped into this line from the line below. Lahmi appears as part of the name Bethlehemite. The text in 1 Ch. prob. represents the original, but there is no certainty. It may be the result of harmonistic effort.

LAISH. (1) See Dan. (2) The father of Palti, to whom Saul gave David's wife, Michal, his younger daughter (1 S. 25.[44]), called Paltiel in 2 S. 3.[15]. He is described as a native of Gallim.

LAISHAH. A place named along with Gallim (Is. 10.[30]). The latter appears to be north of Jerusalem. It may, however, be identified with Beit Jāla, not far from Bethlehem. But there is no trace of any name here resembling Laishah.

LAKUM, RV. LAKKUM, a town on the border of Naphtali, apparently between Jabneel and the Jordan (Jo. 19.[33]); unidentd.

LAMB. The usual word in Heb. is kebes for the male, and kibsāh for the female (Ex. 29.[38]; Gn. 21.[28], &c.), from wh., by transposition of the letters, we have keseb and kisbāh (Gn. 30.[40]; Lv. 5.[6]). These are the words commonly used for the lambs offered in the various sacrifices. Seh is lit. "a head of small cattle," and applies equally to sheep or goats, e.g. in Dt. 14.[4] we have sēh kĕsābīm wĕ-sēh 'izzīm. This is the word used in Gn. 22.[7f.];

Jewish Captives from Lachish

Ex. 12.[3], &c. Kar is a well-fed he-lamb, wh. cannot yet be described as 'ayil, "ram" (Dt. 32.[14], &c.). The LXX renders kebes by amnos, the word wh. appears in NT. in Jn. 1.[29, 36]; Ac. 8.[32]; 1 P.

1.19. In Rv. the word used is arnion, lit. "little lamb." The playful frisking of the lamb (Ws. 19.9), its innocence and gentleness (Is. 53.7; Jr. 11.19, &c.), furnished the Hebrew writers with striking figures. The lambs are to be the special care of the Messianic shepherd of Israel (Is. 40.11; cp. Jn. 21.15). The title, Lamb of God, applied by the Baptist to Jesus (Jn. 1.29, 36), probably glances back to the lamb wh. J". was to provide (Gn. 22.8). Doubtless here also we may trace the influence of Is. 53.7, which Philip (Ac. 8.32) interprets of Christ. St. Peter speaks of Jesus as "a lamb, without blemish and without spot" (1 P. 1.19). St. Paul regards Christ as "our Passover" (1 Cor. 5.7); and in the fourth Gospel a rule regarding the paschal lamb (Ex. 12.46) is applied to Jesus (Jn. 19.36). The Lamb of God's providing, an innocent and willing Victim, shd. complete the redemption symbolised by the system of sacrifice in wh. the lamb was the most prominent victim. In the book of Revelation the Redeemer is frequently spoken of as the Lamb. He is described as "a Lamb standing as though it had been slain" (Rv. 5.6, RV.), "the Lamb that hath been slain" (v. 12), in whose blood the garments of the saints have been washed and made white (7.14). The symbolism is clearly drawn from the significance of the lamb in the sacrificial ritual of Israel.

LAMECH, the name of two men. (1) The fifth in descent from CAIN, son of Methusael, and fr. of Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal-Cain (Gn. 4.18, &c.). To his two wives, Adah and Zillah, he addressed the oldest fragment of poetry preserved in the OT. (Gn. 4.23f.). It is difficult to determine the purport of this poem. Very probably it is a "sword song." (2) The seventh in descent from Seth, son of Methuselah, and fr. of Noah (Gn. 5.25, 30). Accdg. to MT. he lived 777 yrs. (LXX 753; Sam. 653). Of him, as of his Cainite namesake, a saying is recorded; he assigns a reason for calling his son "Noah" (5.29). The resemblance of the names in the Cainite and in the Sethite genealogies has led to the suggestion that they were originally the same.

LAMENTATIONS (Heb. 'ēḳāh, sometimes qīnōth: the first is the word with which the book opens, while the second is like the English title descriptive of its contents), the third of the five megilloth, or "rolls." Each of these is read on a special occasion, as ESTHER on the feast of Purim; L. is read by the Jews, barefoot, sitting on the ground, on the 9th of Ab (August), the anniversary of the two captures of Jerusalem, that by Nebuchadnezzar, and that by Titus. It consists of five elegiac poems; four of these are alphabetic, i.e. each verse begins with a different letter, the order of the alphabet being followed. There is, however, a peculiarity to be noted. In the first of these the verses succeed each other according to present order of the Hebrew alphabet; but the second, third, and fourth transpose the 16th and 17th letters. The fact that most of the Alphabetic Psalms have some irregularity has been taken to prove that in early days the order of the letters was not fixed with precision. The 1st, 2nd, and 4th poems begin with the word 'ēḳāh, "how." Although the 5th has 22 vv.—the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet—it is not alphabetic. The third is arranged in stanzas of three verses each, and, as in Ps. 119., each verse in the stanza begins with the same letter. This elegy has an additional peculiarity, that while the others are national, concerning Judah and Jerusalem, this is personal, expressing the author's feelings. The first pictures the desolation of Judah from the ravages of the Chaldean army; all the cities of Judah are captured; Jerusalem sits solitary; the wasted fields mean distress in the city. Jerusalem is introduced as making her plaint: "Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow" (1.12). In the second the siege appears to have begun, and famine is doing its deadly work: "The sucklings swoon in the streets of the city." The enemy has secured the gates of the city: "Her gates are sunk into the ground;" there is warfare in the streets, Jerusalem says: "My virgins and my young men are fallen by the sword" (2.21). The third, as we have said, is personal; it is to some extent autobiographical. In the beginning the poet seems to be suffering under some sickness: "My flesh and my skin hath He made old, He hath broken my bones" (3.4). Then his neighbours mock him: "I was a derision to all my people, and their song all the day" (v. 14). There is a momentary gleam of comfort: "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed" (v. 22). Then he contemplates the destruction of his people: "Mine eye runneth down with rivers of water for the destruction of the daughter of my people" (v. 48). The fourth exhibits the feelings of the fugitives from the captured city, recalling the terrible experiences of the siege, the horror of the famine when "the hands of pitiful women have sodden their own children." They feel themselves hunted: "Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of heaven, they pursue us on the mountains, they lay wait for us in the wilderness."

We translate here present although it is preterite in the Hebrew because the Hebrew verb has no present tense, and in such a connection an English poet wd. use the present.

The fifth is an expostulation with J". for His rejection of Zion; he attributes their distress to a heritage of guilt: "Our fathers have sinned and are not, and we have borne their iniquities" (5.7). He pictures the desolation of Judah: "The mountain of Zion is desolate, foxes walk upon it" (v. 18). Yet after all he has confidence in God: "Thou, O Lord, remainest for ever, Thy throne from generation to generation" (v. 19).

Date and Author.—An old tradition ascribes L. to the prophet Jeremiah. In 2 Ch. 35.[25] we are told that "Jeremiah lamented for Josiah, and all the singing men and singing women spake of Josiah in their lamentations unto this day, and made them an ordinance in Israel; and behold they are written in the Lamentations" (Qīnōth). The meaning of this seems to be that Jeremiah wrote a dirge over the death of Josiah, and that this was adopted by the Temple choir in Jerusalem. The difficulty is that this wd. apply only to the fourth chapter, indeed only to one verse—v. 20. The body of the book pictures more serious calamities than even the death of Josiah. Although L. is separated from the prophecies of Jeremiah in the MT., in the time of Josephus it must have been conjoined to it, otherwise the "books" wd. run to more than 22. Even if L. were separate from the Prophecies from the first it does not follow that it was regarded as by a different author; the Jews believed that Solomon wrote the Song of Songs, yet they did not conjoin it to Proverbs. The main reason against attributing to Jeremiah the authorship of L. is the tendency of great names to attract to themselves anonymous works that are at all in their style or suit their circumstances. It is clear the book describes Jerusalem being besieged; and the siege is so prolonged that in the extremity of hunger mothers devour their own children. We only know of two such sieges: that wh. resulted in Nebuchadnezzar's capture of the city, and that conducted by the Romans. We have no hint of any siege or any occasion for a siege during the Persian period. That being so, it seems most natural to ascribe it to the Chaldean siege, as it cannot have been the Roman. Hence if L. were not written by Jeremiah it must have been written by a contemporary of his. The fact that the first elegy follows a different order of the letters from the next three makes the suggestion of a different author at least plausible; if the order, however, was yet somewhat indefinite in early times, this has less probative value. The linguistic arguments to the same purport do not seem to be weighty.

LAMP. The Heb. lappīd (Gn. 15.[17]; Jg. 7.[16], &c.). is lit. "torch," or "flame." In every case "torch" best agrees with the context, but RV. retains "lamp" in Is. 62.[1]; Dn. 10.[6]. The Heb. nēr (Ex. 25.[37], &c.), and Gr. lampas (Mw. 25.[1], &c.) and luchnos (Lk. 15.[8]), stand for an essential article of household furniture (see CANDLE). It was necessary not only to give light, but also to preserve fire, which, in ancient times, was not easily produced. Thus it becomes a symbol of human life (Pr. 20.[20]). Of the shape and material of wh. lamps were made there is no account in Scrip. In the course of recent excavations in Palestine, however, the tombs have yielded an enormous number of lamps, of all periods. These are chiefly of clay; but occasionally they are found in bronze. Their development can be traced through all its stages. The earliest were in the form of an open saucer, or shell. Part of the edge was pinched, to afford a steady rest for the wick. Later, the lips of the part pinched were pressed more closely together, to form a sort of spout from which the wick projected. Then the base was made flat, for greater security in position. This form of open lamp may at times be seen in Pal. to-day. The next step was to cover the top, leaving a hole in the centre through which oil might be poured into the lamp, with a definite spout for the wick. Later still a grip or handle was added, at the side opposite to the spout. Artistic designs were stamped upon the clay, many of them ingenious and intricate. At times lamps are met with in the shape of animals or birds, although the resemblance is so rough that the potter can hardly be said to have broken the second commandment. Olive oil was generally used, and the ordinary wick was made of twisted fibres of flax (Is. 42.[3]).

The lamps used by the peasantry in Palestine to-day are mostly made of tin. The material is supplied by the tins in which petroleum is imported from Russia, and the lamps are made mainly by Jewish travelling tinkers. They are conical in shape, with an orifice for the wick at the apex. These are set, as the ancient lamps were, in a niche in the wall. The CANDLESTICK of AV. should always be "lampstand." It might be of stone. Nothing like our CANDLE was known in ancient times: but it and the tin candlestick are familiar sights now in Palestine. For lamps of more elaborate structure see TABERNACLE, TEMPLE. For discussion with illustrations see Bliss and Macalister, Excavations in Palestine, esp. Plates 62, 63, 66.

LANCE. See SPEAR.

LANCET (Heb. rōmah, "spear"). Only in 1 K. 18.[28] (AV.) is the word rendered "lancet," referring to the instruments with wh. the priests of Baal cut themselves. "Lancers," an old form of "lances," appears in the ed. of 1611. "Lancets" of later editions was intended as a correction. RV. reverts to "lances."

LAND-CROCODILE is the RV. rendering for AV. Chameleon (Lv. 11.^{30}).

LANDMARK (Dt. 19.^{14}). In a land without fences or dykes boundaries were indicated by stones, heaps of stones, trees, &c. The Heb. word in the passage cited, and elsewhere, however, is gebūl, lit. "border" or "boundary." Instead, therefore, of "Thou shalt not remove the landmark, &c.," we should tr. "Thou shalt not move the boundary of thy neighbour fixed by the ancients," i.e. in order to add to thy portion what properly belongs to thy neighbour. In arable land, which is mainly important, the usual boundary line is a furrow of double width, with a stone set up at either end. In this way the cultivated land is marked as between adjoining farmers in Pal. to this day: and the removal of such marks is often the occasion of great strife. There seems to have been special need for stringent regulations on this subject in old Israel (cp. Dt. 27.^{17}; Jb. 24.^{2}; Pr. 22.^{28}, 23.^{10}; Ho. 5.^{10}). Among other nations also boundaries were treated as inviolable. Among the Greeks they were under the protection of Ζεὺς ὅριος. The Romans even deemed it allowable to slay those who attempted to move them (Dion. Hal. ii. 74; Plutarch, Numa 16), and celebrated the annual festival of the Terminalia in honour of the god Terminus (Ovid, Fasti, ii. 639ff.) [Driver, Deuteronomy, 234f.].

Driver thinks that "the law, in its present wording, presupposes the occupation of Canaan by the Israelites, the ראשׁנים being evidently not the Canaanite predecessors of the Israelites, but the Israelite ancestors of the present possessors." Too much stress should not be laid on this. The Heb. word here used corresponds in meaning to the 'awwalun of the Arabs. The present writer inquired of certain Arabs in the Jaulun as to the popular view of the origin and use of the dolmens which abound there, and was told that they were the graves of the 'awwalūn—qubur el-'awwalīn. In response to further inquiry they explained that the 'awwalun were the bene Isra'il. They did not consider the "ancients" as in any way related to themselves save as predecessors in occupancy of the land.

LANGUAGES OF THE OT., THE. Although for all practical purposes it is correct to speak of the OT. as the Hebrew Bible, nevertheless there are some parts of it which are written not in Hebrew but in another language, which scholars have now agreed to call Aramaic, but which was in former days erroneously called Chaldee. These parts of the OT. are Jr. 10.^{11}; Dn. 2.^{4}–7.^{28}; Ez. 4.^{8}–6.^{18}, 7.$^{12-26}$, and, further, in the first clause of Gn. 31.^{47} we find two purely Aramaic words, of which the Hebrew equivalents are given in the second clause of that verse.

These two languages, Hebrew and Aramaic, are both branches of the great Semitic family (Gen. 10.$^{21-31}$), as philologists now call that family in contradistinction to the Aryan or Indo-European, to which our own English language belongs. Renan proposed to balance the compound title "Indo-European" by the similarly constructed term "Syro-Arabian," but that suggestion has not met with much approval; and the title "Semitic," to use the French spelling of the term introduced by the German scholar Eichhorn, may now be regarded as permanently established, despite the fact that it is by no means historically correct; for, on the one hand, all peoples of Semitic speech have not had in their veins the blood of Shem, and, on the other, all the descendants of Shem have not spoken a Semitic tongue.

Semitic-speaking nations spread themselves at various times over Hither-Asia and a great part of Africa, thus covering those vast areas of country known in history as Assyria, Babylonia, Mesopotamia, Syria, Phœnicia, Palestine, and Arabia. Hence the Semitic languages may be most conveniently classified into three great groups, corresponding to the geographical situation of those who spoke them—viz. North-Semitic, Mid-Semitic, and South-Semitic. The three main languages of the North-Semitic group are Assyrian, Aramaic, and Syriac; the two divisions of the Mid-Semitic are Phœnician and Hebrew, both of which are termed by some scholars Palestinian Aramaic; while the three main divisions of South-Semitic are Arabic, Ethiopic, and Amharic. Consequently of the two Semitic languages found in the OT. one belongs to the North-Semitic group, viz. Aramaic, whereas Hebrew itself belongs to the Mid-Semitic, and is thus seen to be much more closely allied as a language to the Phœnician than it is to the real Aramaic.

The outstanding characteristic of the Semitic family of languages is that they have all retained, in a perfectly marvellous degree, the features of their original mother-tongue. In fact, when one compares the differences between any two Semitic languages with the differences between any two Indo-European languages, one is all but driven to the conclusion that the differences in the former case are really so slight as almost to warrant the conclusion that such languages should be regarded as mere dialects of the one original Semitic tongue. Indeed it may be said that the original Semitic tongue practically survives to this day, not merely in the classical Arabic of the Qoran but also in the modern Arabic still spoken by a great variety of tribes and peoples both in South-western Asia and in North Africa. This is just another way of stating the theory of Professor Margoliouth of Oxford, who, following Olshausen, maintains that "the relation between Hebrew and Arabic is that of daughter and mother. The apparent absurdity of deriving so ancient a language as Hebrew from one of which the earliest specimens in our possession are so recent as the sixth cent. A.D. disappears in the face of the overwhelming evidence which comparative philology and grammar can produce." This simply means that, instead of postulating an original Semitic tongue which has not come down to us, but from which all the existing Semitic languages have sprung, and regarding Arabic as the daughter-language which most resembles its mother, Professor Margoliouth considers the existing language, which has, in his opinion, retained the greatest number of original characteristics, as being not the eldest daughter but the mother herself. Zschokke, on the other hand, points out that Aramaic is the simplest of the Semitic languages, and therefore infers that Aramaic is nearest to the original tongue. This, he thinks, is due to the fact that the Aramæans remained in their original home, and thus, not having changed their sky, they did not change their tongue either.

The term "Hebrew language" is not found in the OT. It occurs first in the Mishna, the Jewish commentary on the OT. In Is. 19.[18] we find the phrase "tongue of Canaan" used; but in 2 K. 18.[26, 28] Eliakim and Shebna are represented as requesting the Rabshakeh to speak Aramaic to them and not Jewish, for they could understand Aramaic but the common people could not—a passage of the utmost importance, as proving that the educated Assyrians and Israelites of Isaiah's day were at least bilingual, and could, in conversation with each other, employ either language at will with the full certainty of being understood. Jeremiah also expected (27.[3]) that his message, given in Hebrew, would be quite intelligible to the Edomite, Moabite, Ammonite, Tyrian, and Zidonian messengers who had been sent by their respective masters to king Zedekiah.

In post-Biblical Jewish literature the Hebrew of the Bible is spoken of as "the sacred tongue," or "the language of the sanctuary." It is Greek writers like Josephus who speak of the Hebrew dialect (Ἑβραῒς διάλεκτος, or ἑβραϊστί), including therein not only the Hebrew of the OT. itself but also the later Aramaic, commonly used in Palestine in the days of our Lord. It is to be remembered that it was by themselves that Jehovah's peculiar people were spoken of as Israelites or Jews, whereas by foreigners such as the Egyptians and Canaanites, the Greeks and Romans, they were called Hebrews.

The Hebrew language is by no means rich in independent roots. Arabic is in this respect infinitely richer. Böttcher has calculated that while in Greek there are only some 1800 roots, yet that language has more than 100,000 distinct words, simple and composite. On the other hand, Biblical Hebrew, with some 2000 roots, has only some 10,000 words. These roots are all but invariably triliteral, the biliteral being generally explicable as contractions from an original triliteral root by the omission of one or other of the so-called "weak letters," א, ה, ו, י, letters which are, from another point of view, described as vowel-letters. The whole Semitic group of languages is formed on quite a different plan from the Indo-European. Only the consonants were written, no vowels being used at all, though by-and-by the so-called vowel-letters were sometimes inserted to indicate the class of vowel intended, but not the particular vowel of that particular class. A great deal was therefore necessarily left to the linguistic acumen of the individual reader. This one fact, therefore, that in the original Hebrew MSS. there were no vowels, may reasonably be regarded as the best possible proof that, in the providence of God, the greatest precautions had been taken to guard against the natural desire of men to shelter themselves behind some external authority rather than trust to the enlightening influences of the Divine Spirit on their own hearts and minds. Hence in the process of the ages it came to be accepted as an indisputable dogma that not only did the Bible contain a Divine revelation to man, but that every consonant, vowel-point, and accent in it were equally sacred, the result of a special, direct revelation from God Himself to the original author. Yet it can be proved, from ancient monuments and coins still in existence, that there were no such signs as vowels or accents in the original MSS. Indeed the Massoretic system of vowel-points was not finally elaborated till some five centuries after Christ. As to the date of the OT. writings themselves it is sufficient here to quote the memorable sentence of Margoliouth, that "while neither the earliest nor the latest verse in the OT. can be named with certainty, there is probably none either earlier than B.C. 1100 or later than B.C. 100."

It is likewise worth noticing that in the Scriptures of the Old and the New Testaments we have presented to us the highest religious thought of the Semitic and the Aryan races, the two races of mankind that are intellectually and spiritually far ahead of all the others. In the OT. we have the quintessence of Semitic religious thought given us in Semitic speech; in the NT. we have the quintessence of both Semitic and Aryan religious thought presented to us in an Aryan language. Hence the world-embracing power of a religion based on the spiritual doctrines of a book with such a complex origin and history as the Bible. Hence also the necessity for European scholars acquiring a first-hand knowledge of the languages in which the OT. was originally written. For it is a truism to say that no translation, however good, can by any possibility equal the original.

Now Hebrew is not a difficult language to acquire if the initial difficulties be boldly faced and resolutely tackled. Hebrew is, in reality, so easy that, were it not that the Hebrew letters are so different in form from our own that many are repelled by their uncouthness from even beginning the systematic study of the language, I am convinced that a knowledge of this uniquely important tongue would be much more general among European Christians than it is. In its brevity and directness, in its freedom from abstractions and abstruseness as well as from the intricate syntactical involutions of such languages as Greek and German, the Hebrew language corresponds, as might have been expected, with the simplicity and naturalness of the unsophisticated life in which it was gradually evolved. Owing to the multitude of suffixes and prefixes which it possesses, it is characterised by extreme terseness. A whole sentence in English is not unfrequently represented in Hebrew by a single dissyllable, e.g. "thou carriest them away as with a flood" (Ps. 90.[5]), זְרַמְתָּם. This is due to the fact that though Hebrew has separate words for all personal pronouns, still, when these pronouns are either subjects or objects of verbs, they do not, as a rule, retain their independence as separate words, as they always do in English, but are changed into mere prefixes or suffixes, as the case may be. In the perfect, the pronouns, when nominatives, are invariably suffixes; in the imperfect they are sometimes only prefixes, and sometimes both prefixes and suffixes. When direct objects of verbs, pronouns, if not compounded with the sign of the accusative, are always suffixes, no matter with what part of the verb they are employed. The possessive pronouns are invariably used as suffixes to nouns, and these vary in form according as the noun is sing. or plur. The gender of the noun, which frequently determines its termination, has also an influence on the method of adding those pronominal suffixes. Hebrew nouns and verbs undergo far more internal changes than the same parts of speech do in Indo-European languages; but these changes can only be ascertained by a systematic study of the language, and cannot be described within the compass of a brief article.

Another fundamental difference between Aryan and Semitic languages is their entirely different idea of tense-formation. The Aryans indicate by their system of tenses the difference between actions happening in time, present, past, and future. The Semites have no such conception of time, but regard the action simply as being complete or incomplete. And in Hebrew, by a very peculiar effort of the imagination, writers employ a special idiom in connection with the inseparable Hebrew particle meaning "and" to transport the reader in imagination to the very point in time at which the first of a series of actions, of which the second is a direct result of the first, and the third of the second, and so on, has just been completed, and at which, therefore, all the other actions in the series are still in the future and therefore still incomplete. Thus, in consequence of this imaginative transportation of the reader to this particular point of time, all the succeeding tenses in the narrative are imperfects with vav conversive (or vav consecutive as it has been more logically termed) prefixed.

Finally, as an encouragement to study one Semitic language thoroughly in order to have a key with which to unlock the treasures of Semitic thought, it may be stated that, were it not the unfortunate fact that Hebrew, Arabic, and Syriac are all written in different alphabets, even the tyro would see that all these languages do not really differ from each other more than many dialects of the same Indo-European language do. For instance, there are many Scottish words that would be far more unintelligible to an English eye, and still more to an English ear when spoken by a Scottish tongue, than most kindred words in Hebrew, Aramaic, Syriac, or Arabic would sound to any Semite who knew only one of these four languages. Once the genius of a single Semitic language has been properly seized and mastered, a disciplined intelligence has, apart from the trouble of learning a new alphabet, little or no difficulty in acquiring any other language of the Semitic group. And for any one who is a Christian, Hebrew is obviously the language with which it is advisable to begin. J. A. PATERSON.

LANTERN (Gr. phanos). The word is used only in Jn. 18.[3]. It may stand for "lantern" as in EV.; but it seems more likely that torches of various kinds were used on that occasion.

LAODICEA. The NT. L., one of the eight cities of the same name, was built by Antiochus II. Theos (B.C. 261–246) on the site of a former city named Diospolis and Rhoas. It was named after his wife, Laodicé, and was meant to be a centre of Greek influence and Seleucid power. It was built on low hills of alluvial formation between the Lycus and the Asopus, tributaries of the Meander, a few miles W. of Colosse and six miles S. of Hierapolis. Its lands were well watered and fertile, and it acquired great wealth fm. the beautiful soft raven-black wool of its world-renowned breed of sheep, and fm. its trade with E. and W. The main routes of Asia Minor met here. One great highway led E'ward through Apamea to Mesopotamia, and a branch of it passed through the "Syrian Gate." W'ward one highway passed down the Meander valley to Magnesia and Ephesus, a distance of 90 miles, while another led over the mountains to Philadelphia, Sardis, Thyatira, and Pergamus. After suffering in the Mithridatic war, it recovered and reached a position of eminent prosperity just before the Christian era. It was well known for its money transactions, and Cicero, travelling in Asia, arranged to get supplies here. It became the seat of a Rm. "conventus"; art and science flourished, and the city produced some famous sceptic philosophers. Near at hand was the temple of Men Karou with its renowned medical school. Destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Nero, it was restored without receiving the imperial subsidy usl. in such cases. It had " need of nothing " (Rv. 3.[17]). It became the mother church of 12 bishoprics, and church councils were held here in 363, when a decree on the canon was issued, and in 476, when the Eutychians were condemned. Under Byzantium it retained its greatness; but Turkish conquest brought decay and destruction, and to-day its ruins (Eski Hissar, " old castle ") are solitary and deserted, monotonous and miserable in their dulness. Their extent, however, agrees with all the ancts. tell us. There are remains of an immense circus for 30,000 spectators, two theatres, a gymnasium, an amphitheatre, a necropolis with many sarcophagi, a colonnaded street, and an aqueduct with an inverted siphon of stone pipes to carry the water over the valley.

The Gospel was not introduced directly by Paul. When writing to Colosse he had not even been in the district. It had doubtless made its way along the trade route from Ephesus. The angel of the church was prob. Archippus whom Paul counselled (Col. 4.[17]), but any fruits of his ministry were undermined by the wealth, luxury, and pride of his people. After NT. times no name of note is connected with the church, and of its annals we know nothing. Paul had counselled this people, rich in worldly wealth, where they might find "all the treasures of wisdom and kge." (Col. 2.[3]); and later John, whose arrangement of the names of the churches shows that he knew the district well, seeks to appeal to them through the familiar circumstances of their daily life. He wd. persuade them to purchase "gold tried in the fire"; from their own ointments he wd. lead them to the true "eye salve"; while in contrast to their own beautiful black wool, he wd. have them clothed in "white raiment" (Rv. 3.[18]). The word "lukewarm" (Rv. 3.[16]) may have been suggested by the hot springs of Hierapolis and the cooling fountains of L.; or they may have carried the apostle's thoughts back to his native lake with its springs of all degrees of heat, wh. also were used for medicinal purposes (Jos. BJ. II. xxi. 6).

The question of Paul's letter to L. (Col. 4.[16]) has given rise to many theories, but the most likely and most accepted is that suggested by Ussher long ago—that it was the Epistle to the Ephesians, wh. was in reality a circular letter to the churches of Asia, and to this opinion the absence of the words "in Ephesus" (Eph. 1.[1]) from some important MSS. adds weight. The apocryphal "Epistle to the Laodiceans" is a late and stupid forgery.

LAPPIDOTH (" flames " or " lightning flashes "), the h. of Deborah (Jg. 4.[4]). Some wd. ident. L. with Barak ("lightning"), but quite unwarrantably. Cert. Jewish commentators explain it figuratively, as meaning that Deborah was a " woman of torches," i.e. that she trimmed the lamps in the sanctuary, or was one of a fiery disposition.

LAPWING (Heb. dūkīphath). The Hebrews were forbidden to eat this bird, as unclean (Lv. 11.[19]; Dt. 14.[18]). LXX render epopa, and Vlg. upupa, the Gr. and Latin names of the hoopoe. This bird is well known in Egp. by the name kekuphah, wh., like the Heb., is an imitation of its cry. RV. rightly adopts this tr. The hoopoe is about the size of a thrush. Its plumage is strikingly barred with white, and it is distinguished by a tall crest, which it raises and lowers at will. It is a regular summer visitor in Pal. Its peculiar cry, grotesque movements, and fearless bearing in presence of men make it the centre of much attention. It figures largely in the folklore of the country. A frequenter of dunghills and rubbish-heaps, it is by no means a clean liver; but it is eaten by the natives to-day.

Lapwing (Hoopoe)

LASEA, a town on the S. coast of Crete, not far fm. Fair Havens (Ac. 27.[8]). The ruins lie five miles E. of the Havens, one mile E. of Cape Leonda.

LASHA, an unidentd. town E. of Jordan, on the SE. border of the Canaanites (Gn. 10.[19]). Jerome placed it at Callirrhoë in Wādy Zerqā Ma'īn.

LASSHARON. LXX B. is prob. correct in reading " the k. of Aphek in Sharon " for " the k. of L." (Jo. 12.[18]). If, however, L. was the name of a Can. city Conder thinks it may be found in Sārōnā, on the plateau SW. of Tiberias.

LATCHET, a thong of leather with which the sandal is attached to the foot (Gn. 14.[23], &c.). To unloose the soiled L., and remove the sandal, is a service wh. the very humblest may render to the traveller (Mk. 1.[7], &c.).

LATIN, the language of the Roman masters of Pal., took, in the time of Christ, nearly the same place as Turkish does to-day. Greek, like French now, was known to the educated classes, and was the language of diplomacy and international intercourse, Aramaic (" Hebrew ") being the domestic language of the natives as Arabic is in mod. times.

While the great officers of state would be familiar with Greek, Latin was the language of the Roman courts, and proceedings before them were conducted in that tongue: altho' by favour of the court Greek might be employed. The situation described explains why the superscription on the Cross was written in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew (Aramaic). It was not unusual to hang a tablet round the neck of a condemned criminal on which was written a statement of his offence. It may also have been the practice to place such a placard over the crucified; but we cannot say with certainty.

LATTICE occurs three times in EV., each time representing a different Heb. word. (1) 'Eshnāb (Jg. 5.[28]; Pr. 7.[6], "casement"). (2) Harakkīm (SS. 2.[9]), "network," may signify the wooden trellis which so often fills the Oriental window-frame. (3) Sĕbakah (2 K. 1.[2]) is rendered "network" in 1 K. 7.[18], &c. It corresponds to the Arb. shubbāk, "window," wh. also refers to the trellis (cp. Arb. shabakeh, "net").

Bath in Temple at Baalbek

LAVER (Heb. kiyōr), a vessel of bronze or copper, on a base of the same metal, placed "between the tent of meeting and the altar" (Ex. 30.[18], &c.) and filled with water. Here the priests were required, on pain of death, to wash their hands and feet before drawing near to make the burnt offerings. The lavers in Solomon's Temple were large basins resting upon bases. Each base consisted of an elaborately ornamented framework of bronze, set upon four wheels. These were placed five on each side of the Temple. As to their use the Chronicler (2 Ch. 4.[6]) says "such things as belonged to the burnt offering they washed in them." Their height would make this difficult. They probably served some symbolical purpose. "The borders of the bases" were removed by Ahaz, and the lavers removed (2 K. 16.[17]). The lavers do not appear in the second Temple, nor in the ideal picture of Ezekiel.

The spiritual significance of the priestly washing is indicated in He. 10.[22]. In Tt. 3.[5] it is the type of "the washing of regeneration."

LAW. I. In OT. (1) Term torah, meaning and history; (2) Codes of law; (3) Effect of law. II. In NT. (1) In teaching of Jesus; (2) in the Christian Church.

I. (1) The Hebrew word for law, torah, from root "to point out," means originally oral direction, and especially direction given in the name of Jehovah, generally by priests. The use of the word in Ex. 18.[16] shows how the Torah took its rise from the decisions given on disputes by judges. Thus Moses says to Jethro, "When they have a matter they come unto me and I judge between one and another, and I do make them know the statutes of God and His laws (toroth)." These decisions were, no doubt, based on the customary usages of the people, modified by the judge's sense of fairness. The people, however, came to their superiors not only for direction in matters of civil dispute, but for instruction in questions of a moral and ceremonial nature. Thus the law deals not only with purely civil questions but also with moral duties and responsibilities, as well as with ritual and ceremonial arrangements. To the prophets the torah was all teaching given in God's name, more especially of a moral and religious nature. When Amos (2.[4]) condemns Judah for despising the law of Jehovah he refers to the general neglect of all moral and spiritual teaching. The "law" commended in the book of Proverbs (1.[8], 6.[20], 3.[1], 4.[2], 7.[2], &c.) ought to be translated "instruction." This usage goes back to the original idea of the term, so in a great many instances in the English Version of the OT. the word "law" is used when "direction" or "guidance" would be preferable. This "direction" or "guidance" was supposed to belong specially to the priests as the representatives of God, and as the priests were naturally interested in their ritual, the ceremonial aspect of the law came to predominate. In post-exilic times the term was applied to the whole of the Pentateuch, which contained the whole body of legislation, in contrast to the prophetic books.

(2) In the Pentateuch we have various legal codes belonging to different periods and stages in the history. The first of these is—

(a) The Decalogue (Ex. 20.[2-17]), in which the duties of the Israelite to God and man are briefly summarised.

(b) The Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20.[20]–23.[33]), so called from 24.[7]. The laws here laid down concern the relations of a people chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits, and deal with questions relating to civil and criminal cases, such as rights of slaves (21.[1-11]), murder (21.[12]), man-stealing (21.[16]), theft (22.[1-4]), &c.; also with moral and ceremonial enactments, such as nature of altars (20.[24-26]), sorcery (22.[18]), first fruits (22.[29]), &c. &c. The Book of the Covenant is the oldest code of Hebrew law, and contains the principles generally accepted in the earlier days of the settlement in Canaan, with the legal decisions which had been collected up to that date.

(c) The Law of Deuteronomy. This book consists of a code of law put into the form of hortatory addresses. The laws here are designed for a more advanced stage of civilisation, and while most of the enactments of the Book of the Covenant are included we have many new regulations. The code deals with religious observances, such as the law of the central sanctuary (12.[1ff.]), on which special emphasis is laid, laws regarding vows, offerings, clean and unclean animals, observance of festivals, &c. A special place is given to the officials of the kingdom. Duties of the judge (16.[18-20]), the king (17.[14-20]), the priest (18.[1-8]), the prophet (18.[9-22]) are specified, while we have a great body of legislation dealing with criminal cases, as also with questions of a civil and domestic nature.

(d) We have in the next place the so-called Law of Holiness (Lv. 17.–26.). This body of law deals much more fully with moral and ceremonial questions than with criminal cases. We have laws relating to offerings, sacrificial animals, first fruits, marriage, feasts, &c. The characteristic of these enactments is the emphasis laid on moral and ceremonial holiness, a feature perhaps due to the compiler.

(e) Lastly we have the legislation in the so-called Priests' Code, which is generally accepted as one of the original documents used in the compilation of the Pentateuch. The laws contained in this code relate almost exclusively to ceremonial observances, especially those of purification and sacrifice. Regulations are laid down for the rites connected with circumcision (Gn. 17.); the Passover (Ex. 12.[1-13]), the Sabbath (Ex. 31.[12-17]), offerings (Lv. 1.–3.), priests and vestments (Lv. 6.[8-18]), leprosy (Lv. 13., 14.), Day of Atonement (Lv. 16.), Nazirites (Nu. 6.[1-21]), Levites (Nu. 8.[5-26]), and in general everything belonging to the complicated ritual of the Jewish Church. While the various enactments of this code undoubtedly go back to a very early period, their present form belongs to post-exilic times, when the attempt was made to separate Israel sharply from the surrounding peoples.

(3) This system of law performed an important function in the religious and moral education of the Jewish people. The earlier laws were fitted to create a righteous, God-fearing nation; the later laws of ceremonial exclusiveness enabled the nation to survive and retain the special truths committed to it even after the national independence had been lost. The constant proclamation of the need of purification deepened in the hearts of the people the sense of sin, and prevented the national life from being assimilated to surrounding heathenism. The law marked Israel off from all other peoples, and the pious Jew gloried in this sign of their separation. The piety of the Psalmist regarded the law as the revelation of God's grace and love to His chosen people, and we find constant references to the blessings the law conferred; cp. Ps. 119., &c. The stress laid on ritual and ceremonial in the later codes rendered the growth of formalism and hypocrisy very easy, and in later Judaism the law, as expanded and defined by the scribes, became a heartless and intolerable burden, which enabled the few to pretend to the possession of a higher form of religion than was possible for the mass of the people. The law remained external, and its hard and exacting discipline led the noblest minds to look for a New Covenant, a law written in the heart which men would gladly obey (cp. Jr. 31.[31-34]). In the words of St. Paul the law was a schoolmaster leading to Christ (Gal. 3.[24]).

II. Law in NT. (1) In the teaching and practice of Jesus. The main feature in the relation of Jesus to the OT. law was the independent attitude He adopted towards its enactments. He claimed to be greater than the Temple and greater than Moses, and, unlike the scribes, He spoke with direct personal authority: "I say unto you." At the same time He declared, "I came not to destroy the law or the prophets but to fulfil" (Mw. 5.[17]). All that the law stood for, the whole of the OT. revelation, found its fulfilment in Him. He Himself in His person and work was the fulfilment of the law, the crown and completion of the Old Testament revelation. Jesus went behind the various enactments of the law to the principles on which they were based. He regarded as the first of all the commandments: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God . . . and thy neighbour as thyself" (Mk. 12.[30, 31]). He distinguished between the weightier matters of the law—justice, mercy, truth—and the lighter, of washings, purifications, tithes; and this distinction was revolutionary. In the Sermon on the Mount all mere traditional modifications and false applications are set aside, and the essential principles revealed, showing the law was spiritual, demanding not merely action but a state of the heart. He and His disciples were often criticised for failure to observe the laws of ceremonial. They ate without previous washings, and the law of the Sabbath was not so scrupulously observed by them as it was by the scribes. In this connection Jesus laid down the principle which determined His action in regard to all institutions of the Mosaic law: "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath" (Mk. 2.[27ff.]). The Sabbath, and by implication all other institutions, human and Divine, are appointed for the true well-being of men. Men were not made for institutions, but institutions are made for the making of men. Unless these institutions fulfil their higher purpose of making men, of bringing blessing to them physically, morally, religiously, then they are more honoured in the breach than in the observance. Deeds of mercy have a prior claim on the human soul to any demand of external ritual. Beyond that, Jesus claims authority over the Sabbath, and professes to work on that day even as His Father works (Jn. 5.$^{17-20}$). This claim led to His condemnation by the Sanhedrin (Mk. 14.^{61}).

On the subject of the ritual law of the OT. Jesus says little. He prophesied the fall of the Temple and the consequent end of the ceremonial system it embodied, but at the same time He gave obedience to many of its commands, as part of a dispensation whose end was not yet. Thus He paid the Temple tax (Mw. 17.$^{24-27}$) and ordered the cleansed leper to present himself to the priest (Mw. 8.$^{1-4}$). But the ritual aspect of the OT. law received in Him its fulfilment. He spoke of His death as the basis of the New Covenant, which promised remission of sins. Thus His death was sacrificial. It remained, however, for the apostles to expound more fully after the event the relation of the death of the cross to the old law.

(2) In the Christian Church the meaning and the place occupied by law in the Christian dispensation was one of the first problems which had to be wrought out. When the Gentiles who were uncircumcised were admitted to the Church the question at once arose: Must these be circumcised and keep the law of Moses? We cannot enter into the history of this conflict here. But two parties were gradually evolved, a Gentile and a Jewish party, the latter insisting that believers must keep the law of Moses. The teaching and influence of St. Paul prevented this opinion from prevailing. Paul, with his keen insight into human nature, and his intimate acquaintance with the non-Jewish mind, clearly saw that if Judaism was to be regarded as the only means of entrance to Christianity, then his Gospel would never be accepted by the Gentile world as a whole. All his energy was thrown into the struggle, and he maintained with unwavering persistence the freedom of his Gospel from the law. Legalism and the Gospel are eternally opposed. The law had its place and its uses, but it could not be substituted for the Gospel of the grace of God in Jesus Christ. Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but a new creature (Gal. 6.^{15}), faith working by love (Gal. 5.^{6}), keeping the commandments of God (1 Cor. 7.^{19}).

The place of the law in Christian experience occupies a prominent place in Paul's theology. In speaking of "the law" or "law" he means now the Mosaic system, again simply statutory enactments in general. St. Paul had as a Pharisee sought to win the Divine favour and approval by obedience to the law, and his experience led him to the conclusion that there was no road that way. By the works of the law no flesh living is justified (cp. Rm. 3.^{20}; Gal. 2.^{16}). But by identifying himself with Christ, by acceptance of His obedience as the only obedience satisfying to God, Paul had found peace, and thus was led to formulate his doctrine that Christ is the end of the law for righteousness (Rm. 10.^{4}). The law could not save men. It brought the knowledge of sin. It even tended to increase sin, and is thus an indirect preparation for the Gospel. It brings men under condemnation of death. This again connects the law with the Gospel, for this sentence of the law was borne by Christ. Christ honoured the law in freely submitting to that death in which the sentence of the law on mankind is expressed. Christ bore the curse of the law. Thus those united to Him have no law except the law of the Spirit of life in Jesus Christ.

In the Epistle to the Hebrews we find a different way of viewing law. The law referred to is generally the law of Moses regarded more in its ritual aspect as laying down rules for worship. The old law is the religious constitution under which atonement was made by a Levitical priesthood. With the change in the priesthood there comes in a change of law. The New Covenant is the perfect completion of what was dimly foreshadowed in the old law. While St. Paul thinks of law as chiefly moral, the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews thinks of it as a system of ritual, as the constitution under which God is worshipped.

In the other books of the NT. there is comparatively little on the subject of law. The Apocalypse reflects the conflict between Law and Gospel, but the claim that legalism is taught is unfounded. The works enjoined are the works of Christ (2.^{26}), and the conception of rewards (2.$^{17, 26}$, 22.^{12}) is common to the whole of the New Testament. The Epistle of James lays great stress on works as the proof and outcome of true faith, and contrasts these works with mere intellectual belief, but the works enjoined are not what St. Paul would call works of the law but rather fruits of the Spirit. The law which is to guide the lives of men is the "law of liberty" (1.^{25}, 2.^{12}), and is summed up in the "royal law" of love (2.^{8}). To the enlightened Christian law could never become a means of meriting Divine favour, but on the other hand the Christian, inspired by the love of Christ, kept the law as the expression of the will of God, which he strove to make his own. In the love of Christ the statutes of God become the Christian's songs in the house of his pilgrimage.

LAWGIVER (Heb. mĕḥōqēq) is derived fm. the verb ḥāqaq, "to engrave." It was customary to engrave decrees upon tablets, and so the word came to mean "to decree," or "command." The ruler was the chief fountain of law, combining in himself the functions of leader (Jg. 5.[9, 14], &c.) and lawgiver (Is. 33.[22], AVm. "statemaker"). In Gn. 49.[10] RV. translates "ruler's staff." This seems to be required by parallelism with "sceptre." The phrase "between his feet" refers to the position of the long staff or symbol of royalty, which, when the monarch sat, rested between his feet (Ball, Sacred Books of the OT., on Gn. 49.[10]).

In NT. nomothetēs occurs only once (Js. 4.[12]), and there it is applied to God as the supreme fountain of law. The verb nomotheteō (He. 7.[11]) and the noun nomothesia (Rm. 9.[4]) refer to the ancient law of Israel.

LAWYER (Gr. nomikos) in NT. is apparently identical with Scribe (grammateus), and doctor of the law (nomodidaskalos). After the return from Babylon, it was necessary to explain the law to the people. So much depended upon their faithful observance of its precepts, that they could not afford to be in ignorance of even the least of its requirements. A class of men therefore arose who devoted themselves to its study, in order to give the necessary instruction and guidance. It is possible that some attended specially to particular aspects of the subject, and this may have led to the use of different names: but there are no available data on which to base a distinction. See Scribes.

LAYING ON OF HANDS. In OT. hands were laid on the head in the act of blessing (Gn. 48.[14ff.]). It plays an important part in the ritual of sacrifice (Ex. 29.[10], &c.). Robertson Smith (RS.[2] 422f.) holds that this signified identification of the parties by physical contact, and also, though "not specially," the transfer of guilt. It clearly meant this, however, in the case of the scapegoat. Laying the witnesses' hands on the head of the blasphemer may have indicated conveyance of judgment (Lv. 24.[14]). In the case of Levi, the ceremony by representatives of the tribes symbolised the giving of authority to act for them (Nu. 8.[10]). In the same way Moses marked the transfer of the status and power of leader to Joshua (Nu. 27.[18, 23]; Dt. 34.[9]).

In NT. Jesus lays on His hands in the act of blessing (Mw. 19.[15], &c.). He and His disciples did the same in acts of healing (Mw. 9.[18]; Mk. 16.[18]; Ac. 9.[12], &c.). In imparting the Holy Ghost whom they had received fm. Jesus (Jn. 20.[22]), the apostles laid hands on the baptized (Ac. 8.[17], &c.). By laying on of hands also, men were set apart for special service (Ac. 6.[6], &c.). 1 Tm. 5.[22] prob. refers to the ordination of presbyters. The Christian practice was doubtless derived fm. the Jewish. Admission to the office of Rabbi was symbolised by the laying on of hands (Edersheim, LTJC. ii. 382).

LAZARUS. (1) L. of Bethany, br. of Martha and Mary, the friend of Jesus, whom He raised fm. the dead (Jn. 11.[1ff.]). This chap. relates all that is known of L. personally. Jesus was accustomed to lodge in Bethany, doubtless in the house of His friends (Mk. 11.[11]; Lk. 10.[38ff.]). The raising of L., after four days in the grave, when all doubt of his death had become impossible, was the crowning display of Divine power by Jesus. It was the immediate cause of His enemies' haste in condemning Him. They feared that if left alone all men might follow Him. In a true sense, therefore, Jesus laid down His life for L. (2) L. is the only char. with a personal name in all the parables of Jesus. In the parable of the rich man and L. (Lk. 16.[20ff.]), he is commended and rewarded, not because of his poverty, but because he is patient and uncomplaining. He stands for the opportunities at life's highway side, for the deliberate neglect of wh. rich men, men with ability, are punished.

LEAD. This metal was familiar to the Egyptians in very early times, and was used by fishermen to make sinkers for their nets. There the Hebrews would become acquainted with it, and in the Song of Moses (Ex. 15.[10]) it is said that the Egyptians "sank as lead in the mighty waters." They knew it was found in the dross of silver (Jr. 6.[29]; Ek. 22.[18, 20]); and it is mentioned as an article of commerce (Ek. 27.[12]). The phrase in Jb. 19.[24] refers to the ancient custom of filling in with lead the letters of an inscription cut in rock, with a view of securing greater durability.

LEAH, elder dr. of Laban, sr. of Rachel, whom her fr. married to Jacob by guile (Gn. 29.[23]), the bride being, according to Oriental usage, introduced to her husband veiled. Not so well favoured as her sr., she had weak eyes. L. bore six sons and one dr. to Jacob. She accompanied him on his homeward journey, and when she died she was buried in the Cave of Machpelah (Gn. 49.[31]). The name may mean "mistress" (cp. Assyrian li'at), or "wild cow" (cp. Arabic la'ā [la'ah]).

LEASING. The word, meaning "a lie," or "deceit," occurs only in AV. in Ps. 4.[2] (RV. "falsehood") and Ps. 5.[6] (RV. "lies"); cp. 2 Es. 14.[18].

LEATHER, the dressed and tanned skin of animals used for girdles (2 K. 1.[8], &c.). Tanning was practised by the Jews (Ac. 9.[43]), and L. was used for shoes, Bottles, Skins, &c.

LEAVEN is a generic term, covering anything wh. sets up fermentation, and causes dough to rise in the baking. In the E. it is usually applied to dough wh. is thoroughly leavened, a piece of wh. is kept after baking to mingle with the fresh dough for the next time. The leavening process is somewhat slow. Bread baked hastily is therefore without L. (Ex. 12.[34], &c.). This applies to most of the bread eaten in the E.

It is agreed that the shewbread was leavened: so might be the offerings to be eaten by the priests (Lv. 7.[13], 23.[17], &c.). The bread used at the Passover, and all offerings laid on the altar, must be free fm. L. To this day, at the season, in Jewish houses the most thorough search is made, that they may be cleansed of everything that might be used to set up fermentation.

The Mishna contains curious directions how to recognise the beginning of the leavening process. "When the surface of the dough shows two small cracks like the antennæ of locusts running in different directions," or "when the surface has become pale like (the face of) one whose hair stands on end (through fear)" (Pesah 3.[5]).

The reason for excluding L. as above undoubtedly was that the process of leavening was regarded as corruption. This, together with its pervasive char., supplies the point in the figure of Jesus (Mw. 13.[33], &c.).

LEBANON. The name of L. is derived from the Heb. root meaning "white," and the word has been connected by some with its snow-clad peaks, while others refer it to the white walls of chalk and limestone which are its chief characteristic. It is not at all a single mountain, as some references of Scrip. might lead us to think (Dt. 3.[25]; Jg. 3.[3]), but rather two lofty parallel ranges, the western named Jebel Libnān, or Lebanon proper, and the eastern Jebel-esh-Sharqi, or Anti-lebanon—"L. toward the sun-rising" (Jo. 13.[5]). The former rises from the rounded hills of Upper Galilee, and extends from the Leontes (Qasimīyé) beside Tyre, 100 miles northwards to the Eleutherus beyond Tripoli; while the latter, starting from Mt. Hermon, "the tower of L." (SS. 7.[4]), extends about 70 miles northwards to near Riblah. The two ranges are separated by el-Buqā' or Cœle-Syria, a valley four to six miles broad, wh. is well watered by the Leontes (Litāny), and wh., at its N. end, opens out into the plain of Emessa—"the entering in of Hamath" (Nu. 34.[8]). The two ranges resemble each other in that the S. end of each is less arid and barren than the northern; the western valleys in each are better watered and more fertile than the eastern; and the main peaks in each are opposite one another. In form the hills are on the whole monotonous; but what is wanting in rugged grandeur is amply made up for by the variety of colouring; and when covered by the winter's snows and seen either from Pal. in the S. or from the western sea the appearance is magnificent; while at other seasons the landscape is scarcely less entrancing. The valleys, through which perennial streams flow, contrast beautifully with their belts of green and blooming oleander agst. the brown and yellow hillsides. L. attracts to itself the moist winds of the Mediterranean in the winter and the balmy breezes of the S. in the early spring. During half the year it has abundant rains, and the snows, preserved on the hilltops and in the ravines throughout the year, cool the air and supply the gushing fountains. In addition to the rivers already named there are many perennial streams, among which the Lycus and the Adonis are of historical interest. The former (Nahr el-Kelb, "Dog River") is famous for its caves and its Assyrian and Egyptian rock-cut records of military expeditions in anct. times. The latter (Nahr Ibrahim) "springs full born from a cavern in a perpendicular rock more than 1000 feet in height," near the temple of Venus, "in the most romantic place in L.," and enters the sea S. of Gebal (Ps. 83.[7])—mod. Jubeil, the Byblos of the Greeks. Although Anti-lebanon has fewer streams and a greater amount of bare rock and crag, it possesses nevertheless many a grassy ravine, and fm. it spring the Barada and the Zebedāni.

The chief peaks vary fm. 5600 feet to the E. of Sidon up to 10,000 feet above Tripoli; but the best known is Jebel Sunnīn (8780), NE. of Beyrout, which many have sought to ident. with Mt. Hor of Nu. 34.[7, 8]. Minerals, mostly unworked, are abundant. They consist mainly of mineral oil, bitumen, asphalt, coal, and iron. The cretaceous limestone, the chief constituent of the rocks, is mixed with enough friable limestone and volcanic products to make the soil fruitful. Pasture land and grass are scarce except in the Buqā', and some of the broader valleys; but by terracing all may be rendered fruitful, even to the hilltops. Wine, grape-honey, raisins, and olive oil are produced in large quantities. The walnut, fig, and mulberry are plentiful, silk culture is profitable, and cattle, sheep, and goats glean sufficient pasturage among the low brushwood. The western valleys have the flora of the Mediterranean, while the eastern toward the desert is poorer. Up to 1600 feet the products are those of Syria generally, including the carob and the pine; then we have dwarf oak till 3200 is reached, and thence till 6200 cedars and cypresses, above wh. there are Alpine plants. The once famous cedars are now found almost exclusively in the Qadīsha and Barook valleys.

Wild animals are still abundant, the bear, hyæna, wolf, fox, jackal, gazelle, and hog being found. The eagle, vulture, partridge, and pigeon are plentiful, and gay birds chirp cheerily on every tree. The Arabs sum up all we have said in their declaration that "L. bears winter on its head, spring on its shoulders, autumn in its lap, while summer lies at its feet." It well deserved to be called a "goodly mountain" (Dt. 3.[25]), and that not only in comparison to the desert fm. which Israel was coming but even in contrast to the brightest spots in Judæa.

It is first mentioned in the OT. as the N. boundary of the land (Dt. 1.[7], 11.[24]; Jo. 1.[4]) and sometimes as having been given to Isr., but they never so far overcame its people—the Hivites and Giblites—as to gain possession (Jo. 13.[5, 6]; Jg. 3.[1-3]). During the days of the Kings it was subject to Tyre and Sidon, and to their rulers the Israelites were indebted for the cedars wh. formed the woodwork of the first and second temples (1 K. 5.[6]; Ez. 3.[7]), and the House of the Forest of L. (1 K. 7.[2ff.]), wh. last received its name either from this fact or from its being built in N. Syrian style. Thenceforward L. is well known in Heb. Lit. Its woods are mentioned (SS. 3.[9]); the strength, beauty, and luxuriance of its firs and cedars are spoken of in terms of praise (Ps. 29.[5], 92.[12]; Is. 14.[8]; Hb. 2.[17]). Its animals seem to have been regarded as of special excellence (Is. 40.[16]). At the present time the population numbers about 275,000, and their men are on the whole strong, energetic, and patriotic.

LEEKS (Heb. ḥātzīr, "grass"), trd. L. in Nu. 11.[5]. This is supported by all the VV., and by the mention along with it of onions and garlic, wh. were all common articles of diet in anct. Egp.

LEES. The word is used only in a figurative sense in OT. (Is. 25.[6], &c.). It denotes lit. the sediment settled at the bottom of the vessel holding WINE.

LEG stands for several Heb. words. (1) Kĕrā'-ayim, a fem. dual from an unused sing. kera'. It signifies a pair of bending legs. Used of those of animals for sacrifice, "his head with his legs" (Ex. 12.[9], &c.). It is used also of the long, bending hind legs of the locust, the cricket, and the grasshopper (Lv. 11.[21]). (2) Regel, lit. "foot." It is applied to the feet (a) of men (Gn. 18.[4], &c.), often figuratively, e.g. "foot of pride" (Ps. 36.[12]); (b) of God, conceived as in the form of man (Ex. 24.[10], &c.); (c) of angels (Is. 6.[2], &c.); (d) of birds (Gn. 8.[9], &c.); (e) of beasts (Ek. 1.[7], &c.); (f) of articles of furniture (Ex. 25.[26], &c.). It is used also of the pace at which one travels (Gn. 33.[14]). In four cases it is used in the plural, in the sense of "times," each case in the phrase "three times" (Ex. 23.[14]; Nu. 22.[28, 32f.]). Like the Arabic rijl, "foot," it may also mean "leg" (1 S. 17.[6]). (3) Shōq seems to be distinguished as the lower leg from the thigh in the phrase "hip and thigh," wh. is literally "leg upon thigh" (Jg. 15.[8]), which points to the ground strewn with hacked and severed limbs. In other cases (Ex. 29.[22], &c.), it stands definitely for the upper leg or thigh (AV. trs. "shoulder," RV. rightly "thigh"). The phrase in Ps. 147.[10], "the legs of the man" (Heb.), may possibly denote foot soldiers. (4) Shōbel (Is. 47.[2]) denotes not leg (AV.) but "train" (RV.), a flowing skirt. In NT. the Greek word is skelos. It occurs only in Jn. 19.[31ff.] If it was desired for any reason to hasten the death of the crucified, it was customary, with a wooden mallet, to smash the bones in the legs of the victims.

LEGION, a body of troops in the Roman army, numbering at first from 3000 to 4000, but under the Empire from 6000 to 7000. The legion consisted mainly of infantry, of whom latterly there were 6000, divided into ten cohorts of 600 each, over which were tribunes. The cohort, again, contained six centuries, commanded by centurions. The word occurs in NT. only in connection with the demoniac (Mw. $26.^{53}$, &c.). But while no occasion for the further use of the name arose, the legion itself may have been familiar enough to dwellers in Pal. in the time of our Lord, owing to the various incursions of the Roman armies. This familiarity may be taken as proved by the use of "legion" as a symbol of multitude. In later NT. times we know that a legion proper was stationed in Palestine.

LEHI, "jawbone," the scene of Samson's exploit agst. the Phil. (Jg. $15.^{9, 14}$, "Ramath L.," i.e. "Hill of L.," v. 17), a place prob. deriving its name fm. some resemblance to a jawbone, prob. in Wādy es Sarār, near Zorah and Timnath. No satisfactory identification has been proposed.

LEMUEL. The 31st chap. of Proverbs purports to be an "oracle" taught by his mr. to King Lemuel. Taking massa, the word translated "prophecy" (AV.) or "oracle" (RV.), as a proper name, we may read "Lemuel, king of Massa" (RVm.). In that case his kdm. might be sought in Arabia, where the children of Massa, son of Ishmael, found their home (Gn. $25.^{14}$; 1 Ch. $1.^{30}$). Some think the name ("belonging (?) to God") might be applied to a wise and virtuous king, such as Hezekiah. But here we are in the region of pure conjecture.

LENTILS (Heb. 'adāshīm = Arb. 'adas) form an important part of the food of the common people in Pal. (Gn. $25.^{34}$). The usual "pottage" is dark brown in colour. With the L. are stewed pieces of meat, onions, rice, oil, &c.

LEOPARD (Heb. nāmēr, "spotted," Aram. nĕmar = Arb. nimr), the well-known predaceous animal of the cat tribe. In former times the L. was common in Mt. Lebanon. It is still found not infrequently in the Hermon and Anti-lebanon range (SS. $4.^{8}$). In 1892 a leopard established a reign of terror in the central district of Upper Galilee, and wrought great havoc among the cattle before he was shot by a young engineer. His body measured over four feet in length. The L. is fond of the flesh of goats, and is therefore specially feared and hated by the shepherds in Sinai, whose flocks are mainly goats (Is. $11.^{6}$). The habits of the creature are referred to in Jr. $5.^{6}$ and Ho. $13.^{7}$. It lies in ambush, observing the movements of its prey, springing with certain aim when the opportunity comes. It is graceful in form and swift in motion (Hb. $1.^{8}$); its beautiful skin, with dark spots on the tawny fur, is highly prized.

The L. figures in several place-names in Scrip., e.g. Nimrah (Nu. $32.^{3, 36}$), Nimrim (Is. $15.^{6}$), &c. It was probably once much more common than it is now; but in the southern reaches of the Arabah and the mountains on the east still the cheetah (Felis jubata) is a not unfamiliar sight. It is sometimes tamed by the Arabs and used in hunting.

The L. was thought to be a different animal from the panther, or pard, and to be a hybrid between the lioness and the pard: hence the name leopardus, "lion-pard."

LET. In AV. this verb sometimes occurs in a sense the exact opposite of its modern meaning, "to allow." In Ex. $5.^{4}$; Nu. $22.^{16ff.}$; Is. $43.^{13}$; Rm. $1.^{13}$; 2 Th. $2.^{7}$ it means "to hinder," or to "restrain."

LETTECH is EVm. transliteration of the word trd. in EV. "an half homer" (Ho. $3.^{2}$). "An homer of barley and an half homer of barley" would together be worth about 15 silver shekels. This with the 15 shekels in money make up 30 shekels, wh. are specified (Ex. $21.^{32}$) as the price of a slave. See Weights and Measures.

LETUSHIM and LEUMMIM are named as sons of Dedan (Gn. $25.^{3}$), grandson of Abraham by Keturah. The plural form suggests that they are names of peoples, whom, however, it is still impossible to trace. The former may be connected with the verb lāṭash, "to forge," "to sharpen"; in which case the names might stand for trades. They are, however, generally regarded as proper names; and names bearing some resemblance to them have been found in Nabatæan and Sabæan inscriptions. But no certain conclusion can be reached.

LEVI, LEVITES, PRIESTS. The plain Scrip. nar. mentions Levi as the third s. of Jacob and Leah (Gn. $29.^{34}$), and connects the name with the Heb. root lavah, to adhere; a word found in the mother's expression of a desire for a more affectionate relationship with her husband, for Jacob "loved Rachel more than Leah." After his birth nothing is recorded of him till the family of Jacob is settled in the land of Can. Along with his br. Simeon he took upon himself the avenging of the insulted family honour and the injury to his sr. Dinah (Gn. 34.). Such seems to have been the duty of the brs. rather than of the fr. (cp. 2 S. 13.[22]); but in the present instance, instead of being satisfied with the demands of the lex talionis and confining their vengeance to the guilty individual, they allowed their anger to carry them to extremes, and by means of cowardice and treachery they accomplished a gen. massacre of the Shechemites (Gn. 34.[25]). In nothing else do we hear of Levi taking a prominent part. Like his brethren, he hated Joseph and shared in their action (Gn. 37.), while later L. is mentioned with his three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, as of the party when Jacob migrated to Egp. Jacob, who at the time of the massacre of the Shechemites had remonstrated but feebly, and who was apparently then silenced by the answer of the sons, brought up the subject again for condemnation in his deathbed song (Gn. 49.[5-7]), and prophesied the scattering of Simeon and Levi in Isr. While his words were literally fulfilled in the descendants of Simeon, the scattering in the case of the tribe of Levi was, on account of subsequent loyalty (Ex. 32.[26-28]), changed into a blessing. It is to be noted that the action condemned by Jacob is in later Lit. (Jth. 9.[2]; Bk. Ju. 30.[18]) commented on with approval.

Levites.—Sometimes this word is used, on the analogy of the other tribal names, of all the descts. of Levi (Ex. 6.[25]; Nu. 35.[2]; Dt. 10.[8]); but as the "sons of Aaron" were specially appointed to the higher office of the priesthood, and were not usually designated Levites (1 K. 8.[4]; Ez. 2.[70]; Jn. 1.[19]), it came about that all the members of the tribe, with their exception, were known by this name. The dedication of this whole tribe to the service of religion is thus related in Scrip. From the time of Isr.'s redemption (Ex. 13.) the first-born males of man and beast were to be dedicated to the Lord, but instead of the first-born of all Isr. the tribe of Levi was taken (Nu. 8.[16]), and instead of the first-born of all cattle, those of the Levites (Nu. 3.[45]). The numerical correspondence (Nu. 3.[43]) of the consecrated tribe with those they represented was so close as to be fitted to impress upon the people the idea of substitution.

The service required of them was arranged in the wilderness. The organisation was on martial lines, and it was designated military service, and described as keeping charge of the sanctuary, i.e. the Levites were a kind of royal guard waiting exclusively on the theocratic King of Isr., whose presence among the people was signified by the tabernacle. They entered on active service at the age of 30 (Nu. 4.[23]), but Nu. 8.[24] seems to imply a period of preparatory service; and they were relieved of all responsibility save that of supervision at the age of 50 (Nu. 8.[25]). These age limits reduced the numbers at command in the three families derived fm. Levi's sons to 2750 Kohathites, 2630 Gershonites, and 3260 Merarites (Nu. 4.); and to these three families were assigned the following duties during the desert pilgrimage. The Kohathites were required to bear the sacred vessels, and the ark itself, after it had been covered even fm. their view by the priests; the Gershonites were the bearers of the curtains and hangings of the tabernacle; while the boards, bars, and pillars were borne by the Merarites (Nu. 3., 4.).

When the desert wanderings were over, and the tabernacle was set up at a fixed centre, a great part of the duties then imposed upon these families came to an end, and, besides, they were also considerably relieved of their more burdensome duties in being assisted by the Gibeonites (Jo. 9.[27]) (see NETHINIM). Arrangements were consequently made wh. did not necessitate their continual presence at the sanctuary, but in these, the more effectively to separate them fm. the common pursuits of life, no territorial possession was assigned to them as a tribe. The Lord was to be their inheritance (Nu. 18.[20]; Dt. 10.[9]). The Levites were distributed through the other tribes, in whose possession they received 48 towns, with their suburbs as pasture lands (Nu. 35.[3]). In addition there was assigned to them a tithe fm. all the produce of the other tribes, but of this they had themselves to give a tithe to the priests (Nu. 18.[21, 24, 26]; Ne. 10.[38]). Every third yr. again they were to receive an additional share in the produce of the land (Dt. 14.[28f.], 26.[12]).

No sooner had the work of conquest been carried to the centre of the land than Joshua, in the settling of the tribes, assigned also to the L. their cities. How they fulfilled their duties during the days of the Judges we can only conjecture. Like the tribes amongst whom they dwelt, they lived alongside of the old inhabitants of the land (Jg. 1.); and on the whole we are led to believe that this was among them a period of declension, in testimony of wh. we may cite the almost incredible cowardice and low morality of the Levite of Mt. Ephraim (Jg. 19.), and the conduct permitted around the tabernacle in the time of Eli; a state of matters that cd. only be the result of a long period of moral decay. Samuel, himself a L., seems to have set himself the task of reforming the order, and tradition has it that he was the founder of the "schools of the prophets," wh. prob. were for the most part composed of Levites.

The absence of the ark in Phil. territory, and later at Kirjath-jearim, though in many ways producing anomalous circumstances, did not altogether prevent the ministrations of the Levites; for during that period we find them serving at Shiloh (1 S. 14.[3]), Nob (1 S. 22.[11]), and Gibeon (1 K. 3.[4]; 1 Ch. 16.[39]); and on its recovery the position of the Levites was fully recognised. The paramount position of the L. during the long judgeship of Samuel was prob. one of the causes of reaction that led to the demand for a king; and the troubles of Saul's reign may in some sense be looked upon as arising out of a claim of the "divine right of kings" agst. the ecclesiastical order. Down to the days of David the organisation had remained practically that of the desert; but with his settling of the tabernacle service, more elaborate arrangements were introduced, and the duties of the L. thenceforward included all the services of the House of the Lord, save mediatorial functions (1 Ch. 23.[24-32]). To such pertained the offering of praise to the Lord morning and evening —a duty that seems to have led to the cultivation of music; and in this art we are told that the most skilled were the sons of Heman, Asaph and Jeduthun. The numbers qualified for active service at this time are given as 24,000 for the work of the sanctuary, 6000 officers and judges, 4000 porters, and 4000 musicians (1 Ch. 9.[19ff.]; 2 Ch. 20.[19]). They resided during the greater part of the yr. in their cities, and went up for service at fixed times, prob. corresponding to the courses of the priests; for we find the skilled musicians, like them, divided into 24 courses of 12 each.

When Jeroboam introduced his schismatic cult he had, with prob. rare exceptions, to find other ministers of religion, for the L. and priests, loyal to the house of David and the Temple worship, gathered round Jrs. (2 Ch. 11.[13, 14]), where they became influential in the preservation and restoration of true religion, as in the days of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. 19.[8-10]), Joash (2 Ch. 23.), Hezekiah (2 Ch. 29.[12-15]), and Josiah (2 Ch. 34., 35.); while in the days of the apostate kings they suffered rejection and prob. persecution; as during the reigns of Ahaz (2 Ch. 28.[24]) and Manasseh. Under the later kings—vassals of Egp. and Bab.—the L. themselves did not preserve their fidelity, and so with the rest of the nation they had to submit to the loss of the Temple, and to captivity.

There seems to have been a momentary enthusiasm when the return was mentioned, for the chiefs of the L. also arose (Ez. 1.[5]). The actual number that returned, however, on the first occasion (Ez. 2.[36-42]) was small, but these were given their old duties at the dedication of the second Temple (Ez. 3.[10], 6.[18]). On the second return only 38 cd. be got together, and being insufficient for the service required of them, it was in part given to the Nethinim. Such as returned took their old places as teachers, interpreters (Ne. 8.[7]), and musicians (Ne. 9.). Their right to tithes was secured to them (Ne. 10.[37-39]), and they dwelt, as prob. since the days of the schism, in the villages of Judah (Ne. 12.[28ff.]). They were represented at the dedication of the wall of Jrs. Their genealogies were carefully looked into, and measures taken to preserve them as well as the priests from contamination by mixed marriages (Ez. 10.[23]). They were the special guardians of the Sabbath (Ne. 13.[22]), and at the close of OT. prophecy Malachi's vision of the latter days includes also the purification of the sons of Levi (Ml. 3.[3]).

Thereafter till NT. times the L. are practically unmentioned. The incidental refc. in the parable of the Good Samaritan shows the L. to be as heartless and as callous as the priest, and we may fairly infer that, as in the case of the priests, their religion had degenerated into a lifeless Sadduceeism. As often occurs when vital religion decays, a fondness for display took hold on the L., and in the reign of Agrippa II. the singers begged that they mt. have permission fm. the king and the Sanhedrin to wear garments similar to the priests (Ant. XX. ix. 6). By their urging that such an arrangement wd. be worthy of Agrippa's government and a memorial of his reign, they obtained their desire. Thereupon those who ministered in other things claimed the right also to be singers, and this too was conceded; but immediately thereafter, with the fall of Jrs. and the destruction of the Temple, their power and ostentation passed away.

Priests.—The idea of priesthood is always associated with the thought of the inability of man to approach God on account of sin and the need of a mediator more acceptable than the common man, that intercession may be made and offended justice satisfied. The Heb. word kōhēn gen. represents such a priest, but judging fm. the usage of the word in Arabic it wd. seem to have been connected originally with soothsaying or the giving of oracles—a duty also of the Israelitish priests in connection with the Urim and Thummim—whence it naturally came to mean the deliverer of a Divine message, or one who stands between God and man representing each to the other; and as sacrifice was usually connected with divination, this remained ever an essential duty of the priestly class.

Before the time of Moses the priesthood was patriarchal, i.e. the father made offering as mediator for his family, as in the case of Abraham (cp. also Jb. 1.[5]); the prince for his people, as Melchizedek (Gn. 14.[18]); and the sheikh for his tribe, as Jethro (Ex. 2.[16]); and such priesthood seems to have been the hereditary right of the first-born (cp. Mishna, Zeb. xiv. 4). In Egp. Isr. first came into contact with the priests as a caste, and in some ways the connection was very close. Joseph was married to the dr. of the priest of On (Gn. 41.[45]), and that prob. accounts for the special favour he showed to the priests during the seven yrs. of famine (Gn. 47.[26]). Further, there can be little doubt that Moses got his teaching in the wisdom of the Egyptians (Ac. 7.[22]) fm. the priests. The Israelite priesthood, however, was not in any sense derived fm. the Egyptian, but the points of contact we have indicated, and others unrecorded, may have had an influence on details of the new system. The sacrifices mentioned in Ex. 5.[1-3] imply, of course, the services of the patriarchal or household priests; and those mentioned in Ex. 19.[22] also belong to the same class.

The priestly dignity in Isr. was limited to Aaron and his descts., even the family of Moses remaining simple Levites; but as two of Aaron's sons died (Lv. 10.), leaving no male heir, the succession was confined to the lines of Eleazar and Ithamar. The establishment in the house of Aaron was not, however, settled without opposition. Dathan and Abiram, as representing the tribe of Reuben, the first-born and heir to the patriarchal priesthood, together with Korah and a company of L., claiming a share as being of those substituted for the first-born, rebelled (Nu. 16.). The office was then reconfirmed, but there seems to have been a strong tendency to revert to the older system (Jg. 17.), and many of the irregularities in places of sacrifice and persons offering may be explained as returns to the not yet obsolete system. The early events in the hist. of the Aaronic priesthood, as recorded, were their taking the lead in the passage of the Jordan (Jo. 3.[14, 15]), and in the overthrow of Jericho (Jo. 6.[12-16]). Then on the division of the land they received in the S. of Canaan thirteen cities with their suburbs as pasture lands (Jo. 21.[13-19]).

Thenceforward, till the close of the period of the Judges, there is little recorded of their hist. Shiloh in its seclusion prob. escaped many of the ruinous effects of the wars of the period; and in none of them, nor in any other national act, are the priests recorded as taking a part. The evil lives of the sons of Eli, followed by the capture of the ark and the destruction of Shiloh (Jr. 7.[12]), threw the whole organisation into confusion, and the functions of the office were for a time exercised by Samuel, a simple L. (1 S. 7.[17]), but admitted by a kind of adoption and special consecration into the priestly office. The chief centre for a time was at Nob, but this also was brought to an end by the attack on and massacre of the priests at the instigation of Saul (1 S. 22.[19]).

Only when David came into full power was order restored. When the ark was taken to Jrs. (1 Ch. 15.[4ff.]), he summoned the priests fm. their cities, and although Gibeon continued also for a time to be a holy place (1 Ch. 16.[37-39], 21.[29]; 2 Ch. 1.[3]), Jrs. gradually became the one central sanctuary. It was now, too, that the priests were divided into 24 courses, serving each a week in turn, and returning to their cities during the intervening periods (1 Ch. 24.). At such times of leisure some of them became teachers or interpreters of the Law (2 Ch. 15.[3]). Some devoted themselves to the deeper study of divine things, and received in addition the prophetic call, as Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Zechariah; while on the other hand many shared in the general corruption of the times (Jr. 5.[31]; Zp. 3.[4]), and became themselves degenerate (Is. 28.[7, 8], 56.[10-12]). Many remained in the lands of captivity, but such as did return threw themselves into the work of restoration and reformation, and at least during the time of the early Persian rulers they were granted immunity fm. taxation (Ez. 6.[8, 9], 7.[24]). By means of the deputation of priests and citizens (Ant. XI. viii. 5) to Alexander at Sapha, his favour was secured and the services left in peace for a time. The persecutions wh. led to the wars of the Maccabees and the gallant work done by that priestly family naturally raised the whole class in the estimate of the people, and they gradually came to take a leading place in the Sanhedrin. During NT. times the division into 24 courses was still nominally preserved (Lk. 1.[5]), and by that time the leading priests belonged to the sect of the Sadducees, though we can scarcely think of the multitude that accepted the Gospel (Ac. 6.[7]) as being affected by such teaching. With the fall of the Holy City their power and influence passed away. The rabbis became the authoritative teachers of Judaism, and even in cases where priestly descent is acknowledged among later Jews, the special privileges of the caste have become limited to the pronouncing of the "Priestly Blessing" (Nu. 6.[24-26]); while in the NT. Church there is nothing at all like the sacerdotal office attached to the ministry of the word, all functions of the priesthood, whether patriarchal or Aaronic, being summed up and fulfilled in Christ alone, as set forth in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

High Priest.—At the head of the whole hierarchy was the High Priest, hakkôhên hag-gādōl (Lv. 21.[10]), otherwise known by the names of hakkôhên

hâ-rôsh, the chief priest (2 K. 25.[18]), hakkôhên ham-mâshîh, the anointed priest (Lv. 4.[16]), and sometimes simply as "the priest" (2 K. 23.[24]). There seems to have been also a second priest with the designation of kôhên mishneh (2 K. 25.[18]), and a kind of committee of priests designated ziqnê hak-kôhănîm (2 K. 19.[2]; Jr. 19.[1]). The succession was hereditary in the family of Aaron, and is understood to have been on the lines of primogeniture (cp. Rashi on 1 Ch. 24.[2]). In this way the succession began. Nadab and Abihu having died during the lifetime of Aaron, he was succeeded by Eleazar in preference to Ithamar, the younger surviving s. He in turn was succeeded by his s., Phineas, but how many more of the line of Eleazar as given in 1 Ch. 6.[4-7] occupied the high-priestly office we cannot tell. Josephus declares that Abishua, Bukki, and Uzzi succeeded (Ant. V. xi. 5), and that the transference then took place to the family of Ithamar in the person of Eli; but for what reason he does not tell. In this line the office remained till the time of Solomon, the High Priests being Eli, Ahitub, Ahiah, Ahimelech, and Abiathar (1 Ch. 9.[11]; Ne. 11.[11]; 1 S. 14.[3]). In the reign of David we meet with the fact, anomalous in the OT., of two contemporaneous High Priests, Ahimelech and Zadok (2 S. 8.[17]; 1 Ch. 18.[16]). We can only conjecture that the arrangement had come about through some attempt either on the part of Saul or David to conciliate the heads of the two lines, and that to avoid offence both had been allowed to remain in office. After the death of David, however, Solomon deposed Abiathar, and the line of Eleazar remained in sole possession till the time of the Maccabees. Zadok was the High Priest when Solomon began his reign, but he seems to have been succeeded by his grandson Azariah before the dedication of the Temple (1 K. 4.[2]; 1 Ch. 6.[10]). Several difficulties meet us when we seek to trace the succession of priests during the period of the Judean kings. The historical bks. refer to several whose names do not occur in the genealogical list of 1 Ch. 6.[8-15], and diffcs. again are found in Jos. (Ant. X. viii. 6). A comparison, however, of these three sources gives the following as the most prob. succession fm. Azariah till the time of the Captivity: Johanan, Azariah, Amariah, Ahitub (1 Ch. 6.[9-11]), Jehoiada (2 Ch. 23.), Zechariah (2 Ch. 24.[20]), Zadok (1 Ch. 6.[12]), Azariah (2 Ch. 31.[10]), Urijah (2 K. 16.[10-16]), Azariah (2 Ch. 26.[16-21]), Iddo (Ant. X. viii. 6), Shallum, Hilkiah, Azariah, Seraiah (1 Ch. 6.[12-14]). The chief incidents in wh. the priests took an active part during this period were the establishment of the Temple service and the organisation of the caste under the direction of the High Priest; the revolution by which Athaliah was deposed and Joash placed on the throne (2 Ch. 23.); the effective resistance offered to Uzziah when he attempted to usurp priestly functions (2 Ch. 26.); the repair of the Temple and the restoration of the services (2 Ch. 30.); the discovery of Deuteronomy in the Temple and the Reformation that followed it (2 Ch. 34.).

After the Temple was plundered and destroyed in B.C. 586, Seraiah the High Priest, along with others, was put to death at Riblah (2 K. 25.[21]), while his son, Jehozadak, was carried into captivity (1 Ch. 6.[15]), and died there, leaving, however, a son, Jeshua, who recovered the hereditary office and took an active and honourable part with Zerubbabel in the restoration of the Temple and the commonwealth of Isr. (Ez. 5.). After the return fm. exile the Chronicler gives the priestly line till the time of Alexander the Great (B.C. 332) as, Jeshua, Joiakim, Eliashib, Joiada, Jonathan, and Jaddua. Little is known of the history of this period, except that it was through the marriage and secession of Manasseh, son of Joiada, that the rival worship was set up on Gerizim (Ne. 13.[28]), an event wh. Josephus places much later (Ant. XI. viii. 2); see SAMARITANS. A copper coin—the earliest in Jewish Hist.—of Eliashib is said to exist in the Cabinet du Roi at Paris, while one more fact is recorded of this period, viz. that the br. of Jonathan entered into an intrigue to obtain the priesthood, and was in that connection slain in the Temple court (Ant. XI. vii. 1). As a punishment for this offence the Persian governor Bagoses imposed a tax of fifty shekels during a period of seven yrs. on every lamb for the daily sacrifice.

It was Jaddua and his attendant priests who made up the picturesque procession fm. Jrs. to Sapha (Ant. XI. viii. 5), to meet Alexander the Great, who was so favourably impressed by the reception he got that the city and people were not only spared, but their requests were fully granted. His line continued in office till the yr. B.C. 170, and the most noteworthy members of the family were Simon the Just, the last member of the Great Synagogue; Eleazar, during whose term of office the beginning of the LXX translation was made (Letter of Aristeas, § 33); and Onias, who fled to Egp., and built a temple at Heliopolis, wh. the Jews did not regard as schismatic, but as fulfilling the prophecy of Is. 19.[19] (Ant. XIII. iii. 3). The line closed in troublous times, caused by the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, and the state of degradation to wh. its last representative, Menelaus, reduced the priesthood, wh., after a vacancy of seven yrs., was continued by his successor Alcimus. A religious and patriotic revolution, however, soon occurred. It was guided by the Asmoneans or Maccabees, a family of the course of Joarib (1 Ch. 24.[7]), who was prob. of the line of Eleazar. It gave to Isr. eight hereditary High Priests, who likewise exercised civil functions and became for a time independent rulers. The last of the line was murdered by his brother-in-law Herod, in the yr. B.C. 35. Thereafter no fewer than twenty-eight High Priests, appointed by the Herods or the Roman governors of Judea, directed the Temple services during a period of 105 yrs., till their place and nation were taken away by the fall of Jrs. in A.D. 70. The most important of these are, of course, those we meet with in the NT.—Annas, whose four sons and son-in-law, Joseph Caiaphas, filled the high-priestly office, and whose family are designated in the Tlm. "Hanan's viper brood." A kind of parallel to this description meets us in two other phrases in the Tlm., the one of wh. states that the priests were wont to go to Lydda for marriage, while the other says that Lydda was nine times more wicked than all the rest of the world together. Jos. (Ant. XVII. vi. 4) records the interesting fact, attested also by the Mishna and Gemara, that the High Priest in the yr. of the Nativity was precluded from acting at one of the fasts on account of having contracted ceremonial impurity, and as a consequence a substitute had to be found. Another interesting case of ceremonial impurity is that of the High Priest who was the friend of Aretas (2 Cor. 11.[32]), who became unclean by the spittle of the king falling on his robe. It tells us of the friendship of the two, and explains how the High Priest cd. give Saul letters to Damascus (Ac. 9.[2]).

Consecration.—The dedication of the Levites is described in Nu. 8.[5-22]. The aim of the various ceremonies may be summed up in the word "purification" (vv. 6, 21). Bodily purification was accomplished by the three actions of sprinkling with the water of purifying, shaving the whole body, and washing the clothes. The Levite was now fit to be given over to the Lord, as a substitute for the whole people, who were to accept this substitution by laying their hands on the L. (v. 10). Then the sin-offering and burnt-offering were offered on behalf of the L., who had to signify their relationship to them by laying their hands upon the victims. This ceremonial was meant to show that men chosen even by God to enter the sanctuary had to be atoned for. In the case of the dedication of the priests the word used is not "purify" but "sanctify." The ceremonial is described in Ex. 29. and Lv. 8. It consisted of washing at the door of the tabernacle, investing or clothing with four articles of dress—breeches, coat, bonnet, and girdle; the three first-named of white, shining linen, as a symbol of purity; the girdle adorned with coloured embroidery. The anointing, a symbol of the giving of the Divine Spirit, was accomplished by the application to the forehead of an oil specially prepared by having four sweet-smelling substances mixed with it. Sacrifices were then offered—a bullock as a sin-offering for the purification of priests and altar, a ram as a whole burnt-offering by the purified priests, and finally a thank-offering. The right ear, right thumb, and big toe of the right foot were touched by the blood of the ram as indicating the priests' hearing, acting, walking in holiness. The ceremony was repeated on seven successive days, during wh. the priests abode in the tabernacle. The consecration of the High Priest differed fm. that of the common priests in the matter of investiture and anointing. Over the clothing of the ordinary priest he was clothed with a woven upper dress of blue cotton—the me'īl—wh. had bound on its lower hem a fringe, to wh. were attached pomegranates of cotton and golden bells; the sound of the latter serving the people as a guide during the services. Over the me'īl was the EPHOD, and to this the breastplate with the Urim and Thummim was attached. As a covering for the head he had a mitre, to wh. was attached a plate of gold with the inscription, "Holiness to the Lord." The peculiarity in the case of his anointing was that the oil was poured on his head in abundance (Ex. 29.[7]; cp. Ps. 133.[2]), and fm. this fact he was designated "the Anointed Priest."

DRESS OF HIGH PRIEST (EGYPTIAN)

Services.—The duties of the Levites after the toils of the desert were over were generally "to wait on the sons of Aaron for the service of the House of the Lord, in the courts and the chambers, and the purifying of all holy things" (1 Ch. 23.[28]). This included preparing the shewbread and the fine flour for the meat-offering, as also for the unleavened bread. They were also to assist the priests in the offering of all burnt sacrifices on the Sabbaths and on the set feasts, and, besides, they acted as gatekeepers, attendants, and general servants in and about the sanctuary. The duties of the priests, on the other hand, are described as "coming near." Their fixed and invariable duties were to keep watch over the fire on the altar of burnt-offerings, and to keep it burning night and day (Lv. 6.[12]; 2 Ch. 13.[11]), to supply the golden candlestick with oil (Ex. 27.[20, 21]; Lv. 24.[2]), and to offer the daily sacrifices (Ex. 29.[38-44]). To the High Priest belonged the government of the priests, Levites, and sanctuary. He guided all the functions of the common priests, but whether he took an active part in ordinary circumstances we cannot say. Josephus says that his duties were limited to the Sabbaths, the new moons, and the feasts (BJ. V. v. 7). The service on the Day of Atonement was specially his, as he alone cd. enter within the veil to sprinkle the blood of the sin offering on the Mercy-seat, and offer incense there (Lv. 16.). The delivery of oracular responses by means of the "Urim and Thummim" was also a function of the High Priest; but of its use we never hear after the establishment of Solomon's Temple. It wd. appear that the prophets took its place after that time. (See also the various FEASTS and SACRIFICES.)

Modern Critical Theory. — Many modern scholars, recognising various strata in the literary growth of the Pentateuch, and the development of its institutions, have sought to reconstruct the history of Israel by comparison with that of other nations and deductions fm. the literary materials in hand. Generally there is hesitancy on the part of such to accept Levi as the eponymous ancestor of the priestly caste, and he is looked upon as at the most an ideal person. It is said that just as Simeon and Levi are communities in Gn. 49.[7], so they are in Gn. 34. allied or brother tribes, and then the name Levi is explained as a nomen gentile, derived fm. the root mentioned, but with the meaning of "attaching one's self to," this name indicating that the Leah tribes attached themselves to the Rachel tribes at Kadesh Barnea. It was only after the entry into Canaan, but before the people had passed into settled life, that the events of Gn. 34. took place, on account of wh. Simeon was reduced to a small clan and driven South, while Levi was scattered throughout Isr. Some seek to trace the priesthood in its origin and succession to Moses and his family (Jg. 17., 18.; 1 S. 2.[27]), and tell us that the story of its connection with Aaron is a late and abnormal theory. In E. Moses is the head of the sanctuary, and Joshua is his attendant (Ex. 33.[7-11]), while it is doubtful if J. knew originally anything at all of Aaron. The name Levite is to be regarded as equivalent to "professional priest," but as there was in prehistoric times a tribe of the name, it may be supposed that Moses belonged to this tribe, and that in this way the name was passed on. Stade writes: "One circumstance prevented the complete disappearance of the Levites among the other tribes—their past history. Moses, the founder of Israel's religion and its first priest, belonged to this tribe, and the memory of that still lived. It was naturally to be expected that Levi wd. be acquainted with sacred usages, i.e. things oracular, and so it came about that the members of this tribe were willingly accepted as priests, while on their part their want of possessions caused them to devote themselves to the service of the Holy Places." Wellhausen declares that a connection between the later priestly caste of the Levites and the earlier tribe of the name cannot be proved, and that there can be only a supposition that Moses belonged to it. He recognises the word Levite to have been used of the priests serving at some of the leading sanctuaries, and thinks that other priestly families sought to increase their dignity by the fiction of a common descent. Notwithstanding this "fiction," however, the Levitical succession was hereditary.

In connection with the development of the idea of priestly functions it is noted that P. knows nothing of either pre-Mosaic priest or sacrifice. J. and E., while they know of sacrifice, mention no priest, and that because it was the duty of the individual himself to present his offering. In each case the meaning is the same—the priestly caste begins with MOSES.

Then in the books of Judges, Samuel, and Kings, we search in vain for the organised system of P. Only at a temple or its substitute does a priest appear. In Judges, private persons, as Gideon and Manoah, offer sacrifice. In Samuel, the Ephraimite Samuel, the Benjamite Saul, and the Judean David, each offer sacrifice with their own hands. Whoever would, might kill and offer (1 S. 14.[34ff.]). The law in practice was that of the Bk. of the Covenant (Ex. 20.[24]): "An altar of earth thou shalt make unto Me, and shalt sacrifice thereon thy burnt-offerings." Only by later editors of these bks. are priests and Levites brought upon the scene (1 S. 6.[14ff.]).

From the circumstances it is explained that the origin of the priestly caste is not to be traced to the need of a mediator to present the offerings of others to God. That may have come to be the chief duty of the later Hebrew priest, but in earlier times it was neither more nor less his duty than it was that of every head of a family in Isr. The case of Micah (Jg. 17., 18.) shows that he desired a priest because he had set up a "house of God," i.e. a house with an image, wh. had to be served and guarded; and further, that the oracle mt. be consulted. It is to be noted that duties at such places are regularly designated by the words shêrêth, "to serve," and shâmâr, "to guard" (1 S. 7.[1], 14.[18], 23.[9]). The legitimate oracle in Israel was the "Urim and Thummim," and of course its service cd. not belong to every one. Its use was complicated, esp. when a number of questions had to be asked (1 S. 10.[20ff.], 14.[19]), and so it became necessary that even Saul and David shd. consult it through one of the initiated (1 S. 14.[18], 23.[9], 30.[7]). This was the work in wh. the Levites were proficient, and it was one of their earliest duties (Jg. 17.[7ff.]; Dt. 33.[8]).

It was, however, natural that those who came to the Levites, and received oracles fm. God through their mediation, shd. look upon the mediators as beloved of God, and shd. seek for their mediation also in the presenting of sacrifices.

As the giving of oracles implied a secret knowledge, and as the offering of sacrifice became more and more technical, it was not only natural but necessary that such offices should become hereditary. We can understand how the possessor of an image wd. pass it on to his son, and we find that the priesthood and oracle at DAN were hereditary for several centuries (Jg. 18.[30]). In Eli's lifetime his sons took over the office of their fr. (1 S. 2.[11ff.]). The hereditary holder of the office at Nob traced his descent fm. the house of Eli. It is not to be thought, however, that the caste was exclusive. Samuel was admitted into it, and the kings appointed priests as they would (2 S. 20.[25]; 1 K. 12.[31]).

With the establishment of the kdm. there came also the royal priests at the royal sanctuary, who were, of course, regarded as of greater dignity than the priests at the local sanctuaries. When Isr. revolted there was really no sanctuary left in the kdm. of Judah that cd. in any way rival the Temple, and so it came about that they as priests were paramount. In Jrs., however, they gradually lost in a different way the independence they had enjoyed at Shiloh and Nob, and became more and more officers of the court, or servants of the kings, who ruled over them and dictated in the affairs of the sanctuary without contradiction. Thus David appointed, alongside of Abiathar, Zadok and Ira as priests, and also gave his sons the same rank (2 S. 8.[18] RV.). Solomon did not hesitate to remove the aged Abiathar for a political offence, and that notwithstanding his belonging to the family of Eli, and accdg. to the Deuteronomic outlook (1 S. 2.[27ff.]) the only legitimate priest. Later on, too, we read of Uriah obeying without objection the order of the king, Ahaz, in the imitating of the altar in use at Damascus (2 K. 16.[10ff.]).

Zadok's descts. then followed, accdg. to all accounts, hereditarily till the time of the Exile.

In the Northern Kdm. the relationship between king and priests was similar to that in Judah. They were the royal servants (Am. 7.[10]), and shared the fate of the royal houses (2 K. 10.[11]), while each king claimed to appoint whom he would (1 K. 12.[31], 13.[33]).

But although the force of circumstances gave to the families of Eli and Zadok a superior rank, it is to be noted that the older documents know nothing of an essential distinction between priests and Levites. In Dt. 18.[1a], all Levites can be priests, and provision is made for country Levites coming to the central sanctuary and claiming to serve as priests (Dt. 18.[6-8]). In P. (Lv. and Nu.), however, the distinction between the two orders is clear, and no common Levite dare assume priestly functions. The explanation that is usually given is that the centralisation of the worship in the Temple naturally carried with it the idea that the priesthood there was the only legitimate one. D. in arranging the matters of the central sanctuary makes provision for local Levites coming up to it, but by the time of Ezekiel all such were rigidly excluded fm. the priestly office; while to bring matters into line it is explained that they, having served the local sanctuaries, wh. were illegitimate, are degraded, and assigned the lower office wh. their name henceforth denotes (Ek. 44.[6-16]). P. in his code then carries the distinction back to the time of Moses.

The small number of Levites returning fm. the Exile is accounted for by their dissatisfaction with their position and duties as degraded priests.

In all these inferences, however, one feels more and more that the endless series of deductions fm. insufficient premises is overdone, and that the Bible's own theory of its origin, its hist., and the development of its institutions, is eminently reasonable. Allowance for editorial work in different centuries must be made. The existence of different codes may be admitted and their limits, as generally accepted, conceded; but we must take into account the different aim of each. When we examine Dt., the key to the whole question, we find that while the manifest editorial work implies a writer in Western Pal. (Dt. 1.[1], 4.[46], &c.), the speeches themselves imply a speaker in Eastern Pal. (Dt. 11.[30], 12.[8, 9], 26.[1]). The settlement of the land and the application of this code was not so early accomplished as was hoped for, and during the periods of confusion, of conquests and reconquests in the days of the judges and early kings, the older practice of patriarchal priesthood was the one that continued in use; only modified from time to time by the attempts of the Aaronic priesthood to attain its legalised status. The loss of Deuteronomy before the establishment of its conditions accounts for the want of conformity to it under the established monarchy. The term "the priests, the Levites" may not imply that all Levites are priests, but be a contrast between the older family, or patriarchal priests, and the new "Levitical priests." Difficulties are too often created by reading into the text what it does not contain.

WM. M. CHRISTIE.

LEVI. See MATTHEW.

LEVIATHAN in Jb. 41. is evidently the crocodile. So also in Ps. 74.[14], where he is the symbol of Egypt (cp. Is. 27.[1]; Ek. 19.[3], &c.); see DRAGON. The crocodile, abounding in the Nile, appropriately represents Egypt. Only in recent times has it disappeared from Lower Egp. It may still, although very rarely, be seen in Palestine, in Nahr ez-Zerqā, popularly called the Crocodile River, or in the Kishon, in the sluggish waters near the sea.

In Ps. 104.[25] the reference to "the great and wide sea" points definitely to the Mediterranean. Here, therefore, some large cetacean is intended, perhaps the grampus or rorqual. These are occasionally seen in the Eastern Mediterranean, and two rorqual skeletons have been found on the Phœnician shore.

With BEHEMOTH Leviathan shared the honour, in Jewish fables, of being slain to afford materials for the great feast of Messianic times (see Jw. En. s.v. LEVIATHAN ; Eisinmenger, Entdecktes Judenthum).

LEVITICUS. From the nature of its contents, Leviticus is probably the most neglected book in the whole Bible, for nothing could well be more remote from the modern standpoint than its detailed account of the ritual connected with animal and cereal sacrifices, as practised by the ancient Jews. Yet Leviticus is, as a matter of fact, the central mass around which the Pentateuch was gradually formed; and the influence of the Pentateuch on the Jewish character it is impossible to over-estimate. Clearly, therefore, Leviticus deserves careful study. This book belongs wholly to the Priestly Code, each section of it being definitely assignable to one or other of P.'s three strata. The Priestly Code, it is now acknowledged by most scholars, cannot possibly have been the work of a single author. It is the conjoint work of a long succession of writers, all of whom belonged to the priestly class. It contains three distinctly marked stages of legislation, the earliest of which is called " The Law of Holiness." Hence the symbol P^{H}. Next in order of time comes what is called the groundwork or historical setting of the Priestly Narrative, which, together with its contemporary legislation, may be called P^{G}. The latest stratum includes whatever legislative additions are manifestly amendments of or developments from the earlier enactments of P^{H} or P^{G}. These secondary or supplementary legislative developments may be styled P^{S}.

The legislative parts of Leviticus fall naturally into three main divisions—chaps. 1.–7., 11.–15., 17.–26. Thus the whole book is best divided, like the Hexateuch itself, into six parts, four of which are purely legislative, and two, partly at least, narrative, viz. chaps. 8.–10., and 16. These parts are very unequal in size and quite as unequal in importance, the fourth and sixth consisting of only one chapter each, whereas the fifth consists of no fewer than ten chapters. Taking the book, then, as it stands, we divide it thus—

(1) The Ritual of Sacrifice, chaps. 1.–7.

(2) The Consecration and Installation to office of Aaron and his sons and an unhappy incident connected therewith, chaps. 8.–10.

(3) Laws of Ceremonial Purity and Impurity, chaps. 11.–15.

(4) The Great Day of Atonement and its detailed ritual, chap. 16.

(5) The Law of Holiness, chaps. 17.–26.

(6) Appendix on Vows and Tithes, chap. 27.

That Biblical critics are left perfectly free to determine, from the data supplied by internal and historical evidence, the relative age of the various laws given in Leviticus must be admitted by all reasonable men, for in the book itself there is not the slightest allusion made as to the time when these laws were first reduced to writing. We never read anywhere in Leviticus " And Jehovah said to Moses, Write," but invariably " And Jehovah said to Moses, Speak unto Aaron," or " Speak unto the Israelites." The inference, therefore, is inevitable that these laws were not originally committed to writing, but were, for a longer or shorter time, handed down from one generation to another by oral tradition. Consequently such laws would, in most cases, be actually in force long before they were put into a written form, and longer still before they were admitted into any recognised civil or ecclesiastical code. Moreover, this interval must, in the case of some laws, have been much longer than in the case of others. Hence the conclusion that the written form of a law is late does not necessarily involve the further conclusion that the law itself is late. Indeed it is quite possible that a law may have originally belonged to an early age, though the written form in which it has come down to us may be comparatively late.

In the first section, " The Ritual of Sacrifice," there are two subdivisions. (1) A manual on the ritual of sacrifice for the use of the laity, chaps. 1.–6.^{7} (in Heb. Bible, chaps. 1.–5.). Hence the headings, " And Jehovah spoke to Moses, saying, Speak to the Israelites," &c. (cp. 1.^{2}, 4.^{2}). (2) A manual on the ritual of sacrifice for the use of the priests, chaps. 6.^{8}–7.^{7}. Hence the headings, " And Jehovah spoke to Moses, saying, Command Aaron and his sons, saying " (cp. 6.$^{9, 24}$). Moses, however, again addresses the people in chap. 7.$^{22\text{-}31}$.

The part which sacrifice played in Jewish life, whether public or private, cannot well be exaggerated. In early times it mattered little what the sacrifice itself consisted of, or how it was presented. The all-important point was, To whom was it offered? If presented in a proper spirit to Jehovah, the only true God, then whatever the offering, or however simple the ritual, the sacrifice was acceptable to Israel's God.

Sacrifices were, in the earliest days, purely spontaneous acts, due to the offerer's gratitude for some signal proof of the Divine favour; afterwards they were prescribed by definite statute, as this manual for the laity proves. Accordingly, sacrifices were at first very various in character, being offered anywhere and anyhow by any one; and this variety depended on the nature of the favour received and the circumstances in which the sacrifice was offered: cp. Jacob at Bethel, Gideon at Ophrah, and Hannah at Shiloh. The original conception of sacrifice was that God required, or at any rate enjoyed, a sacrifice, just as man requires and enjoys his food. Primitive man thought that the God in whose honour he slew the victim ate its flesh and drank its blood; and even when civilisation had advanced so far that men knew how to obtain for their own use and enjoyment oil and wine, they still considered that their God enjoyed the wine of a drink-offering, and that the oil which they mixed with every cereal-offering they presented made the flour and the cakes more palatable to their God. But such ideas were by-and-by felt to be too grossly materialistic, and at last it was only the fragrant smoke of the burnt-offering, as it curled slowly heavenward, that was held to be specially pleasing to the Divine Being.

Animal flesh has always been considered the most important part of a feast. In primitive days, every meal at which flesh was eaten was regarded as a sacrificial feast. Not till the God of the host had received his due portion (and that was always the best or fattest part) could the family or the guests begin to eat. The blood, being considered the seat of life, belonged in a very special sense to God, the Giver of life. The victim's blood was, therefore, either poured out on the ground or flung from the sacrificial bowl against the altar. Indeed the blood was so peculiarly what belonged to God that flesh with any blood in it was never on any account to be eaten by an Israelite. Even in Lv. we find a sacrifice spoken of as the bread of God ($3.^{11, 16}$, $21.^{6, 22}$, &c.). In these passages, however, it is possible that the Hebrew word for "bread" may be used in its Arabic sense, "flesh." If so, then this is a very striking illustration of the persistence with which ceremonial words retain their original signification; for, on this supposition, this word, which in ordinary Hebrew had long since ceased to mean anything but "bread," still retained in sacrificial terminology its original signification, "flesh."

Now, in ritual as in every department of human thought and practice, the more developed must be later than the less developed, out of which, on the principle of Evolution, the more developed has gradually grown. The progress of Biblical Criticism, especially in recent years, has really been due to the application of the Evolution Theory to the problem of Israel's development. The effects of Darwinism have been by no means confined to the realm of Natural Science. It may safely be averred that Darwin's theory has contributed as much to the progress of intelligent study in the departments both of History and of Religion as it has to the advancement of the various branches of Natural Science. There are a thousand and one facts which go to prove that Jewish ritual did change from age to age; but to establish this statement it is sufficient to compare Ek. $46.^{11}$ with Nu. $28.^{11-14}$, both of which passages treat of the sacrifices offered on the stated feast-days. In Ezekiel the very same cereal-offering is prescribed for a bullock as for a ram, viz. an ephah of fine flour; while for a lamb each worshipper has to give a cereal-offering according to his means. In Numbers, however, the cereal-offering for a bullock is $\frac{3}{10}$ of an ephah, for a ram $\frac{2}{10}$, for a lamb $\frac{1}{10}$. Furthermore, while in Ezekiel no mention is made of any accompanying drink-offering or libation, according to Numbers the drink-offering presented with each bullock was $\frac{1}{2}$ hin of wine, with each ram $\frac{1}{3}$, and with each lamb $\frac{1}{4}$ of a hin. It is evident, therefore, that the ritual in Numbers is much more precise in details than that in Ezekiel, and therefore it is undeniably the more developed. Consequently, it must be the later. The further conclusion is, therefore, inevitable that the book which prescribes the later ritual must have been written after Ezekiel's time. No wonder, therefore, that the Jewish rabbis, accomplished casuists as they were, could not reconcile such a conclusion with their belief in the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, and were at their wits' end to explain such discrepancies as these between Ezekiel and the recognised Law-book of their nation.

Sacrifices, though originally offered anywhere, were gradually restricted to sacred places; and finally, in the case of Israel, to one sacred place.

According to Lv. $17.^{3-5}$, in the form in which it now stands, no animal could be killed even for food except at the one sanctuary. Small as the land of Canaan was, it was nevertheless far too large to admit of such a law being actually put in force. Indeed this law cd. not have been even thought of until after the return from the Exile, when the High Priest was practically the head not only of the Church but of the State, and when the territory over which he exercised spiritual and temporal authority alike was limited to a very small area round about Jerusalem.

In the People's Manual there are five kinds of sacrifices described. (1) Burnt-offerings; (2) cereal-offerings; (3) peace-offerings; (4) sin-offerings; (5) guilt-offerings. In the Priests' Manual the same five classes are enumerated but in a different order, peace-offerings being placed not third in the list, but last. From the historical point of view the first order is the most natural, the first three kinds being mentioned in the earliest books, while neither the sin-offering nor the guilt-offering is mentioned till the time of Ezekiel. In early days peace-offerings were by far the most common, for in offerings of this kind most of the victim's flesh was eaten by the worshipper and his friends, and as the priests had less interest in this class of sacrifice it is only natural that it should stand last in the Priests' Manual.

In the fully-developed ritual of P. there are five distinct acts in connection with an animal sacrifice which must all be duly performed:—

(1) The animal had to be brought before the altar and formally presented to Jehovah.

(2) The offerer then laid his hand solemnly on the victim's head and pressed it heavily down, thus identifying himself with the animal whose blood was about to be shed, and so symbolically transferring his guilt to it. According to the Mishna, no woman or slave, nor any person blind, deaf, or dumb, or imbecile, or a minor could perform this solemn act.

(3) The animal was then slaughtered by the offerer, or, more probably, by a temple-attendant. No stress, however, is laid on the act or mode of killing.

(4) The act of applying the blood. This act could be performed by no one but a duly qualified priest; and the ritual varied according to the kind of sacrifice, the position of the offerer, and the nature of the occasion.

(5) The final act is the disposal of the flesh. The various details as to the different kinds of sacrifice cannot be enumerated here.

We may now pass on to the first of the two sections consisting of a single chap., viz. chap. 16., which describes the ritual on the Great Day of Atonement. The sins of Jehovah's people could not but pollute even Jehovah's Sanctuary. Hence not only the Holy of Holies, but the Tent of Meeting and the very altar on which Jehovah's sacrifices were offered, all required to be periodically sanctified. Ezekiel enacted that this should be done twice a year, on New Year's Day and on the first day of the seventh month. But P. makes the ceremony annual, and assigns it to the tenth day of the seventh month. The choice of the seventh month is due to the fact that this was the chief sacrificial month; and the tenth day of this month may therefore be regarded as the very central point of the whole sacrificial system. Besides, this day had once been New Year's Day. This seems a necessary inference from Ek. 40.[1], where "the head of the year" must mean New Year's Day, and also from Lv. 25.[9f.], where the Jubilee Year, the 50th year, is said to begin on the tenth day of the seventh month, as soon as ever the trumpet was blown.

In this chapter a wider and deeper meaning seems to be given to the word "atonement" than it usually has in the Levitical system. Sin-offerings did not atone for all sins, but only for those done in ignorance, and therefore unwittingly. But here atonement is said to be made for all the iniquities of the Israelites and all their transgressions, even all their sins (vv. 16,21). Hence the Day of Atonement is also a day of repentance in the fullest sense of that word. The people were "to afflict their souls," the technical word for "fast," but they were to do so not merely in outward form but with penitent, contrite hearts. For sins committed "with a high hand," or intentionally and presumptuously, and without being repented of, no sin-offering could atone. But even for such sins, once they were repented of, and when the doers had really "afflicted their souls," the Great Day of Atonement could bring forgiveness from Jehovah, the merciful and gracious.

On the Day of Atonement the High Priest enters the Holy of Holies not once but thrice—the first time when he carries into it a censer full of live coals taken from off the altar of burnt-offering (v. 12), and sets the incense alight that the smoke from it may protect him from the unbearable effulgence of Jehovah's glory, "that he die not;" the second time when he goes in to sprinkle the blood of the bullock for himself; and the third time when he takes in the blood of the goat to sprinkle it in the same way for the people. Hence "once every year" in He. 9.[7] must mean "on one day every year," but not only once on that one day.

The fifth section (chaps. 17.–26.) is not only the largest but the most important of the book, especially as it raises the most interesting problems in connection with Pentateuchal Criticism. These ten chapters form the main body of what is now called "The Law of Holiness," a name first given to it by Klostermann because of the constant refrain, "Ye shall be holy, for I, your God, am holy." All the laws in it are given that the Israelites may not merely obtain but maintain the special holiness required of Jehovah's peculiar people. The ideal this code aimed at was a holy people for a holy God in a holy land.

This code is the earliest stratum in the whole Priestly Narrative, and must have existed as an independent code before the Priestly School of Writers had even conceived the idea which eventually resulted in the formation of the Pentateuch. It consists mainly of laws concerning sacrifices, priests, sacred festivals, and other matters, such as ceremonial or Levitical purity. To such an extent does it carry the idea that everything must be done in strict accordance with the regular laws of worship that it actually declares a man to be worthy of death if he kill an animal for food without first bringing it to the Sanctuary.

The life which the laws of this code presuppose is that of a settled agricultural community, very simple in its habits and requirements (cp. 19.[10, 13, 19], 25.[35-37]). Probably also the name of Aaron never occurred in the original Law of Holiness. The expression, " the High Priest among his brethren," or better, " the priest greater than his brethren," cd. not properly be applied to Aaron, for the other priests are, in reference to Aaron, always described as his sons, not his brothers. In other words, the High Priest, being alone anointed, was regarded as on an altogether different level from the other priests, who were never anointed. Hence " the priest " seems to be used all through P^H in a generic sense = the priesthood or a member of the priesthood. It is certainly a confirmation of this theory that in the superscriptions and colophons we find the ordinary phrase, " the sons of Aaron," whereas in the laws themselves it is " thy seed " that is used, not " thy sons " or " thy son."

The Law of Holiness has much affinity with Deuteronomy. It insists with the same emphasis on one Sanctuary. But the similarity is best seen by comparing chap 26. of Lv. with chap. 28. of Dt. Both codes have a hortatory element running through them ; and it is from an examination of this hortatory element in the Law of Holiness that we are most likely to get a clue to the date of its codification. Since most of the sections begin or end with language of a hortatory character, these portions are evidently the work of the author or authors who gave the code its final form. For though the laws were doubtless in existence before they were codified, it is impossible to believe that these hortatory passages could be. In consequence of the peculiar beauty that characterises both the thought and the diction of chap. 26., the inference may well be drawn that this collection of laws was put into its present form by the very hand that wrote its closing chapters. The verses, therefore, which bear most conclusively on the date of codification are 26.[27-45]. Are these verses best interpreted as due to the fear of an approaching exile or to the hope that the close of an actual exile is near at hand ? Surely the language is so vivid that it is better to regard it as the description of woes actually endured in the hated land of exile rather than an imaginative description of what was merely anticipated. The woes of exile depicted with such depth of feeling have been already experienced by the author himself, but he is now joyously confident that the dawn of a new day is at last brightening the horizon. The Exile that produced such an impression must have been the Babylonian Exile. Hence the Law of Holiness must have been just a little later than Ezekiel. This conclusion is confirmed in a very remarkable way by the linguistic data obtained from a careful comparison of the book of Ezekiel with the chapters under consideration.

This Law of Holiness, though compiled by a Priestly author, differs in many respects from P. There are in it many passages of pathetic beauty which are utterly foreign to the matter-of-fact character of P., but which closely resemble in spirit and diction the most graphic passages that are to be found in the great prophets, e.g. 26.[36], " The sound of a driven leaf shall chase them, and they shall flee as one fleeth from the sword, and they shall fall when none pursueth." Moreover, in spite of the externalism that necessarily predominates in a work dealing so largely with matters of ritual, there are so many traces of the humane spirit that breathes throughout Deuteronomy as to constitute a marked contrast with the purely ceremonial spirit of the later Priestly School.

Although the central idea in the Law of Holiness was current coin in Israel's pre-exilic days, nevertheless, after the Temple had been destroyed and the people had been carried away to Babylon, their conviction as to the necessity of Holiness, both national and personal, became infinitely stronger. Had not the Holy Land vomited out the Israelites, as it had formerly vomited out the Canaanites, just because they had not continued to be a Holy People, as their Holy God required, but had, on the contrary, neglected their Sanctuary duties ? Jehovah had abandoned to the heathen conqueror His holy city, because His people had not kept their covenant with Him, but had neglected to offer the sacrifices He had demanded of them. Hence the exiles devoted themselves, heart and soul, to perfecting the ritual by means of which Holiness might be attained. On this task these Jewish exiles concentrated all their energies—on the task, that is, of making a holy people for a Holy God ; and the result of their consecrated zeal, guided by the Divine Spirit, was " The Law of Holiness." J. A. PATERSON.

LIBERTINES are mentioned among the adversaries of Stephen (Ac. 6.[9]). The multiplying of synagogues for small communities in Jewish cities to-day, makes it probable that the L. had a synagogue of their own in Jrs. It appears certain that they were Libertini in the Roman sense, i.e. freedmen. Many Jews were carried captive to Rome by Pompey. Jews must always have been somewhat " difficult " as slaves, owing to their tenacious adherence to their religious observances. Many of them were set free, and their descendants formed the bulk of the Jewish community in Rome (Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, 23 ; Tacitus, Ann. ii. 85).

The home-sickness of their people no doubt drew many of them to Jerusalem, where they distinguished themselves by their opposition to the new faith.

LIBNAH. (1) A station in the wanderings (Nu. 33.[20f.]) ; poss. = LABAN (2) : unidentd. (2) A royal Can. city taken by Joshua (10.[29f.]), in the Shephelah, allotted to Judah (15.[42]). It revolted under Joram (2 K. 8.[22], &c.) and was besieged by Sennacherib (2 K. 19.[8] ; Is. 37.[8]). It was the home of Josiah's mr. (2 K. 23.[31]). It lay between Makkedah and Lachish (Jo. 10.[29, 31]). OEJ. places it in the district of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrīn). Two sites have been suggested—Tell eṣ Ṣāfiyeh, 7½ miles N. of Beit Jibrīn, and el-Benāwy, six miles SE. of Tell el-Ḥesy.

LIBYA, LYBIANS. In AV. the Heb. Pūṭ is rendered "Libyans" in Jr. 46.[9], and "Libya" in Ek. 30.[5]. RV. invariably renders "Put" (see PHUT). The Libyans figure as allies of Egypt in the prophetic Lit. of OT. (Lubim, 2 Ch. 12.[3], 16.[8] ; Na. 3.[9], AV. Lubims ; Lubbim, Dn. 11.[43], EV. "Libyans"). A fair-haired, blue-eyed race appears on the Egyptian monuments, called "Lebu." This people were probably the original inhabitants of the land adjoining Egp. on the West. They seem to have furnished mercenaries in considerable numbers to the Egyptian armies. From the time of the 19th dynasty many of them settled in the Nile valley. Under the leadership of SHISHAK they finally conquered Egp., and to them may be reckoned the 22nd, 26th, and 28th dynasties. Lehabim (Gn. 10.[13] ; 1 Ch. 1.[11]), a race related to Mizraim (Egypt), may be the same people. Ludim, mentioned as son of Mizraim (loc. cit.), and in connection with North African peoples (Ek. 27.[10]), may have been the name of another Libyan tribe (see LUDIM). Libya is the Greek name for the Roman province of Africa ; i.e. for the north of Africa, exclusive of Egypt (Ac. 2.[10]).

LICE (Heb. kinnīm, LXX σκνίφες), the creatures who formed the third plague of Egypt. Some would tr. "gnats," or even a species of worms (RVm. "sand-flies," or "fleas"). The Gr. σκνίψ means "a kind of emmet" (Liddell and Scott). This would favour the rendering "fleas." Gnats rise fm. the water, not fm. "the dust of the earth" (Ex. 8.[16ff.]) as lice and fleas seem to do. Both are found plentifully in Egypt. When we remember the Egyptian instinct for personal cleanliness, the priests shaving all hair off their bodies to afford no harbour for vermin, we can understand how utterly loathsome it wd. be for them to be covered with such disgusting creatures as lice.

LIEUTENANT. See SATRAP.

LIFE is nowhere defined in Scrip., but it is represented as the exclusive possession of organic creatures (Gn. 1.[20] ; Pr. 12.[10] ; 1 Cor. 14.[7]). God is the fountain whence all life flows (Ps. 36.[9] ; Jn. 5.[26], &c.), and human life is His gift (Gn. 2.[7], &c.). It is conveyed by the breath of God (Gn. 2.[7]). It is identified with breath (Gn. 6.[17], &c.) or wind (Jb. 7.[7]). It is illusive and transient as a vapour (Js. 4.[14]). It was observed that the life left the body with the blood. The latter was in fact identified with the life, and a peculiar sacredness attached to it. To eat the blood of an animal was held sacrilege (Dt. 12.[23], &c.), as it is to this day alike among Jews and Arabs. Nothing is so precious to a man as life (Jb. 2.[4]). It is the supreme good, as over against DEATH, the supreme evil. No greater proof of loyalty and devotion to a cause cd. be given than that one should adventure his life in its interest (Jg. 5.[18], 12.[3], &c.). "As I live" is a form of asseveration put into the mouth of the Lord (Nu. 14.[21], &c.). "As the Lord liveth" (Jg. 8.[19] : lit. J″. is living) is a common oath, and is practically equivalent to "by the life of J″." Men also swear by the life of the king (Gn. 42.[15], &c.). "As thy soul liveth" (1 S. 1.[26], &c.) may be compared with the mod. Arb. wa ḥayātak, "by thy life." Precious and sacred as it was, the worth of life cd. be estimated in no other medium. For life taken only life could pay (Ex. 21.[23] ; Nu. 35.[31] ; Dt. 19.[21]).

The term is sometimes applied to the ground of life's continuance (Dt. 32.[47]), and to that which makes for fulness and effectiveness of life. Again it signifies the sum of a man's earthly years (Gn. 7.[11], &c.). In NT. once and again "this life" means human existence here and now, with all its material conditions and limitations, as contrasted with "that which is to come" (1 Cor. 15.[19] ; 1 Tm. 4.[8], &c.). Corresponding to the mod. usage in wh. "life" is practically equal to "conduct"—e.g. "a good life," &c.—we have such phrases as "a peaceable life" (1 Tm. 2.[2]), "manner of life" (Ac. 26.[4], &c.).

As men desire life above all things, so God's gift to men in Christ Jesus is life in undreamed of amplitude (Jn. 10.[10]). It is life to which there is no limit, over which death has no power (Jn. 10.[28], 11.[25f.], &c.). Life lost in the service of Christ is life saved : the divinely bestowed crown of a victorious life is itself life, greater and more glorious (Rv. 2.[10]). Eternal life is the present possession of believers (Jn. 3.[16, 36], &c.). The distinction in AV. between "everlasting" and "eternal" as applied to life is unreal. The adjective is the same in every case (aiōnios), and RV. uniformly renders "eternal." "Eternal life" is not simply "endless" ; it is rather to be conceived under the aspect of timelessness. It is life which is "hid with Christ in God" (Col. 3.[3]) ; its very essence is found in union and communion with God.

We are often reminded that to the OT. saints no clear vision of the life to come was vouchsafed. They do not seem to have thought much about it. Of course full expression of all their religious hopes and beliefs need not be sought for in the extant literature. And we must remember that their deepest aspiration was after union and fellowship with God; and this carried in it the satisfaction of every legitimate human desire. On this subject, therefore, Old and New Testaments are in fundamental agreement. In the NT., however, there is granted to us a glimpse of the life beyond the grave, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. His life is the pledge and guarantee of ours (Jn. 14.19).

LIGHTNING represents several Heb. and one Gr. word: (1) 'or, lit. "light" (Jb. 37.3); (2) bāzāq, wh. is probably an error for bārāq (Ek. 1.14); (3) bārāq, the most common term (Ex. 19.16, &c.); (4) ḥāzīz, wh. Ges. derives fm. ḥāzaz, and defines as "properly an arrow." But the meaning is uncertain. We shd. possibly tr. "thunder-cloud." (5) Lappīd, lit. "torch" or "flame." It is used in the plural for the lightnings on Sinai (Ex. 20.18). In several cases where "fire" is spoken of as falling fm. heaven probably L. is meant (Gn. 19.24; 1 K. 18.38). Where it is mentioned with a hailstorm (Ex. 9.24) certainly lightning is meant. The NT. word is astrapē. God is master of the lightnings (Jb. 38.35, &c.). They are as weapons in His hand, arrows with wh. He destroys His enemies (2 S. 22.15; Ps. 144.6). "My glittering sword" (Dt. 32.41; cp. Na. 3.3, &c.) is lit. "the lightning of My sword"; and in Jb. 20.25 the lightning is the sword itself. The speed of chariots, or perhaps the flashing of the wheels in the sun, is compared to lightning (Na. 2.4). A glorious countenance is like L. (Dn. 10.6; cp. Mw. 28.3). Like L. Satan falls from heaven (Lk. 10.18). The name "Barak" is lit. "lightning." Some wd., therefore, identify Barak with Lappidoth (Jg. 4 4)

LIGN-ALOES. See Aloes.

LIGURE, the first stone in the third row on the breastplate of the High Priest (Ex. 28.19). For the Heb. leshem LXX gives ligurion. Various identifications have been suggested: "jacinth" (RV.), "amber" (RVm.), "yellow agate" (Flinders Petrie).

LILITH. This name is trd. in Is. 34.14 AV. "screech owl"; in AVm. and RV. "night monster." It is really the name of a female demon of Hebrew folk-lore. She is said to have been Adam's first wife. She refused to be subject, or to yield obedience to him, and flew away from him. Thereafter she became a demon. The superstition is connected with that of the Babylonian and Assyrian Lil and Lilit. "The Sumerian lilla or lil meant a 'ghost,' 'spirit,' or 'spark,' and was borrowed by the Semites under the form of lilū, from which the feminine lilîtu was formed in order to represent the female lil whom the Sumerians called kiel lilla, 'handmaid of (the male) lil.' Lilîtu is the Hebrew Lîlîth" (Sayce, The Religion of Anct. Egp. and Bab. 261). The lil had properly no relationship to humankind. It had a separate and independent existence of its own, dwelling under the earth among the dead, but visiting the upper world by night, or haunting desert places where no living thing appeared. Essentially a spirit of darkness, it was known as the "light-despoiler." It travelled in the dust-cloud and the whirlwind. "The lil, in fact, was essentially a demon," without husband or wife, "one of those evil spirits who tormented and perplexed mankind." The "handmaid of the lil" was the female attendant of the sexless lil. "Under the cover of night she enticed men to their destruction, or seduced them in their dreams. She was a veritable vampire, providing the lil she served with its human food." To the Semite mind she ceased to be a serving-maid and became a lil herself, carrying over all her repulsive and gruesome characteristics. For the Hebrew these were embodied in the conception of Lilith, a single individual spirit. It was in accordance with the popular notions that she should haunt the desolate ruins of Edom (Is. 34.14), finding among them "a place of rest." The later rabbis have much to say regarding this vampire, who, in the form of a beautiful woman, was wont to suck the blood of children whom she slew at night. She was also especially dangerous to men who slept alone (Sayce, op. cit. 281f.). The Targum on Jb. 1.15 identifies Lilith with the Queen of Sheba. This superstition was active among the Jews in Mesopotamia until the seventh cent. of our era, and in some quarters it is not yet quite extinct. For the Rabbinical stories see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s.v., and Eisenmenger, Entdecktes Judenthum, ii. chap. 8.

LILY. The word (Heb. shūshan, Gr. krinon) cannot be taken as indicating any particular flower. The lilies of 1 K. 7.22, &c., may be the lotus flowers wh. often appear in Egyptian decorations. But the Heb., like the mod. Arb. sūsan, applies to many brightly coloured flowers, including the anemone, iris, gladiolus, &c. One who has seen the glory of these flowers in a Galilean spring, glowing over the fields in the splendours of scarlet, pink, purple, and blue, must feel that the Saviour's reference wd. lose much of its effect if limited to any single species (Mw. 6.28f., &c.; cp. SS. 2.16, &c.).

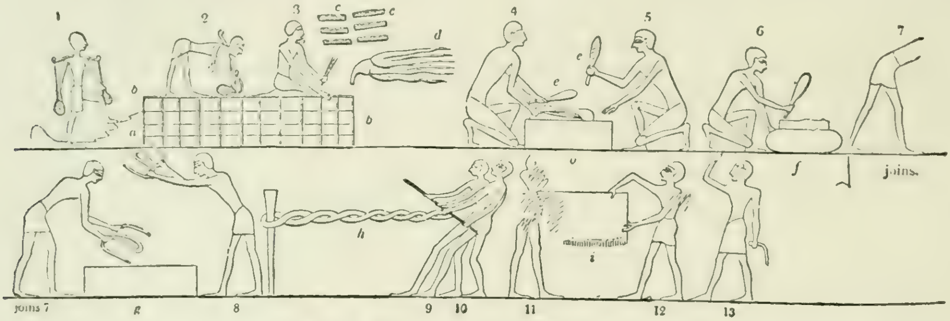
LIME (Heb. sīd), the common alkaline earth used as mortar. The Heb. word occurs four times in the OT.; in Dt. 27.2, 4 it is trd. "plaister." It was to cover over the stones that were to be set up on Mt. Ebal, either to afford a convenient surface on wh. to impress, possibly in cuneiform, certain portions of the Deuteronomic Law, or to protect the words fm. the weather after they had been engraven on the stones. If the latter be the meaning, it is difficult to understand the point of the instruction in v. 8. Is. 33.12 and Am. 2.1 refer to the burning of limestone to make into lime. The burnt limestone in the kiln is an apt emblem of the condition to which the peoples are doomed. Moab is denounced for burning "the bones of the king of Edom into lime"—i.e. phosphate of lime, the chief ingredient in bone ash. Such burning of the bones, involving the complete destruction of the bodily frame, was a gross indignity. It made impossible, also, the gathering of the man to his fathers. Possibly there was some thought that despite done to the corpse involved suffering for the spirit. The chalkstone of Is. 27.[9] is the unslaked "shell" of quicklime, which crumbles at the touch of water.

LINE represents several Heb. words. (1) Ḥebel: this denotes "a cord," used for a variety of purposes, e.g. to lower men from a window (Jo. 2.[15]), for tent-ropes (Is. 33.[20]), for ships' tackling (Is. 33.[23]), &c.; then a measuring line (2 S. 8.[2]; Ps. 78.[55]; Am. 7.[17]; Mi. 2.[5]; Zc. 2.[1]). It is used fig. as of lines marking off the limits of a happy and favoured life. (2) Ḥūṭ corresponds to the Arabic khait, "a thread" or thin cord, easily broken (Jg. 16.[12]). It is used as a measure of length in 1 K. 7.[15], "a line of twelve cubits." (3) Pāthīl, from pāthal, "to twist," variously trd. in EV., is primarily a cord (e.g. the cord from which the seal was hung: Gn. 38.[18. 25]—not "bracelet" AV.). In Ek. 40.[3] it is used for measuring line. (4) Qaw, from qāwāh, "to wait for" (prob. originally "to twist" or "stretch"), is used only of measuring line (1 K. 7.[23]), employed in marking off allotments in land (Is. 34.[17]), in building (Jb. 38.[5]), by the craftsman in designing the idol he is to carve (Is. 44.[13]), in marking off what is devoted to destruction (2 K. 21.[13], &c.). In Ps. 19.[5] instead of קַוָּם, "their line," perhaps we should read קֹלָם, "their voice," or "sound." (5) Sered. This word, which occurs only in Is. 44.[13], does not mean "line" (AV.). RV. reads "pencil," and RVm. "red ochre." The context suggests a marking-tool for wood. (6) Tiqwah, from the same root as qaw, in Jo. 2.[18] signifies the scarlet cord which Rahab bound in the window.

In NT. "line" occurs only once in AV. (2 Cor. 10.[16]). Here we may tr. kanōn with RV. "province," the apostle fig. conceiving his own sphere as having its limits determined by the kanōn or measuring-rod.

LINEN. EV. render many words by L., the meaning of wh. it is impossible always to distinguish. In some instances not L. but cotton may be intended. Bad is used only of clothes (Gn. 41.[42]; Ex. 28.[42], &c.). Shesh may be either the thread (Ex. 39.[28]), the cloth (25.[4], &c.), or the finished garment (28.[39], &c.). The mod. Arb. shāsh means "cotton gauze." The Gr. byssos, later used for "cotton" (Liddell and Scott, s.v.), fm. būtz (Ek. 27.[16], &c.), a word of Aram. origin, Josephus takes as equivalent to both bad and shesh. Pishtīm denotes flax and all its products (Jo. 2.[6]; Jr. 13.[1], &c.). Sadīn (Jg. 14.[12f.]; Pr. 31.[24], &c.), prob. = Gr. sindōn (Mk. 14.[51]; Mw. 27.[59], &c.), a linen sheet. 'Ēṭōn, prob. = fine thread (Pr. 7.[16]). Othonē (Ac. 10.[11]) is a large sheet: othonia (Jn. 19.[40], &c.), the sheet torn into strips for bandages. Omolinon (Sr. 40.[4]) was unbleached flax. Sha'atnēz (Lv. 19.[19]) was prob. mingled cotton and linen. Miqweh (1 K. 10.[28]; 2 Ch. 1.[16]), AV. "linen yarn"; RV., correctly, "drove."



PREPARING FLAX, AND MAKING TWINE AND CLOTH

a, Steps leading to pits, bb, where flax was steeped; cc, flax taken by 3 to dry before beating; d, stalks fresh cut; 1 brings water in earthen pots; 4, 5 beat flax with mallets, ee; 7, 8 strike yarn on stone, g; 9, 10 twist yarn into a rope; 11, 12 show piece of cloth, i, made from yarn; 13, superintendent.

L. was early made and greatly appreciated in Egp. (Herod. ii. 182). It was an article of Egyptian commerce (Ek. 27.[7], &c.). In a hot climate it ministers to cleanliness and comfort. Egyptian priests wore L. (Herod. ii. 37; Wilk. Anct. Egyptians, iii. 117). L. only was used for the wrapping of mummies. L. is prominent in the furnishings of the Tabernacle, and is prescribed for the priestly garments (Ex. 25.[4], 28.[15], &c.). It was worn largely by royal and wealthy persons (Gn. 41.[42]; Est. 8.[15]; Lk. 16.[19]). L. was worn by those engaging in religious service (1 S. 2.[18], 22.[18]; 2 S. 6.[14]; 2 Ch. 5.[12]). It symbolises the righteousness of the saints (Rv. 19.[8]; cp. 18.[16]), and poss. signifies the purity of the warriors who wear it (ib. 19.[14]).

LINTEL, the horizontal stone or piece of timber over the doorway, resting upon the doorposts. The Heb. 'ayil is the lintel of the Temple doorway (1 K. 6.[31]); mashqōph is the lintel of the Egyptian house, to be sprinkled with blood (Ex. 12.[22f.]). Kaphtōr (Am. 9.[1]; Zp. 2.[14]) is properly the capital of a column.

LINUS (2 Tm. 4.[21]), a Roman Christian who unites with Eubulus and CLAUDIA in sending greetings to TIMOTHY. He is called by Eusebius (HE. iii. 2, 4, 13) the "first Bishop of Rome" after Peter; Irenæus also (III. iii. 3) makes a similar statement, only he attributes the ordination of L. to the apostles generally, not to Peter alone. On the other hand, Tertullian (Præs. Hær. 32) says, "The Church of Rome records that Clement was ordained over them by Peter." It is improbable that the government of the Roman Church had become definitely Episcopal during the lifetime of the apostle Peter. Clement in his epistle appears to contemplate only two orders (Clem. i. 40; cp. 36). The episcopate of L. is said to have continued 12 years. For a full discussion of this whole question see Lightfoot's Dissertation on "The Early Roman Succession," Apostolic Fathers: Clement, vol. i. pp. 201–345.

A LION HUNT (ASSYRIAN)

LION, the strongest of the cat tribe, and the one wh. has most impressed the imagination fm. its majestic look. Though now extirpated fm. Pal., indeed fm. the whole of South-western Asia, it must have been frequently encountered in OT. times. Samson slew a L. wh. had roared upon him (Jg. 14.[5]). David, when a shepherd, encountered and slew a L. (1 S. 17.[34]); Benaiah, the s. of Jehoiada, slew a L. in the midst of a pit in the time of snow (2 S. 23.[20]). When the prophet fm. Judah disobeyed God, a L. slew him (1 K. 13.[24]); there is a similar case in 1 K. 20.[36]. Afterwards, when the land of Israel had been harried by the Assyrian campaigns and the deportations, lions multiplied (2 K. 17.[25]). References to the lions are frequent in the poetical books and the prophets. None of the wild animals is so frequently named in OT. as the L., and none is known by a greater variety of names. (1) 'ari, the L. generically (Jg. 14.[8]); (2) lābī' (poetic), fm. roaring (Is. 5.[29]), lābī'yah, a lioness; (3) lāyish, an old L.; (4) kephīr, a young L. (Jr. 25.[38]); (5) gūr, a lion's whelp (Ek. 19.[2]); (6) shaḥal (poetic), a roaring L. The L. was the symbol of strength (Jg. 14.[18]), of cruelty (Ps. 7.[2]), of majesty of going (Pr. 30.[30]). The L. was common as an ornament; it was thus used by Solomon (1 K. 7.[29]), and Dr. Thomson (LB.) repeatedly mentions seeing carvings of lions on the rocks. It was the symbol of the tribe of Judah (Gn. 49.[9]) and of that of Dan (Dt. 33.[22]). It is the symbol also of a monarch (Pr. 19.[12]; Ek. 19.[6]). In the Apocalypse our Lord is called "the Lion of the Tribe of Judah" (Rv. 5.[5]). It may be presumed that the lions in the den into wh. DANIEL was cast were kept for amusement (Dn.

6.[7]). Hunting the L. was a favourite amusement of the Ninevite kings.

LIP, in OT., usually stands for the Heb. sāphāh. With few exceptions the references are to the lips as organs of speech. Such adjectives as "lying" (Ps.

EGYPTIAN LITTER

31.[18]), "perverse" (Pr. 4.[24]), &c., indicate the disposition and aim of the speaker. "Swords are in their lips" (Ps. 59.[7]), and "adders' poison is under their lips" (Ps. 140.[3]), point to the injury done by wicked words. "The fruit of the lips" is praise (Is. 57.[19]). Probably we shd. also read "fruit" instead of "calves," in Ho. 14.[2]—so LXX and Syr. The change in MT. is slight. A gesture in the worship of the heavenly bodies seems to have been to touch the lips with the hand (Jb. 31.[27]). This is part of a common Oriental gesture in salutation. The ancient Assyrians put rings in the lips of their captives, to which cords were attached. These are often figured on the monuments. The Heb. sāphām properly means beard and moustache, or the lower part of the face. It is not unusual in the East for one stricken with sorrow too deep for words to draw part of his raiment over his lips (Ek. 24.[17, 22]; Mi. 3.[7]). This also was the attitude to be assumed by the leper (Lv. 13.[45]). In the NT. the usage of cheilos is the same as that of sāphāh in OT. It appears only in passages quoted fm. LXX.

LITTER. The L., to wh. allusion may be made in Dt. 28.[56], was known to the early Hebrews. The "camel's furniture" of Gn. 31.[34] may be the litter borne on a camel's back. "Wagons" of Nu. 7.[3, 8] prob. had shafts projecting before and behind, between wh. mules were yoked to carry them, like the mod. Arb. takht-rawān, or palanquin; so poss. also the litters of Is. 66.[20], and the chariot of SS. 3.[9] (RV. "palanquin"). The L. of SS. 3.[7] (RV.) prob. resembled the Arb. L., wh. is "charged like a houdah on a camel's back" (Doughty, Arabia Deserta, ii. 484)—a very comfortable mode of travel.

LIVELY. This word appears in the AV. of NT. three times (Ac. 7.[38], "lively oracles"; 1 P. 1.[3], "lively hope"; 1 P. 2.[5], "lively stones"). In each case RV. correctly renders "living." The Greek word is the same as that used in 1 P. 2.[4] of "living stone"—"Unto whom coming as unto lithon zōntā . . . ye also as lithoi zōntes," &c.

LIVER (Heb. kābed, "heavy," as being the heaviest of the viscera, Ges.). The L. does not seem itself to have been burnt in sacrifice, but the "caul" (Heb. yotereth) that was upon it; presumably the fat that is near it (Ex. 29.[13]; Lv. 3.[4]).

It may be regarded as throwing some light on the special place occupied by the L. in sacrifice, and in heathen auspices, that, in celebrating their Passover, the Samaritans, after disembowelling the lambs, take the liver wh. they have just removed and skewer it into the carcase of the lamb before it is put into the pit wh. serves as an oven.

Inspection of the L. of the sacrifice for omens was a Babylonian practice, as we learn fm. Ek. 21.[21]. All readers of Livy know that the L. was the organ most looked at by the Roman Haruspex, or more accurately Extispex; indeed in Gr. this whole art was called hepata-skopia, "inspection of the L." The L. is the seat of emotion, especially of grief (La. 2.[11]). The common view of antiquity associated sensual desire with the L.; Delitzsch (Biblical Psychology, p. 316) sees a reference to this in Pr. 7.[23].

LIVING CREATURE. See BEAST.

LIZARD (Heb. leṭā'āh). It is uncertain what species of L. is intended in Lv. 11.[30], wh. is the only passage in wh. the word occurs in the AV.; the RV. again in Lv. 11.[29], trs. tzāb (AV. "tortoise"), as "great lizard"; in v. 30 'anākāh (AV. "ferret"), RV. trs. "gecko," a kind of L. RVm. suggests that the other terms in that verse probably denote different kinds of lizards. The L. is certainly very common in Pal.

LOAF. See BREAD.

LO-AMMI, the symbolical name given by Hosea to his second son by Gomer, denoting "not my people," and signifying the rejection of the kingdom of Israel by Jehovah (Ho. 1.[9f.], 2.[23]). This and the name Lo-ruhamah, given to his daughter (" not pitied "), may have been actually borne by the persons indicated; but many scholars think them merely allegorical.

LOCK. See Key.

LOCUST. Although there are many species of L. in Pal. only those that are migratory are noticed in Scripture. Several names are given to the L. in the OT. (1) 'Arbeh, the L. generically; Driver thinks there is a special reference to Acridium peregrinum. (2) Ḥāṣīl, tr. " caterpillar " (1 K. 8.[37]; Is. 33.[4]; Jl. 1.[4]). This Driver thinks is the slightly larger and darker Pachytylus migratorius, wh., not uncommon in Pal., is indigenous in Belgium. (3) Gob (Am. 7.[1]; Na. 3.[17]), trd. " great grasshopper." From the description given in Nahum of their halting benumbed in bushes Dr. Driver concludes that this may represent the newly hatched L., including the pupa and semi-pupa stage, when the L. runs and leaps but does not fly; this suits also the cognate gebīm (Is. 33.[4]), wh. are spoken of as " running to and fro." (4) Ṣol'ām, " the bald L." (Lv. 11.[22]): this may be some species of tryxalis, the tapering head of wh. may have suggested the Rabbinic translation " bald " wh. has been adopted in the AV. (5) Yeleq, probably the L. in the last pupa stage (Na. 3.[16]); it " strippeth and fleeth away." In AV. this is rendered in Ps. 105.[34], and Jr. 51.[14, 27], " caterpillar "; but in Jl. and Na. " cankerworm," a rendering preferred by RV. throughout. (6) Ḥāgāb, trd. " grasshopper " in four of the five cases where it occurs. Fm. its meaning, " the concealer," it may be given to the female because it deposits its eggs below the ground. The other terms, gāzām (Jl. 1.[4], &c.), ḥargōl (Lv. 11.[22]), and tzĕlātzōl (Dt. 28.[42]), are rarer and more obscure. It is impossible to fix with any precision the meanings of these various terms; suggestions given above are to be taken only as such. In the first two chapters of Joel we have a vivid description of an incursion of L. In the beginning of March, if there is a prolonged sirocco, accompanied by a coppery haze along the horizon, the natives begin to be apprehensive. Then the swarm of flying locusts begins to arrive and devour the green wheat and barley. But the main damage is not that wrought by the winged L. The females lay their eggs under the ground: in a few weeks or months, according to species, they are hatched, and at once begin their destructive work. The pupa is not with them, as with many other insects, a time of quiescence; they are always devouring. Strenuous efforts are made by the fellaḥīn to stop, or at all events divert, the devastating horde; sometimes they form ranks of beaters, who with feet and brushwood destroy all they can; sometimes long, shallow ditches are rapidly dug, filled with brushwood, and set on fire: then the air will soon be filled with the stench of the roasted L. and the fire it may be is quenched. Sometimes these efforts are successful, but often they fail. Even the devastation wrought by devouring every green thing is not all the damage the L. effect; they fill the wells and cisterns and putrefy and pollute them, and pestilence results. When carried out to sea and drowned, their carcases are often washed back on the shore, and lie there heaped up for miles along the edge of the sea putrefying; and again pestilence results. The L. is used as the symbol for multitude (Jg. 6.[5], RV.; AV. by mistake trs. " grasshopper "). They march like an army (Pr. 30.[27]; Jl. 2.[7]). In Rv. 9.[3] the mystical army of Apollyon, wh. comes out of the smoke of the Bottomless Pit (see Pit, Bottomless), is likened to L. The L. was reckoned clean, and it is still eaten, but only by the poorest. It was the food of John the Baptist, along with wild honey (Driver, Joel and Amos, Cam. Bib. for Schools, p. 82f.; Thomson, LB. ii. 295–302).

The Destructive Locust

LOD, LYDDA, a city built by the Benjamite Shemed (1 Ch. 8.[12]), and reoccupied after the Exile (Ne. 7.[37], 11.[35], &c.). L. was ceded to the Jews by Demetrius Nicator, B.C. 145 (1 M. 11.[34]; Jos. Ant. XIII. iv. 9). The privileges of the city, wh. Pompey had taken away, were restored and confirmed by Cæsar (Ant. XIV. x. 6). It suffered grievously at the hands of Cassius (Ant. XIV. xi. 2; BJ. I. xi. 2), was favoured by Antony (Ant. XIV. xii. 2[ff.]), and destroyed by Cestius Gallus (BJ. II. xix. 1). Having been rebuilt, it surrendered to Vespasian (BJ. IV. viii. 1). Here Peter healed Æneas (Ac. 9.[32ff.]). The mod. town, Ludd, in the plain, 11 miles fm. Jaffa, is a station on the Jaffa-Jrs. Railway, with fine gardens. It is the reputed birth and burying place of St. George, whose memory is perpetuated by a beautiful Crusading church, now in ruins. The inhabitants are Moslems and Greek Christians.

Church of St. George, Lydda

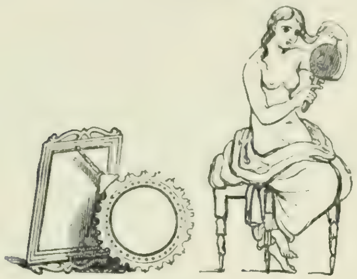
LO-DEBAR, the home of Machir, the son of Ammiel, with whom Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, found refuge after the downfall of the house of Saul, until sent for by David (2 S. 9.[4f.], 17.[27]). The place was in Gilead, prob. to the E. of MAHANAIM. The site has not been recovered.



ANCIENT LOOKING-GLASSES

LODGE, TO, with but one exception (Is. 2.[1], where the word is shākab, " to lie "), in AV. of OT. represents the verb lūn or līn (connected with lailāh, " night," through the usual exchange of " l " for " n "), which means lit. " to pass the night." Thus Elijah " passes the night " in the cave at Horeb (1 K. 19.[9]); those in charge of the store-houses and treasuries " passed the night " around the house of God (1 Ch. 9.[27]); the builders and their servants " passed the night " in Jerusalem, to act as a guard (Ne. 4.[22]); the merchants who profaned the Sabbath, being shut out of the city, " passed the night " about the walls (13.[20f.]); the naked " passed the night " without clothing (Jb. 24.[7]); the stranger was not permitted to " pass the night " in the street (31.[32]); the Assyrian army is pictured as making bivouac for the night at Geba (Is. 10.[29]). The same word is trd. to " tarry all night " (Gn. 19.[2]; Jg. 19.[6], &c.), he " lay all night " (2 S. 12.[16]). In Ps. 30.[5] we shd. read " at evening weeping may come to pass the night."

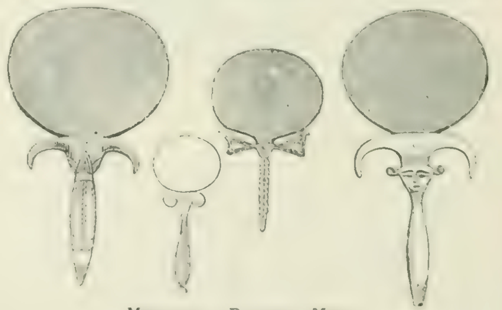
Mālōn, from this verb, is simply the place in which the night is passed, and does not necessarily involve a building of any kind (Gn. 42.[27], &c., AV. " inn "). It is the place where Israel encamped for the night (Jo. 4.[3]). Mĕlōnāh is used for the night shelter of the watcher in a garden of cucumbers (Is. 1.[8], EV. " lodge "); and as a symbol of what is frail and insecure (Is. 24.[20], AV. " cottage," RV. " hut "). In NT. kataluō is " to ungird " (Lk. 9.[12]); kataskēnoō is " to rest as in a tent " (Mw. 13.[32], &c.); chenizō is to take quarters, more in our sense of the word " to lodge " (Ac. 10.[6], &c.).

LOFT. The word occurs but once in Scrip. (1 K. 17.[19]), where RV. trs. " chamber." The Heb. is 'alīyāh, " upper room," and corresponds to the Arabic 'alīyeh, the chamber, approached by an outer stair, often erected on the roof of the house.

LOG, fluid measure used for oil (Lv. 14.[10f.]), $\frac{1}{12}$ of a HIN, about $\frac{5}{6}$ of a pint. See WEIGHTS and MEASURES.

LOIS (2 Tm. 1.[5]), the grandmother of TIMOTHY, from whom, as from his mother Eunice, he had inherited his " unfeigned faith." If not a native of Lystra she at all events had been long resident there. Though a Jewess, her family must have been Hellenistic for a considerable time, as shown by the fact that her own name and that of her daughter are Gr. At the same time it seems certain that her grandson's knowledge of the Scripture was due in some measure to her teaching and example. From the way in wh. Paul refers to her it wd. seem that he had known her, and that she had become a Christian. Her " faith " even as a Jewess must have been free fm. racial prejudice, since she allowed her daughter to marry a Greek.

LOOKING-GLASS. This word occurs twice in AV., representing two different Heb. words. (1) Mar'āh (Ex. 38.[8]), of the mirrors wh. the women of Israel gave up in order to supply brass for the LAVER of the TABERNACLE (RV. " mirror "). The Heb. is used for " vision " in Gn. 46.[2]; Ek. 1.[1]; Dn. 10.[7]. (2) Rĕ'ī (Jb. 37.[18]), a comparison for the sky; here, too, the reference is to a metal mirror, as proved by the adj. " molten." In Is. 3.[23] the word trd. " glasses " (gillāyōn) is evidently also " mirrors " of metal (so RV.); it is trd. " roll " in Is. 8.[1], a mistranslation due to a false etymology (RV. " tablet "). In NT. the word GLASS (Gr. esoptron) occurs twice in the sense of " mirror "; in one of these cases (1 Cor. 13.[12]), through a mistranslation of the prep. a false idea is conveyed. Pliny tells (HN. xxxiii. 9) that L.-G. were usually made of bronze, but sometimes of silver; he also mentions that in Sidon mirrors of glass were manufactured (HN. xxxv. 26). In a work attributed to Alexander of Aphrodisias the statement is made that such mirrors were backed with tin instead of quicksilver.



MIRRORS OF POLISHED METAL

LOOPS were used for uniting the curtains. See TABERNACLE.

LORD. The word, according as it is printed, represents three different Heb. terms. When in capitals it stands for JHWH, the covenant name of the God of Israel, wh. we commonly, but incorrectly, pronounce "Jehovah." The reason for this is that the reverence of the Jews led them to avoid pronouncing the sacred name, for which, in reading, they substituted 'Adōnāi, "Lord"; and when vowel points were introduced the vowels of 'Adōnāi were placed beneath the consonants of JHWH. This reverential avoidance of the sacred name is at least as old as the LXX, which in every case renders JHWH by kurios. When "Lord" is printed with only the initial capital, like other proper names, it trs. 'Adōnāi. When 'Adōnāi occurs along with JHWH, then the latter receives the vowels of 'Elōhīm, and is represented by "GOD," printed in capitals. Sometimes "lord" is a common noun, as in Gn. 42.[33], "The man who is lord of the country said unto us." This represents 'ādōn, wh. is also trd. "master" (Gn. 24.[12]). Here attention is directed only to the first of these.

The meaning of the sacred name appears to be "The Existent One." The French VV. alone, however, attempt to translate JHWH (l'Eternel); all the others treat it as a name. The common statement that JHWH was merely the tribal god of the bĕnē Yisrā'ēl, who was universalised into the Supreme, has little evidence to support it. The whole trend of mod. archæological discovery points to Monotheism being the primitive religion. There is, further, no hint that JHWH was ever regarded as the ancestor of the Israelites, or that He was even of kin with Isr. All the analogy of history shows in mankind a tendency, not to rise fm. a fetish or ghostly ancestor to a Supreme God, but rather the reverse. Thus in Roman Catholic countries the Virgin has practically been split up into Virgins of different places with different powers and attributes.

In pre-Mosaic times the names involving JHWH as an element were very few. From Leah's words in naming her son (Gn. 29.[35]) we gather that "Judah" stands for "Jehudah" (a form, it may be remarked, which the name frequently assumes in later Judaism, e.g., that of Jehuda haq-Qodesh, who reduced the Mishna to writing). The sacred name appears in that of Joseph, as Rachel's words show (Gn. 30.[24]); and also in that of Moses' mother, Jochebed. It was therefore known to the patriarchs, and we find that it was occasionally used by them. Abraham says (Gn. 14.[22]), "I have lift up my hand to the Lord (JHWH) God Most High (El-Elyon)."

Ball (Polychrome Bible) wd. ascribe JHWH to P., leaving the preposition of the original document without an object. The clause is omitted in the Psh., but is found in the LXX (Vat.) and the Tgg.

In the following chap. Abraham addresses God (v. 8) as Lord God (JHWH). So too Eliezer (24.[12]), Isaac (26.[25], 27.[27]), Abimelech (26.[28]), and Laban (31.[49]).

All these are ascribed by Ball (op. cit.) to J.: in the last case three verses are divided into snippets of nearly equal proportions between J., E., and P. Ball also omits the difficult "I have waited for Thy salvation, O Lord" (JHWH, Gn. 49.[18]), although it is in all the VV., the Sam. and the Tgg. It would ease matters considerably if we cd. regard all these passages as due to the mannerism of J.

The cases referred to must be taken account of in considering what God says to Moses (Ex. 6.[3]): "I appeared unto Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob by the name God Almighty; but by My name JHWH was I not known." We must remember the force of the word "name." To an Oriental it conveys the idea of essence: hence to know the name meant to understand all that was implied in it. The phrase, therefore, does not necessarily signify more than that the meaning and relationship implied in the name JHWH had not been revealed to the Patriarchs. That is to say, the "name" does not consist in the mere word, but in the significance it bears.

If it be true, as scholars seem to be agreed (for interesting discussions see Expository Times, vols. xvii. and xviii., by index), that the Babylonian equivalent of JHWH is found in the cuneiform inscriptions of the time of Ḥammurabi, this only supports the view that JHWH is a primitive form: it takes nothing fm. the originality of the name revealed to Moses.

In the NT. Lord stands for kurios, with few exceptions (Eph. 6.[9]; Col. 4.[1], &c., where it is rendered "Master"), when it refers to God or Christ. With a similar reference despotēs is also rendered Lord (in 2 P. 2.[1]; Ju.[4]; Rv. 6.[10], RV. renders "Master").

LORD OF HOSTS. This name of God is found chiefly in prophetic Lit. What meaning attaches to "Hosts" is the question of main interest. The name is first used in a narrative (1 S. 1.[3], 4.[4], &c.), where the Lord of Hosts is closely associated with the ark, as the symbol of His presence who was able to give victory to His people. It is natural to suppose that "Hosts" for them meant the armies of Isr. It is true, as Delitzsch says, that the name does not occur in the history where most we should expect it—that of the Desert Wanderings. But we must remember that the correlative "hosts of the Lord" is the phrase used to describe Israel on leaving Egp. Such passages, however, as Jg. 5.[20]; 1 K. 22.[19]; and 2 K. 6.[17], show a conception of other "hosts" who were subject to His obedience. The significance of the term was greatly developed. For the prophets the Lord of Hosts is the Supreme Master of all powers in heaven and on earth (cp. Mw. 26.[53]; He. 1.[14]).

LORD'S DAY, THE. 1. The Title.—Lord's Day is the name given by Christians to the first day of the week. Our only written authority for it is Rv. 1.10. The place of John's vision was Patmos, and the time of it is generally believed to have corresponded to our Sabbath. All days are the Lord's, and the apartness of one portion of time does not rob the remaining portions of their sacredness. But, as the little leaven leavens the whole lump, the dedication of the first day to high spiritual ends lifts the other six to a loftier plane, and infuses them with a finer spirit.

2. Its Relation to the Jewish Sabbath.—Under this head many nice points arise wh. cannot be discussed here. Some deny any connection between the two days. Others base the obligation of the Christian Sabbath on the Fourth Commandment, and invest it with the sanction pertaining to the other commandments. The truth lies between these extremes. The one day grew out of the other, and has its highest sanction in man's own nature. It is not right because it is commanded; it is commanded because it is right. When Christ uttered the words, "It is finished," the death-knell of the Jewish Sabbath was sounded. Shadow and type as it was, it was doomed to disappear. The Great Fulfiller having come, something better must take its place. That something better was the Lord's Day, and while the two are in some respects dissimilar, there is common to both a moral principle wh. expresses permanent obligation.

3. How the Change came about.—We possess no written command authorising the substitution of the first day for the seventh. To many this constitutes a real difficulty. Such shd. remember that God guides us with the glance of His eye, and that events and providences, no less than spoken words and written decrees, are expressions of His will for us. The change is not hard to explain. For a long time Jewish Christians observed both days. They naturally clung to the old while making place for the new. This dual arrangement cd. not last. One of the days must, in time, take pre-eminence over the other. There were strong reasons why that day shd. be the first. On the first day of the week our Lord rose fm. the dead, thereby putting the seal on His Messiahship; on the same day He revealed Himself in His resurrection life more than once to the apostles; on it also He shed down the Pentecostal Baptism of the Holy Spirit. The day was thus sanctified by Christ's resurrection; it was the birthday of the Christian Church and the beginning of the New Creation. These things inevitably made a deep impression on the first Christians, and so, guided by a Divine instinct, they stepped out of bondage to the Jewish Sabbath, and entered into the glorious liberty and hope for wh. the Lord's Day stands.

4. The Purpose of the Day.—Much may be learned fm. the practice of the first Christians as recorded in Acts. Times change, however, and the question is often asked: "How shd. the day be spent? What is, and what is not, lawful?" Generally speaking, this question will answer itself provided we grasp the true idea of the day. That man is on the wrong tack who regards it as a burden. It does not so much impose duty as confer privilege. Though called the Lord's Day, it is pre-eminently man's day. Christ's rebuke of the Jews who, by their accretions and superstitions, had largely frustrated the Divine idea of their Sabbath, furnishes the best clue to the wise observance of our own rest-day. "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." Get your definition of man and the rest becomes luminous. Man has been well likened to a pyramid, with the body as base, the spirit as apex, and heart and brain packed in between. The body needs relief fm. toil. The bow must not be always bent. Regularly recurring periods of rest are necessary if man's wearied powers are to be restored and repaired. Experience has proved that Sabbath work is mistaken economy. Man is also a social and intellectual being. Absorption in daily tasks leaves too little time for the cultivation of social and family ties. The Lord's Day gives the needed opportunity for making good this loss; and the gladdest day of all the seven, the day to wh. the children shd. eagerly look forward, ought to be this day, wh. has been too often associated with austerity and gloom. As an old writer remarks: "God is the Father of lights and everlasting glee." Man's crowning distinction, however, is his spiritual nature. His soul cries out for God. There is in him a deep life that seeks for the nourishment wh. faith and hope and worship alone can give. If he is to be anything more than a highly civilised animal, these are indispensable. The Lord's Day allows him to escape to the mountain top where he can see his life in the calm, clear light of eternity, and refresh his nature in communion with God and his fellow-men. He best keeps it, therefore, who makes it minister to the growth of a complete manhood. To go back here is to go downward. To sum up—every Lord's Day is an Easter, telling of our risen Redeemer and the New Creation, of wh. His Person and Work are the foundation. It is an opportunity given to the sons of toil to refresh their exhausted natures, and remind themselves of their dignity and destiny as immortal beings. And it is a prophecy of the rest that remaineth for the people of God. The Sabbath is thus its own sufficient justification, and, though always needed, is needed now more than ever. S. M. Riddick.

LORD'S PRAYER, THE. This prayer was not used by Christ. One, at least, of its petitions wd. have been impossible on His lips. It derives its title fm. the fact that the Lord taught it to His disciples. There are two accounts of it, in Mw. 6. and Lk. 11. A comparison of these shows that, though to some extent verbally different, they are substantially the same. Questions have been raised as to wh. of the two is the original form, or whether both forms may not have been spoken by Christ on different occasions. Such questions only land us in the region of conjecture. According to Luke it was taught by Christ to the disciples in response to a definite request. It may be accepted as a form of prayer, the very words of wh. may be legitimately used; as a summary gathering up in concise fashion the various things for wh. men may pray; also as a pattern of the spirit, aims, and proportions of true prayer.

Structure.—It is made up of six petitions. Some say seven, but if the last two be taken as negative and positive aspects of the same desire, there are six. Quaint and fanciful numerical correspondences have been pointed out between it and the Decalogue, but without being either quaint or fanciful we may lay stress on the following points. It begins with God and gives prominence to what is spiritual: Thy Name, Thy Kingdom, Thy Will. Our first care is to be the Kingdom of God and not our own personal interests. The second half begins with man on the purely animal plane, and rises to the soul's needs and conflicts: our bread, our debts, our temptations and deliverances. The prayer is thus an object lesson, showing that we must put first things first, and not invert the spiritual order.

The Various Steps. — In bidding us say "Father," Christ opens out to us a new conception of God and our relation to Him. If He is our Father, we are not creatures only. A spark disturbs our clod, and we approach Him with a sense of kinship wh. summons us to be and do our best. Our Father. Even when we enter our closets and are alone we are to say Our. We thus link ourselves on to humankind: to those we love, to those we do not love, and to the whole company of the redeemed. Without the Fatherhood there can be no real Brotherhood. In Heaven, and therefore exempt fm. the limitation and caprice and inability by wh. the best human fatherhood is marred. The Name of God stands for His character, and for all the things and ways through wh. that character has been revealed. We ask that it be hallowed—in other words, that there be generated in us a mood of reverence and adoring wonder. The very scrub of the desert is to be seen by us as burning with a Divine fire. Thy Kingdom come. Men are not saved in bundles, but, when saved, they do not remain solitary units, but coalesce into a society. Within this society the laws of righteousness are to prevail. This is really a prayer for the better time about wh. men are now dreaming. But it must come inwardly before it can come outwardly. Personal regeneration must precede social regeneration. "The golden age cannot be made out of leaden people." Thy Will be done. In the popular mind prayer is an attempt to bend God's will to ours. Its true purpose, however, is to bring our will into harmony with God's. We ask that this be done in ourselves and others, and that we may be active participators in its achievement. For God works through means and, among men, His means are men.

The second part starts with a reference to our material wants. God fed the hungry prophet, and we are not surprised to find such a petition in the model prayer. It is like the Father, who cares even for oxen. The one puzzling word in the prayer is daily. Opinions differ as to its precise meaning. Some think it means needful, "just sufficient for the day;" others, bread "for the coming day." In any case the word expresses limitation, and bids us throw our cares on God. It puts a curb on human greed and ambition. It warrants us in asking, not for luxuries, but only for enough to sustain life and keep us fit organs of God's purpose. If carried out it wd. put an end to the mad haste to be rich and to all shady ways of making money. Forgive us. The need for pardon as well as for bread is a daily need, but if we hope to be forgiven the 500 pence we owe to God, we must be ready to remit the small debt of 50 pence due to ourselves by our brother. This petition, if uttered by any man with hatred lurking in his heart, is a prayer for his own condemnation. Lead us. God does not needlessly tempt any man, but opportunities are temptations. A chance to rise is also a chance to fall. Conscious of weakness, we desire that while God may not lead us round He will at least bring us through temptation, so that our souls may be strengthened and not weakened by the struggle.

The doxology was introduced for liturgical purposes, and is not a part of the original. But it is in harmony with the mind of Christ, and forms a fitting close to this prayer—a prayer so simple that a child can lisp it, yet so profound and comprehensive that the most expert scholar and the ripest saint cannot plumb its depths or exhaust its blessings. S. M. Riddick.

LORD'S SUPPER, THE. Each of the first three Gospels contains an account of its Institution, but the most detailed account is in 1 Cor. 11. The night in wh. He was betrayed Christ and His apostles met in an upper room in Jerusalem to keep the Passover. While so engaged our Lord took the bread and, instead of uttering the usual form of words, said: "Take, eat: this is My body, wh. is broken for you." In like manner He took the cup of blessing and gave to it a new significance: "This cup is the New Testament in My blood, wh. is shed for you." In this simple way the Type was fulfilled in the Antitype, and the Passover, wh. commemorated a national deliverance, was supplanted by the Supper, wh. commemorates the greater deliverance of the soul fm. the bondage of sin. The Lord's Supper is thus not a device of man. Christ's action lifted it clear above the level of any human institution, while the time, manner, and circumstances all conspired to invest it with a peculiar solemnity.

Names.—These are varied, and are each descriptive of one or other of its features. The Scripture names are "the breaking of bread" (Ac. 2.[42]), the Communion (1 Cor. 10.[16]), the Lord's Table (10.[21]), and the Lord's Supper (11.[20]). Early in the history of the Church it was called the Eucharist—a term wh. expresses the joyful gratitude of the communicant. It is also widely known as the Sacrament. This last is misleading, as Baptism too is a Sacrament, and stands on the same level. It is a, but not the, Sacrament.

Nature and Purpose.—Looked at broadly, it is an impressive representation of the Redeemer's sufferings and a vivid symbol of His wonderful love for man; an appeal to the heart through the eye, as a sermon is an appeal to the heart through the ear. There may be a sermon without Christ in it, but there cannot be a Sacrament without Him. When few were able to write, seals were used bearing the owners' crests, and such a seal, when attached to a document, gave it validity. So this Sacrament seals the Word, assures us that Christ not only gave Himself for us, but is here and now actually giving Himself to us. It adds nothing to the Word, but it makes it surer, and helps us to take a firmer grip of the Unseen Saviour.

More particularly it is (1) A Commemoration. Christ wrote no book, gave His name to no city, took none of the ordinary ways of perpetuating His memory. He simply appointed this feast, adding the words, "This do in remembrance of Me." Though a memorial of all Christ was and did, it is, in a special sense, a memorial of His death. It was not natural for Christ to die. Death did not naturally round off His sinless life. We can only explain it by saying, "He bore our sins." It is thought the early Christians showed forth His death in audible words. But speech or no speech, at the table we individualise ourselves and say, "He loved me and gave Himself for me." (2) A Communion. Though Christ died He is not now sleeping beneath the Syrian stars. He rose again, and is spiritually present in the Supper. The material elements serve their purpose only in proportion as they bring us into contact with Him. The robe wh. the woman touched derived all its healing virtue fm. the fact that Christ was the wearer of the robe, and a Sacrament is a channel of blessing only when it reveals Him to the soul. We have no independent life. Our action in the Supper implies that by faith we live in and through Him, even as we receive physical strength by eating bread and drinking wine. "He that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me." At the Table we have also fellowship with Christ's people. The communion of saints is a blessed reality. By eating of the same bread and drinking of the same cup, emphatic testimony is borne to the fact that in the midst of many differences we are one. Because it is the Lord's Table, it is a place where all the Lord's people have a right to sit; and it is sad and humiliating that what was meant to be a symbol of unity has often been a cause of strife and separation. (3) A Service of Consecration. God says, "I am your God;" and our reply is, "We are Thy people." As the Roman soldier took the sacramentum or oath of loyalty to his emperor, so do we pledge ourselves in holy troth to be Christ's and only Christ's. (4) It is a Feast of Hope. "Till He come." If it points us back to the Cross and up to the living Christ, it also points us forward to His glorious appearing, and to the time when hope shall pass into fruition and sacramental shadows be swallowed up in the heavenly substance.

Attitude of the Communicant.—Many are kept back fm. the Lord's Table through groundless fears. Some of the words in 1 Cor. seem to bar their way. Let it be said for their encouragement that the word translated "damnation" means "judgment" or "chastisement," and the unworthy communicating alluded to by St. Paul referred to unseemly brawls wh. prevailed among the Corinthians at their love-feasts. The Lord's Table is not meant to be difficult of access. It is a means of grace; not a mark of perfection but a help for pilgrims towards perfection. We are to come to it not because we are good but because we desire to be better. The most worthy communicant may be he who most feels his unworthiness.

"All the fitness He requireth,
Is to feel our need of Him."

The flag of a nation, though only a piece of weather-beaten bunting, is a sacred thing. The Founder of our faith knew men, and His intention is that this simple symbolic rite shd. awaken thought, kindle imagination, express love, and draw His followers into a holy fellowship. S. M. Riddick.

LO-RUHAMAH. See Lo-ammi.

LOT, s. of Haran, nephew of Abraham (Gn. 11.[27-31]). His fr. being dead, he went with Abraham to Can. (12.[4ff.]). We next hear of him when, to avoid strife between the herdsmen of their overgrown flocks, Abraham proposed the division of the land, leaving to L. his choice (13.[1ff.]). Fm. some eminence E. of Bethel they surveyed the country, and L., attracted by the fertility and beauty of the great valley of the Jordan, selfishly chose it for himself. For himself and his descts. he thus abandoned all claim to the higher lands of Western Pal. Taking up his residence in SODOM, he was carried captive, along with others, by the victorious Chedorlaomer, fm. whom he was rescued by his uncle. See ABRAHAM.

Despite his evil surroundings, L. preserved the hospitable spirit, and handsomely entertained the angels who visited Sodom on their mission of destruction. When the men of the city threatened them, he was ready to defend them at any cost, even to the sacrifice of his daughters. It is true that " he was bound to defend his guests at the risk of his own life, but not by the sacrifice of his daughters " (Speaker's Com. on v. 8), but there are perhaps few Arabs who wd. hesitate, in similar circumstances, to make the sacrifice to-day. Mocked by his sons-in-law when he urged them to flee, and lingering himself by the home of many days, the angels hurried him forth, with his w. and two daughters, exhorting him to flee to the mountains. He begged leave to find easier refuge in ZOAR, where he arrived about sunrise. His w., looking behind her, was turned into a pillar of salt. Witnessing the awful destruction raging in the valley beneath him, L. at last fled to the mountains, and sought asylum in a cave. There, beguiled by his daughters, he became the fr. of Moab and Ammon (Gn. 19. ; cp. Dt. 2.[9, 19], &c.). L. was selfish and worldly-minded, willing to expose his family to the contaminations of life in Sodom, for the sake of temporal advantage. His disaster and final disgrace are doubtless designed as warnings.

Lot's Wife was punished because she had left her heart behind her in the burning city. How many since then, with their feet in the way to the mountains of freedom, have been turned to stony pillars by the petrifying power of backward dragging affections.

Curious and fantastic pillars and blocks of crystallised rock-salt are found to the SW. of the Dead Sea. In former days travellers thought to see in one or other of these the veritable pillar of Gn. 19.[26]. But none of these lasts many yrs. They are perpetually changing and passing away, worn esp. by the rains.

LOTS. See DIVINATION, URIM and THUMMIM.

LOTUS TREES. RV. thus correctly renders tze'ĕlim (Jb. 40.[21f.] ; AV. " shady trees "), named with the covert of the reed and the fen, as affording shelter to Behemoth (the hippopotamus). It prob. correspds. to a prickly shrub, Arb. dāl, the " dom tree," and must be distinguished from the Egyptian water-lily.

LOVE. The Heb. 'ahăbāh has practically the same variety of meanings as our English word " love," including the pure spiritual affection existing between God and His people, and the mutual loves of human beings in the various family and friendly relationships. God's beneficence to Isr. is traced to its source in the Divine love (Dt. 7.[7f.]) ; and it is required of His people that they love Him (Dt. 6.[5]). This pure love is incompatible with love of evil (Ps. 97.[10]). It manifested itself towards God in reverence and glad obedience, and towards man in brotherly kindness and willing service. It was essential to the fulfilment of the ancient law. Jacob's love for Rachel made light his burdens (Gn. 29.[20]). The Song of Songs sets to music the trial and triumph of pure and faithful love. No friendship was ever consecrated by more beautiful and loyal love than that of David and Jonathan (2 S. 1.[26], &c.).

In the NT. the love of God attains its fullest expression. It is the fountain whence all blessings have flowed to man (Jn. 3.[16] ; Rm. 5.[8] ; 1 Jn. 4.[9f.]). Love to God is the condition of obedience (Jn. 14.[15], RV.). Where love rules in the heart obedience is ideally complete ; for " love is the fulfilling of the law " (Rm. 13.[10]). This love is the response of man's nature to the appeal of God's love (1 Jn. 4.[19]), and when it exists ensures not only a pure devotion to God, but also a tender regard for all the objects of the Divine love, especially the brotherhood (Jn. 15.[12, 17] ; 1 Jn. 3.[14], 4.[7ff.]). This love is the inspiration of the lives redeemed by Jesus Christ, and it furnishes the guarantee that His great purpose of grace shall, through them, be promoted in the earth.

In the NT. agapē is the word commonly used for love, being free from the sensuous associations of erōs. No absolute distinction can be drawn between the verbs agapaō and phileō. The former is far the more frequent, and leans to the pure and austere sense, while the latter implies perhaps an element of familiarity like that found between friend and friend, or in the intimacies of the family circle.

LOVE-FEAST. RV. so renders agapē in Ju.[12] and in 2 P. 2.[13], in the latter case correcting apatais to agapais. From old time in the East the common meal has been the confirmation and seal of brotherhood. The early Christians met regularly for the " breaking of bread " ; and as these meals were open to every member of the community, they helped to meet the necessities of the poor (Ac. 2.[46], 6.[1f.], &c.). From this probably arose the agapē, the " love-feast," which either began or ended with the celebration of the LORD'S SUPPER. The account given by St. Paul (1 Cor. 11.[17ff.]) of the love-feast at Corinth * seems to show that there the Supper came last (vv. 21f.). The same passage, taken with Ju.[12] and 2 P. 2.[13], shows how soon abuses appeared, how scandalous persons found their way in and destroyed the character of the feast. This furnished the ground for charges of immoral excesses brought against the Christian societies. It was deemed necessary to sever the celebration of the Lord's Supper from the feast, moving it to the early morning. This was the case in Bithynia, as Pliny reports to Trajan (Ep. 96); the meal which used to follow having been discontinued in consequence of Trajan's prohibition of societies (sodalitates). The suspicion and jealousy excited by these secret feasts, and such internal troubles as are referred to above, probably explain why the love-feast fell into desuetude.

* In Sparta, which was regarded as the ideal Greek Republic, the citizens were accustomed to eat together, at what was called the sussitia. Mention of the " love-feast " in connection with Corinth, suggests the possibility that this feast may have been taken over with the word ecclēsia, by which the assembly of the citizens in a Greek city state was known. In the NT. it denotes the community of believers ; and the love-feast may have been the mark of citizens of the spiritual commonwealth.

LUBIMS. See Libya.

LUCAS = LUKE (Phm.[24]).

LUCIFER (Heb. hēlēl, lit. "shining one"), defined as "son of the dawn" (ben shaḥar). The reference is clearly to the morning star. The name is applied to the king of Bab., possibly Esarhaddon, who took the title k. of Bab. to secure the loyalty of the Babylonians, who had rebelled so often agst. his father and grandfather. His pride and splendour, and the dazzling ambitions he cherished, throw into bolder relief the humiliation and wretchedness of his downfall. It has been supposed that in Lk. 10.[18], "I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven," and in Rv. 9.[1], "I saw a star from heaven fallen upon the earth," there is some reference to this passage in Isaiah. Jerome and the Christian Fathers therefore applied the name "Lucifer" to Satan. Woods (HDB.) thinks the imagery may have been suggested by a meteor.

LUCIUS. (1) L. of Cyrene, named among "certain prophets and teachers" at Antioch (Ac. 13.[1]) to whom the Holy Ghost said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul," &c. Without any reasonable ground he has been identified with St. Luke. (2) One of those named in Rm. 16.[21], who send greetings to the Christians in Rome. He may be identical with (1), but there is no certainty.

LUCRE is used in Old English without any evil connotation, simply signifying "gain," for example, in the phrase of Erasmus, "the lucre and encreace of godlynesse." In EV. it occurs only once without the adjective "filthy" (1 S. 8.[3]), and there also it wd. be quite appropriate, as characterising ill-gotten gain.

LUD, LUDIM. In Gn. 10.[22] Lud is named as a son of Shem (1 Ch. 1.[17] repeats the statement). It is usual, following Jos., to take this as representing Lydia in Asia Minor. The identification is doubtful. The Lydians were certainly not Semites. The fact that they were for a time under Semitic rule—that of the Assyrians—might furnish a colourable reason for so describing them; but there is no certainty. "Ludim" of Gn. 10.[13]; 1 Ch. 1.[11], is mentioned among the sons of Mizraim (Egypt). In Ek. 27.[10] Lud is associated with Persia and Phut as soldiers in the army of Tyre. In Ek. 30.[5] Lud appears with Ethiopia and Phut, both African peoples. In Is. 66.[19] "Pul," named along with Lud, is probably an error for "Put" (Phut). In Jr. 46.[9] Ludim (AV. "Lydians") are mentioned with Cush and Phut among the auxiliaries of Egypt, as those who "handle and bend the bow." But there is no evidence that the Lydians were ever held in repute for archery. That some North African people is intended seems certain; but they have left no mark on history, and archæological research has so far furnished no clue by which they may be identified.

LUHITH, a place unidentd., poss. on the road passing up through Wādy Bene Ḥammād to the E. uplands, fm. near Zoar (Is. 15.[5]); "the ascent of L." or the "descent of Horonaim" (Jr. 48.[5]).

LUKE THE EVANGELIST. The name is a contraction of Lucanus. He was a physician (Col. 4.[14]), and may have been of servile origin, many slaves following that profession. In this passage he is distinguished from those "of the circumcision" (v. 11); he was therefore of Gentile birth, and not identical with St. Paul's kinsman Lucius (Rm. 16.[21]). The Præfatio Lucæ, a work not later than the third cent. (Harnack, Chronologie, p. 653), calls him "by nation a Syrian of Antioch," to which city his family belonged (Eusebius, HE. iii. 4). He is thrice mentioned by name in St. Paul's Epp. (Col. 4.[14]; 2 Tm. 4.[11]; Phm.[24]). From these passages we learn that he was associated with the apostle as a "fellow-labourer," and that he was with him during his sojourn in Rome. A later tradition identified him with the "brother whose praise is in all the churches" (2 Cor. 8.[18]).

To St. Luke is commonly attributed the authorship of the Gospel bearing his name, and the Acts of the Apostles. The two books are admitted to be the work of the same hand. The reasons for believing St. Luke to be the writer of the Acts of the Apostles are, briefly, these:—

(1) Certain sections of the book—the so-called "we" sections—are written in the first person, with a fulness and accuracy possible only to an eye-witness. In character and style these sections cannot be distinguished from the rest of the book. The first "we" section * takes us from Troas to Philippi (16.[10-17]). This can hardly have been the writer's native city—see an interesting discussion by Sir William Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, pp. 200ff., 389f.), who suggests the identity of St. Luke with the "man of Macedonia." The next section begins at Philippi (20.[5]), and from that point to the end of the book the third person is used only when the subject matter does not personally concern the writer. From the beginning to chap. 16.[9] the author was dependent upon others for his information: from that point forward he writes of what he himself knows. (2) These circumstances support a tradition, dating at latest from the end of the second cent., that the book was written by St. Luke, a companion of St. Paul. They apply to no other companion of the apostle. Had Timothy been the writer, the "we" would have appeared in chap. 17., when we know he was with St. Paul (v. 14). Had it been Titus, he had first-hand knowledge sooner (Gal. 2.[3]). The like is true of Silas (Ac. 15.[22]). (3) Accurate knowledge of details, such as the varying titles borne by the magistrates in different cities, points to the hand of a contemporary; while exactness in the use of medical terms (Ac. 28.[8], &c.) is natural in a physician (Col. 4.[14]). These considerations place St. Luke's claim practically beyond doubt.

* The use of the first person in chap. 14.[22] suggests that St. Luke may have been one of the apostles' auditors, and that the connection of St. Luke's family was with Pisidian, not Syrian Antioch. Perhaps here St. Paul first met his future companion in travel and toil. They seem to start from Troas on terms of former acquaintance.

The universal admission that the same hand wrote the third Gospel rests on such facts as these: (1) The preface in each case is addressed to Theophilus. (2) The identity of literary style. (3) The same sympathetic presentation of the freedom and universality of the Gospel. (4) Early tradition, nowhere contradicted, that the Gospel was written by St. Luke, a companion of St. Paul.

Of the further activities of this gifted man we are left largely in ignorance. He is said by tradition to have laboured in Achaia and in Alexandria. Accdg. to the Præfatio Lucæ, he "served his Master blamelessly till his confession. For having neither wife nor children he died in Bithynia at the age of seventy-four, filled with the Holy Ghost."

LUKE, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. Tradition ascribes to St. Luke the authorship of the third Gospel and of the Acts of the Apostles. He was assumed to be the Luke who was the companion of St. Paul, who was with him on the voyage to Rome, and with him when he wrote the Epp. of the captivity. It was supposed that Luke wrote the Gospel in the sixties, and the Acts soon after the arrival at Rome, the last scene recorded in the Acts. With the rise of criticism all these positions were questioned. It was held that Luke was not the author of the one book or the other. Analysis of the Acts seemed to disintegrate the authorship, and literary criticism seemed to be triumphant. A few yrs. ago it was held as unquestioned in many circles in Germany that both books dated fm. the second century. English scholarship largely held that the traditional doctrine was the true one. But literary analysis seemed to have demonstrated the contrary. But in the event it turned out that it demonstrated only the limitations of literary criticism. If we are to arrive at trustworthy results literary criticism must be checked by objective reference. A change came over the scene when Sir William Ramsay began to publish his exhaustive studies on St. Paul. Other scholars had also been at work. But none had the same equipment. He approached the study of the question with an unequalled kge. of the Roman Empire in all its aspects. Its law, its government, its politics, its police, were all known to him. He was able to place documents and events in their proper historical environment. Then also he knew the geography and the social conditions of the Eastern provinces as few men knew them. Work after work proceeded fm. his pen, and the life and work of St. Paul became luminous. And the Acts of the Apostles, in particular, became a historical document of the first value. No doubt others had shown that Luke or the writer of the Acts was correct in his allusion to historical events; that the titles he bestows on officials, such as the politarchs of Thessalonica, were correct. But Sir William Ramsay was successful in showing that the whole atmosphere of the Acts is of the first cent.

Others have come to his help. And now we have three works fm. the pen of Harnack (two of these have been trd. into English, and the third will soon appear). Luke the Physician and The Sayings of Jesus are works of such a kind as we scarcely expected fm. Germany. He confesses that he is largely indebted to British scholars. But his own work is worthy of him. He brings forth proof of various kinds to the effect that the third Gospel and the Acts are fm. the same pen. He believes also that the Acts were published about the yr. AD. 80. It is not necessary for us to trace the evolution of the criticism regarding these bks., nor to trace the hist. of the reaction agst. the extreme conclusions wh. were reached by some critics. There is now a presumption that these writings proceeded fm. the pen of this companion of Paul, whom Sir William calls one of the great historians of the world.

As to the dates when this Gospel and the Acts were written, we see no reason why we shd. not date both of them in the sixties. The only reason alleged why the Gospel should be dated after that event is that certain sentences in the eschatological discourses in the Gospel seem to be a vaticinium post eventum of the destruction of Jrs. It does not seem to us a sufficient reason. But we do not intend to discuss the question in the space assigned to us. It is sufficient for us that the trend of recent criticism seems to be in the direction of a vindication of the Lucan authorship of these books, and a few yrs. earlier or later make little diffce. to the issue as to whether these documents are credible or not.

The main question at present is as to the sources wh. Luke used in his composition of these bks. The question of sources naturally rises in connection with his works. He raises the question himself, in the preface wh. prop. belongs both to the Gospel and to the Acts. He tells of many attempts to set forth the story of the Gospel. He tells also of his investigation of all things fm. the beginning. He himself was not an eye-witness. He belongs to the second generation. He belongs also to the Greek race. He was a Gentile Christian. With regard to the second Gospel the question of sources does not naturally arise, and if we raise it we have no sufficient data for its settlement. The sources of it seem to be the oral tradition, and the special testimony of Peter. The question of sources may well arise with regard to the first Gospel, though it is a matter of great critical delicacy to deal with them.

There is a tendency towards universal agreement that the second Gospel is a source for the third. About three-fourths of the second Gospel is found in the third. That, at all events, is a fact, account for it as we may. There are some perplexities regarding this hypothesis. One is, why Luke shd. have omitted all refce. to the incident of the Syro-Phœnician woman, an incident so illustrative of the particular ethos of his Gospel. Still the facts and incidents are so many, and the agreements are so conspicuous, that we may well suppose that he had the second Gospel before him while he wrote: unless, indeed, he had talked over the whole story with Mark while they were together with Paul at Rome (Col. 4.[10, 14]; Phm. [24]). Suppose, then, that he had the second Gospel as one of his sources, what are the others? In the Sayings of Jesus Harnack attempts to resuscitate this last source. And he is so far successful. But only so far. We cannot be sure that the last source consisted only of sayings, nor can we affirm that the common historical matter, common to the three, was drawn fm. Mark or fm. the tradition. The document Q may have been a Gospel like those we have, containing events and deeds as well as sayings and discourses. But Luke had other sources at his command in addition to Mark and Q. About half of his Gospel contains matter wh. we do not find anywhere else. The fore-hist. belongs to the third Gospel alone. It wd. be easy to enumerate the chapters and verses wh. are peculiar to the third Gospel. In fact this has been done more than once, and the result is easily accessible. We mention only the parable of the Good Samaritan, and the parables of the Lost Sheep, the Lost Coin, and the Lost Son. What does criticism make of these sources and of Luke's use of them?

On the supposition that the second Gospel is a source for the third, we may come to some conclusions regarding the way in wh. Luke uses his authorities. We may look at the changes wh. he makes on Mark. Referring to the work of Harnack and to the Horæ Synopticæ of Sir John Hawkins for illustration of the changes wh. Luke makes, we quote from Sir William Ramsay, who himself had given some illustrations of the process. "A comparison like this might be carried out over the whole matter common to Mark and Luke. In some places there is distinctly more change than here. But even where there is most change, enough remains to show the char. of the source. Slight alterations to improve the Greek are frequent. Complete re-fashioning of the thought and expression is rare. Words and vocabulary wh. Luke rarely employs where he is writing freely are retained fm. the source. Luke recognised that a certain type of nar. style had been established for the Gospel, and he allowed this to remain. Esp. in the beginning and end of a borrowed paragraph he altered freely to suit the preceding narrative. Fm. some places it is clear that he did not translate verse by verse, but considered a paragraph or incident as a whole, and transferred touches fm. one point to another, where they seemed more effective. He studied effect more, perhaps, he pictured the scene to himself more vividly than Mark did, and lit it up with more vivid forms of language" (Luke the Physician, pp. 41, 42).

Fm. this statement and fm. others of the same kind, and fm. a comparison of the material in the second Gospel with similar material in the third, we may obtain a conception of the freedom wh. Luke allowed to himself in dealing with his authorities. He touched up the style, altered the arrangement sometimes, grouped things somewhat differently, but he seemed to think it unwarrantable to change the meaning. He regarded the material of the Gospel tradition as given to him, and his business was to arrange and set it forth as lucidly as possible, in order that Theophilus might know the certainty of the things in wh. he had been catechised. He dealt with all his sources in the way in wh. he dealt with Mark. We may be reasonably sure that he did not invent anything, that he never changed the meaning, but faithfully set down what he gathered fm. written sources, and fm. the tradition of the Churches with wh. he came into contact.

If where we can test his procedure we see that we can trust him, surely we may trust him in his use of sources of wh. we have no kge. It may be well at this point to look at the fore-history. It is a most remarkable document, and is indeed unique. It is so unlike, in style, in setting, and in its whole outlook, to what we might expect in an introduction to an event wh. the writer estimates as the greatest in the world's history. We do not dwell on accounts of the appearance of famous heroes in the hist. of the world, or delineate the signs and wonders wh. were said to accompany their birth. Signs in the heavens above and wonders in the earth beneath signalise the birth of the hero. Take Milton's "Ode to the Nativity," and note how he strives in his own majestic way to express his sense of the greatness of the Nativity. History, poetry, science, mythology, and every token of material greatness are used to enhance the significance of the event. Milton was a Christian poet, and cd. appreciate sptl. greatness. Contrast, however, his treatment of the Nativity with the fore-history of Luke and of Matthew, and we are in worlds which measure greatness by altogether different standards. In Luke everything is quite simple, untouched by any token of material greatness. There is no shaking of the firm foundations of the earth, kings do not look with awful eye, the great ones of the earth are untroubled, the greatest event of hist. is ushered in by no outward greatness. In truth we must be educated in the higher values, and learn to know something of spiritual greatness ere we can appreciate the simple majesty of Luke's fore-history. The people who appear are notable only for simple piety, and for religious devotion. They are an aged priest and his wife, a maiden on whom was to fall a great destiny, a few shepherds, an old man and an old woman on the brink of the grave, all of them people heard of only in this place, and on this occasion. The world is unconscious of the appearance in it of the greatest person in its history. We submit that here there is no legend, no mythology. Legends and mythologies are made up of material of an altogether different sort.

How did the wondrous story arise, and where did Luke find it? That he did find it, and that he did not compose it, seems very obvious. The simplest explanation of the story is that it tells of things wh. had happened. For no one cd. have invented it. It is so unlike the products of human imagination, so different fm. them in its sptl. measurement of greatness. We read that Luke was with Paul at Jrs., and that he did not accompany Paul when Paul was hurried away to Cæsarea. Likely he made his abode in Jrs. while Paul was in imprisonment at Cæsarea. Is it assuming too much to say that he occupied his time in ascertaining all he cd. find out regarding the tradition of the Jrs. Church? May we not imagine him making a pilgrimage to the hill country of Judea, and visiting the scenes of the Gospel story? Very likely he had already formed the purpose of writing the Gospel, and the story of the spread of Christianity fm. Jrs. to Rome. In the innermost circles of the Jrs. Church he might well learn of what the mother of Jesus might have told to that circle when she dwelt in the house of John the beloved disciple. At all events the story, if it is true, cd. only have come fm. Mary. It is occupied all through with Mary, her feelings, her hopes, her aspirations. She is in the forefront all through. Joseph is in the background, or rather never appears on the scene. It bears all the marks of a woman's purity and graceful, tender imagination. May we not say that the source of the fore-history of Luke lies in the memories of the mother of Jesus?

We have written these paragraphs because the fore-history has been sadly misrepresented and misunderstood. It is a unique document, so unlike every other in the hist. of Lit. that we do not think any one cd. have invented or imagined it, and we repeat we have to be educated in the estimate of sptl. values to appreciate its unique greatness. Fm. Mary alone cd. have come also the story of the visit to the Temple, and of the scene when Jesus remained behind after the Galilean caravan had departed. For that note of Jesus as a boy of twelve we may be thankful, and for that note also that He increased in wisdom and in stature and in favour with God and with man.

Luke's function in these books is that of a historian. His object is to set forth in lucid order and in intelligible fashion what had been handed down, to trace all things fm. the beginning, and to make his reader understand those things in wh. he had been catechised. He was not free to invent, nor did he think of setting forth an apology for the Christian religion, or instituting a defence of it. He had no doubt of its truth and reality. He believed that its hist. was its best defence, and its highest vindication. The reader he had in view was a Christian already, who did not need to be convinced of the truth of Christianity. It seems to me that they make a sad mistake who are always ready to read the writings of the NT. fm. an apologetic point of view, as if the writers had in view a hostile world, or a world wh. was constantly employed in making attacks on Christianity. On the contrary, the writers of the Gospels had those in view who had already believed, and their aim was to deepen and confirm their faith. The writers of the Gospels made it their business to acquaint their readers with what Jesus did, with what He had said, and thus enable them to know Him, for in the kge. of Him was life. Nor can it be said of Luke in particular that he wrote in a dogmatic interest. In his record of Jesus, and in his description of the hist. of the early Church, there is a conspicuous lack of pure dogmatic teaching. It is, indeed, singular, that a companion of Paul shd. set forth in order the things wh. were believed in the Christian Church, and yet have none of those terms and words employed by Paul in setting forth the meaning of the Christian Revelation.

It might be well, then, to take for granted that Luke means what he says as regards his aim in writing these bks. It is that Theophilus might know the certainty concerning the things wherein he had been instructed. Having traced the course of all things fm. the beginning, he now writes in order. As we read what he has written, and compare what he has written with the other sources wh. we know, we find a great correspondence. There are touches in the portraiture of Jesus wh. we do not find in Matthew or in Mark, but there is no discrepancy in the great outline. There is no doubt regarding the attitude of reverence and devotion assumed by Luke while he is writing about Jesus. Nor is there any doubt regarding what Luke thinks of the relation of Jesus to the Father. Jesus is the Son, sent by the Father. In particular Luke lays stress on the need wh. the Son has of constant intercourse with the Father. Every new departure in the ministry of Jesus is taken after a night of prayer and fellowship with the Father. The majesty of Jesus in His relation towards men is paralleled by His need of refce. to the Father in all He says and in all He does. It may be safely said that as regards the estimate of Jesus and as regards faith in Him, the attitude of the three Synoptic Gospels is one.

As far as the third Gospel is concerned it is a hist. of the doings and sayings of Jesus, a record of His relations to men, arranged in artistic form, and grouped so as to enable a reader to know what to think of Jesus. The writer is a historian, not an apologist or a theologian. He makes changes in lang., in order, in arrangement, but he seems to take care to make no change in the essential meaning of the facts. He may now and then soften the harsher lang. of Mark, he may now and again lay emphasis on some feature simply mentioned by the former evangelist, but the impression made by the two narratives are in essential agreement. As an illustration take the sentence descriptive of the agony at Gethsemane wh. is found in Luke alone: "And being in an agony He prayed more earnestly: and His sweat became as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground" (22.[44]).* This enables a reader to feel the intensity of the agony. Hobart points out that the word for "sweat," and the phrase "drops of blood," both peculiar to Luke in the NT., are technical medical terms (The Medical Language of St. Luke, p. 82). In many other instances Luke uses his precise medical kge. to give his reader a more vivid and more adequate impression of the real state of the case he is describing. In this instance he enables us to know how sore was the agony of the Master.

It is said by some that Luke persistently and constantly softens the lang. of his source, and minimises the phrases wh. imply weakness, infirmity, or blameworthiness on the part of the apostles. In this there is a measure of truth. He does omit some sentences; he gives a more favourable turn to some of the Markan phrases; he leaves out, e.g., the "Get thee behind Me, Satan" (Mk. 8.[33]) addressed to Peter. And there are other omissions like this one. It is perfectly intelligible that a writer of the second generation of Christians shd. reverence the apostles, on whom the foundations of the Church were laid, and shd. desire to speak of them as highly as possible. This may have been the motive of Luke in the changes wh. he has made on his source. It is not possible to look at these changes now. But we may safely say that while he speaks softly of the faults and failures of the disciples, the reader always knows that they were at fault, and had failed to rise to the height of their calling.

As we read over these two works of Luke, and allow ourselves to receive the impression they are fitted to make on us, what an impression it is! What a picture is here drawn of the Master—His compassion, His sympathy, His patience, His tenderness, alongside of His majesty, His wisdom, His endurance! What tenderness in the Lucan parables, what sympathy and tact are shown to the two on the way to Emmaus! How vividly Luke makes us feel the reality of the Resurrection, and the truth of the appearances of the Risen Lord. He tells of the Ascension twice, once as the closing scene of the Gospel, as the last chap. of a work done; he tells us again in the Acts of the Apostles, and tells of it as the first work of the Risen Lord. The former treatise was written of all that Jesus began to do and teach; the new treatise was written to tell of what the Risen Jesus continued to do and teach. But they are really one story. The Child born at Bethlehem, the Boy we meet at Jrs., is the Man Jesus who, being about thirty yrs. of age, came forth to work. He is the same in His Galilean work, in His wanderings round about the dominions of Herod. We are able to discern His identity in all the scenes and circumstances of His life, fm. Bethlehem to Calvary. It is a consistent figure that Luke is enabled to draw. But the picture is drawn fm. material given to the artist, not invented by him. After criticism has done its work, and investigation is pushed to the uttermost, out of it once more comes this gracious humane Figure, and claims His own.

It ought to be noted that Luke had among his sources something that corresponds to the tradition wh. is embodied in the fourth Gospel. Space forbids us to enter into detail, but a refce. to Harnack's note in Appendix IV. to Luke the Physician may be given. He points out that John and Luke have added narratives to the Gospel History; that, among other things in common in Christology, Luke approaches to the Johannine type. It wd. be well that the reader shd. study Harnack's learned and judicious note, inasmuch as it traces a significant link of connection between the four Gospels.

JAMES IVERACH.

LUNATICK (Gr. selēniazomai, lit. "moon-

* As to the authenticity of this verse see Dr. Hort's note, The New Testament in Greek, vol. ii., appendix, p. 69f.

struck ") is the term used to describe certain who were brought to Jesus for healing (Mw. 4.[24]), and also of the boy brought by his father (Mw. 17.[15]). In both cases RV. renders "epileptic." It was some form of disease which was popularly regarded as the result of possession. The symptoms described in the latter instance point to epilepsy. The term "moonstruck" was due to the belief among the ancients that diseases marked by paroxysms were affected by the changes of the moon.

LUST is frequently used in Scripture in a sense quite free from the sinister significance which now attaches to it. It stood for strong and eager desire in a quite general way. Whatever one greatly wished, he was said to lust after; so that it is possible to speak of a "lust" of the Spirit, as opposed to a "lust" of the flesh (Gal. 5.[16]).

LUTE stands in RV. for nēbel (Is. 5.[12], AV. "viol"). See Music.

LUZ. (1) Gn. 28.[19], &c., see Bethel. (2) An unidentd. city in the land of the Hittites, built by a Bethelite (Jg. 1.[26]).

LYCAONIA, a district, rough and infertile, in the interior of Asia Minor, on the N. slopes of the Taurus mountains, reaching to the border of Galatia on the N., bounded on the W. by Phrygia and Pisidia, and on the E. by Cappadocia. The Lycaonian people were prob. related to the Pisidians. In B.C. 36 Antony placed the whole region under Amyntas, k. of Pisidia, who further conquered Derbe and Laranda. At his death in B.C. 25, the districts incorporated in his kdm. became the Rm. province of Galatia. At the time of St. Paul's visit (Ac. 14.[6]), the Lycaonian speech was still in use (v. 11).

LYCIA, a country in the SW. of Asia Minor, cities in which, Patara (Ac. 21.[1]) and Myra (27.[5]), are mentioned in connection with St. Paul's travels. Christianity made little headway in L. The country is mountainous, cut up by deep valleys. The people, who possessed an ancient culture of their own, were subject to the Seleucids till B.C. 190. Taken by the Romans, it was given to Rhodes for a time, and in 168 it was made free. A colony of Jews had early settled in L. (1 M. 15.[23]), attracted, no doubt, by the trade of its seaport towns. It was joined to the province of Pamphylia by the Emperor Claudius, A.D. 43.

LYDDA. See Lod.

LYDIA. The ancient and prosperous kdm. known by this name lay on the W. coast of Asia Minor. The last king was Crœsus, whom the Persians conquered c. B.C. 546. It fell in succession to Alexander the Great (B.C. 334) and to Pergamum (B.C. 190). By the will of the last king of Pergamum it passed to the Romans (B.C. 133), and became part of the Roman province of Asia. By this latter name only it is known in the NT. Within it lay certain great cities closely associated with the early progress of Christianity—Ephesus, Sardis, Smyrna, &c. Possibly it is referred to in Ek. 30.[5]. See Lud.

LYDIA, a seller of purple fm. the Lydian city Thyatira, prob. a Jewess, an early convert of St. Paul in Philippi, who extended hospitality to him and his companions (Ac. 16.[14]). She seems to have been well-to-do, and may have represented in Philippi some Thyatiran firm for sale of the dyed garments for which her native country was famed. "As her husband is not mentioned, and she was a householder, she was prob. a widow; and she may be taken as an ordinary example of the freedom with which women lived and worked in Asia Minor and in Macedonia" (Sir W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 214). L. may have been her proper name, but prob. it is only the adjective, "the Lydian," by wh. she was known in Philippi. She does not again appear by that name in the NT. Some have sought to identify her with Euodia or Syntyche. Renan thinks that L. is the "true yoke-fellow" of Php. 4.[3], and that she was married to St. Paul. For the last suggestion there is not even plausible evidence.

LYSANIAS is named as tetrarch of Abilene at the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry (Lk. 3.[1]). The only L. known to hist. was killed in B.C. 34 (Jos. Ant. XV. iv. 1; BJ. I. xiii. 1). It is sometimes assumed, therefore, that Luke was in error. But it does not appear that Abila was given to Herod with the other possessions of L. (Ant. XV. x. 3), and it is mentioned apart as "Abila of L." (XIX. v. 1). It is not improbable, therefore, that Augustus gave Abila to a Lysanias, who may have been a son of the former, and that Luke refers to him.

Ancient Sacrifice

LYSTRA, a city of Lycaonia, visited by St. Paul on his first and second missionary journeys (Ac. 14.[6ff.], 16.[1f.]). Here he healed a lame man, and had to restrain the people fm. sacrificing to him as a god.

Agents of the hostile Jews in Antioch and Iconium wrought a revulsion of feeling in the people: he was stoned and dragged out of the city as dead. Fm. L. he took with him Timothy, prob. a native of this town. The common people spoke Lycaonian. The site is identd. beside Khatyn Serai, a vill. 18 miles S. of Iconium. It was made a Rm. colony by Augustus, and in St. Paul's time the influential part of the population wd. be the descts. of the old colonists.

M

MAACAH. Of many persons bearing this name only these call for mention: (1) Dr. of Talmai, k. of Geshur, w. of David and mr. of Absalom (2 S. 3.[3]; 1 Ch. 3.[2]). (2) Dr. of Absalom, w. of Rehoboam (1 K. 15.[2]; 2 Ch. 11.[20ff.]). Poss. we shd. understand here "granddr." of Absalom, and identify her with Michaiah, dr. of Uriel, who may have married Tamar, Absalom's only dr. (2 Ch. 13.[2]). M. was mr. of Abijah and Asa, kings of Judah (1 K. 15.[2, 10, 13]). Under Asa she was deposed because of idolatrous practices (1 K. 15.[13], &c.). (3) Fr. of Achish, k. of Gath (1 K. 2.[39]), who may be referred to as "Maoch" (1 S. 27.[2]).

MAACHAH, RV. MAACAH, a small Aram. state between Hermon and Geshur, with the Sea of Galilee and the upper Jordan as its W. boundary, the inhabitants of wh. were called Maacathites (Dt. 3.[14], &c.). It long maintained its independence (Jo. 13.[13]). It joined with Ammon agst. David (2 S. 10.[6]; 1 Ch. 19.[6], Aram-Maacah). Poss. Abel-beth-maacah may have been built by men of M. (2 S. 20.[14], &c.).

MAALEH AKRABBIM. See Akrabbim, Ascent of.

MAARATH, a town in the uplands of Judah, named with Beth-anoth and Eltekon (Jo. 15.[59]); poss. = mod. Beit 'Ummār.

MAAREH GIBA. See Gibeah.

MACEDONIA appears first in Jewish hist. in 1 M. 1.[1ff.] It was the kingdom of Philip, the home of Alexander the Gt. M. in NT. is the Rm. province of that name. It was organised in B.C. 146, with its capital at Thessalonica. As defined by Augustus, B.C. 27, when it became a senatorial province, it reached S. to Thessaly, W. to the sea between the Aous and the Drilo. It was bounded on the N. by Moesia, and on the E. by the sea and the river Nestus (see Achaia). In A.D. 15 it became an imperial province, but in A.D. 44 it was restored by Claudius to the Senate. Much of the missionary work of St. Paul was done in the cities of M.; see separate articles on the cities. His coming over to M., bringing the Gospel to the shores of Europe (Ac. 16.[9ff.]), marks an important new departure in his life.

MACHIR. (1) Eldest (Jo. 17.[1]) and only s. (Nu. 26.[29]) of Manasseh. His descts., called Machirites (Nu. 26.[29]), were warlike and enterprising (Jg. 5.[14]). They took Gilead fm. the Amorites (Nu. 32.[39]; Jo. 13.[31], &c.). Fm. the mention of M. by Deborah among the tribes W. of Jordan, some suppose the conquest of Gilead must have fallen later. M. is called fr. of Gilead (Nu. 26.[29], &c.); but the presence of the article (Jo. 17.[1], &c., Heb. "the Gilead") may indicate a locality. (2) S. of Ammiel of Lo-debar, a place E. of the Jordan, who befriended Ishbosheth and Mephibosheth, after the disaster to the house of Saul (2 S. 9.[1ff.]). He also succoured David in his flight fm. Absalom (17.[27]), and is described by Jos. (Ant. VII. ix. 8) as the chief man of that country.

MACHPELAH was the name of a district that lay "before," i.e. "east," of Mamre, in wh. was the lot of Ephron, containing a cave (Gn. 23.[9, 17], &c.). The cave Abraham bought fm. Ephron for a burying place, and there the dust of Sarah was laid. In this cave he himself was buried (25.[9]), as was Isaac, Rebekah, Leah (49.[30f.]), and finally Jacob (50.[13]). There is no reason to doubt the truth of the tradition wh. identifies this cave with that under the great mosque at Hebron. It lies on the E. edge of the mod. city, on the SW. slope of the mountain. This land, inclining towards the ancient city (see Hebron), must have formed the district of M. Of the cave no recent reliable account is available. The latest is that of Benjamin of Tudela (A.D. 1163), who explains that any Jew giving an additional fee to the keeper of the cave wd. be admitted by an iron door. Taking a candle in his hand, he passes through "the first cave, wh. is empty, traverses a second in the same state, and at last reaches a third, wh. contains six sepulchres, those of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of Sarah, Rebekah, and Leah, one opposite the other."

Ibrahim Pasha in 1834 had himself lowered into the cavern. But his Moslem soul suddenly shrank fm. the impiety of looking even upon the ashes of another man's wife, and he was drawn up forthwith, leaving the cave unexplored.

The mosque is held in peculiar reverence by the Moslems. Certain favoured visitors, e.g. King Edward, when Prince of Wales, in 1862, and the Prince of Wales (George) in 1882, by imperial orders were permitted to enter. Members of other religious communities are as a rule rigidly excluded.

Mosque at Hebron, Machpelah

The space enclosed by the walls is 197 ft. in length by 111 ft. in breadth. The walls are supported by buttresses 25 ft. high, resting on a base wall wh. is flush with their faces. The stones in walls and base have a draft of 4 inches wide round the edges, and a band of similar tooling, about 4 inches wide, round the face, within the draft. The courses average 3 ft. 7 in. in height, one stone measuring 24 ft. 8 in. by 3 ft. 8½ in. The thickness of the walls between the buttresses is 8½ ft. In respect of buttresses, drafting, stones, thickness, and general structure these walls correspond with those of the Ḥaram in Jerusalem, and may therefore, probably, be no later than the time of Herod. The wall on the west is crowned by a cornice. On the inner face the stones are plainly dressed. The inner court is 15 ft. above the level of the street on the W. The ancient wall, including the base, was thus about 40 ft. in height. On the top of this old masonry has been built a modern wall with battlements, plastered and whitewashed. A wall of comparatively recent construction surrounds the ancient enclosure on three sides, north, south, and east, with flights of steps on the N. and S. leading up to passages on a level with the floor within, by wh. the entrance to the enclosure is reached. This is a doorway in the E. side, 95 ft. 7 in. from the SE. angle. The buildings within the enclosure are all of Christian or Moslem workmanship. The southern part is occupied by a mosque, originally a Christian church, built, probably, in the latter half of the twelfth cent. The minbar, or pulpit, is a fine piece of work in wood, completed in A.D. 1091, and brought hither by Saladin after the capture of Ascalon, A.D. 1187. The six cenotaphs are believed by the Moslems to stand directly over the spots where the three patriarchs and their wives are buried. Those of Isaac and Rebekah are within the mosque. They are enclosed in shrines oblong in shape, built of masonry, with gabled roofs, the ridges being 12 ft. above the floor. At the gable ends are brass crescents. In the sides and roofs are windows with heavy iron bars. The wooden doors are adorned with ornamental brass work. Richly embroidered hangings of silk cover the cenotaphs, under canopies of cloth. Manuscript copies of the Qor'ān are placed around each. Silver plates bearing inscriptions in Arabic are attached to the doors and windows. The porch or narthex to the N. of the mosque includes two octagonal chapels, containing the cenotaphs of Abraham and Sarah. That of Abraham is 8 ft. by 4 ft., and 8 ft. high. The gates closing the entrance to the shrine are said to be iron plated with silver. The walls of the chapel are lined with marble, Arabic inscriptions in gilt letters running round the top. The roof is domed. The shrine and cenotaph of Sarah are similar to these. To the NW. of the courtyard are the buildings enclosing the shrines of Jacob and Leah, wh. may be seen through open-barred gates from the passage between them. All the cenotaphs have hangings and coverings like those of Isaac and Rebekah described above. It is to be noted, however, that those covering the cenotaphs of the patriarchs are of deep green, the sacred Moslem colour, while in the case of their wives the colour is crimson. The inscriptions are embroidered in silver and gold. The so-called shrine of Joseph, wh. adjoins the enclosure in the NW., is entirely of Arab workmanship. In the corner of a vaulted gallery leading to it is shown the print of Adam's foot (or "the footprint of the prophet"), impressed on a stone slab said to have been brought from Mecca over 600 years ago.

The cave under the enclosure is, however, the main source of interest. The custodians describe it as double (cp. Gn. 23.[17], LXX). It was known as "the double cave" in the Middle Ages—Spelunca Duplex. Whatever entrance there may formerly have been from lower levels has long been built up, so that it was possible to enter only through certain openings, three in number, in the floor of the enclosure above. Two of these have been closed. The third, inside the N. wall of the mosque, is covered by a stone like those over well-mouths in Pal. Through a hole about 1 ft. in diameter in this stone a light may be lowered, when a chamber will be seen, about 12 ft. square, the floor being about 15 ft. below that of the mosque. A doorway like those seen in ancient rock-cut tombs in Pal. opens off the chamber to the SE. The floor is covered with pieces of paper on which Moslems have written petitions, and thrown them into the cave, in the hope that the patriarchs will intercede for the writers and secure their requests. Although the descent of the Jews from their common ancestor Abraham is not denied, they are prohibited from entering the sacred enclosure. They are allowed, however, to stand and pray at a point in the SW. where a hole in the masonry of the base appears to communicate with the interior of the cave.

An excellent account of the sacred enclosure and the cave is given by Warren, HDB. s.v. MACHPELAH; and by Col. Conder in PEFM. iii. 333ff., to which the writer of this article is mainly indebted.

MADAI. See MEDES.

MADMANNAH, an unidentd. town in the S. of Judah (Jo. 15.[31]), wh. may be the same as Beth-marcaboth (Jo. 19.[5]; 1 Ch. 4.[31]). Conder suggests, doubtfully, Umm Demineh, N. of Beersheba.

MADMEN, a town in Moab (Jr. 48.[2]), named with Heshbon. It may be = mod. el-Medeineh, N. of Dibon. But poss. it may be an error in transcription for Dibon itself.

MADMENAH, an unidentd. town N. of Jrs. (Is. 10.[31]).

MADNESS. Various words are used in Scrip. for "madness" and "to be mad," indicating different mental conditions which are sufficiently defined by the context. Madness "is recognised as a derangement proceeding either from weakness and misdirection of intellect, or fm. ungovernable violence of passion; and in both cases it is spoken of, sometimes as arising fm. the will and action of man himself, sometimes as inflicted judicially by the hand of God." The case of demonic possession is considered under DISEASES.

The prophets, acting under Divine inspiration, were sometimes regarded as madmen (2 K. 9.[11]; Jr. 29.[26], &c.). As to the marks of the inspired mood we have no sure information. It could be induced by means of music; and in some features it may have resembled the frenzy into wh. certain mod. devotees in the East work themselves by similar means.

To this day in the Orient a certain sacredness attaches to the madman. If he be not a dangerous person, his whims and follies are met with easy indulgence. The air of half-contemptuous good nature assumed in dealing with him is only a cloak for a deeper feeling, of wh. the more intelligent are somewhat ashamed. David's feigning of madness was a sure means to secure immunity (1 S. 21.[13]).

MADON, a royal Can. city in Galilee, named with Hazor (Jo. 11.[1], 12.[19]). We shd. prob. read with LXX A. "Maron." It may be ident. with mod. Meirōn, W. of Safed.

MAGADAN. See MAGDALA.

MAGDALA. This name occurs only in Mw. 15.[39] AV.; RV. Magadan. The letters "l" and "n" are frequently interchanged: e.g. Heb. nathan, "to give," is equivalent to Aram. nethal (Mk. 5.[41]): "Magadan" may therefore be simply the survival of a localism. In the parallel passage (Mk. 8.[10]) stands Dalmanutha. Neither name can now be located. The place seems to have been on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee, as Jesus set out hence for the E. side (Mk. 8.[13]). The Tlm. speaks of more than one Migdal ("tower") in the neighbourhood of Tiberias (Neubauer, Geog. d. Tlm. 216ff.), to one of wh., no doubt, Mary of Magdala (Magdalene) belonged. El-Mejdel, a few mud hovels amid traces of anct. buildings, with a comparatively mod. tower at the SW. corner of el-Ghaweir (plain of Gennesaret), prob. represents one of the Heb. Migdals, and may be Magadan itself.

MAGI. See WISE MEN.

MAGIC. See DIVINATION.

MAGISTRATE. In AV. the word first occurs in an obscure passage (Jg. 18.[7]), where for AV. "no magistrate" RV. has "none possessing authority, &c."—a meaning wh. Moore (Judges, ad loc.) says "cannot be extorted from the Heb. text with a rack." The sense may be that owing to distance from the Zidonians Laish was exposed without restraint to the attack of the Danites. In Ez. 7.[25] the Aram. shophĕṭīm represents the Heb. shōphĕṭīm. From the Phœnician form of this word the Romans got their name for the magistrates in Carthage, sufetes. In NT. "magistrates" stands for archai (Lk. 12.[11], AV.). RV. correctly renders "rulers," possibly the Gentile authorities as distinguished from those of the synagogue. In Lk. 12.[58] archōn may be "a local authority of somewhat higher position than the judge (κριτής) to whom he remits the case" (HDB. s.v.); but it may be taken as applying to the judge himself. In Ac. 16.[20], &c., the magistrates are stratēgoi (lit. "leaders"), the supreme authorities in the Roman colony.

MAGOG is named between Gomer (the Cimmerians) and Madai (the Medes) as a son of Japheth (Gn. 10.[2]; 1 Ch. 1.[5]). Ezekiel (38.[2]) makes Gog of the land of Magog, prince of Rosh, or (RVm.) chief prince of MESHECH and TUBAL. Magog must therefore be sought in the N. of Pal. It has been suggested that Gog may be identified with Gyges of classic story, and consequently Magog with Lydia.

With more probability Jos. identifies Magog with the Scythians. The impression made by incursions of this wild and warlike people was still fresh when Ezekiel wrote. We may infer from his words that they had conquered Meshech and Tubal. Gog and Magog play a great part in Apocalyptic Lit. They appear in Rv. 20.[8] as the peoples gathered by Satan to war against "the beloved city," who are destroyed by fire from heaven.

MAGOR-MISSABIB ("Fear on every side"), a nickname applied by Jeremiah to Pashur (RV. "Pashhur"), son of Immer, "chief governor of the house of the Lord" (Jr. 20.[3]), who had beaten the prophet and put him in stocks. Verse 4 explains: "Thus saith the Lord, Behold I will make thee a terror to thyself and to all thy friends." The word occurs elsewhere in the Heb., but not as a proper name; e.g. Ps. 31.[13]; Jr. 6.[25].

MAGUS, SIMON. When, in consequence of the persecution inaugurated by the death of Stephen, the believers were scattered abroad, Philip the Evangelist proceeded to Samaria to preach the Gospel, he found there a sorcerer in great authority named Simon. He claimed to be some one great. Hiding the special sphere of his greatness, he seems to have added mystery to his other artifices. Probably at his skilfully planned suggestion, the people declared him to be "that power of God wh. is called great" (Ac. 8.[9-13] RV.). This term had a special meaning in the teaching of Philo Judæus; the Logos had this title as the summation of all the dunameis of God. S. did not in words claim to be the Philonian Logos; indeed, if Irenæus is to be believed, his claim was to be the supreme God. This title wh. was given him may be held to imply that the Samaritans regarded him as their expected Thaheb or Messiah.

That the Samaritans expected a Messiah, whom they named Thaheb, "the one who returns," was proved by Merx's discovery of the Samaritan hymn to him. He was to conquer seven nations and bring back Judah to union with Israel, i.e. Samaria. He was not expected to be immortal, but was to live 110 years. (Hilgenfeld's Zeitsch. f. Wiss. Theol. 1894, 2tes H.)

Philip's preaching, confirmed as it was by signs following, was wonderfully successful; multitudes of the Samaritans believed, abandoning not only Simon with his claim to Messiahship, but also all hope of a conquering Samaritan Messiah. Simon himself was impressed with the works done by Philip, and professed himself a believer in Jesus and was baptized. We may not assume that S. M. was merely a hypocrite; he probably thought that Jesus was a clever goes who somehow had got in touch with higher powers than he had ever had to do with, and had taught His disciples the secret of His power. There is no sign of sorrow for sin or of joy in deliverance from it.

The arrival of the apostles Peter and John fm. Jerusalem supplied the touchstone that revealed the man. He saw the apostles laying their hands on the heads of believers and they received the Holy Ghost; presumably they had the gift of speaking with tongues bestowed upon them. This was a power that passed into another region altogether fm. anything he had hitherto aimed at; the power to give power. Hungry as he always was for power, Simon coveted this power also. He approached the apostles with the offer of money, saying, "Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay my hands he may receive the Holy Ghost." Here was belief in the reality of the spiritual power possessed by the apostles, combined with absolute ignorance as to its nature. His offer is met by scathing rebuke fm. Peter: "Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought to obtain the gift of God with money. . . . Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray the Lord if perhaps the thought of thy heart shall be forgiven thee." Awestruck by the horror of the apostle, Simon entreats Peter to pray for him, "that none of those things wh. ye have spoken come upon me." This is the last we see of Simon in Scripture.

Singularly, Professor Schmiedel makes it an objection against the authenticity of the narrative that nothing is said of the fate of the man thus cursed. If no manifest fate had overtaken him when the book was written nothing cd. be said on the matter; further, to narrate anything of the adventures that befell him wd. take the record too far fm. the matters of supreme importance. The fact that so little interest is manifested in what became of Simon proves, instead of disproving, that the narrative was approximately contemporary with the events.

Though the record of Scripture relates no more of Simon Magus, the Church Fathers tell us much; most of it unlikely, some of it impossible, though something also of truth. With the exception of the apostle Peter no individual is more prominent in the literature of the second and third Christian centuries than Simon Magus. A good many of the statements made regarding him are founded, directly or indirectly, on the evidence of Justin Martyr, himself a native of Flavia Neapolis, the ancient Shechem and modern Nāblus, a city of the province of Samaria. Justin may quite well have met old men who as youths had seen Simon and had conversed with converts of Philip. Not only does Justin refer to Simon in his two Apologies and give some particulars of his life, but in the treatise Against Heretics, wh. has not come down to us, he probably entered more fully into the life and opinions of this earliest of heretics; and fm. this work not improbably was drawn much that we find in Irenæus and Tertullian. Justin tells in his first Apology that Simon was born in Gitto, a village of Samaria, wh. may be Jit, a village six miles fm. Nāblus and five SW. fm. Sebastieh (Samaria). He accuses him of having given himself out to be a god, a statement that is corroborated by the narrative in Acts.

Justin further says that, having come to Rome in the reign of Claudius, Simon was worshipped as a god and had a statue erected to him. Justin tells exactly where it was placed—"in the Tiber river between the two bridges"; the inscription, he says, was Simoni Deo Sancto. Nearly three centuries and a half ago, a marble fragment was found wh. appeared to be a portion of the base of a statue; the place in wh. it had been dug up, too, was very similar to that described by Justin; it was in an island of the Tiber. The most striking thing was the inscription: Semoni Sanco Deo Fidio Sex. Pompeius. S.P.F. Col. Mussianus. This Semo Sancus was a deity of the Sabines, as we learn fm. Ovid's Fasti. The conclusion come to almost universally has been that Justin had, by mistake, read the dedication to the Sabine divinity as a dedication to his countryman. It is hard to imagine, as Dr. Burton (Bampton Lecture) contends, that Justin cd. make such a blunder; yet it is also difficult to avoid recognising the striking resemblance between what Justin quotes and what is found on the marble. Another solution suggests itself as at least possible; that Simon, taking advantage of the similarity of names, persuaded the people that he was the Sabine deity come to earth, and so the statue mt. be erected to him in the character of incarnation of Semo Sancus.

The next authority is Irenæus. As already remarked, in all likelihood his information was drawn fm. Justin Martyr. He gives an account of the views of Simon wh. has the look of caricature; he says that Simon found a beautiful young woman named Helena enslaved to a brothel-keeper and redeemed her. That he shd. declare her to be a reincarnation of Helen of Troy was not unnatural, but he went further, as already noted; he declared, so Irenæus says, that he himself was the Supreme God, and that this Helena was an incarnation of his primitive ennoia or creative thought of the universe—equivalent to the ideal world of Plato; that she, descending into the depth, created the angels, who in turn created the world and humanity. After this work was finished her creatures wd. not allow her to return to her father, but passed her through humiliation after humiliation, till this last degradation of public prostitution was reached. She was the "lost sheep," and he, Simon, i.e. the Divine Father, came down to earth to seek her. This appears to be the travesty of a statement in parable of the effect of sin as degrading and destroying the world as God had meant it to be; while the Divine effort towards the deliverance of the world fm. the power of sin is symbolised by the descent of the Supreme into the world, i.e. the appearance of Simon—an added lie necessitated by his claims. The evidence of Tertullian as to the teaching of Simon may be neglected, as he seems to have derived his information fm. Justin Martyr and Irenæus. The publication of the Philosophoumena of Hippolytus put all questions in regard to the opinions of Simon on a new footing, as in addition to acquaintance with what had been written previously on the matter he had studied The Great Announcement, the work in wh. Simon expounded his views. The quotation he gives fm. it exhibits at once Simon's opinions and his manner of exposition: "To you then I say what I say and write what I write. The writing is this: there are two offshoots of all the ages having neither beginning nor limit. This power is Sigē (silence), invisible, incomprehensible.

Of these offshoots one is fm. above, a great power, the Reason (nous) of all things, managing everything; it is male. The other fm. beneath is great Design, female, producing everything. Whence the others, arranged in opposing pairs, wh. each forms a conjugal union (suzugia); these exhibit an intervening space (diastēma), illimitable air, wh. has neither beginning nor limit. In this is the Father, sustaining and nourishing such things as have beginning and end. He it is who has stood, is standing, and will stand, a hermaphrodite (arsēnothēlus) power, wh. has neither beginning nor limit and is solitary. From this the Design (epinoia), proceeding forth in unity, became two. It was one, having unity in itself, isolated, but not primal: proceeding forth, an object of contemplation to itself, it became the second. Neither was he called 'father' before this power named him so." Hippolytus elsewhere credits Simon with making "fire" the first principle of all things, as did Heraclitus; and that from this proceeded three "suzugies," male and female; Reason and Design, Voice and Name, Reckoning and Reflection. In this we can recognise how Simon was the originator of Gnosticism, wh. in some forms indulged far more extensively in the device of "suzugies." From these six results a seventh, wh. he seems to regard as the Holy Ghost who moved upon the waters. At other times it seems as if he himself were this seventh, this perfect man. It is difficult to reach an intelligible view of the doctrines wh. Simon actually held. He grounded his system partly on Scripture, hence Hippolytus gives us the interpretation he offers of the different books of the law. The relation in wh. he represents himself as standing to Christ has a great deal of interest in the light of the succeeding history of opinion. He regards Jesus as the Redeemer. He says the Supreme Being, having been manifested to the Jews as Son, to the Samaritans as Father, to the Gentiles He appeared as Holy Ghost. He had a purely docetic view of our Lord's humanity. "Not being a man He appeared as a man to the Jews, and to suffer though not really suffering." S. M. thus inaugurated the long line of docetic speculation. We may omit sundry physiological speculations, in wh. Simon identifies the unfallen condition of our first parents with the condition of a child unborn. The later fathers, as Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Epiphanius, do not add anything of real value. When we rid his doctrines of the symbolic and the accretions due to possible misunderstandings we may regard his system as an attempt to produce a philosophy of religion in the terms of Christianity.

Another source of information of a sort has to be considered. Towards the very end of the second century, if not even later, there was published a religious novel of strongly Judaising tendency wh. purported to be the work of Clemens Romanus, and under cover of narrating his search for his father and mother, gives an account of the prolonged and repeated contests of the apostle Peter with Simon. It appears in two main forms, The Recognitions and The Homilies; along with these there are two Epitomes, wh. differ but little. It is a question wh. of these varying forms, if either, is to be looked upon as the primitive, or whether there was an earlier form, now lost, fm. wh. all that has come down to us has been derived. Not impossibly there was a collection of pseudo-Petrine discourses of a Judaising tendency; to ensure for these a greater popularity the story of Clement is woven about them. There are many traces that Pauline doctrine is attributed to Simon in order that it shd. be refuted under his name. This led to the idea that Simon had no existence save as a nickname of the apostle Paul. Had it not been in the interest of a theory to maintain the opposite, it wd. have been seen that the existence of Simon was as clearly proved as any truth of history. The narrative in the Acts must be admitted to be by a follower of St. Paul, although for the sake of argument we do not affirm the Lucan authorship. The admission of the Simon narrative into Acts proves him more and other than St. Paul under a nickname. The evidence of Justin Martyr itself wd. be conclusive. This view is maintained by Professor Schmiedel, who finds reason to doubt, as already mentioned, the historicity of the narrative in Acts—"that the story has no close; we are not told what in the end became of Simon." Another difficulty has been made by some who, forgetful that Simon or Simeon was one of the commonest names in Judea—there are no less than nine mentioned in the NT.—maintain that the Simon, the Cyprian Goes, who seduced Drusilla to leave her husband for Felix, was Simon Magus. It might as well be asserted that, because Iscariot was "the son of Simon," therefore Simon Peter was his father.

There are varying accounts of how S. M. died. In the Apostolic Constitutions we are told that, having by magic ascended into the heavens in a fiery chariot, Peter prayed that he might be hurled to the ground but only his leg be broken: in answer to this petition he was so precipitated to the ground, and "had his hip and ankle-bones broken." The Acts of Peter and Paul add the influence of Paul to that of Peter ere the heresiarch falls, but add also that he died, "was divided into four parts, and so perished by an evil fate," wh. the Apost. Const. does not say. Arnobius supplements the account in the Const. by saying that he was carried to Brunda (Brindisi), and when filled with shame ascended a tower and, throwing himself down, died. The earlier account of Hippolytus is that, having come to Rome, he encountered the apostles, and fearing to be convicted by them, "he said that if he were buried alive he wd. rise again on the third day. And having commanded a grave to be dug by his disciples he ordered them to bury him. They indeed did what was ordered, but he remains there till now" (Hippol. Philosoph. vi. 15).

There is a reference in the Acts of Peter and Paul to a claim of Simon's that he had been beheaded and had risen on the third day. By a trick he had substituted a ram for himself.

The Literature is extensive—all works on the Gnostic heresies, all Church Histories of any size that deal with the early Christian centuries, must take knowledge of S. M. Articles in various Biblical Cyclopædias and Dictionaries, and Commentaries on the Acts may be consulted. For original sources the Ante-Nicene Library has translations of all the Fathers of the first three cents., and all the Apocryphal writings the evidence of which is of any moment.

MAHANAIM. Many scholars deny that this name is really a dual, maintaining that it is an old locative form, meaning "camp" not "two camps."

M. is first mentioned in the hist. of Jacob (Gn. 32.[2]), where we find the parallel "Mahaneh" (v. 21, not "company," EV.). It was on the N. border of Gad (Jo. 13.[26, 30]), and was given to the Merarite Levites (21.[38]). M. was the capital of Ishbosheth's kdm. (2 S. 2.[8], &c.), and formed David's headquarters in the war with Absalom (2 S. 17.[24], &c.). Later one of Solomon's commissariat officers was stationed here (1 K. 4.[14]).

There can be little doubt that M. was in the neighbourhood of Maḥne, wh. stands on the N. bank of Wādy Maḥne, to the NE. of mod. 'Ajlūn. Not far to the SW. rises the magnificent strength of Qal'at er-Rabad, where some scholars wd. place the anct. fortress of M. No cert. identn. is, however, poss.

MAHANEH DAN. See DAN.

MAHLAH. (1) Dr. of Zelophehad (Nu. 26.[33], &c.), who, with her sisters, claimed and received her father's inheritance, being bound to marry only in their own tribe, thus keeping intact the tribal property. (2) Dr. of Hammolecheth (1 Ch. 7.[18]; AV., wrongly, "Mahalah").

MAHLI. (1) S. of Merari (Ex. 6.[19], &c.). (2) S. of Mushi, the br. of M. (1) (1 Ch. 23.[23], &c.). The priestly clan descended fm. M. s. of Merari were known as Mahlites (Nu. 3.[33], 26.[58]).

MAHLON ("sickly"), son of Elimelech and Naomi, br. of CHILION, a native of Bethlehem (Ru. 1.[1ff.]). Going with his parents and br. to Moab, on account of famine, he married RUTH the Moabitess. How long he lived is not recorded, but he was dead before their ten years' sojourn in Moab (1.[4]) was ended.

MAHOL, the fr. of Heman, Calcol, and Darda, who must have been men celebrated for wisdom: that Solomon excelled them in this respect is mentioned to his glory (1 K. 4.[31]). The Heb. word māḥōl, when it occurs elsewhere (Ps. 30.[11], 149.[3, 4]; Jr. 31.[4, 13]; La. 5.[15]), is rendered "dance." In Ps. 149.[3, 4] AVm. gives "pipe." Poss. we shd. not take it as a proper name in 1 K. 4.[31], but read "sons of dancing" or "music." They may have been skilful performers, who also distinguished themselves in original compositions.

MAIL. See ARMOUR.

MAKAZ, a town, or poss. a district, in the NW. of Judah, wh. has not been identified. The LXX quite erroneously reads Michmash (1 K. 4.[9]).

MAKHELOTH, a station in the wanderings (Nu. 33.[25f.]), not identd.

MAKKEDAH, a royal Can. city taken by Joshua (10.[10, 28]). Hither the confederate kings fled fm. the battle of Beth-horon, and hid in a great cave, whence, at Joshua's command, they were led out and slain. It lay between Beth-horon and Libnah (Jo. 10.[10, 29]), on the way leading down fm. Beth-horon (Beit 'Ūr), by way of Amwās, and across the plain. No sure ident. is poss., but it may be = mod. el-Mughār, "the Cave," on the N. bank of Wādy Qatra, the lower reach of Wādy eṣ Ṣarār, to the E. of Yebnā.

MAKTESH, "a mortar," is clearly part of Jrs., so called poss. fm. its resemblance to a mortar (Zp. 1.[11]). It may have been the upper part of the Tyropœon Valley.

MALACHI, the last of the Minor Prophets, has left no traces of his individual life. If M. is a proper name, which is uncertain, it may be a shortened form for Malachiah, "messenger of Jah," or the word may simply mean "my messenger," as in 3.[1].

The prophecy belongs to the time after the Captivity, when the Temple had been rebuilt, and the work of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah accomplished. The situation is similar to that dealt with in the bks. of Ezra and Nehemiah, and the evils wh. M. deplores are of the same nat. as those agst. wh. they had to contend. There is an old tradition, accepted by Jerome, that Ezra was the author of this bk.; but if it is anonymous it is almost certainly not his work. Such a tradition would readily grow up, owing to the similarity of the contents of the prophecy and the bk. of Ezra, and its prevalence needs no other explanation. The data are insufficient to give more than a gen. indication of the date of M. The Temple was built in B.C. 516, but it was not till 458 that Ezra came to Jrs., with the authority of the Persian k., and began the reforms recorded in the bk. bearing his name. Thirteen years later, Nehemiah appeared to correct the abuses wh. had grown up during the interval, and to induce the people to pledge themselves to keep the law. Again he visited Jrs. in 432, and found many of the old abuses still prevailing. The Levites were not receiving their dues, the Sabbath was being profaned and the Temple desecrated, and marriage with foreign ws. was prevalent. M. protested agst. all these evils, some scholars placing him before the coming of Ezra in 458, while others place him after the appearing of Nehemiah.

The feeling of the people in the time of M. was one of disillusionment, and the enthusiasm of earlier days had given place to bitterness and despair. The promises made by the earlier prophets seemed unfulfilled, and the return fm. the Captivity had not been accompanied by the clear tokens of Divine approval or of material success wh. had been anticipated. The Temple had been built, but the Messianic Age had not come, and the hope that the nations wd. come and seek their good from Jrs. had been falsified. Both priests and people were forsaking the requirements of the ceremonial law of Moses, and a spt. of scepticism and indiffc. was abroad among the community. The earlier prophets had denounced the slavish adherence to ritual, as usurping the place of the true sptl. and ethical worship of J″.; but the circumstances were now entirely altered, and M. finds it necessary to insist upon the proper observance of the ceremonial law wh. had been imposed. He looks upon the ceremonial as the expression of reverence for J″., and carelessness on the part of the people with regard to it as indicative of their neglect of J″. Himself. Not that M. teaches that the mere observance of ritual is sufficient in itself to please God, but he insists upon its value as the expression of worship, reverence, and obedience. Moreover, the Temple and its services had now a much more important place than formerly, for after the Captivity the life of the nation gathered round the sanctuary. Judah had lost its place as an independent nation, and the Temple took that place in the devout imagination wh. the chosen land had formerly held.

M.'s style is prosaic, but it is forceful in expression. His literary form is unusual in the OT., and individual questions are discussed in the form of dialogue. The prophet first states his own view, then considers the objns. wh. are offered to it, and finally gives his answer and defence. But this method, wh. M. was the first to adopt, was carried to great length by the later Jews.

M. begins his bk. by urging the people to continue to believe in their own future. Edom is destroyed and shall never rise again, but with Isr. it is difft. J″. loves Isr. (1.$^{2-5}$), but Isr. has not been faithful. The priests have been careless about what was offered God, and have made the service of God contemptible. God has greater honour fm. the heathen who blindly worship, than in this mockery of worship given by His own people (1.$^{6-14}$). The priests are warned to amend their ways, lest J″. send a curse upon them and disgrace them (2.$^{1-9}$). The people are condemned for divorcing their ws. and marrying foreigners. The cries of the divorced ws. rise to God, who will not regard any offering made by those who have sinned in this way, for He hateth putting away (2.$^{10-16}$). Some have been saying that J″. has no interest in morality, but that evil-doers prosper. M. prophesies that a day of judgment will come suddenly, to deal first with the priests and afterwards with the people (2.^{17}–3.^{6}). The people have neglected the ordinances of J″. and have robbed Him of His dues. They have brought a curse upon themselves; but if they repent God will again bless them abundantly (3.$^{7-12}$). The two classes of the nation are contrasted. The wicked say there is no distinction between good and evil and it is vain to serve God; but the faithful meet together to encourage each other in their faith. The day is coming when a clear distinction will be made, and then the evil workers shall perish (3.^{13}–4.^{3}). The prophecy closes with an appeal to all to obey the law of Moses, and with a promise that Elijah will appear to prepare the way of the Lord.

John Davidson.

MALCHAM, RV. MALCAM. (1) Son of Shaharaim, after whom a family of Benjamites were named (1 Ch. 8.^{9}). (2) The consonants forming this name occur several times elsewhere in the Heb. text, and opinion varies as to how they should be pointed. If it be pointed Milcom, it is the name of an idol of the Ammonites, ident. with Molech: if Milcam, it may mean "their king." In 2 S. 12.^{30} EV. render "their king," where prob. we ought to read "Milcom." In Jr. 49.^{3}, a passage borrowed from Amos 1.^{15}, AV. has "their king" in the text, and the proper name in the margin. RV. reverses this; so also in v. 1. In Am. 1.^{3} EV. read "their king." In all these cases the correct reading is prob. "Milcom." This is true also of Zp. 1.^{5}, where EV. have "Malcam" as a proper name, and RVm. "their king." See Molech.

MALCHIAH ("J″. is king"). (1) In Jr. 21.^{1}, 38.^{1} M. is ident. with Malchijah, of 1 Ch. 9.^{12}; Ne. 11.^{12}. (2) The king's son (RV.), or son of Hammelech (AV.), in whose house was the dungeon where Jeremiah was confined (Jr. 38.^{6}).

MALCHIJAH. Eleven persons in Scrip. seem to have borne this name. We need only mention here (1) one of those who stood at Ezra's left hand on the platform when he read the law to the people (Ne. 8.^{4}); (2) one of the nobles who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.^{3}).

MALCHI-SHUA, Saul's third son (1 S. 14.^{49}, &c.), who fell in battle with the Phil. on Mt. Gilboa (1 S. 31.^{2}, &c.). The name is also written Melchishua.

MALCHUS, a bondservant of the High Priest whose ear Peter cut off (Jn. 18.^{10}). He had a kinsman in the service (v. 26). The other evangelists mention the incident (Mw. 26.^{51}, &c.), but John alone gives the name. Luke, the physician, tells of the healing of the ear.

MALLOWS (Heb. mallūaḥ), the food of the wretched creatures who had Job in derision (30.[4], RV. "saltwort"). It is the Arb. mallūkh, a shrub with whitish leaves, broader and softer than those of the olive—the sea orache. It is found in the salt marshes. The leaves, sour to the taste, are used by the very poor as pot herbs.

Jew's Mallow

MAMMON represents the Aram. māmōnā, "wealth," or "riches" (Lk. 16.[9], &c.). Mammon (or more correctly "mamon") is personified, and set in opposition to God (Mw. 6.[24]; Lk. 16.[13]). The "mammon of unrighteousness," or "unrighteous mammon" (Lk. 16.[9, 11]), is a phrase wh. occurs in En. 63.[10]. The derivation of the word is uncertain. It was used by the Phœnicians for "gain" or "profit." It would therefore be a common word in the trade vocabulary, wh. did not require to be translated.

MAMRE. (1) The place, by the oaks of wh. Abraham pitched his tent (Gn. 13.[18], read always with RV. "oaks of M."), identified with HEBRON (Gn. 23.[19], 35.[27]). The oaks prob. marked the anct. sanctuary in the vicinity of the city. Where they stood cannot now be determined. Sozomen (HE. ii. 4) and OEJ. point to a position corresponding to Rāmat el-Khalīl, 1½ mile N. of the mosque. Others suggest a large tree 1½ mile NWW. of the mosque. This tree was broken by a storm in the winter of 1888–9, and is now dead. In later times the oaks and neighbouring well were the scene of an elaborate ritual, finally put down by the Christian emperors (Reland, Palestina, 711ff.). (2) Br. of Aner and Eshcol, an ally of Abraham (Gn. 14.[24]).

MAN stands for several Heb. words. (1) 'Ādām, M. as made fm. "the dust of the ground" ('ădāmāh); M. as "vassal," or as it is in AV., "mean man." (2) 'Aish, sometimes used for "mankind" as compared with God (Jb. 9.[32]), but more generally where there is some contrast as between M. and woman (Gn. 4.[1]), a "husband" (Gn. 3.[6]). It is opposed to (1) as "a great man" (Is. 2.[9]); as M. emphatic, "quit yourselves like men" (1 S. 4.[9]); "be a M." (1 K. 2.[2]). It is frequently used indefinitely, like "man" in German. (3) 'Ĕnōsh, "man" in his weakness (but though this is so theoretically, see Gn. 6.[4], "men of renown"), "common people" usually collective (Jb. 7.[17]), though sometimes singular (Ps. 55.[13]): fm. this form appears to come the pl. of 'aish, 'anāshim, a fact that implies that this form was primitive. (4) Gibbōr and geber, "a warrior" (1 Ch. 9.[13]; Ex. 10.[11]). (5) Mĕthīm, "men" (Dt. 2.[34]), suggesting fewness (Dt. 4.[27]). The Gr. words for M. are two, anēr and anthrōpos; the first is "man" in contradistinction to "woman" as in Mw. 14.[21], and the second "mankind," "read of all men" (2 Cor. 3.[2]).

Christian Doctrine of Man.—Christianity as a scheme of redemption involves a theory of human nature, a doctrine of man. The origin it ascribes to M. is thus given in Genesis: "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul" (2.[7]); "God created man in His own image, in the image of God created He him, male and female created He them" (1.[27]). The reader at once sees that this is a symbolic account of creation, not a scientific: the Divine source of the process and the result are placed before us, not the various phenomena that presented themselves while the process was being evolved. So, too, in the creation of woman we have the same symbolic poetic representation: "The Lord caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept; and He took one of his ribs and closed up the flesh thereof; and the rib wh. the Lord God had taken fm. man made He a woman" (Gn. 2.[21, 22]). This account of the separation of the sexes is yet further removed fm. the scientific standpoint. If we regard this as purely poetic and symbolic, wh. it certainly is, then nothing in the Darwinian hypothesis of evolution really impugns it. If we consider the Darwinian doctrine as applying merely to the phenomenology of the process of creation, and having nothing to say as to the source or purpose of it, then the two accounts may be perfectly harmonised. The "Lord God" may as really be said to have created man fm. the "dust of the ground" although between the dust and man millions of animated forms intervened, as if by plastic fiat He had spoken, and the particles gathered themselves together into a human form. It seems more in accordance with the Divine method, as we see it in other regions, that man shd. be the result of some such gradual process, than that he shd. be created by a word in a moment. It took millions of years to fit the earth to be man's dwelling-place; is it not in accordance with analogy that a similarly lengthened process wd. be employed to fit man for dwelling in it? The separation of the sexes is also very striking. Darwin maintained that "man" at the beginning was "unisexual," i.e. hermaphrodite, each individual being both male and female, as is the case in so many flowers, but that it was for the advantage of the species that the different sexual functions shd. be fulfilled by different individuals. So individuals were evolved in wh. the characteristics of one sex or the other were more and more strongly pronounced, until in each individual only one sex was potent and the other was aborted. This is a statement in scientific language of the process wh. we find pictorially exhibited in Genesis.

It is to be noted that tzēla does not mean primarily "rib" so much as "side." If we render it so, the pictorial and scientific representations are brought into yet closer harmony: God took one side of man's being and completed it into "woman"; and, closing up the flesh of the remaining side, completed it into "man." Plato has a similar speculation in the Symposium; but in his hands, artistic though they were, the picture becomes grotesque.

We have thus far considered the evolution of man's physical frame: there is, however, another element in his nature; he has mental powers as well as those of body. Here, too, there is claimed to be evolution. Some of the more rudimentary forms of animal life show the beginnings of choice, of recognition of danger, and of the means to avoid it. The higher we rise in the scale of animated being the more perfect becomes what may be called the mental equipment. Some of the higher animals have powers of adapting means to ends in unexpected circumstances that far exceed the possibilities of instinct. Darwin shows (Descent of Man, chap. 4) what he, with some plausibility, regards as the rudiments of a moral sense in some of the higher animals. Even this does not necessarily militate against the Mosaic account of the creation of the animals and man. This will be referred to below.

On one point, however, Darwin and the Biblical account of man are at absolute variance. Darwin does not believe that man is naturally religious, that "he was aboriginally endowed with the ennobling belief in the existence of an Omnipotent God," but that he rose to it by steps through fetishism. Against this the Mosaic account represents man as enjoying communion with his Creator; the representation of things in Ecclesiastes is in harmony with this: "God made man upright" (Ec. 7.[29]). So, too, in Romans, speaking of the heathen, "that wh. may be known of God is manifest in them, for God hath showed it unto them." It is now proved by archæology that the further we go back the simpler and purer we find the worship of primitive peoples. Among savage races also it is found that behind the fetishism there is, in the case of the most degraded, belief in a spiritual God who is above and before all these fetishes. This relationship to God is implied in the image of God in wh. man was made; his sonship to God: for He who was the framer of our bodies is "the Father of our spirits." This leads us to advert to the constitution of the nature of man according to Scripture; it is that man is formed of body, soul, and spirit (see Soul and Spirit). While M. had this relationship to God, he has fallen, he has sinned; he has lost the image of God; the spirit within is dead (see Sin). One branch of the subject may be merely indicated; the unity of the race. What is implied throughout Scripture is expressly stated by St. Paul on Mars' Hill; God "hath made of one blood all nations of men." The supposed reference to two races in the two names for M., or in the mysterious passage in regard to the "sons of God" and the "daughters of men," disappears on closer study.

Another part of this has to be looked at, if only for a little. We have spoken of the origin of the race: what of the individual? Did the spiritual being of each individual exist before the birth of the body? was it created by God and inbreathed into the body at birth? or is the spirit as much a heritage as the body? It was but natural that such speculative questions as these shd. not be discussed in writings so eminently practical as those wh. make up our Bible. Yet there are traces wh. seem to indicate a belief, if somewhat indefinite, in a previous existence. Thus the Preacher speaks of the "spirit returning to God who gave it" (Ec. 12.[7]), a statement wh. seems plainly to imply a previous as well as a future existence. Further, this is clearly against the Traducian view, that the human spirit is in any sense the product of ordinary generation. When in Jn. 9.[2] the disciples ask the Master, "Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" their first alternative implies a prenatal existence in wh. sin cd. be committed. The spirit that has come forth fm. God may, without undue fancifulness, be supposed to need an education to enable it to use a physical frame; this mt. be accomplished by committing to it successive frames of growing complexity. This wd. explain what seem to be the dawnings of conscience in the higher species of the lower animals. This view was shared by Plato, if we may take anamnesis in its natural meaning. There are several other doctrines wh. assume a new shape when looked at fm. this point of view. It is, however, merely speculation.

There is, however, one point in wh. the Christian view of M. differed especially fm. Greek thought. The body was not treated with contempt; it is regarded as an integral part of human nature, and the "redemption of the body" is an essential part of the redemptive work of Christ. M. is promised not merely immortality of the soul but Resurrection. We are not merely to be unclothed, to live a purely spiritual existence; we shall be clothed upon with spiritual bodies, that "mortality may be swallowed up of life." Man is considered as a social being, hence the family is consecrated and enlarged in the Church.

MAN OF SIN. See ANTICHRIST.

MANAEN (Gr. form of Heb. Menaḥem, "comforter"), one of the "prophets and teachers in Antioch" (Ac. 13.[1]), the suntrophos of Herod the tetrarch, i.e. Antipas. This does not necessarily mean that he was "foster-brother" (RV.) of the tetrarch. It does mean that he was brought up at court, and enjoyed the prince's confidence. He may have been son of that Menahem (Manaen), who prophesied to Herod the Gt. that he wd. be king (Jos. Ant. XV. x. 5), who was therefore treated with special kindness.

MANAHATH. (1) Son of Shobal, the son of Seir the Horite (Gn. 36.[23]; 1 Ch. 1.[40]). (2) A place to which the Benjamite inhabitants of Geba were carried captive (1 Ch. 8.[6])—see MANAHETHITES. This is prob. ident. with Μανοχω, added by LXX to the list of cities of Judah in Jo. 15.[59]. There it is named with Bether (Bittīr), and may be represented by the mod. Māliḥa, a considerable hill SW. of Jerusalem, not far from Bettīr. The change of "l" to "n" is not uncommon. In Jg. 20.[43], for AV. "with ease," and RV. "at their resting-place," RVm. gives "at Menuhah." If this is correct the same place may be intended.

MANAHETHITES (1 Ch. 2.[52, 54]). In the first verse RVm. gives "Menuhoth," transliterating the Heb. word; and in the second it gives "Manahathites." The latter is the preferable form in both cases. It is a gentilic noun formed from Manahath, prob. the chief town in the district occupied by the clan, half of which reckoned descent from Shobal (cp. 1 Ch. 1.[40]) and half from Salma.

MANASSEH. This name in Jg. 18.[30] is the result of scribal interference with the text. Gershom was the son of Moses. It was thought inconsistent with the dignity of that great man, and the respect due to him, to regard him as the ancestor of such a degenerate as Jonathan the priest. A נ (nun) was therefore inserted in the name "Moses" to make it read "Manasseh."

MANASSEH ("causing to forget"). (1) Elder son of Joseph (Gn. 41.[51]), to whom Jacob, who adopted him, gave the second place (48.[5, 14], &c.; cp. Dt. 33.[17]). With this agrees the position of his descts. in the host. For the strength assigned to M. at different times see NUMBERS. The position of M. in the desert march was between Ephraim and Benjamin, on the W. side of the Tabernacle (Nu. 2.[20]). The captain (RV. "prince") of the tribe was Gamaliel, son of Padahzur (Nu. 1.[10], 2.[20], &c.). Gaddi, son of Susi, represented M. among the spies. Moses gave M. a portion E. of Jordan, including N. Gilead and Bashan, conquered by Jair, Machir, and Nobah—see also HAVVOTH-JAIR (Nu. 32.[33, 39ff.], 34.[14]; Dt. 3.[13f.]). The boundaries of this portion are not given. Mahanaim, however, was on the N. border of Gad (Jo. 13.[26], cp. 13.[30]), and the W. part of the Yarmuk must have marked the S. frontier of Geshur, wh., with Maacah, formed the W. boundary of Bashan. The half tribe, thus provided for, sent its fighting men across the Jordan to assist in the conquest of W. Pal. (Jo. 1.[12], 4.[12]). The possession of Ephraim and M. on the W. of Jordan seems at first to have been undivided (Jo. 16.[1ff.], 17.[14ff.]). When the division was made, the territory of the half tribe of M. marched on the S. with Ephraim, and on the N. with Asher and Issachar, stretching W'ward to the sea, and E'ward to the Jordan (17.[7ff.]). Although within the boundaries of Issachar and Asher, Beth-shean, Ibleam, Dor, En-dor, Taanach, and Megiddo with their dependent villages, were assigned to M., but not possessed (vv. 11ff.). This chain of hostile fortresses separated M. fm. his brethren on the N. Some of the finest soil in Pal. is found on the W. slope of the mountains within these limits. Golan, the city of refuge, was in E. Manasseh (20.[8]). Ten cities in W. Manasseh were assigned to the Levites, and thirteen in the eastern portion (21.[5, 6]). The E. half tribe, returning after the conquest, took part in building the altar in the Jordan valley, wh. so nearly led to a rupture (22.). Gideon and Jephthah are the two great soldiers of M., but the men of the tribe were capable and skilful warriors (1 Ch. 5.[18], &c.). They no doubt suffered much during the Syrian wars (B.C. 900–780), and were finally carried away by Tiglath-pileser III., B.C. 733 (1 Ch. 5.[26]).

(2) Son of Hezekiah, who succeeded him at 12 yrs. of age (2 K. 21.[1]). He seems to have fallen into the power of the party of reaction agst. the reforms of his fr. The old superstitions, idolatries, and abominations were restored with the royal sanction, M. himself practising the most horrible rites and persecuting the worshippers of J″. The cup of Jerusalem's iniquity was full. The sins of M. are assigned as the reason for her final overthrow (24.[3]). Accdg. to 2 Ch. 33.[11ff.], M. was taken captive by the Asyr. In captivity he repented, and, having prayed to God, was restored to Jrs. Of this neither the writer of Kings nor Jeremiah seems to know anything. But Shrader (KAT.[2] 367f.) gives reasons, based on the monumental records, for believing that the account given in 2 Ch. may be correct (see Driver, Authority and Archæology, 114ff.). Later Judaism, however, speaks of M. only with reprobation. His long reign of 55 yrs. seems to have been uneventful—save in matters of religion—and we may infer that it was a period of prosperity. At his death he was buried in the garden of his own house (2 K. 21.[18]).

MANDRAKE (Heb. dudā'īm, "love apples," (Gn. 30.[14], &c.), the Mandragora officinarum = Arb. luffāḥ. The root is often forked, and is manipulated during growth to resemble the human figure. Fm. the middle of a rosette of dark green leaves rises a bunch of purple flowers, greatly prized for their perfume (SS. 7.[13]). The fruit when ripe is in the form of small golden-coloured apples. These are popularly supposed to act as a love potion. Many believe that when eaten they bring about conception. Natives of Pal. think that possession of the root brings good luck.

MANDRAKE

MANEH (AV. Ek. 45.[12], in Heb. the word occurs 1 K. 10.[17]; Ez. 2.[69]; Ne. 7.[71, 72]; in wh. cases it is translated "pound." The Gr. weight, mna, was derived fm. this, Lk. 19.[13, 16, 18, 20]). The passage in wh. this word occurs in AV. is somewhat difficult: "twenty shekels, five and twenty shekels, and fifteen shekels shall be your maneh." It was explained by Michaelis that there were three manehs in use, and their weight was hereby fixed. This is by no means improbable in itself. The main difficulty is that even the largest is so much less than it ought to be according to the symmetrical order of Babylonian weights, in wh. the maneh was sixty shekels and the sixtieth of a pound. This objection tells against Hitzig's explanation that the first was the gold, the second the silver, and the third the copper maneh. In itself this is not improbable. It is to be observed that the number of the shekels 20 + 25 + 15 are = 60; the statement then might be regarded as referring to subordinate weights. Another view is suggested by Dr. Davidson, that we read according to LXX (A): "The shekel shall be twenty gerahs: five shekels shall be five, and ten shekels shall be ten, and fifty shekels shall be your maneh." The fact that the latter estimate so accurately coincides with the Gr. (Attic) proportion shows that the didrachm was equal to the shekel. The Targum rendering is obviously an attempt at forcing an explanation fm. the MT. The fact that the M. is a Babylonian measure inclines us to regard the statement of the text as indicating that sixty shekels were the M.; its weight wd. be a little over 2 lbs.

MANGER (Gr. phatnē: in LXX several Heb. words are so trd.). (1) 'Ēbūs, "a cattle stall" or "crib" fm. wh. food is eaten (Jb. 39.[9]; Pr. 14.[4]; Is. 1.[3]). (2) 'Urwāh, or 'uryāh, "gathering place," or "gathered herd" (2 Ch. 32.[28]): poss. later it meant a cert. number of animals, "a pair," or "team" (1 K. 4.[26], &c.). (3) Repheth, "a stall" (Hb. 3.[17]). (4) Marbēg, "tying-up place" (1 S. 28.[24], lit. "calf of the stall"). The mod. midhwad, or manger, in Pal. is often a little hollow in the edge of the raised part of the living room, out of wh. the animals in the lower part eat. It forms quite a comfortable resting-place for a small child. Tradition says that Jesus was born in a cave near Bethlehem. Many caves, usually under the houses, are used as stables in Pal. to-day. The "mangers" are cut out of the rock at the sides (Lk. 2.[7], &c.).

MANNA, the food miraculously supplied to Isr. in the desert (Ex. 16.[15], &c.). It is described as a small round thing ("flake" RV.), that lay like hoar frost on the ground, like coriander seed, white, and tasting like wafers made with honey (16.[31]), or like bdellium, with a taste like fresh oil (Nu. 11.[8]). There was sufficient to supply all the people during the wanderings. Gathered in the morning, it wd. not keep overnight, save only on Friday (Ex. 16.[19ff.]). It cd. be ground in mill or mortar, seethed in a pot, or made into cakes (Nu. 11.[8]). The vegetable exudations, with wh. it has been sought to identify M., need not be discussed, as they fulfil none of these conditions. They can be found only part of the yr., and then in insufficient quantities. They can be kept indefinitely, but can be neither seethed nor baked.

A golden pot of M. was placed "before the Testimony" (Ex. 16.[33f.]; He. 9.[4]), not in the ark. M. is mentioned Ne. 9.[20]; Ps. 78.[24]. It is symbolical of the true bread that came down fm. heaven (Jn. 6.[31], &c.). The hidden M. rewards the victor (Rv. 2.[17]).

MANOAH, a Danite of Zorah, fr. of Samson. An angel announced the coming birth of a son to his w., and at his request appeared a second time, and instructed them as to the child. M. was stunned at the ascent of the angel in the flame of a burnt-offering prepared at his direction (Jg. 13.[2], &c.). M. died before his son (16.[31]); see SAMSON. The Manahathites of Zorah may have traced their descent fm. M. (1 Ch. 2.[54]).

MANSION occurs only in Jn. 14.[2], "In my Father's house are many mansions," as the equivalent of the Gr. μονή, wh. means lit. "dwelling-place," or "abode." By this last it is rendered in v. 23. Here, therefore, it in no way suggests the dignity and grandeur now associated with the English word. The sense of the passage is simply an assurance that for all His brethren there is room enough in the Father's house.

MANSLAYER. This term is used (Nu. 35.[6, 12]) for one who slays another by misadventure. In 1 Tm. 1.[9] androphonos mt. be trd. "murderer." See KIN.

MANTELET (Heb. ṣōkēk, lit. "covering" [AVm.], AV. "defence," RV. "mantelet," Na. 2.[5]). The word occurs only in this passage, where the prophet pictures the impending capture and destruction of Nineveh. The mantelet is to be prepared by the besiegers. Probably a movable shed is intended, such as protected the men who worked the BATTERING RAM (see Illustration to BATTERING RAM).

MANTLE. See DRESS.

MAOCH, fr. of Achish, king of Gath (1 S. 27.[2]). This is evidently another form of the name MAACAH (1 K. 2.[39]).

MAON. (1) A town in Judah named with Carmel and Ziph (Jo. 15.[55]), the home of Nabal (1 S. 25.[2]), prob. = mod. Khirbet Ma'īn, seven miles SE. of Hebron, a vill. standing on a hill, with traces of anct. walls, cisterns, and tombs. (2) A city in Edom (Jg. 10.[12]), prob. = mod. Ma'ān, on the great pilgrimage road SE. of Petra, whose inhabitants, Maonites, oppressed Isr. See MAHUNITES.

MARAH ("bitter"). (1) The first station in the wanderings, after crossing the Red Sea, where Moses healed the bitter waters (Ex. 15.[23], &c.); unidentd. (2) The name claimed by Naomi (Ru. 1.[20]), as expressing the bitterness of her lot.

MARALAH, an unidentd. town on the W. border of Zebulun (Jo. 19.[11]), Psh. Ramath-ta'le'.

MARANATHA. The Apostle Paul concludes his first Epistle to the Corinthians in his own handwriting, and inserts there (16.[22]), between an imprecation and a benediction, the Aramæan formula, maranatha. The Syriac translation takes it to represent māran athā, "Our Lord has come": but it may equally well represent māranā tā, "Our Lord, come!" (cp. Dalman, Gramm. d. jüd. palaestin. Aramäisch,[2] pp. 152, 357). This latter sense is the more natural at the end of the eucharistic prayer in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, where also it occurs; and it reminds us of the end of the Revelation (22.[20]). The expression may possibly have been the refrain of a song well known among Oriental Christians; or it may have been used as a watchword, which would best explain why the apostle gives it in Aramaic. G. H. DALMAN.

MARBLE is limestone wh. by subjection to heat or pressure, or both, has become entirely crystalline, the hard substance taking a high polish. If the limestone is pure before conversion, the marble is white: but the presence of minerals in the limestone gives rise to the various colours and markings so familiar in different kinds of marble. Among the materials collected by David for the building of the Temple were "marble stones in abundance" (1 Ch. 29.[2]). In the court of the king's garden at Shushan the palace, the many-coloured hangings were supported by pillars of marble, while the pavement was of marble, white, yellow, and black (Est. 1.[6]). The famous obelisk of Shalmaneser (see Illustration of JEHU) is of black marble. In SS. 5.[15] the legs of the beloved are compared to pillars of marble. Marble also appears as one of the commodities in which the mystical Babylon traded (Rv. 18.[12]). Marble is greatly valued in buildings of any pretensions in the East to-day, not only for its beauty but also for its cleanliness and coolness.

MARCUS. See MARK.

MARESHAH. (1) A city of Judah in the Shephelah, named with Keilah and Achzib (Jo. 15.[44]), fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.[8]), where Asa defeated Zerah the Ethiopian (14.[8ff.]), the home of the prophet Eliezer (20.[37]). It was burned by tants to remain on condition of their being circumcised (XIII. ix. 1; x. 2). Favoured by Pompey (XIV. iv. 4), it was destroyed by the Parthians (ib. xiii. 9). OEJ. places the ruins of M. two Rm. miles fm. Eleutheropolis. As a result of Dr. Bliss's work (Excavations in Pal., PEF.) M. is identd. with Tell Sandahannah, wh. "covers a small natural plateau," a mile S. of Beit Jibrīn. This identification is confirmed by discoveries made in a series of tombs, the most remarkable yet found in Pal. (PEF., Painted Tombs at Marissa). The anct. name lingers in Khirbet Mer'ash, ¾ mile to the NW. 1 Ch. 2.[42] poss. signifies that Hebron was colonised by M.

MARK, JOHN, one of the minor figures in apostolic times. John was his Jewish name: Marcus his Rm. prænomen. He is called John in Ac. 13.[5, 13]; Mark in Ac. 15.[39]; Col. 4.[10]; Phm.[24], &c.; while both names appear in Ac. 12.[25], 15.[37]. He was son of Mary, a Christian woman in Jrs., and cousin of BARNABAS. It is just poss. that in Ac. 13.[5] we shd. tr., not "J. as their attendant," but "J. the synagogue minister," wh. wd. mean that he had an official place in the synagogue. He accompanied his cousin and St. Paul on their first missionary journey; but, for reasons not stated, he turned back fm. Perga, incurring the displeasure of St. Paul. This led to the separation of St. Paul and Barnabas, the latter, with his cousin, sailing for his native island of Cyprus. M. appears again in company with Peter (1 P. 5.[13]), whose acquaintance he prob. made in his mother's house in Jrs. (cp. Ac. 12.[12]). A reconciliation was effected with St. Paul, and the apostle came to regard him with grateful affection (Col. 4.[10]; 2 Tm. 4.[11]).

Tradition fm. the time of Papias asserts that he acted as interpreter for St. Peter, and that he embodied in the second Gospel the recollections of that apostle. At a later time it was reported that he had some deformity of the hand, being called "stump-fingered." Jerome says M. died in the eighth yr. of Nero, and was buried in Alexandria (Vir. Ill. 8). There is no mention of martyrdom in connection with M. till about the end of the fourth cent., in the Acti Marci, a work of fiction written in Alexandria about that time (Lipsius).

MARK, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO. In a note on his commentary on St. Matthew's Gospel Mr. Willoughby C. Allen says: "By way of illustration of my own view, I will only say that I believe that the simple reader, who accepts the second Gospel as a nar. of literal fact, is nearer the truth than the critic who starts severely handicapped by hard-and-fast conceptions of the limitations of human personality, and who distorts nars., wh. on all other evidence are proved to be early, into late and legendary growths, because they contain a record of facts wh. his theories will not allow him to credit as historical" (Intern. Crit. Com. p. 312, note). The verdict of so distinguished a scholar, who is versed in all the Lit. of NT. criticism, is reassuring. For the second Gospel has come within the last hundred yrs. to have the foremost place among the Gospels. For many cents. it was comparatively neglected. The early Gentile Church did not appreciate its value. It preferred the first Gospel, wh. is more frequently quoted than any other. The second Gospel in the later Church was regarded as the epitome of the first and third. And so it continued to be until the rise of historical study in the beginning of last century. Gradually the originality and the freshness of this Gospel were recognised, until now it is almost universally held to be the earliest acct. of our Lord's ministry, and is looked on by many as a source for the other two. It is well that the unique value of the second Gospel has obtained such gen. recognition. The more it is studied the greater becomes its worth. Yet in it we have a picture of our Lord and His activity, of His life, death, and resurrection, wh. as strictly binds the reader to recognise the impression made by Him on His contemporaries, and specially on His disciples, as any other acct. does. Of this something will be said later.

It is not necessary to take up our limited space with an acct. of the external evidence of this Gospel. Such evidence is easily accessible, and is well presented in many bks. Nor is it necessary to speak of the evangelist, except very briefly. We know that Mark dwelt in Jrs., and that his mother had a house there (Ac. 12.[12]). She filled a conspicuous place in the Christian community. It was in her house that Peter found refuge on his release fm. prison. He was a nephew of Barnabas. He is closely associated with Paul and Barnabas in their missionary work. He was at Jrs. during the famine of 45–6, when Barnabas and Paul visited Jrs. bearing with them the alms of the Church at Antioch. He accompanied them on their return to Antioch, but left them when they ventured inland on their adventurous journey into South Galatia. We find that his name occurs in Paul's Epistles, and also he is called in the first Epistle of Peter, "Marcus my son." Mark must have had a wide and varied experience, and have been well equipped for the work of recording what he had learned in the early Church regarding the life and work of our Lord. He was in the inner circle of the Jrs. Church. He must have been often present at the weekly assemblies, and have heard the apostles as they told of the life and work of the Master. Tradition calls him the interpreter of Peter, and affirms that he went with Peter on his missionary journeys. He must have been often present, also, at the meetings of the Church at Antioch, and have heard also the tradition recited in the weekly meetings. But tradition has fastened, not on these possible ways of knowing what had been said and done by our Lord, but on his companionship with Peter. What Mark has recorded was believed to have been the distinctive testimony of Peter, as it was spoken by him in his apostolic work. In this way the Church believed that they had a Gospel of distinct apostolic authorship, and they regarded it as of apostolic authority. At the same time the probability is that Mark made good use of the tradition as it had been gathered up into the oral teaching carried on in all the churches, and from the first in the Jrs. Church. It may be that he himself took part as a catechist in teaching the new converts to Christianity in the Church in wh. his mr. was a member and his relative, Barnabas, was a leader. Apparently he had abundance of leisure, for his mr. appears to have been a lady of wealth, and his relative, Barnabas, had property wh. he gave as a free gift to the apostles for their work. At all events there is nothing improbable in the supposition that he was an active worker, and a teacher in the early Church. The oral tradition may have been familiar to him ere he took pen in hand. He had abundant opportunities of knowing it in more churches than one.

Still the main part of his Gospel may have been derived fm. Peter. We note that in the Gospel a greater fulness and precision appears when Peter is introduced on the scene. The opening part is condensed. The story of John the Baptist is shortened; the Temptation, though picturesquely and graphically told, is told in the briefest terms. And up to the time when Jesus enters into Peter's house the story bears the marks of severe condensation. Then, too, the style is not literary; it is a spoken style. It has not the severe simplicity of a literary style. It is emphatic, redundant, repetitive, the style of one who speaks so that he may make an impression on his hearers. For a hearer must catch the meaning as the speaker passes on in his talk. There is no time for him to look back and try to relate the present word with the words already spoken. A reader can look back, can pause and ponder, and lay his book down and reflect on what he has read. But a speaker must carry his audience with him, and keep the attention alive. The nar. of M., simple, direct, graphic, hurrying on fm. scene to scene and fm. incident to incident, is precisely what we shd. expect in oral tradition. It is easily remembered.

The Gospel begins without a fore-history, and its opening scene is that of the ministry of John the Baptist. A brief acct. of John's ministry leads on to the baptism of Jesus, the Temptation, and the return of Jesus to Galilee. With M. the public ministry of Jesus begins after John was cast into prison. Then comes the calling of the four disciples, and their willing response to the call. Then we are hurried on fm. scene to scene, each told in the most vivid manner, with scarce a reflection or an explanation on the part of the evangelist. Surely the most vivid and objective nar. ever written by human pen. The evangelist is never in evidence—his pen is a transparent medium through wh. we see Jesus; we see Him at work, we witness His gracious demeanour, we are allowed to see His emotions, His compassion, His patience, and His beneficence. The motto of Mark's Gospel mt. well be said to be that wh. Peter spoke to Cornelius, "Jesus of Nazareth, how that God anointed Him with the Holy Ghost and with power: who went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil: for God was with Him" (Ac. 10.38). The coincidence is remarkable, but need not be dwelt on here.

Read this Gospel through consecutively, and note the progress of events as you follow Jesus fm. place to place. The development is simple; the order followed is that of the journeys made by Jesus and His disciples fm. time to time, and fm. place to place. We are with Him first at Capernaum, and note what takes place in the synagogue. We pass with Him into the house of Peter, and "At evening when the sun was set" (how careful the writer is to note that the Sabbath was over, and the people mt. attend to things they cd. not attend to on the Sabbath), "all the people were gathered together at the door." Then away to a desert place whither He had gone for rest and prayer. Then away to other cities also, "for to this end am I come forth." He went about doing good, healing the leper, and then we find Him again at Capernaum. So the wondrous story goes on, in simple, natural fashion, without any reflection on the part of the writer. Sometimes we come on a marvellous sentence wh. is not appropriated by the other evangelists, as "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath," a sentence wh. carries its own authorship on its face. It is not poss. to enter into detail, but we may note that for a time He was popular, and the impression made on the people was great. "They were all amazed, and glorified God, saying, We never saw it on this fashion" (2.[12]). But His ideals were very difft. fm. those of the people, and quite difft. fm. those of the ruling classes. The rupture speedily came, and after the healing of the man with the withered hand, and the discussion wh. followed, it is said, "The Pharisees went out, and straightway with the Herodians took counsel agst. Him, how they might destroy Him" (3.[6]). It is a decisive moment, and a really momentous event in the hist. of our Lord, and it is simply and quietly told. It is only on reflection and on close examination that a reader perceives the significance of the alliance between the Pharisees and the Herodians, and its result on the work of Jesus. This is pointed out with great felicity and power by Professor Burkitt (The Gospel History, chap. c). This is one of the best chapters in his worthy work. In it he points out that here was the parting of the ways, that fm. this time Jesus began to organise His followers into an organisation wh. was destined to develop into the Christian Church. "He no longer preaches in the synagogues, save once (and that unsuccessfully), in His own home at Nazareth, and for the rest of His ministry His main efforts are directed towards preparing His disciples for the trials that are in store for Him and them" (p. 69). The whole chap. deserves and will reward careful study. Consistent with this concentration of His attention on His disciples and their training is the teaching in parables, of wh. teaching M. gives a sample in the fourth chap. of the Gospel: "Unto you is given the mystery of the kdm. of God: but unto them that are without, all things are done in parables: that seeing they may see and not perceive, and hearing they may hear and not understand; lest haply they shd. turn again, and it shd. be forgiven them" (4.[11f.]). Leaving the exact exegesis of this statement without discussion at present, we call attention to the fact that it is coincident with the rupture with the ruling powers, civil and ecclesiastical, and with His determination to give Himself to the training of His disciples.

The rupture grows more and more significant as we pass on to the immediately following chaps.

The alliance between the Pharisees and the Herodians becomes something deeper and wider, and it grows until it brings together the civil and the religious powers of the tetrarchy of Herod. Jesus went round the villages teaching. And Herod heard of Him and His work, and of the work done by the disciples in their missionary tour. Here Mark pauses to tell us of Herod, and of the reason why he was disturbed at the news. He tells us of the death of John the Baptist, and of the share wh. Herod and others had in bringing it about. Herod asks in his trouble what these things mt. mean, and the memory of his crime, working together with his native superstition, causes him to say, "John the Baptist is risen fm. the dead, and therefore do these powers work in him" (6.[14]). It is not said by M. that Herod took any overt steps agst. Jesus. But that such was the case seems to be an assumption wh. underlies the whole story. For when the disciples returned fm. their missionary journey, Jesus took them apart for rest, and really took them outside of the dominions of Herod. We again refer to the masterly discussion of Professor Burkitt. We may refer also to the map of the journeyings of Jesus, in wh. it is clearly shown that in these journeyings He strictly avoided the dominions of Herod. It was not safe for Jesus and His disciples to remain in the place over wh. Herod had power. We have not space to trace the outline of the journeyings, but we may express our thanks to Professor Burkitt for his demonstration of the historical char. of the second Gospel, and of how it is related to the hist. of the time.

We call attention to another fact of great significance. Wellhausen, in his Introduction to the three first Gospels, has called attention to a section in Mark's Gospel wh. has a distinctive char. of its own. He refers to the section fm. chap. 8.[27] to chap. 10.[45]. Most commentators have dwelt on the characteristic note of these chapters, but none with such emphasis as Wellhausen, and we may be grateful to him for his emphasis. No doubt he lays emphasis on these sections for purposes of his own. Yet the emphasis is just. These sections of the Gospel do lay stress on the person of Jesus, on His calling, on His work, on the near approach of sorrow, suffering, and death. It is the Christian Gospel, and because it contains just such a Gospel it cannot, says Wellhausen, be historical. What is reflected here is not the historical situation of Jesus, it is the situation of the martyred Church. Jesus transports Himself into His own future and into the future of the Church, wh. presuppose His death and resurrection, and this He cannot have done.

We may be grateful to Wellhausen for this emphatic way of calling attention to the facts, because it enables us more completely to vindicate the historical char. of the Gospel. These sections of the Gospel represent the situation as it was while Jesus was a wanderer outside the dominions of Herod. He is an exile. He was conscious that His aims and purposes were in utter opposition to the aims and purposes of the ruling classes, and the people of His time. He was an exile, in fear of His life, and the feeling of martyrdom was in His heart, as it was in the heart of His persecuted Church at a later time. He foresaw the issue to that conflict. It was to end in Gethsemane and Calvary. Is it any wonder that in these wanderings outside the dominions of Herod, while He was an exile, He shd. set Himself to think out the situation, and see it as it was, and as it was bound to become, and set Himself to instruct His disciples accordingly; and also more fully to prepare Himself for the imminent crisis?

It is appropriate that in this time of exile, and after He had elicited the confession of Peter, He shd. have begun "to teach them that the Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again" (8.[31]). From this time forth Jesus frequently warns His disciples of the decease wh. He should accomplish at Jrs. The refcs. to this are frequent in the Gospel. And the disciples did not understand or comprehend His statements. That the Messiah shd. be a suffering Messiah was a conception in the mind of Jesus alone at that time. The disciples cd. not get rid of the popular conception of the Messiah, nor cd. they ever associate sorrow, suffering, or death with the coming One. Hence the despair wh. overtook them when the events happened wh. He had predicted.

The tension of the situation increases, and on the last journey to Jrs. it becomes almost unsupportable. It has its effect on Himself, and in an inferior degree on the disciples. At last He is in Jrs., He is betrayed, captured, tried, condemned and crucified. He is buried, and on the third day He arose fm. the dead. All these things are simply, graphically, and in terrible simplicity described. So also is the story of the resurrection and of His meetings with His disciples. The close of the story is lacking in the best MSS., and the present conclusion seems to be by a later hand. Enough remains to show that the resurrection was a fact, and that it had an unspeakable influence on the disciples, raising them as it did fm. despair to hope, fm. despondence to courage and enterprise, and sending them forth on that amazing career wh. transformed the world, and presented to humanity a new ideal. These things may be learnt fm. this early Gospel. It wd. be well to read this Gospel by itself, and to repeat for ourselves the experiment made by Dr. Bennett in his excellent book, The Life of Christ according to St. Mark. It is a book of surprising freshness and power, and we rise fm. its perusal filled with gratitude to St. Mark. For one thing, it seems to bring our Lord nearer to us. It helps us to realise how true a man He was, how greatly He shared our nature. He was not impassive; He was touched with a feeling of our infirmities; He felt sorrow, disappointment, anger; and He worked as other men work, and grew wearied as other men. Then, too, Mark enables us to see that the Lord cd. do His wondrous works, not instantaneously, but slowly and gradually, so that by the use of means He cd. quicken the man into a livelier faith. See in particular the two miracles peculiar to this Gospel, 7.[30] and 8.[22]. But, while the real humanity of our Lord is manifested so conspicuously, we are never left with the impression that He was altogether like other men. While He is one with them, He is also apart. We are made to feel that He is in a relation to God altogether unique and peculiar. Jesus has a place in the religion of M. wh. cd. be held by no other. He is Himself the glad tidings wh. He proclaims. He is the obj. of religious faith. Throughout the Gospel we feel that the writer feels and is persuaded that the true way of saving men is to enable them to see Jesus as He lived, walked, and laboured among men. Nor can we forget that the Jesus about whom M. wrote, was to Him the risen and exalted Lord, who was at the right hand of the Father, and also the Jesus who had walked in Pal. This Jesus is the Son of God, to whom the Divine voice spoke at His baptism: "Thou art My beloved Son, in Thee I am well pleased." Fm. that hour He was all that in the faith and experience of Christians He ever came to be. But He cd. not tell what He was as one can impart a piece of indifferent information to another. He had to reveal Himself as what He was in life and word and works: He had to be discovered as what He was by men who associated with Him in obedience, trust, and love. The truncated form in wh. the Gospel has come to us, with no resurrection scene, and no words of the risen Lord, prevents us fm. seeing as directly in Mark as we do in the other evangelists the full scope of the writer's faith. But we have seen what he means by the term Gospel, and know fm. words wh. he ascribes to Jesus that he believed the Gospel to be meant for all mankind (13.[10], 14.[9]). "Jesus exalted as Lord and Saviour of all, the Jesus whom the evangelist can exhibit to us in this char. even in the days of His flesh, is the same incomparable and incommensurable Person whom we meet everywhere in NT. religion" (Dr. Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, pp. 60, 61).

MARKET, RV. MARKET-PLACE, appears only in OT. Ek. 27.[13]; RV. "merchandise." In NT. M. represents Gr. agora, "place of meeting." It was usually an open space or square where assemblies for various purposes were held (Ac. 16.[19], &c.), where goods were exposed for sale (Mk. 7.[4]), and children found room to play (Mw. 11.[16], &c.).

MAROTH ("bitterness"), a town mentioned by Micah (1.[12]). Other towns named in the same passage—Gath, Saphir, Moresheth-gath—seem to point to some position in the Philistine plain: but no identification is possible.

MARRIAGE. The original charter of M. as a Divine institution is found in Gn. 2.[24]. In the NT. it is confirmed by Christ Himself (Mw. 19.[4-6]), and a deeper sacredness attached to the bond; while also to honour a M. feast He wrought His first miracle (Jn. 2.). The OT. and NT. ordinances are monogamic in principle. The lapses of mankind into polygamy, chiefly in the patriarchal times and in the middle ages of Isr.'s hist. (Gn. 16.[4], 25.[1-6], 28.[9], 29.[23, 28]; 1 Ch. 3.[1-9], 7.[14]), were "winked at," and the continuation of the system permitted, but the evils of polygamy were fm. time to time made manifest, as in the cases of Abraham (Gn. 21.[11]) and Elkanah (1 S. 1.[6]), while we find repeated reversions to monogamy, a notable case being that of Noah (Gn. 7.[13]). In nearly all cases the rule of monogamy was recognised in the position given to the first wife. In post-exilic times monogamy was prevalent (Jb. 2.[9f.]; Su. vv. 29, 63), and not a single case of polygamy is mentioned till the time of Herod the Great. He is reported to have had several wives at the same time. In NT. days monogamy was also the rule (Mw. 18.[25];

Market Place, Jaffa

Lk. 1.[5]; Ac. 5.[1]). The remarkable statement in Is. 4.[1] is not to be regarded as having anything to do with the present question. It is merely a poetic explanation of the reduction of the male population through the ravages of war. Rabbinical Judaism made much of the first command in Scrip. (Gn. 1.[28]), and strongly insisted on the duty of M., declaring that the man without a wife was not a man, and was among the excommunicated of heaven. At the same time they disapproved of polygamy. They advise a man not to marry two wives, but tell him, if he has done so, that he ought to marry a third who will reveal their intrigues (Pes. 113b). On the other hand there arose between the OT. and NT. times new ideas of asceticism, including the teaching of abstinence from M. In Palestine the Essenes, a sect akin to the Therapeutæ of Egypt, followed such practices. They are interesting as having influenced several sects in the first and second cents., but the little that is to be known of them is found only in Josephus, Philo, and incidental refcs. in the Talmud.

Limitations of Choice.—With non-Isrs. there were three degrees of limitation as to choice of a partner in M. (1) Isr. men and women were absolutely prohibited fm. entering into any M. relationship with the Can., on the ground that such was certain to lead to idolatry (Ex. 34.[16]; Dt. 7.[3f.]). (2) Ammonite and Moabite men were excluded fm. M. with Heb. women (Dt. 23.[3]), but Isr. men might marry Moabite women (Ru. 1.[4]). (3) The relationship to the Edomite and the Egyptian was of a similar nature but less stringent (Dt. 23.[7f.]). Proselytism was not a sine qua non in the case of a wife, but was in the case of a husband (cp. 2 Cor. 6.[14, 17]). The child born of an illegal M. was designated mamzer (Dt. 23.[2]). The prohibitions between Isr. men and women were dependent on consanguinity and affinity (Lv. 18.[6-18], 20.[11-21]), and the various degrees are given in detail, with the various punishments for violations. Kinship, however, cannot be regarded as the moral reason for these restrictions, as such marriages were not considered invalid in patriarchal times (Gn. 20.[12]; Ex. 6.[20]). To the Scrip. lists the rabbis added the wife of the fr.'s uterine br., and the mr.'s br.'s wife. A remarkable exception to these limitations is the case of the levirate M., in wh. a man was required to marry his br.'s widow when she had been left childless. It is first mentioned in Gn. 38.[8], and is comprised in the Mosaic economy (Dt. 25.[5-9]). It was a case of this kind in wh. the Sadducees, with their hair-splitting art, tried to entrap the Lord (Mw. 22.[23-30]). The levirate M., being connected with territorial succession, became useless when Isr. ceased to be a nation in Pal., so the custom was allowed to lapse by the rabbis, who instead ordained that the responsible party shd. give the widow a "bill of divorcement," a regulation still in use.

It is to be noted that the prohibition of M. with the wife's sr. in Lv. 18.[18] is "during her life." The question of M. with a deceased wife's sr. must be settled on other grounds, and if rejected, it must be by analogy fm. the prohibition on act. of affinity.

Special limitations were imposed on the High Priest, who was limited in his choice to a virgin Isr. (Lv. 21.[13, 14]). The ordinary priests had more freedom, but were not allowed to marry prostitutes or divorced women (Lv. 21.[7]). To prevent the alienation of tribal lands also heiresses had to marry within their own tribe (Nu. 36.[5-9]; To. 7.[10]).

The reasons for the gen. prohibition noted have been ascribed to (1) the preservation of moral propriety among those living in the same family circles; (2) social convenience, as the prevention of domestic jealousies and disturbances; (3) to prevent sympathy with or participation in heathen practices, and thus to preserve Isr. a peculiar people (Lv. 18.[3]).

In the Christian Church bishops or elders and deacons were required to be the husband of one wife (1 Tm. 3.[2, 12]). This regulation has been considered ambiguous, and has been interpreted as prohibiting a second M. in the case of these office-bearers. The likelihood, however, is that, in view of the condition of the world then, the regulation meant that such functionaries shd. be chosen fm. men who were leading monogamous lives. Christianity did not create violent ruptures with social conditions, but such an arrangement wd. be a suitable first step in leading the Church and the world to a universal monogamy; and the very ambiguity suggests that the apostle was not introducing something entirely new, for in such a case he must of necessity have been more explicit.

Betrothal.—This is called espousal in the Bible. The age at wh. it cd. take place was, of course, determined by that at wh. M. was allowed. In the Bible no particular age is fixed for this latter event, but early marriages are approved (Pr. 2.[17], 5.[18]; Is. 62.[5]). The Tlm., however, allows girls to be married at the age of 12 yrs. and 1 day, and boys when 13 and 1 day old, but gives the gen. age as eighteen (Aboth, v. 21); and, as a yr. was the usual time between the betrothal and M. in the case of virgins, and a month in the case of widows, we can thus fix the earliest possible date of affiance. The selection of a bride for a marriageable youth was very often made by the relatives of his family, but in connection with this and the carrying through of all the arrangements till the conclusion of the M. ceremony the responsible and active duties fell upon the friend of the bridegroom (Jn. 3.[29]), who is named in Heb. shoshĕbīn, and in Gr. paranymph. He was gen. the youth who had been the chief companion of the prospective bridegroom during his youthful days, and so understood to be acquainted with his tastes and wishes. It was his duty to be mediator between the two families, to arrange the contract, to fix the amount of the bride's dowry (mohar) and the presents (mattan) to her relatives (Gn. 34.[12]), and to make sure that all was done with the full kge. of each party (M. Baba Bathra, x. 4). The dowry was nat. in proportion to the rank of the bride, so that as a rule a poor man cd. not marry a rich wife (cp. 1 S. 18.[23]). As early as the days of the Judges (14.[20]) we find mention of this friend or companion, and the Tg. in this place as well as in 2 S. 13.[3] uses the word shoshĕbin. There were in Judea often two such friends, one fm. the relations of each family, but in Galilee this custom was not common (Kethuvoth, 12a): indeed they commonly had none, but it wd. seem that the governor of the feast at the M. at Cana of Galilee (Jn. 2.[8]) acted this part.

Matrimonial unions, however, for the sake of money are spoken agst., and the children of such are said to be unruly (Kidd. 70a). The consent of the girl was sometimes asked (Gn. 24.[58]; Kidd. 41a), but it was subordinate to the will of others (Gn. 24.[51], 34.[11]); and in the Tlm. free unions are also spoken agst. (Kidd. 12b). When the arrangements were all completed they were usually confirmed by an oath and followed by a family feast. Between betrothal and M. all communications between the bridegroom and the bride were carried on through the friend of the bridegroom. During this period also the bride was theoretically a wife, and therefore, if unfaithful, the punishment was death (Dt. 22.[23, 24]); but in such a case the husband had still the option of simply divorcing her (Dt. 24.[1]; Mw. 1.[19]).

Wedding Ceremonies.—The Mosaic law prescribes no ritual of M., but that a good deal of ceremonial gathered round the event we have ample proof. The essence of the ceremonial consisted in the removal of the bride fm. her fr.'s house to that of the bridegroom; but with this there seems to have been united fm. the first some formal ratification with an oath (Pr. 2.[17]; Ek. 16.[8]; Ml. 2.[14]), and a blessing pronounced (Gn. 24.[60]; To. 7.[12]); and there soon gathered round it a good deal of ritual, display, and rejoicing. Rabbinical Judaism, however, recognised that a woman might become a wife by the reception of money to that effect, by mutual consent, or by the execution of a deed (Kidd. 1a). The practice among the Jews was that virgins be married on Wednesday (modern Judaism also allows Friday), and widows on Thursday (M. Kethuvoth, i. 1), and the time usually fixed was sunset. At this time modern Jewish weddings are celebrated. This differs somewhat fm. the refces. we meet with in the NT., but modifications have been made by all the sects: still, modern customs, Jewish, Christian, and Moslem, enable us to understand these. The Oriental love of display comes out chiefly in the adornment, and the dressing of the bride and bridegroom are special ceremonies in themselves. The bride takes a preparatory bath (Ek. 23.[40]; Eph. 5.[26, 27]), and sometimes this lasts for hours. She is then adorned, and sometimes this is a laborious process as, esp. in the more secluded places, she is clothed with her whole trousseau, dress above dress. Except in the case of those who imitate western customs, the bride, too, is heavily veiled (Gn. 24.[65], 38.[14, 15]), and deception is not unfrequently practised even yet (Gn. 29.[23]). Jewish brides are invariably adorned with great quantities of jewels (Is. 49.[18], 61.[10]; Rv. 21.[2]), many of wh. are borrowed or hired for the occasion; while embroidery in gold and silver (Ps. 45.[13, 14]) is very common. Perfumery, too, is used (Ps. 45.[8]), but in quantities far exceeding the bounds of good taste. The veil of the Heb. bride was designated tzārīph (see DRESS), and it is this that is referred to in 1 Cor. 11.[10] as the sign of submission. The girdle also, or qishshur, was usually of fine embroidered work, an object of joy to the bride (Jer. 2.[32]). Last of all she was crowned with a chaplet which gave her the name of kallah, and from which usage the modern Arabic wedding is also designated iklīl or crowning. In the case of the M. of a virgin she usually had the hair left loose, and was dressed in a white robe (Rv. 19.[8]). While the bride is being adorned by her maiden companions, the bridegroom has also been so treated by his friends. He is likewise perfumed (SS. 3.[6]), and in old times the head-dress wh. has now disappeared was a kind of nuptial crown (SS. 3.[11]; Is. 61.[10]) called pe'er. That an hour has been fixed for the M. does not by any means imply that the ceremony takes place at that time. In both houses songs such as we meet with in the Song of Songs, descriptive of the love and beauty of the young pair, are sung to native instrumental music. Either two sets of musicians are engaged, or the one company passes back and forward. The bride and the bridegroom are expected to exhibit a modest reluctance to face the crisis, and so the weary hours drag on, till often near midnight the bridegroom, the shoshĕbīn, and friends set out (Mw. 9.[15]; Jg. 14.[11]), guided by lanterns (Mw. 25.[7]; cp. Rv. 18.[23]),* and accompanied by music (Gn. 31.[27]; Jr. 7.[34], 16.[9]), to the house where the bride and her maidens have awaited (Mw. 25.[6]). Practically the whole neighbourhood comes out to applaud (SS. 3.[11]), and members of the bride's party may meet them on the way (Mw. 25.[6]).

A young Heb. couple's M. ceremony is carried through in the open court of the bride's house, or a court hired for the occasion. They are placed side by side under the ḥuppāh (Ps. 19.[5]; Jl. 2.[16]) or M. canopy, sometimes translated as if meaning "bride-chamber." The chief rabbi present prays, the M. contract, in use since the Captivity (Kethuv. v. 1), is read, and then the blessing is pronounced, and the young pair, having each drunk fm. one wine-glass, are considered to be married. At this moment a glass, specially provided for the purpose, is broken, and the company shout out the words of Ps. 124.[7b]. It is then that the bridegroom cometh forth fm. his chamber, and that the friend of the bridegroom, hearing his voice (Jn. 3.[29]), in response to the congratulatory greetings, rejoices in his own work effectively and joyfully concluded. Various kinds of festivities, over wh. the bridegroom's friend presides, now follow (Gn. 29.[22]; Mw. 22.[1-10]; Lk. 14.[8]; Jn. 2.[2]), and varied entertainments in addition to music are indulged in (Jg. 14.[12]). In the case of Jews the feasting gen. lasts seven days (Jg. 14.[12]; To. 8.[19]), and during this time, but gen. on the day of the M., the bride is conducted to her husband's dwelling (Ps. 45.[15]) to the noise of the Oriental sound of joy known as the zagharīt. The Tlm. says that the M. blessing is pronounced by God Himself (Ber. Rab. 8), that matrimonial unions are formed by God (Moed Katon, 18b, based on Jg. 14.[4]; Pr. 19.[14]), and that angels guard the bridal bed (Ab. R. Nath. iv., xii.).

* The Tlm. mentions that ten were carried (Chal. ii. 8).

There is no actual trace of M. rings in the OT, but since they were regarded as tokens of fidelity (Gn. 41.[42]) and adoption (Lk. 15.[22]), and are met with throughout the whole hist., we cannot doubt they were in early use in this connection also.

The newly married man, like the newly betrothed (Dt. 20.[7]), was free fm. military service, and this exemption lasted for one yr. (Dt. 24.[5]). The duties and relationships of married life were practically those of the East to-day, and they only come out incidentally in Scrip. (Gn. 18.[6]; Ex. 21.[10]; 2 S. 13.[8]). The ideal wife is God's gift, and in contrast with brawling wives (Pr. 19.[13], 21.[9, 19], 27.[15]), her qualifications are beautifully set forth in Pr. 31.[10-31]. The NT. contains many exhortations to mutual forbearance and love (Eph. 5.[22, 23]; Col. 3.[18, 19]; Tt. 2.[4, 5]; 1 P. 3.[1-7]); but on the whole the picture is the same.

The social position of women was equal to the highest in the East to-day. They went about freely, unveiled (Gn. 12.[14], 24.[16, 63], 29.[11]; 1 S. 1.[13]), and they were even allowed to hold important offices (Ex. 15.[20]; 1 S. 18.[6-7]), and enjoyed a good deal of independence (Jg. 4.[18]; 1 S. 25.[14]; 2 K. 4.[8]). A man was in duty bound to honour his wife (Bab. Meh. 59a), but as her property became his on marriage (Kidd. ix. 1, &c.), and as there was great facility of divorce, there was the need of her being protected agst. it, or provided for in case of it, in the matter of dowry, the one essential in the M. contract. This gen. consisted of the amount the bride brought, together with an equal sum fm. the bridegroom, increased by 50 per cent., and this the husband was bound to pay his wife if he put her away.

In Galilee the marriage arrangements were carried through with better taste than in Judea (Kethuv. 12a). Indeed in the south there were a number of departures fm. propriety so serious that we could not even think of the Lord Jesus attending a M. there as He did in Galilee.

Dissolution of Marriage.—Though only one instance of divorce is recorded in the days of the patriarchs (Gn. 21.[14]), it seems to have been prevalent (cp. Code of Ḥammurabi, 137–143); and the Mosaic laws are intended to mitigate the evils and bring its operation under restraint (Dt. 24.[1-4]), in certain circumstances taking away altogether the power of divorce fm. the husband (Dt. 22.[19, 29]). The law of Moses mentions as the ground of divorce "some uncleanness," and it is to be noted that this must mean something less than actual fornication, as the punishment in that case was death (Lv. 20.[10]; Jn. 8.[5]). Just before NT. days the schools of Hillel and Shammai differed in their interpretation of this law. Shammai limited its operation to moral transgression, while Hillel allowed divorce "for every cause," e.g., allowing the food to be burned, or reproaching her husband in a loud voice; and it was in connection with such disputes between the two schools that an attempt was made to make Christ a party (Mw. 19.[3]). The giving of a bill of divorce required in OT. times the presence of Levites (Is. 50.[1]; Jr. 3.[8]), just as in modern times it has to be done through the rabbis; and thereafter the divorced wife was free to marry whom she pleased; but in the event of the second husband's death she cd. not return to the first (Dt. 24.[2-4]). A woman might be divorced with or without her consent, but the husband could in no case be compelled to divorce his wife (Gitt. 49b). With the consent of the husband, however, divorce might be obtained at the instance of the wife (Mk. 10.[12]; 1 Cor. 7.[11]), and this is recognised in the Tlm. too, though in such a case she lost her dowry. The NT. is much more definite on moral relationships than either the OT. or rabbinical teaching. It condemns altogether not only adultery but even fornication, wh. many considered as quite indifferent (Ac. 15.[20]). It aims at the restriction of divorce and the prohibition of the marriage of the guilty party (Mw. 5.[32], 19.[9]; Rm. 7.[3]; 1 Cor. 7.[10, 11]), and regards sexual immorality (Mw. 5.[32], 19.[9]) or persistent desertion (1 Cor. 7.[15]) as the only lawful grounds for the dissolution of marriage.

Symbolical.—M. is used in the OT. as a symbol of the sptl. relationship between God and the Isr. This may be seen very clearly in the prophets Hosea, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, but fm. the earliest days of Isr.'s hist. the same thought meets us. To serve other gods is described as whoredom (Lv. 20.[6]), and to go a-whoring. This may have come about fm. the fact that it was gen. also literally true, as such services almost invariably embraced licentious rites of the same nat. as those practised to this day in Syria: as, e.g., in the service of Baal-Hamon on Mt. Casius beside Antioch.

In the NT. the application is made to the relationship between Christ and the Church. Christ is the bridegroom (Mw. 9.[15]; Jn. 3.[29]); the Church is the bride (2 Cor. 11.[2]; Rv. 22.[17]); while the consummation of all things is the M. supper of the Lamb (Rv. 19.[7-9]). In the bk. of Revelation, too, the Church appears, according to its state of apostasy or fidelity, as a woman (12.[1]), a whore (17.[1]), a bride, and a wife (21.[9]). WM. M. CHRISTIE.

MARSHAL. This is the RV. rendering of two Heb. words. (1) Ṣōphēr in Jg. 5.[14], where RV. "they that handle the marshal's staff" seems more appropriate than "they that handle the pen of the writer" (AV.). "Scribe" is indeed the usual meaning of sōphēr, but shēbeṭ (rod, staff, club, sceptre) cannot mean "pen." Ṣōphēr here corresponds to the γραμματεύς, "marshal," of 1 M. 5.[42], and the shēbeṭ is his truncheon, or baton. Ṣōphēr has this meaning of marshal or muster-officer in 2 K. 25.[19]; 2 Ch. 26.[11]. (2) Ṭiphṣār, wh. is prob. the Bab.-Asyr. dupsarru, "tablet writer," but the meaning is uncertain. A military officer is intended in Jr. 51.[27] (AV. "captain"), and also in Na. 3.[17] (where the form is ṭaphsēr; RVm. "scribes").

MARS' HILL. See AREOPAGUS.

MARTHA, sister of MARY and LAZARUS of BETHANY (Lk. 10.[38]; Jn. 11.[1-5, 19-39], 12.[2]). The name is Aramaic, meaning "the lady": on this ground some have fancifully suggested that she may be "the elect lady" of 2 Jn.[1]. The fact that she served at the feast in "the house of Simon the Leper," while her brother sat at table, has been held to show that she was the wife or widow of Simon.

The notices preserved of Martha present a consistent character, vividly contrasted with that of her sister MARY. She was of an anxious disposition, taking a heavy lift of the work requiring to be done, and, feeling the burden, apt to be "troubled" with others who took life more calmly. In His kindly response to her complaint about Mary's inactivity, Jesus shows how well He understood her. "Martha, Martha," He says, and without detracting from the value of the service in wh. she is absorbed, encourages her to find deliverance from this engrossment by seeking for what is best.* It is the same practically minded Martha who reasons with Jesus as to the advisability of opening Lazarus' grave, and who "serves" at the feast where Mary breaks the box of ointment.

An interesting and picturesque tradition represents Martha with Mary and Lazarus as put out to sea during the persecution (Ac. 8.[1]) in an open boat, without oar or sail, with neither food nor drink. They drifted to land near Marseilles, and did great things for the spread of Christianity in the south of France. Martha was buried at St. Baume. The tradition may be traced to the fact mentioned by Plutarch (Marius, 414), that a Syrian prophetess, Martha by name, accompanied Marius in his victorious campaign against the Cimbri and Teutones in Provence. There Marius and Martha are still popular Christian names (Hall, Romans on the Riviera, 121).

MARTYR. The Gr. word μάρτυς, from a Sanscrit root meaning "to remember," is used in NT. of one who gives evidence of what he personally knows, usually by way of supporting or confirming something (2 Cor. 1.[23], &c.), but also of one who makes an assertion on his own authority (Ac. 6.[13], &c.). The μάρτυρες are they who declare the truth concerning Christ, confirming it by their own experience (Ac. 5.[32]). μάρτυς also denotes one who has suffered death for his confession of Christ (Ac. 22.[20]; Rv. 2.[13], 17.[6]). This, however, does not mean that their dying was their witness; but only that their testifying led to their death. The sense now attached to our word "martyr" is not found in the NT. but only in later ecclesiastical Greek. In the Apocalypse Jesus Christ is called the faithful and true μάρτυς (1.[5,] 3.[14]), i.e. "He who gives the information contained in the Apc. concerning the things wh. must shortly come to pass (1.[1f.])" (Cremer, Lex. NT. Greek, s.v.).

* The numerous dishes enjoined by Eastern hospitality, and the mental absorption implied in their preparation, give point to our Lord's statement, "But one thing—i.e. one dish—is needful," to one who has seen an Oriental entertainment. Our Lord seeks to impress upon her the higher hospitality of the listening ear and the inquiring spirit.

MARY. If distinct persons are intended in all cases where the name Mary occurs with different designations, then eight Maries are mentioned in the NT. 1. Mary the mother of Jesus. 2. Mary Magdalene. 3. Mary the mother of James and Joses. 4. "The other Mary" (Mw. 27.[61], 28.[1]). 5. Mary the wife (daughter ?) of Cleophas. 6. Mary the sister of Martha and Lazarus. 7. Mary the mother of John Mark. 8. Mary saluted by St. Paul, as resident in Rome. 3, 4, and 5 probably denote the same person, and it is not impossible that 7 and 8 are one and the same. If these identifications are accepted, the number is reduced to five, or at most six.

The name is the Gr. form of the Heb. Miriam. It was extremely popular in the days of our Lord's earthly ministry. In the form of Mariamne it was borne by two of Herod's wives, a grand-niece and a great-granddaughter.

I. Mary the Mother of Jesus.—The NT. tells us nothing of Mary's immediate parentage. The Apocryphal Gospels, that narrate the Nativity, say that she was the dr. of Joachim and his wife Anna, born to them, miraculously, in their old age. Tradition still points out their house in Sepphoris, the mod. Ṣaffūrieh, to the N. of Nazareth. These Gospels also agree that she was of Davidic descent. Schmiedel, indeed, declares that St. Luke assigns her a Levitic ancestry. This is contradicted by St. Luke himself, who relates that the angel Gabriel, announcing the miraculous conception to Mary, said, "The Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David," with whom He had no connection, unless He were a descendant of that king. Mary's relative, Elizabeth, was of Aaronic descent: this, however, does not affect the fact that Mary herself was of the lineage of David. The present writer, although himself without any claim to royal ancestry, has a cousin who is able to claim descent from King Robert the Bruce. Yet on such evidence as this, Schmiedel has the courage to assert "that the author of Lk. 1. held her to be a Levite is certain." What value can attach to the historical judgments of one who finds "certainty" in such evidence as this? Prof. Paul Haupt, however, straining after the extraordinary, goes still further. Resting upon a misunderstood passage in 1 Maccabees 5.[23], he maintains that Mary was not even a Jewess. But even if the Jewish population in Galilee at the time was so small that Simon the br. of Judas Maccabæus was able to carry them all for safety into Judæa, there was nothing to hinder any number from returning when the immediate danger was past. Josephus himself furnishes proof of an overwhelming Jewish element in Galilee; and in order to explain it Haupt asserts a general process of compulsory proselytism, an assertion unsupported by evidence. If one may capriciously accept or reject documents, any conclusion desired may be reached. The only purpose, however, which such conclusions can serve, is to exhibit the learning and ingenuity of their authors—possibly nothing else is intended.

No historical value attaches to the narratives contained in the Apocryphal Gospels of the wonders connected with the birth and early days of Mary. The story is told in the Canonical Gospels with a quiet restraint which carries conviction of its truth. Apparently while still young, Mary was betrothed to Joseph, a carpenter in Nazareth, who is described as a "righteous man" (Mw. 1.[19]). There is no doubt that he belonged to the house of David. If Mary had had a brother the events that followed would have furnished occasion for his interference. Of this there is no record, and the inference is that she had no brother. She was therefore an heiress, in however humble a way, and therefore legally bound to marry within the circle of her own family (Nu. 36.[8]). It follows that she also was of the house of David (cp. above). Her inheritance may, not impossibly, have been in the territory around Bethlehem.

To the betrothed maiden the angel Gabriel appeared with the greeting: "Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee;" and proceeded to announce her great destiny, concluding: "that which is to be born of thee shall be called holy, the Son of God." The beauty and simplicity of her spirit are manifest in her reply: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word" (Lk. 1.[26ff.]). Joseph's natural anxiety and alarm were allayed by a divine messenger (Mw. 1.[18ff.]). Not long afterwards Mary visited Elizabeth, the destined mother of the great forerunner, in a city of Judah in the hill country, who, by divine intuition, recognised in her young kinswoman the mother of her Lord. The Magnificat, in wh. Mary responded to the greeting of Elizabeth, is largely reminiscent of the song of Hannah (1 S. 2.), affording evidence of sympathetic knowledge of OT. Scripture. Tarrying with her friend some three months, Mary returned to Nazareth just before the birth of the Baptist (Lk. 1.[39ff.]).

For the enrolment decreed by Cæsar Augustus Joseph and Mary journeyed to their ancestral city, Bethlehem in Judah, and there, under circumstances with wh. all are familiar, the Divine Child was born. The vision to the shepherds, their visit to the Infant, and the coming of the Wise Men, with their adoration and offerings, made a deep impression upon the young mother's heart. Treasured in her memory also were the scenes in the Temple when, with her husband, she went thither, to make the necessary legal offerings for her Son—offerings which would declare their humble condition—"a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons" (Lk. 2.[24]; cp. Lv. 12.[8]). There Simeon, a waiter "for the consolation of Israel," took the Child in his arms and, with thanksgiving to God, spoke his marvellous prophecy. Perhaps the splendour of the destiny promised to her Son may have obscured for the time the force of that word spoken to the mother, "Yea, and a sword shall pierce through thine own soul." The aged Anna, a prophetess, seeing Jesus, gave thanks to God, and spoke of Him to all the company of "waiters for the redemption of Israel," to which she also belonged (Lk. 2.[22ff.]).

Tree of Mary, Heliopolis

Before the red storm of Herod's jealous wrath burst over Bethlehem, warned of God in a dream, Joseph took Mary and Jesus to Egypt; then, as now, a refuge for the oppressed. There they tarried for a time, possibly for two years. Tradition still points out spots associated with their residence, such as the tree of Mary at Heliopolis. After Herod's death they returned to Pal., but to Nazareth, not to Bethlehem, as Archelaus, Herod's son, reigned in Judæa. There is no record of the home-life in Nazareth. That it was marked by piety we gather from the regular presence of Joseph and Mary in Jerusalem at the Feast of the Passover (Lk. 2.[41]). It is in connection with one of these visits that the interview of Jesus, now twelve years old, with the doctors in the Temple, is related. Looking behind this narrative we see what confidence Joseph and Mary reposed in her Son. His absence from the company of returning pilgrims was not observed till the approach of nightfall. This cannot be attributed to any want of solicitude on their part, as is plainly shown by their hurried return to Jerusalem, their three days' search, and the terms in wh. Mary greeted her Son. The terms of that greeting, in wh. Joseph is called His father, imply that she had not revealed to Him the secret of His birth. Yet His reply, perhaps with emphasis on "My Father," may indicate an expectation on His part, that His mother should note a difference between Him and others. It does seem to show at least the dawning consciousness that His relation to God was not the same as that of other men.

This is the last time that Joseph appears in the narrative, and we may perhaps assume that no great time thereafter Mary was left a widow, and may have been dependent for support upon the earnings of her Son. Subject as He was to His parents in the home, we may be sure His mother was held in special love and honour; and the eighteen years that elapse before we meet them again would be years of peaceful and happy life. Mary next appears at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, where her kindly solicitude for the bridegroom's reputation lest, by shortage of the wine, he should be shamed in presence of the guests, exhibits the delicacy of her nature. Her authority over the servants seems to imply that she was in some way related to the bridegroom. It is possible that Mary's appeal to Jesus was made in the expectation of miraculous help: but there is no certainty. In His reply there is no harshness, as some have supposed, in His use of the word "Woman." With accompanying tone and look it may express both honour and affection. It is the word that comes to His lips addressing His mother from the Cross. And certainly Mary shows no sense of rebuff or soreness. The report is no doubt greatly condensed. But evidently He lifted the veil very gently, that she might see a relationship between them other than that of mother and Son. It may not have been easy for Mary to realise this; she evidently felt that her expectation was to be fulfilled; but we may detect something of awe in her direction to the servants: "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." Subsequently we find Him correcting in this sense the words of the crowd who spoke of His mother and brethren according to common usage. "Who is My mother? and who are My brethren?" Then, stretching His hands towards His disciples, "Behold My mother and My brethren!" This, at the moment when in motherly solicitude she would fain have exercised some restraining influence, would add to the feeling of distance between herself and her Son, which must have grown with succeeding years, shedding partial light for her, perhaps, upon the meaning of Simeon's prophecy. This sense of remoteness no doubt reached its climax on Calvary, when addressing her as "Woman," however much of tender affection the word conveyed, and not as "Mother," He committed her to the care of His beloved disciple. And then, also, to her broken heart was revealed the full significance of the word spoken in the Temple so long ago. Through what process Mary was led to recognise the Divine Saviour in her crucified Son we do not know. The fact that she was entrusted to the care of John may possibly indicate that, for the time at least, she was out of sympathy with the other members of her household. But it is a happy circumstance that she last appears in the sacred narrative as present, with the complete family circle, in the company of 120 who, after the Ascension, waited together, praying, in the upper room in Jerusalem (Ac. 1.[14]).

Two questions connected with Mary the mother of Jesus, which have attracted much interest recently, may be here briefly considered, viz. The Virgin Birth of Jesus, and the Perpetual Virginity of Mary.

1. The Virgin Birth.—In addition to what is said in the article Jesus Christ we may observe—

(a) With regard to the Record.—The facts would at first be known to few; perhaps only to Joseph and Mary. Reticence about them was natural, and when stated, they called for great delicacy of treatment. St. Matthew tells the story as it must have appeared to Joseph. Only Mary herself could have been the source of the narrative given by St. Luke. The work of this historian shows how carefully he verified his facts. His calm, firm outline is precisely what we should expect from one who, upon evidence which he could not resist, had accepted the truth of events, which in themselves must have appeared so entirely improbable. The Virgin Birth is directly asserted in the first and third Gospels, and it is implied in the fourth. "The Word became flesh" (Jn. 1.[14]) has no meaning if an ordinary birth is referred to. An older generation of critics drew attention to the difference between Mw. 13.[55] and Mk. 6.[3]. The former speaks of Jesus as "the carpenter's son"; the latter describes Him as "the carpenter," thus avoiding, as these critics thought, the ascription of a human father to Christ. St. Matthew doubtless employed what was the popular phrase: and whether St. Mark wrote from the theological point of view or not, his description was no doubt quite accurate. Owing to the relation in which St. Paul stood to St. Luke, his silence on this point is deprived of all probative force. The argumentum e silentio, always hazardous, is doubly so when we are so far removed from the date and circumstances of the writer. It is a significant fact that, as early as the beginning of the second cent., this doctrine was universally received (Ignatius, Ephes. i. 8). In the Palestinian Syriac Gospel found by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson the continuation of Mw. 1.[16], "and Joseph begat Jesus," only means that our Lord's birth was so registered: indeed it could not be registered otherwise.

(b) With regard to the Fact.—It is frequently declared that the Virgin Birth of our Lord was impossible. The alleged impossibility depends upon the gen. assertion that miracles cannot occur. Such an assertion betrays a misconception of what an "impossibility" really is; and further, it contradicts the expectation, practically universal to mankind, that, given suitable moral conditions, miracles will occur. The Virgin Birth is not even against the analogy of Nature. Parthenogenesis is well known in certain lower forms of life. As the higher contains in itself all the lower forms, the isolated occurrence of phenomena connected with these is merely an exaggerated case of "harking back," as it is called. The Virgin Birth was miraculous, indeed, but even so it did not violate the analogy of Nature.

2. The Perpetual Virginity of Mary.—This subject is referred to in the article Brethren of the Lord. That, after the birth of our Lord, Mary was merely in name the wife of Joseph is a dogma of the Church of Rome, greatly favoured in high Anglican circles. When we contemplate the awful mystery of the Incarnation it almost seems profanation to think of the Holy Mother bearing any other child than that One who was conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost. It seems like using the sacred vessels of the Holy Temple for common purposes. But we must be on our guard against taking a priori notions as proving facts. The Docetism of the early centuries was due to this illogical use of a priori ideas as tests of fact. If the doctrine of Mary's perpetual virginity had been true we might surely have expected to find some early, if not Scriptural proof. At all events, when any phrase occurred wh. seemed to deny it, some guarding word or two would have been introduced to prevent mistake—such e.g. as hōs nomizeto, "as was believed" (Lk. 3.[25]), wh. warns the reader against taking Joseph as the father of our Lord in the ordinary sense of the word. No evidence, however, in support of the doctrine, either direct or indirect, can be drawn from Scripture. On the other hand, if we had to do with any merely secular matter, Mw. 1.[25] would be regarded as nearly decisive against it, especially when taken along with Lk. 2.[7], where Jesus is described as Mary's "first-born" son. In neither case is there any word to warn us against making a mistake wh. must have seemed so natural. The men of Nazareth, whose knowledge of the family had the closeness and intimacy born of nearly thirty years' life in the same village, spoke of four men as the "brethren" of Jesus, and referred to "sisters." In other passages also we have notices of "His brethren" (Mw. 12.[46]; Jn. 7.[5]). Further, St. Paul (Gal. 1.[19]) speaks of James as the "Lord's brother." Such Scriptural evidence as exists, therefore, does not favour the doctrine (see Brethren of the Lord).

To the Jewish mind the ideal of womanhood was found in motherhood, not in virginity; and it is significant that this belief is first heard of only when the undue exaltation of virginity began to show itself in the Christian Church.

A later development of this not unnatural tendency to lay stress on the sanctity of her who was privileged to be the mother of our Lord, is found in the belief in her sinlessness—that she was conceived without sin. For this belief there is less to be said on the ground of sentiment, while on its own behalf no shadow of evidence is furnished by Scrip. or by the early Fathers. The dogmatic reason for its support is obviously to be sought in the desire to fence more thoroughly the doctrine of our Lord's freedom from Original Sin. The line of reasoning assumed, however, involves itself in contradictions if pursued to its legitimate conclusions. If it were necessary to our Lord's absolute holiness that His mother should be without sin, would it not be equally necessary to the sanctity of that mother, that her mother should also be sinless? This step would involve another similar assumption, and that again yet another, until we should go back to Eve, thus ultimately denying altogether the fact of Original Sin, and, therefore, the necessity for the Incarnation. In point of fact, Mary seems to have allowed the influence of "the brethren of the Lord"—her own younger sons, as we think—to overbear her faith (Mw. 12.[46]; cp. Mk. 3.[21]). Also our Lord's words addressed to her at Cana of Galilee seem to imply that, although holy, she was not wholly free from human failing.

Many traditions have gathered round the name of Mary. According to one she went with John to Ephesus. Another says John stayed with her in Jerusalem till her death. The disciples are said to have been brought miraculously from their various fields of labour to her deathbed. She was buried in Gethsemane, but her body was supernaturally carried away from earth. When the grave was visited three days after her burial only a sweet perfume remained. Jesus is said to have declared to her before her death, "Whosoever invokes thy name shall not be put to shame."

The fable of the Assumption of her body, and the practice of Mariolatry, are natural deductions from the false premises discussed above.

II. Mary Magdalene.—The name may be taken as indicating that she was a native of Magdala. This is the Heb. migdāl, "tower." While there were several Migdals in Galilee, only one of them is named in NT. (Mw. 15.[39]). For Magdala in this place the rdg. of RV. is "Magadan" (see Magdala). Mark gives "Dalmanutha." It may be identical with mod. el-Mejdel (see Magdala), where tradition locates the birthplace of Mary. She had been a demoniac, and out of her our Lord is reported to have cast seven devils (Lk. 8.[2]; Mk. 16.[9]). That her trouble was one of exceptional severity is plain, and her gratitude for deliverance would be correspondingly deep and sincere. There is absolutely no reason for identifying her with "the woman that was a sinner" (Lk. 7.[37]). There is no evidence that demoniac possession was in any way connected with special moral delinquency. She appears to have been a person of means. Of the women who ministered to our Lord of their substance her name stands first (Lk. 8.[2]). That company of true friends witnessed the crucifixion "from afar" (Mw. 27.[55]; Mk. 15.[40]), but drew near when the cruel work of the soldiers was accomplished (Jn. 19.[25]). She stood by and saw the body of Jesus laid in Joseph's tomb (Mk. 7.[47]). Bent upon the pious duty of anointing the body, she was among the earliest visitors to the sepulchre on the morning of the resurrection (Mk. 16.[16]; Jn. 20.[1]). From the open tomb she inferred that the body had been removed. Running to Peter and John, she exclaimed: "They have taken away the Lord out of the tomb, and we know not where they have laid Him." When the disciples who had examined the tomb had gone, Mary still stood without, weeping, her sorrow doubtless intensified because she was balked of her affectionate purpose. To her then, after she had seen the vision of angels, first of all His followers, the risen Lord appeared. In the grey twilight she did not at once recognise Him, but at the utterance of her name she fell at His feet, exclaiming "Rabboni" (Mk. 16.[9]; Jn. 20.[11ff.]). Very gently Jesus makes her understand the great gulf that separates Him now from the friends of earth. Full of a new-found joy, she goes to tell the disciples, and so passes for ever from the page of history. Quite unwarrantably she has been identified with

III. Mary, the Sister of Martha.—Mary is introduced to us as sitting at Jesus' feet, listening to His conversation, while Martha bustled around preparing for His creature comforts. In His reply to Martha's appeal He does not condemn the active as contrasted with the contemplative life. He does indicate that it is possible to be so absorbed in external concerns as to miss what is of greatest import. In Mary He had found a mind that responded to the sublimity of His teaching (Lk. 10.[38-42]). The incident recorded in Jn. 11.[31ff.] sets the impressiveness of Mary's personality in a strong light. The expression of Martha's grief had been heard with composure. When Mary appeared the waves of her sorrow overwhelmed the bystanders, and for the moment even Jesus Himself was carried away. On the return of Jesus from Ephraim to the Passover a supper was made for Him at Bethany, where Martha served, and Lazarus sat with Him at table. There, as He reclined at meat, His feet projecting over the couch behind, Mary came and anointed His feet with ointment of spikenard, and wiped them with her hair. Judas Iscariot's protest against the seeming waste only elicited Christ's commendation of a deed done on the prompting of some deep spiritual instinct, "against the day of My burying" (Jn. 12.[1ff.]). The resemblances between this incident and that recorded in Lk. 7.[37-39] have led some to identify Mary of Bethany with "the woman that was a sinner." The identification is unsatisfactory. Although there are many points of resemblance, there are also many of difference. The incident in Luke is placed in Galilee, and early in our Lord's ministry. All the other evangelists place the incident where Mary is the actor, in Bethany near Jerusalem, and close to the end of Christ's ministry. Further, in chap. 10., St. Luke speaks of the family at Bethany; but while Mary is there mentioned by name, there is no reference back to the incident of chap. 7., wh. would have been almost inevitable had she been "the woman that was a sinner."

It should be observed, also, that the points of resemblance concern things that were common, and call for no special remark. It is not surprising, e.g. that both feasts should be in the house of one called Simon. This was a popular name. There are seven Simons, or Simeons, mentioned in the NT., excluding the two here involved. Alabaster boxes of ointment, although costly, were far from unusual. From the attitude in wh. guests reclined at meat the feet were conveniently placed for anointing. In a land where perfumed ointment has always been held in such high esteem, there is nothing to call for remark in the fact that two women, independently, chose the same means of expressing their devotion and grateful affection. For the tradition as to Mary's last days see MARTHA, ad fin.

IV. Mary the Mother of James the Less (the Little) and Joses is named among the women who ministered to Jesus, and were witnesses of His crucifixion (Mw. 27.[55], &c.). In v. 61 and 28.[1] she is identified with "the other Mary," and in Jn. 19.[25] with Mary the wife (or daughter) of Cleophas (cp. Mk. 15.[40]). "Mary of Cleophas (or Clopas)" has been taken as sister of Mary the mother of our Lord, probably owing to a misunderstanding of Jn. 19.[25] (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). With Mary Magdalene she saw the burial of Jesus (Mk. 15.[47]), and went to the tomb on the resurrection morning (Mk. 16.[1]).

V. The other Mary; see the foregoing.

VI. Mary of Cleophas (or Clopas); see IV.

VII. Mary the Mother of John Mark.—Her house in Jerusalem the Christians seem to have regarded as a common meeting-place (Ac. 12.[12]). If Mark, the cousin of Barnabas (Col. 4.[10]), be identical with John Mark, as seems probable, Mary may have been the sister of the fr. or mr. of Barnabas.

VIII. Mary saluted by St. Paul.—A Christian who had toiled for the advantage of the Church in Rome: possibly identical with VII.

MASON. The M. is one who graves stones (2 S. 5.[11]), makes a dry-stone wall (2 K. 12.[12], &c.), hews or digs stones (1 Ch. 22.[2], &c.), knows how artistically to build a wall (1 Ch. 14.[1]). Lebanon still supplies the greater number of masons to Pal., those of Shweir being in special repute.

MASSAH. See MERIBAH.

MATTAN. (1) A priest of Baal, who shared the fate of Athaliah (2 K. 11.[18], &c.). (2) Father of Shephatiah, one of the princes opposed to Jeremiah (Jr. 38.[1]). (3) Mw. 1.[15], MATTHAN.

MATTANAH, a station of the Israelites, apparently the next after BEER, and before NAHALIEL (Nu. 21.[18f.]). In Heb. Mattanah = "gift." Some have thought, therefore, that it may be identical with Beer, "the well," of all gifts the most prized in "the wilderness." It must have lain to the SE. of the Dead Sea, but no ident. is possible.

MATTANIAH. This was a popular name. Ten men so called are mentioned in Scrip. Here we need only speak of that king of Judah whom Nebuchadnezzar placed on the throne instead of his nephew Jehoiachin (2 K. 24.[17]). His name was Mattaniah, but the conqueror changed it to ZEDEKIAH. In the same way Pharaoh-necho changed the name of Eliakim to Jehoiakim (2 K. 23.[34]).

MATTHAN, son of Eleazar, and grandfather of Joseph the husband of Mary (Mw. 1.[15]). He is prob. identical with Matthat (Lk. 3.[24]).

MATTHEW, one of the Twelve, a tax-gatherer, called by Jesus fm. the receipt of custom (Mw. 9.[9]). In the parallel passages (Mk. 2.[14]; Lk. 5.[27]) he is called Levi. Probably he owned both names—a custom not uncommon. He is always named along with Thomas "the twin." It may therefore, perhaps, be inferred that he was the twin brother of Thomas. From his occupation at "the receipt of custom" he wd. form the habit of keeping records. It is prob. that he kept notes of our Lord's words and deeds which afterwards formed the nucleus of his Gospel. The beginning of his new relationship to Jesus he signalised by a feast (Mk. 2.[15ff.], &c.). Late traditions assign him his sphere of missionary labour among the Ethiopians or the Parthians.

MATTHEW, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. References to St. Matthew in New Testament literature are very few. His name appears in the first Gospel, first when he was called to follow Jesus, and next in the list of the Twelve.

In the second Gospel he is called Levi, and there is no reason to doubt that Levi is identical with Matthew. His name appears in the list of the eleven in Ac. 1.[13]. The story of his call is also told by Luke in almost identical terms. His position in the list of the twelve apostles is seventh or eighth.

The ministry of Jesus had been some time in operation before the call of Matthew. Accdg. to the fourth Gospel there had been a ministry in Judea and in Jerusalem, and even from the three Gospels we gather that the ministry in Galilee had been going on before the day when Matthew was found at the receipt of custom, was called, and forsook all to follow Jesus. He was not one of the disciples of John as some of the Twelve were. His experience of the ministry of the Lord would thus date from his call. The events which happened and words which were spoken ere he was called, Matthew would have to learn from those who were then present. While the NT. is so far silent about Matthew and his work, and while his position among the Twelve was not such as to indicate why he should be chosen by subsequent tradition as the writer of a Gospel, yet the tradition is persistent, comes from an early date, and was universally believed by the Church from the second century onwards. The easiest solution of a difficult problem is to assume that a basis of fact forms the source of the tradition. That assumption alone can account for the tradition. For neither the position of Matthew among the Twelve, nor any mention of him in the NT., is sufficient to explain the tradition.

The tradition itself is thus stated by Eusebius. "For Matthew, after preaching to the Hebrews, when about to go also to others, committed to writing in his native tongue the Gospel that bears his name; and so by his writing supplied to those he was leaving the loss of his presence" (HE. viii. 24). The tradition is persistent and consistent from the second century onwards. The authorship of the first Gospel is always ascribed to Matthew, and it is also consistently said that he wrote it in the Hebrew language. The two statements hang together, and must be taken together. From the tradition it would appear that the Gospel was first circulated in the Hebrew language, and we are told that each one interpreted it as he was able. The most likely interpretation of this statement is that those who read the Gospel, whether in a private reading or in the weekly assembly of the Christian congregation, translated it into Greek for the benefit of those who did not know Aramaic. We know of a parallel in the history of the Scottish Church. In the days before the Bible was translated into Gaelic, Mr. Macdonald, the father of Dr. Macdonald, the Apostle of the North, was wont to read from the English version to the congregation, and to translate, as he went on, into Gaelic for the edification of the people. This was apparently the custom in many parts of the Highlands of Scotland, until the Gaelic version was published. This also seems to have been the custom in the early Church. So Matthew was translated into Greek, as the reader was able; so also the Greek would be translated into Latin, into Syriac, Ethiopic, or into other languages as the need and the occasion demanded.

We have not space to describe the tradition at length. It has often been described. We refer to Professor Nicol's work, The Four Gospels in the Earliest Church History, for a full and accurate account of the tradition. We can trace the tradition backwards from the time of Irenæus to the close of the first century, and there can be no hesitation in saying that the belief in the tradition was universal in the early Church. All believed that the first Gospel was written by Matthew, and was written in the Hebrew tongue. It was also believed that the first Gospel, as it now stands in the canon, was the Gospel to which Papias referred. It would seem also to have been the belief of Papias himself. What has criticism to say to this ancient tradition? Many questions arise, to which a definite answer cannot yet be given. The trend of criticism is against the acceptance of the ancient belief in its simplicity and its entirety. Most hold that the present canonical Matthew is not a translation, that it cannot be the work of the apostle Matthew, that it is a compilation, and that the sources from which it was compiled can be traced and identified. There is a growing consensus of opinion that the second Gospel is a source of the first, and that a second source is a book of Sayings of Jesus, which was in early circulation in the Palestinian churches. The problem is very complex, and the solution is not yet apparent. Within our limits we can only indicate the problem, we cannot dwell on it. It may, however, be safely said that criticism of sources is a most delicate operation, and it is very difficult to conduct it in an objective fashion. It is hard to believe that a common source could have given rise to the sayings contained in the Sermon on the Mount, gathered into an artistic unity as an organic whole in the first Gospel, and scattered into separate and disparate paragraphs in the third Gospel. Some other solution must be found more consistent with the facts. A common source of the Sayings of Jesus has not yet been found.

Nor is it to be forgotten that the meaning of the word logia, which identifies it with "sayings," dates only from Schleiermacher. He introduced it, he has been widely followed, until now, both in German and in English, the word logia means sayings. In the NT. logia always means the whole of the OT., and includes in it all the literary forms of the OT. A story, a fact of history, a poem, a parable, a prophecy may be a logion, an oracle of God. So far as the NT. is concerned the Gospel history and the history of the Acts may be oracles of God. Apart from this fact, is there any ground to believe in a book of Sayings of Jesus compiled in the early Church, and in circulation before the destruction of Jerusalem ? Much may be said for that conclusion, and a good deal may be said against it. Nor is it necessary here to give a decision. For a discussion of the subject we refer to Dr. Allen's Critical Commentary on St. Matthew, to Zahn's Einleitung, and to all the treatises on NT. Introduction recently published, of which there are very many.

The best use we can make of the limited space at our disposal seems to be this. We propose to leave on one side the questions regarding sources, the possibility of the Gospel being a compilation, and similar questions which cannot yet be definitely answered, and devote our space to a description of its contents, and to those particulars in which it differs from the other Gospels. It is a remarkable fact that the first Gospel, written by Jewish Christians, should have been the most popular, and the most widely used and quoted by the Gentile churches. In the Greek and Latin Fathers it is much more frequently quoted than the others, and in fact it almost superseded the use of the second Gospel altogether. Many explanations are given of the fact, on which we need not dwell. Evidently the Gentile churches found the first Gospel to be that which met their deepest needs, and satisfied them. One reason for this preference may be found in the amount of didactic teaching found in the first Gospel, in the fact that the teaching of Jesus is found in it, aggregated into great discourses, and in the fuller account of the Passion Week and of the resurrection contained in it. Whatever the explanation may be, the fact remains that the first Gospel was regarded by the Church as the fullest and most complete of the Gospels.

Looking at the contents of the Gospel we find first the fore-history. The fore-history of the first Gospel is peculiar to itself. It has first the genealogy, next the account of the birth and childhood of Jesus, then the account of John the Baptist, and the baptism and the temptation of Jesus. It is noteworthy that the person in the forefront of the story is Joseph. It is Joseph to whom the dream comes, to him the Divine message is delivered, and it is to Joseph that the dream comes which directs the journey to Egypt. Mary is in the background. In the fore-history of Luke Joseph is scarcely mentioned. It is to Mary that the dreams and visions come. The feelings, emotions, and aspirations of Mary, her wonder, her loyalty, and her devotion, are the themes on which the story lingers. Clearly the two stories come from different sources ; one comes from Joseph and the other from Mary ; both alike dwell in a sphere of spiritual greatness, the greatness of which is not appreciated by those who measure greatness by quantitative measures. The two fore-histories are unique in the history of literature.

Having told the story of the genealogy of Jesus, laying stress on the fact of Davidic descent, and His consequent claim to Messiahship, it goes on to tell the story of the birth of Jesus, of His experience at baptism, of His temptation, and of His entrance on His public work. Then comes the story of the Galilean ministry (4.[12]–13.[35]), a brief and general description of His ministry in Galilee, in which the characteristics of His ministry and of its effects are given (4.[23, 25]). The evangelist tells the story of the Galilean ministry in some detail. It is characteristic that the teaching comes first and the doing second. The teaching is summarised in the Sermon on the Mount, the doing in the eighth and ninth chapters. Then comes another brief summary of His teaching and working, followed by His commission to the disciples of authority and power to fit them for their mission, and instructions to the disciples as to their conduct in carrying out their mission—instructions which were the guide of their conduct during all their life. The relation of His ministry to that of the Baptist follows, with an appreciation of the character, mission, and place of John the Baptist in the historic evolution of the kingdom of God. Then in a characteristic manner the parabolic teaching of Jesus is gathered together, and the reader finds in one place what was the way and manner of this feature of the ministry of our Lord.

Passing over various scenes and circumstances of the Galilean ministry, we note the significant fact of the visit of the Pharisees and Scribes from Jerusalem and its bearing on the movements of Jesus during the rest of His Galilean ministry. What is the explanation of His journeyings and wanderings during these months ? For the most part He is outside of the dominion of Herod Antipas. No evangelist formally connects the fact of the rupture with the Pharisees with the fact that He keeps outside of the dominion of Herod. Some modern interpreters find a symbolic meaning in these wanderings. They find that it is a dramatic rendering of the old belief that a prophet must also be an exile, and that he must, Elijah-like, flee to Horeb. It is an illustration of the tendency to find symbolic interpretations of what the Gospels set down as fact. But if we connect the rupture with the religious authorities and the alliance with the Herodians (Mk. 3.[6]) with the subsequent journeyings of Jesus, we find a sufficient motive and reason why He should not put Himself within the power of the authorities until He had trained the Twelve for their work. After all, it is easiest to take the Gospel statements of fact for what they appear to be, and to try to find an adequate interpretation of them. So, in the Gospel before us, we find that He is outside of the dominion of Herod. We find Him on the borders of Tyre and Sidon, in the region of Decapolis, at Cæsarea Philippi, and His presence in these places is sufficiently explained from the fact that He could not exercise His ministry safely within the dominion of Herod. Then we have the account of His journey to Jerusalem and His arrival there, with all that was said and done during that journey. The next great section of the Gospel (21.-27.) tells of the arrival at Jerusalem; of what He said and did till the beginning of the Passion Week; of the events of the Passion Week; of His betrayal, arrest, His trials, His crucifixion, His death and burial. The final section tells of the resurrection, and of the days between the resurrection and the ascension, and the Gospel ends with the great parting word to the disciples to go and win the world for Him.

Thus the fore-history, the ministry in Galilee, the journey to Jerusalem, the Passion Week, the story of the crucifixion, and the story of the resurrection comprise the history as contained in the Gospel. Essentially it is the history common to the three Gospels. It is evidently the common tradition with which the churches had been made acquainted, and which was derived from the common apostolic teaching. What is peculiar to the first Gospel is the fore-history and the grouping of the teaching of our Lord into great discourses. While there are shorter sayings scattered through the Gospel, usually located in some particular place, and represented as spoken on some special occasion, yet the characteristic peculiarity of the first Gospel is that it gathers the sayings of Jesus into great groups. The first of these is the Sermon on the Mount (5.-7.). The second is the instructions to the disciples when they were sent forth to their separate work (10.). The third is the great collection of parables (13.). The fourth is the denunciation of the scribes and Pharisees (23.). And the fifth is the great eschatological discourse, with the parables illustrative of the last things. These, with the discourse about the Baptist (11.) and the discourse about Beelzebub, contain what may be described as the didactic part of the Gospel as distinct from the narrative portion. Many important questions arise as to these parts of the Gospel. It may be reasonably contended that these discourses, both in manner and in matter, belong really to the Master. Almost all the contents of them bear the marks of His unique mode of speech. It is another question, however, and one not admitting of an easy answer, as to whether in their present form, and in their present aggregation, they were spoken by Him. It is possible that the tradition of the Church brought together, into one place and time, sayings which were spoken at different times and on separate occasions. It may be that the Sermon on the Mount, while it contains only the sayings of the Master, may have received its present form and setting from and in the tradition of the Church. It may be so, also, with the other great discourses. That is one question, and one which may well be discussed with a reasonable hope of an answer. It is another question, however, when it is argued that the substance of these discourses is attributed not to Jesus but to the consciousness of the Church, and when the authorship of them is ascribed to the reflection of the Church. When it is contended that the Church, reflecting on her own needs, and craving satisfaction for them, sought to make them objective, and, to invent situations, doctrines, and facts which would accomplish this aim, really constructed the Gospels, and that what we have in them is not the reflection of the consciousness of Jesus, but of the consciousness of the Church, that raises a different and a larger issue. We should have, ere we accept such a hypothesis, first to ascertain the capacity of the Church for so great a work. Could the Church, as we know it in the Acts of the Apostles, and in other sources of information, have really reflected to so great a purpose? Could she have been able to frame for herself, in that immature period of her development, a literature which was to be the standard for Christian thought and life for all the centuries—a standard which has never been approached, and which still remains unapproachable by any age of the Church? Whatever may be the solution of the literary problem of the Gospels, and of the first Gospel in particular, that solution which ascribes its contents to the reflection of the early Church is clearly untenable. Leaving these literary questions for further investigation, and for an adequate solution to the research of the future, we now turn to a brief description of the theology of the first Gospel.

That Jesus is the Messiah, foreshadowed in the OT. and expected in the fulness of time by Israel, is one of the themes of the first Gospel. His descent is traced to David and to Abraham. In David His ancestral line attained to kingship, and though the royal dignity was lost at the Captivity, it was restored again when Jesus the Messiah was born. He was king of the Jews by right of birth, and in the end of the days He entered Jerusalem as its king. But stress is laid on more than His Davidic descent. He was born of a virgin, was conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, and His proper designation is Immanuel, or the Son of God. He was proclaimed the Son of God by the Divine voice, at the baptism and at the transfiguration. He speaks of Himself as Son in an absolute and unique sense. Thus He is Son of David and Son of God. On one thing the first Evangelist constantly dwells. He delights to trace in the words and deeds of Jesus fulfilments of OT. prophecy. The instances of these are too frequent to be recorded here. A full treatment of the Christology of the first Gospel would take up much space. The wonderful works of Jesus, His gracious works of healing, His words of grace and love, His prophetic insight into the future illustrated by the foretelling of His death and resurrection, and of the coming of the kingdom, are illustrations of the way in which this Gospel attests His Messiahship. Briefly, in this Gospel He is Son of Man and Son of God, in whom and through whom OT. prophecy in all its lines obtained its fulfilment. Special stress is laid on the work of healing and of preaching as the means by which the approach of the kingdom of God was prepared. Again, stress is laid on the fact that He would return and build up the kingdom of God.

In the first Gospel we find that, looking at the frequent references to the OT., the new beginning is simply the continuation and culmination of the old. To Matthew the new is simply the completion of the old. What was prepared in the one is achieved in the other. Jesus is the goal of the past, the centre and the key to the eternal purpose, and in Him all the lines of the OT. meet and are fulfilled. Jesus is Immanuel, God with us. This is the essential feature of this Gospel. It is not merely that He was declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection, as with Paul; not merely that in this or that phase of His history He had received the Divine attestation; to this Gospel He is essentially Divine, Immanuel, God with us.

This appears whether we dwell on His teaching or on His action. In His teaching, as it is gathered up into the great discourses, He always speaks with Divine authority, and always makes claims which could only be justified if He were Divine. In the Sermon on the Mount He interchanges "for righteousness' sake" ($5.^{10}$) with "for My sake" ($5.^{11}$) as if the two were identical. Nor is this the only place in which the personal claim of Jesus is identified with the claim of righteousness. "For My name's sake," "for the Son of Man's sake," are phrases of frequent occurrence in this Gospel and in the other Gospels, and these are set forth as the supreme source of Christian obedience, and as the highest Christian motive. It is noteworthy also that this note of Divine authority set forth in the Sermon on the Mount is deeply imbedded in that discourse. Jesus places His own sayings on the level of the Divine commands given of old. "Ye have heard that it was said . . . But I say unto you." The situation is unique. Prophets of old had said, "Thus saith the Lord"; Jesus says, "I say unto you." It is the attitude of One conscious that He is the truth, that in Him and in His words the earlier order has been transcended and that a higher order has been reached. In the Sermon there is a note of authority never used before by any messenger of God, a tone of assurance which stands absolutely alone. It is all the more remarkable because for Jesus the OT. was the revelation of the Father, and its words were Divine. Yet He places His own words on the same, or rather on a higher level.

Equally noteworthy is the claim which is made in the Sermon to the highest judicial functions. This is noteworthy throughout the first Gospel. He claims to be the final Judge of men. It is sufficient to quote one passage: "Not every one that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of My Father which is in heaven. Many will say to Me in that day, Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy by Thy name, and by Thy name cast out devils, and by Thy name do many mighty works? and then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from Me, ye that work iniquity" (Mw. $7.^{20-23}$). It is a noteworthy claim that is made here, not only for the fact of it, but also for the principles underlying it. The principle of judgment is unique. He will not accept service, however distinguished, unless there is sincerity in the hearts of those who render it. He will not accept any service unless the people who render it are wholly His. There is nothing like this in the history of humanity. Other leaders accepted service without inquiring curiously into the motives of it; Jesus will not accept such service. How did this happen to be placed in the forefront of the Christian conditions of service? There is only one answer: Jesus Himself placed it there, and there it remains.

If we gather this impression of uniqueness, of sovereign personal claims, and of authority from the words of Jesus, as these are reported in the first Gospel, a similar impression is made on us by a perusal of His doings, and of His general demeanour, as these are set forth here. To these we can only allude. We might speak of the mighty works done by Him but we forbear. The impression made on us by the teaching of Jesus, as that is set forth in this Gospel, is confirmed by the life He lived, and by the work He did. It is in the words and deeds of Jesus that we find the material with which to fill up the meaning we ascribe to Him, and to the names by which He is called in this Gospel.

Take the first Gospel as it stands in our canon, and leaving out of sight for the moment all questions as to its authorship, as to the sources of it, and all other literary questions whatsoever, what is to be said regarding it? This much at least, that within half a century of the death of Jesus this book was in wide circulation among the churches, as an account of what the Master was, of what He had said, and of what He had done. This was what they believed about Him, this was their faith and the justification of it. It was received by the Palestinian churches, and by the churches scattered around the shores of the Mediterranean Sea. Of this there can be no doubt. Granted that there were in it some reflections made by the Church, some manifestations of the tendency on the part of disciples to magnify their Master; grant also that we have here reflections of the need of the Church, yet after all is said that can be said of these tendencies, what remains? Much remains indubitable. There remains what no man could have invented. There remains Jesus the Christ, a figure so unique, so different in His greatness from what men usually regard as great, that no one could have thought of Him as He was, unless He had been. He is the reversal of all ideas of human greatness, so that men do not recognise how great He is until they are educated to apprehend the new spiritual measures. Be the literary sources of the first Gospel what they may, the fact remains that out of these sources we have a book which is its own evidence, which in its spiritual greatness is productive of greatness in those who surrender themselves to it, and submit themselves to its guidance.

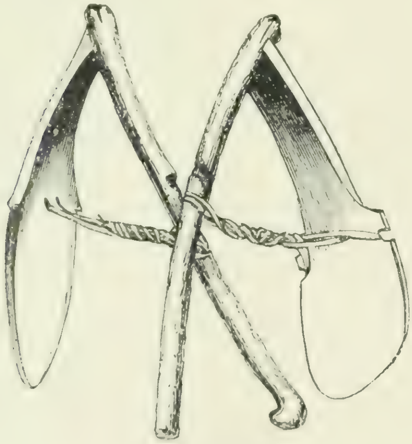
JAMES IVERACH.



EGYPTIAN HOES

MATTHIAS is known in NT. only as the disciple chosen by lot for the place vacated by Judas Iscariot (Ac. 1.$^{15ff.}$). This election may have been a mistake (Stier, Words of the Apostles). St. Paul seems to have been the man chosen of God for the office. M. disappears at once. Tradition has been busy with his name, but contains nothing worthy of credit. One story represents him as evangelising a city of cannibals in Ethiopia, fm. whose maw he is delivered by Andrew (Acts of Andrew and Matthias).

MATTOCK stands for several Heb. words. (1) Ḥereb, a general term, often trd. "sword," but in 2 Ch. 34.^{6} a tool for digging. (2) Maḥarēshāh, an implement of husbandry, poss. "ploughshare" (1 S. 13.$^{20f.}$). (3) Ma'dēr, "hoe" (Is. 7.^{25}). The usual M. is a pick with one end broad, the other pointed.

MAUL. The Heb. word is mēphīṭz, lit. "scatterer" or "disperser," and denotes a club or mace (Pr. 25.^{18}). A smashing weapon is no doubt intended, like the club that has played so large a part in Oriental war. The cognate mappāṭz (Ek. 9.^{2}) is "a shattering weapon," and mappēṭz (Jr. 51.^{20}) is "a war club."

MAUZZIM. AV. renders the Heb. phrase 'elōah mā'uzzim "the god of forces," giving "munitions, Heb. mauzzim" in the margin. The RV. rendering, "the god of fortresses," is now generally accepted. It is impossible to say which god is intended. Antiochus Epiphanes, the king referred to, wished to erect a temple in Antioch to the Roman Jupiter Capitolinus (Livy, xli. 20), and some have therefore thought this may be the god meant. But in 2 M. 6.$^{1f.}$ we read that "the king sent an old man of Athens to compel the Jews to depart from the laws of their fathers, and not to live after the laws of God: and to pollute also the temple in Jerusalem, and to call it the temple of Jupiter Olympius." Were this incident certainly historical a reasonable claim might therefore be made on behalf of the Olympian Jupiter.

MAZZAROTH (Jb. 38.^{32}), supposed to be identical with "planets" (mazzārōth—2 K. 23.^{5}), RVm. "twelve signs"; rendered by Psh. 'ogalto, "the waggon," prob. "Charles's Wain," Vlg. "Lucifer." Agst. the suggestion of RVm. is the fact that in Job it is sing.; agst. Psh. the fact that M. is "led forth in his season," whereas "Ursa Major" is always above the horizon in Syria; M. can scarcely be a star so frequently above the horizon as Venus. The suggestion of Fuerst that M. is Jupiter has something to recommend it, only 'ēth, "season," suggests a fixed star whose rising was a noted period. For this reason it wd. seem that Sirius, fm. whose rising the Egyptians arranged their Sothiac period, is the star most likely meant by M.

MEADOW in AV. stands for 'āḥū (Gn. 41.$^{2, 18}$) and ma'arāh (Jg. 20.^{33}). 'Āḥū is lit. "reed grass," and it is so rendered in RV. It may have applied to the rich pasture land of Egypt. Ma'arāh is simply transliterated by RV. in Jg. 20.^{33}. But it seems certain that this is a scribal error for ma'arāb, and that we ought to read "from the west of GIBEAH." In Is. 19.^{7} 'ārōth is trd. by AV. "paper reeds," by RV. "meadows." Probably, however, instead of ārōth we should read 'aḥoth.

MEAH, TOWER OF, RV. HAMMEAH, lit. "Tower of the hundred," stood on the wall of Jrs. between the sheep and fish gates (Ne. 3.^{1}, 12.^{39}). See JERUSALEM.

MEAL is grain ground between millstones, or crushed in a mortar (Gn. 18.^{6}, &c.; Mw. 13.^{33}, &c.).

MEAL OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

MEALS. See FOOD.

MEARAH, "a cave," a place remaining to be possessed by Isr. (Jo. 13.[4]), belonging to the Zidonians: poss. = Mugheirīyeh, "little cave," near Sidon.

MEASURE. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEAT in EV. is the tr. of several Heb. words, and has a quite general significance. It is applied indifferently to bread, flesh meat, &c.; the meaning in each case must be determined from the context. A similar use of the word "meat" is still common in Scotland.

MEBUNNAI, one of David's heroes of the Judahite family of Hushah (2 S. 23.[27]). It is a copyist's mistake for Sibbecai. The correct form is preserved in the parallel list in 1 Ch. 11.[29], &c.

MEDAD. See ELDAD.

MEDAN, one of Abraham's sons by Keturah (Gn. 25.[2], &c.). No prob. ident. with any Arabian tribe has been suggested, and the question seems likely to remain in obscurity. An easy solution would be to take "Medan" as a doublet of "Midian" which immediately follows. But in Gn. 37.[36] (Heb.) there is mention made of "the Medanites." It is usual to regard this with EV. as an error for "Midianites." It is also poss. that we have here an allusion to the children of Medan.

MEDEBA, an important town in the plateau E. of Jordan (Nu. 21.[30]), occupied by Reuben (Jo. 13.[9, 16]), the scene of Joab's victory over the Ammonites and their confederates. It was taken by Omri, but recovered and fortified by Mesha (Moab. St., lines 7f., 29f.; cp. Is. 15.[2]). Here John, son of Mattathias, was murdered by the Jambri, a crime avenged by Jonathan (1 M. 9.[36ff.]; Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 2, 4). It was captured by John Hyrcanus, and later by Jannæus (Ant. XIII. ix. 1, xv. 4, XIV. i. 4). It is = mod. Mādebā, six miles S. of Heshbon. In 1880 a company of Christians fm. Kerak occupied the place. There are many anct. remains. A mosaic map of a portion of Palestine and a part of Lower Egypt in the reign of Justinian, found here in digging the foundations of the Greek church, is described in PEFQ., July 1897.

MADEBA—RUINS OF CHURCH

MEDES. An Aryan race inhabiting a territory E. of MESOPOTAMIA, one of the regions to wh. the Northern Tribes were deported (2 K. 17.[6], 18.[11]). The M. seem to have formed several separate kingdoms, as in Jeremiah the reference is always to the "kings of the M." (Jr. 25.[25], 51.[11]). Their ancestor (Gn. 10.[2]) is MADAI, third son of JAPHETH. In both sacred and profane history the M., while distinguished fm. the PERSIANS, are always associated with them. Herodotus' account of the Empire of the M. has many elements of romance. Deioces, after gaining such a reputation for justice in his own canton that all his countrymen brought their cases before him, withdrew himself; as they felt the want of his tribunal the M. ultimately made him king. Herodotus says he reigned 53 years—an impossible length of reign when we remember that he must have been more than mature when he was made judge even in his native canton, and that it wd. take a very considerable time for his reputation to spread over all Media, and become so high that the habit was formed of coming to his tribunal; and that a further period wd. be required for the need of his decisions to become so clamant that the M. were necessitated to make him their king; when all this had transpired Deioces cd. not be much less than 70, an age wh. precludes a reign of more than half a century to follow. There occurs in the monuments a Daiuku, a vassal chief under the k. of the Manda who was taken prisoner by Sargon (B.C. 715). Herodotus makes Phraortes his son and successor; there is a Fravartish who was overthrown by Ashurbanipal. His successor according to Herodotus, Cyaxares, may have joined Nabopolasor in the assault on Nineveh and its capture. Meantime a Scythian race, the Umman-Manda, who seem to have been confused by Herodotus or his informants with the Medes, burst in upon SW. Asia under Istivigu (Astyages). They were overthrown by CYRUS, the k. of the canton of Anshan; who thereupon united the now emancipated M. with the PERSIANS and ELAMITES, to his small ancestral dominion. Fm. the beginning the M. were treated as the equals of the Persians, hence the phrase, "the laws of the Medes and the Persians" (Dn. 6.[8]). When the Persian monarchy had been wiped out the M. still appear associated with the Parthians (En. lvi. 5; Ac. 2.[9]).

MEDE, WITH BOW IN CASE

MEDIATOR (Gr. mesitēs: it only occurs once in the LXX (Jb. 9.[33]) to translate the Heb. mōkiaḥ, "daysman," wh. is more strictly "arbiter" or "umpire": the verb yākaḥ means "to rebuke"—see Am. 5.[10]). It occurs six times in the NT.—twice in Galatians (3.[19, 20]), once in 1 Timothy (2.[5]), and thrice in Hebrews (8.[6], 9.[15], 12.[24]). Four times out of the six it refers to our Lord directly; in the remaining cases (Gal. 3.[19, 20]), though it refers to Moses primarily, the ultimate reference is Christ. In three out of the four instances of refce. to Christ, while applied primarily to our Lord, there is also a reference to Moses, and mainly to his function in regard to the covenant between God and Israel, the ratification of wh. is narrated in Ex. 24.[3-8]. This general recognition of Moses as "mediator" of the first covenant is all the more striking that the term is never used of him in the OT. In "The Assumption of Moses," an Apocalyptic writing wh. cannot well be dated later than A.D. 6, the Latin Version of wh. is all that has come down to us, Moses speaks of himself as "arbiter testamenti," obviously pointing to mesitēs tēs diathēkēs, as the Greek fm. wh. the Latin had been immediately translated. It is introduced in a way that indicates that the mediatorial position of Moses was a commonplace in the theology of the period. Certainly Moses did fulfil that function, not only as standing between Israel and God when the covenant was ratified, but also again and again he was their advocate with J″., and most of all when they entreated him to speak with God for them, and to them for God (Ex. 20.[19]).

As universal as the belief in a Divine Being is the sense of the need of a mediator. Along with his belief in Divinity man has a consciousness of sin; this makes him feel that he cannot enter into the presence of the Holy God without overmastering awe and dread. Hence away back in primitive times priesthood was evolved; first it was, as in the case of Job, the father of the family that was the mesitēs—the priest. When families became larger, and congregated together so as to form village communities, kingship of a simple sort was evolved; then the ruler was priest and mesitēs. In early Babylonian history the primitive ruler, the patesi, was priest as well as ruler. As the moral degeneration of mankind became more pronounced, worship became more elaborate. Sacrifices appropriate to one set of circumstances were inappropriate to another. Form of words, dress, attitude, all began to be regarded as important. The more men recognised their distance fm. God the more they felt bound to express their awe in ceremonial. Hence the greater became the necessity for a mesitēs—a priest who knew accurately all sacred formulæ and modes of sacrifice; then kingship and priesthood were separated. There was needed also one to interpret God, and make known to men His will; hence the prophet, who acted as mesitēs fm. the other side. Moses combined these characteristics. His mediatorship therefore became, as we have seen, part of Jewish theology. In Christian theology the mediatorial work of Christ is the fundamental truth. By His Person, uniting in Himself the Divine and human natures, He is able to represent Man before God, and to present God to man; by His atoning sacrifice He removed the separating barriers; and by His continual Advocacy He unites men to their Father in heaven. The whole history of mankind was a course of training to prepare men to see in Jesus the true mesitēs, after whom they had been blindly feeling.

MEDICINE. See DISEASES AND REMEDIES.

MEGIDDO, a Can. city whose k. Joshua smote (12.[21]), allotted to Manasseh in the territory of Issachar (17.[11]), but not possessed by them (Jg. 1.[27]). It was subject to Solomon (1 K. 4.[12], &c.). Here the wounded Ahaziah died (2 K. 9.[27]), and Josiah was slain (23.[29], &c.). It is constantly named with Taanach, wh. definitely points to the SW. of the plain of Esdraelon. The most natural road for an

MEGIDDO

Egyptian army coming north issues into the plain by Khān el-Lejjūn, the Rm. "Legio," wh. rose on the site of M. and gave its name to the plain. It lies five miles NW. of Ta'anuk (Taanach) on the edge of the plain. Tell el-Mutasellim, hard by, may have been the acropolis of M. The stream wh. flows through the anct. site to join the Kishon is prob. referred to as "the waters of M." (Jg. 5.[19]). It is quite possible that an echo of the old name is heard in the mod. name of the Kishon—el-Muqaṭṭa' (HGHL. 386), although Moore (Judges, 158) thinks otherwise. El-Mujedda' in the Ghōr, near Beisān, favoured by Conder, while its name agrees in form, seems in no other respect to claim consideration (PEFM. ii. 90ff.).

MEHETABEEL, RV. MEHETABEL. (1) Ancestor of the prophet Shemaiah, who prophesied against Nehemiah, having been hired by Tobiah and Sanballat (Ne. 6.[10ff.]). (2) Daughter of Matred, wife of Hadad, or Hadar, king of Edom (Gn. 36.[39]; 1 Ch. 1.[50]).

MEHIDA, the ancestor of a family of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[52]; Ne. 7.[54]). Called "Meeda" in 1 Es. 5.[32].

MEHIR, son of Chelub, and brother of Shuah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. 4.[11]).

MEHOLATHITE, THE. Adriel, the son of Barzillai, who married Merab, the daughter of Saul, is so called in 1 S. 18.[19]. It probably means a native of ABEL-MEHOLAH.

MEHUJAEL, son of Irad, a descendant of Cain (Gn. 4.[18]), who corresponds to Mahalaleel (RV. "Mahalalel") in Gn. 5.[12ff.]

MEHUMAN, one of the seven eunuchs who served Ahasuerus (Est. 1.[10]).

MEHUNIM, RV. MEUNIM (Heb. meʿūnīm), are identical with the Maonites of Jg. 10.[12], who, along with the Zidonians and Amalekites, oppressed Israel. In 1 Ch. 4.[41f.] they are mentioned as a quiet and peaceable people, occupying "fat pasture and good," who were raided and dispossessed by the Simeonites in the reign of Hezekiah. It appears certain that "Ammonites" in 2 Ch. 20.[1] should be read Maonites, as forming part of the allied army opposed to Jehoshaphat, which perished by mutual slaughter. In this case they are identified as the men of Mount Seir (v. 10). They suffered defeat at the hands of Uzziah (2 Ch. 26.[7]). They are mentioned again among those returning from exile (Ez. 2.[50]; Ne. 7.[52]). These may represent captives of the M. set to humble tasks connected with the Temple. The name was derived from Maon, represented to-day by Maʿān, a town on the pilgrimage road, now a station on the Damascus-Hejaz Railway, to the E. of Petra.

ME-JARKON, Heb. mē hayyarqōn, lit. "the waters of Jarkon" (Jo. 19.[46]). The LXX reads "and from the sea, Jarkon and the boundary near Joppa." While this may be taken to authenticate the existence of Jarkon as a place in Dan, no identification is possible. The officers of the PEF. identify the waters of Jarkon with the river ʿaujeh, to the N. of Jaffa. The text is in confusion.

MEKONAH, RV. MECONAH, a town in Judah, prob. near Ziklag, occupied after the Exile (Ne. 11.[28]), not identified.

MELATIAH, a Gibeonite who took part in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Ne. 3.[7]).

MELCHI. (1) Son of Janna, an ancestor of Joseph (Lk. 3.[24]). (2) Son of Addi, in the same genealogy (Lk. 3.[28]).

MELCHIAH, a priest, father of Pashur (Jr. 21.[1]), called "Malchijah" (1 Ch. 9.[12]), "Malchiah" (Ne. 9.[12]), and "Melchias" (1 Es. 9.[32]).

MELCHISHUA, son of SAUL (1 S. 14.[49], 31.[2]), otherwise MALCHISHUA (1 Ch. 8.[33]).

MELCHIZEDEK, a Canaanite Priest-king of Salem in the time of ABRAHAM (Gn. 14.[18]). He is called "Priest of the Most High God" ('El-ʿElyōn). Abraham acknowledged his Priesthood by his offerings. The identity of Salem with Jrs. has been generally admitted. Jerome in his Epist. to Evagrius maintains that Salem was near Scythopolis; elsewhere (Quest. Heb. in Gen. 14.[18]) he assumes the common identification to be correct. Stanley thinks Gerizim to be Salem; Ewald wd. place it E. of Jordan. The evidence of Jos. and the Tgg., strong in itself, is confirmed by the Tell Amarna tablets, in wh. there are letters fm. a priest-king of Uru-salim named Ebd-Tob (servant of the Good). Hommel (AHT. pp. 155, 156) considers one of the expressions in a letter of Ebd-Tob to be an assertion that he had received his position by Divine appointment, not by inheritance (cp. Heb. 7.[3]). The Tgg. Ps.-Jon. and Jrs. declare M. to be SHEM bar Noah. A sect of Gnostics asserted M. to be an earlier incarnation of the Second Person of the Trinity, and superior to JESUS CHRIST. That M. was an Incarnation of Deity is a view that has frequently appeared among Christians. The parallel drawn in Heb. 7. between our Lord and M. has formed the occasion of much of this.

MELEA, son of Menan, an ancestor of Joseph (Lk. 3.[31]).

MELECH, second son of Micah, a descendant of Jonathan, son of Saul (1 Ch. 8.[35]).

MELICU, a family of priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ne. 12.[14], RV. "Malluchi").

MELITA, the island on which St. Paul was wrecked (Ac. 28.[1]), the mod. Malta, a small island 60 miles S. of Sicily. It was probably first occupied by the Phœnicians, who found it a convenient place of call on their maritime trading enterprises. For similar reasons it was counted of value by the Greeks, into whose hands it next passed. They were unable, however, to hold it against the power of Carthage. The Carthaginians were in turn overpowered by the Romans, who took possession of the island in the second Punic War (B.C. 218), and joined it to the province of Sicily. The population was of mixed Carthaginian and Lybian origin, very little of the Greek element remaining; and so we find them described as "barbarians," Gr. βάρβαροι, that is people who did not speak the Greek language (Ac. 28.[2, 4]). The products of Melita most highly esteemed were honey and cotton. A very early tradition places the scene of St. Paul's landing in what is now called St. Paul's Bay, eight miles W. of Valetta. Of St. Paul's work during the three months he was compelled to stay here only two incidents are preserved to us. Wet and cold as he was, he helped to collect fuel for the fire. In the bundle of brushwood which he brought there was a dormant viper. Roused "by reason of the heat," it sprang out and bit his hand. The natives, seeing this, thought he must be a murderer who, although he had avoided death in the sea, was not permitted by justice to escape. But no evil results followed, and their judgment swung at once to the opposite extreme: they believed him to be divine. Whether this were a poisonous snake or not—St. Luke does not say that it was—the thought of the natives shows that there were venomous reptiles on the island at that time, altho' none are found to-day. The other incident is the healing of the Roman governor, Publius, of fever and dysentery. By such deeds of kindness he won the honour of the islanders, and we may take the old tradition regarding the place of his landing as evidence that they cherished the memory of their benefactor. A bishop of Malta was present at the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451).

Since the year 1800 Malta has been a British possession, and it is now the main station of the Mediterranean fleet. It is still famous for its honey. The natives industriously cultivate the land, and export large quantities of grain, fruit, and cotton. Trade is also carried on in marble, alabaster, filigree, lace, &c. The people still bear the marks of their ancient origin, and the language is largely Arabic.

MELONS (Heb. abaṭṭiḥīm = Arb. baṭṭīkh). The red-fleshed water melons are here (Nu. 11.[5]) referred to. With green rind, they grow to a great size, and they are cultivated in large quantities all over Palestine. They are sent in enormous numbers to the cities, where in the hot summer months the juicy globes are intensely relished. They are cut in slices and set in the sun, where there is a draught or breeze, and they soon become icy cold. Ample supplies make them very cheap, so that even the poorest are able to indulge in this luxury.

MELZAR (Thd., Amelsad (B), Amersad (A); Coptic, Ameldad; LXX Abiesdri (Paulus Tellensis, Abiezer); Psh., Meshitzar (v. 11), Meñitzar (v. 16)), the steward "whom the chief of the eunuchs had set over Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah." To him Daniel appealed to be relieved of the necessity of eating the food fm. the royal table. All the early VV. regard M. as a proper name; on the other hand most recent commentators and the English RV. look upon it as the title of an official in the Babylonian Court. It is supposed to be the Persian word melsar, "a steward" or "master of banquets." Certainly the article wh. seems to supply the first syllable implies that we have to do with a common noun, and the way the word is introduced confirms this. Still the unanimous testimony of the versions is not lightly to be put aside. The first two syllables suggest that they represent the Asyr. amil, "man," and then amil-sarru mt. mean "the man of the king," but the "tz" is a difficulty, as it wd. suggest some derivative of nutzur rather than sar; moreover the final portion of such a name is usually a divine name, as Evil (Amil) Merodach. It seems impossible at present to decide definitely. Dr. Cheyne endeavours, not quite successfully, to combine Melzar with Abiesdri and Ashpenaz, to extract the name fm. wh. all three have sprung. He deduces it to have been Belshatzar.

MEMPHIS, the first capital of the united monarchy of Egypt, was called in Egyptian Men-nofer, "the good place," wh. the etymologists of the Roman age made into "the haven of the good" (Plut. De

Melon

Is. et Osir. 20, p. 35). Men-nofer is the Moph (Ho. 9.[6] Heb.) and Noph (Is. 19.[13]; Jr. 2.[16]) of the OT., final r being dropped as in other names of the Tel el-Amarna period. It was built by Menes, the founder of the first dynasty of the united kingdom, on the western bank of the Nile, on a piece of ground wh. he had reclaimed from the river by means of a dyke (Hdt. ii. 99), and being situated a little south of the apex of the Delta and at the entrance of Upper Egp., was a convenient centre for his kingdom. Menes is also said to have dug the sacred lake and built the great Temple of Ptah, the god of the district, whose massive wall of enceinte gave the city the name of Anbu-hez, "the white wall." From the temple the city also took the name of Ḥa-ku-Ptah, "House of the Double of Ptah" (written Ḥiguptaḥ in the Tel el-Amarna tablets), whence the Αἰγυπτος of the Greeks. The site is now occupied by the villages of Bedreshên, Mit-Rahenna, and Qasrîya.

'Abdellaṭif, in the twelfth century, describes the ruins as extending half a mile in length. Westward, in the desert, was the necropolis, with its line of pyramids stretching from Abu-Roâsh and Gîza in the north to Dahshûr and Lisht in the south. Saqqâra, with its "step-pyramid" of Neter-khâ Zoser of the 3rd dynasty, its Serapeum, and sepulchres of the Apis-bulls, was the oldest portion of the cemetery.

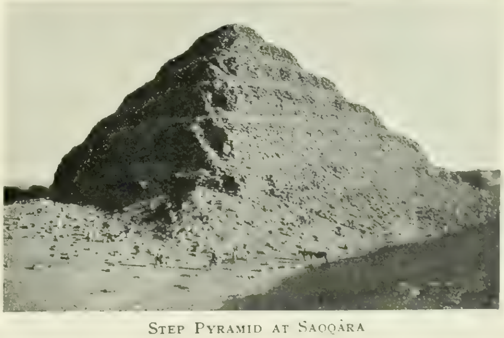
The 3rd and 4th dynasties were of Memphite origin, and Memphis continued to be the capital of the kingdom down to the age of the 11th dynasty, when its place was taken by Thebes, and the centre of power shifted to Upper Egypt. Under the Hyksos dynasties it again became a seat of government, but the recovery of Egyptian independence under the Theban princes once more raised Thebes to the first place in the Egyptian empire. With the decay of the Theban dynasties, and the rise of the



Step Pyramid at Saqqâra

Pharaohs of the 21st and following dynasties, who were connected with the Delta, Memphis again occupied a prominent position in the Egyptian monarchy. It suffered severely from the Ethiopian and Assyrian invasions, having been besieged and captured several times. It was again taken by Cambyses (B.C. 525), and the foundation of Alexandria deprived it of much of its importance. Under Theodosius (A.D. 379–95) its temple was destroyed, and henceforward it depended for protection on the Roman fortress of Babylon (now Old Cairo) a few miles to the north. The surrender of the fortress handed Egypt over to the Mohammedans (A.D. 638), who built a new capital on the east bank of the Nile, where Cairo now stands. Memphis served as a quarry for the new city, but in the time of 'Abdellaṭif its monuments were still numerous and imposing. Now its site is marked by mounds, a few remains of the city wall, and more esp. the two colossal statues of Ramses II. on the site of the Temple of Ptah. A. H. SAYCE.

MEMUCAN, one of "the seven princes of Persia and Media who saw the king's face and sat first in the kingdom" (Est. 1.[14]). According to Josephus (Ant. XI. vi. 1) it was their duty to interpret the laws. They were "wise men which knew the times," from wh. we may infer that they were skilled in the lore of their age and land: probably acquainted with astrology. They evidently formed a council with wh. the king advised in difficulty. Memucan appears as their spokesman, and may have been their president (v. 16).

MENAHEM, son of Gadi, who slew Shallum in Samaria, seized the throne, and treated Tiphsah with horrible cruelty (2 K. 15.[14ff.]). His usurpation and violence made him many foes, and two parties were formed, looking respectively to Egp. and Asyr. (Ho. 7.[11]). On the appearance of Pul (Tiglath-pileser III.), he purchased immunity fm. invasion with 1000 talents of silver, exacted fm. the "men of wealth" in the kdm. The account of 2 K. 15. is confirmed by the Asyr. inscrs. (Shrader, COT.[2] i. 284). The evils of his brief reign are portrayed in Ho. 4.ff., &c. The respite purchased fm. Asyr. was employed only to plunge into deeper guilt. M. was the last k. of Isr. whose son followed him on the throne.

MENAN, an ancestor of Joseph (Lk. 3.[31]).

MENE. Aram. word meaning "a pound." See DANIEL.

MENI. In Is. 65.[11] RV. reads "that prepare a table to Fortune, and that fill up mingled wine unto Destiny" (EVm. "Meni"). It is clear that two deities are intended. Jerome (Com. in Is. ad loc.) illustrates the practice here referred to "by reference to an idolatrous custom which prevailed in Egypt, and especially at Alexandria, on the last day of the last month of the year, of placing a table covered with dishes of various kinds, and a cup mixed with mead, in acknowledgment of the fertility of the past year, to us an omen of that wh. was to come." Mĕnī, "God of fate" ("award," "appointment"), may be compared with the Arab. Manāt (see WELLHAUSEN, Skizzen, iii. pp. 22f., 189), one of the deities worshipped by the Arabs before Mohammed, and referred to in the Qor'an (Sura 53). The idol was a large stone, and in the eighth year of the Flight it was destroyed by one Saad.

MEONENIM, OAK OF (Jg. 9.[37], AV. wrongly "plain of M."), i.e. "diviners' oak," a sacred tree near Shechem, associated prob. with the responses of soothsayers who sat by it. Several sacred trees are mentioned as near Shechem (Gn. 35.[4]; Jo. 24.[26]; Jg. 9.[6], &c.). We cannot say where this tree stood.

MEONOTHAI, son of Othniel, Caleb's younger brother (1 Ch. 4.[14]).

MEPAATH, RV. MEPHAATH. A city of the Amorites in the district of Heshbon, in the territory allotted to Reuben, subsequently given to the Merarite Levites (Jo. 13.[18], 21.[37]). In the time of Jeremiah it appears again in the hands of Moab (Jr. 48.[21]), from whom prob. the Amorites had first taken it. OEJ. says it was held by a Roman garrison. It was necessary thus to hold the nomadic tribes in check. They have always been a danger to anything like settled cultivation in the neighbourhood of the wastes. The place is not identified.

MEPHIBOSHETH, "scatterer of shame." Son of Jonathan (2 S. 4.[4], &c.). The original form was Meribaal, "Baal's man" (1 Ch. 8.[34], &c.). For similar transformation and reason see ISHBOSHETH. M. was lamed for life by a fall in the hurried flight after the battle of Gilboa, when only five years old. Hearing fm. Ziba, formerly a servant of Saul, that Jonathan had left a son, David sent for M. fm. his retreat in Lo-debar, gave him Saul's private estates, to be managed for him by Ziba, and retained him as a permanent guest at his own table (2 S. 9.). On David's flight fm. Absalom Ziba succoured him with gifts (16.[1ff.]) but maligned his master, and secured fm. David the grant of all M.'s possessions. M.'s protestations on David's return apparently did not quite convince the k. of his innocence; but Ziba had to restore half of what he had won by craft and falsehood (19.[24ff.]). M.'s loyal response to the king's word is perhaps the best proof of his sincerity. He left one son, Micha (2 S. 9.[12]), whose descendants are named in 1 Ch. 8.[35], 9.[41].

MERAB, elder dr. of Saul (1 S. 14.[49]), promised to the man who shd. slay Goliath (17.[25]), and in violation of this promise, given to Adriel the Meholathite (18.[19]). Her five sons (2 S. 21.[8], read "Merab" for "Michal") were given up to the Gibeonites, who slew them and heaped indignities upon their bodies.

MERAIAH, a priest in the days of Joiakim, head of the priestly family of Seraiah (Ne. 12.[12]).

MERAIOTH. (1) A descendant of Eleazar, son of Aaron, son of Ahitub and father of Zadok (1 Ch. 9.[11], &c.). (2) A Levite (1 Ch. 6.[6f.]; Ez. 7.[3]), called "Memeroth" (1 E. 8.[2]), and "Marimoth" (2 E. 1.[2]). (3) Head of a priestly house in the days of Joiakim (Ne. 12.[15]) called "Merimoth" (v. 3).

MERARI, the third of the sons of LEVI. At the first census the sons of M. were divided into the families of the Mahlites and Mushites; the number of males of a month old was 6200 (Nu. 3.[33, 34]); of those fit for service, i.e. fm. 30 yrs. old and upward, there were 3200 (Nu. 4.[44]). They carried the boards of the Tabernacle, the bars, the pillars with their sockets, the pins, the cords "with all their instruments" under the superintendence of Ithamar (Nu. 41.[29-33]): to aid them in this they had four waggons and eight oxen assigned them (Nu. 7.[8]). They had twelve cities, wh. were situated in REUBEN, GAD, and ZEBULON. JEDUTHUN (= ETHAN), a musician in the time of David, was a Merarite (1 Ch. 6.[44]).

MERATHAIM perhaps means "double rebellion," a name applied to Babylon (Jr. 50.[21]). Delitzsch thinks it may be equivalent to the Babylonian Marrātim, i.e. land by the nar Marrātu, the bitter river (Persian Gulf) = Southern Babylonia. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.

MERCURIUS (Gr. HERMES, RVm.). Although M. and Hermes were identified by the Romans and Greeks, yet to the two deities in popular belief totally different spheres of activity were ascribed. The identification was due to the tendency, so strongly exhibited by Herodotus, but common among the Greeks and Romans, to regard deities of foreign nations as their own, but known by different names. M. the Roman divinity was essentially the god of merchandise, as evidenced by his name; statues of him were made holding in his hand a purse of money. On the other hand the Hellenic deity was the god of eloquence, and, strangely, of theft. He was the messenger of the gods in the Homeric poems; there also he is the leader of the souls of the dead to the shades. Mythology credited him with the invention of the lyre and the syrinx. Hermes or M. is usually represented with a winged broad-brimmed hat on his head, and winged sandals on his feet, and in his hand the caduceus, or rod entwined with serpents. At Lystra, when PAUL had cured the impotent man, the multitude became convinced that "the gods had come down in the likeness of men," and declared Paul to be Hermes and his companion to be Zeus (Jupiter). Possibly the inhabitants of Lystra were led to their choice of divinities by the legend of Philemon and Baucis (Ovid, Met. viii. 621f.), located in the neighbouring Phrygia, in wh. these two deities appear together. It is probable that the deities actually invoked by the people of Lystra "in the speech of Lycaonia," had quite other names and attributes, but had been identified in the easy Greek fashion with Hermes and Zeus.

MERCY-SEAT. See TABERNACLE.

MERED, son of Ezrah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. 4.[17]). He married Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh, for whom the later rabbis found a place in

MERCURIUS

Paradise. These teachers of a subsequent age played with the names in this genealogy, making some curious combinations. Mered becomes Caleb, so called because he opposed or rebelled against (mĕrad) the counsel of the spies. Again, Ezrah is Amram; Jether and Mered, his sons, are Aaron and Moses. Moses (Mered) "takes" Pharaoh's daughter because she has forsaken idolatry and become a convert to the true faith. These speculations may be traced to the mention of "Miriam" in 1 Ch. 4.[17], who was taken to be the sister of Moses.

MEREMOTH. (1) Son of Uriah the priest (Ez. 8.[33]), of the family of Koz (Ne. 3.[4]). This family had lost its genealogy during the Exile, and were excluded from the priesthood (Ez. 2.[61f.]). This prob. applied only to certain divisions of the family, as Uriah is quite definitely designated "priest." To Meremoth was assigned the duty, along with three others, of making an inventory of the precious vessels of the Sanctuary (Ez. 8.[33f.]). He also took part in the building of the wall (Ne. 3.[4, 21]). (2) One who married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[36]). (3) One of those who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[5]). In Ne. 12.[15] for Meraioth read "Meremoth."

MERES, one of the seven princes of Persia, counsellors of Ahasuerus, "wise men who knew the times" (Est. 1.[14]).

MERIBAH ("strife"), the name of two places wh. occur in the history of the wanderings in the wilderness. The first is in the beginning of the wanderings, near REPHIDIM (Ex. 17.[7]), where the people, because they had no water, murmured agst. MOSES; then at God's command he smote the rock and the waters gushed forth. It was also called Massah. The second occurs near the end of the wilderness journey, in Kadesh in the Wilderness of Zin (Nu. 20.[1-13]); the full name of this place is "the waters of Meribah-Kadesh." Here also the people murmured not merely against Moses but also agst. Aaron. It was here that Moses and Aaron were guilty of that mysterious sin wh. led to their exclusion fm. Canaan.

There is without doubt a resemblance between these two incidents beyond that in the names of the localities. In both narratives thirst leads the people to murmur; in both the situation is relieved by Moses striking the rock and the water flowing out. Notwithstanding, there are many points of difference; the temporal and geographical background of the two incidents is quite different; the first is near Horeb in the first year of the wilderness journey, the second is in the Wilderness of Zin, on the confines of EDOM, within a year of the conclusion of the 40 years. In the first there is no mention of Aaron, nor of any sin on the part of Moses and him, nor do they enter into the "tabernacle of the congregation," prominent features in the second. On the other hand, in the second there is no hint that the people were ready to stone Moses as in the first. The argument relied on by those who wd. identify these incidents, that in the "blessing of Levi" (Dt. 33.[8]) both incidents are mentioned in one verse, is valueless; they are two separate occurrences, as is proved by the fact that in the next verse, but in the same sentence, an incident totally distinct fm. either is referred to; that narrated in Ex. 32.[26-29].

MERIBAH-KADESH. See MERIBAH.

MERIB-BAAL. See MEPHIBOSHETH.

MERODACH (Asyr. Marduk), a Babylonian and Assyrian deity identified astronomically with the planet Jupiter. Tho' worshipped by Nebuchadnezzar as the supreme God, yet accdg. to the Creation myth M. was one of the younger deities. He gained his supremacy by the slaughter of the dragon Tiamat; a statement that may indicate the conquest of the worshippers of Anu and Ea by the worshippers of M.; and at the same time the recency of the city whose inhabitants claimed M. as their god. He was later usually identified with BEL, wh. probably means "deity" (Jr. 50.[2]).

MERODACH-BALADAN (Asyr. Marduk-bal-iddina, "Marduk has given a son"), hereditary k. of the Kalda; his capital was Bit-Yakin. He is called "the son of Baladan" (2 K. 20.[12]; Is. 39.[1]); this, however, cannot be the complete name. Possibly Bel-baladan was the real name; in the Asyr. inscriptions he is called "son of Yakin," prob. only a predecessor, perhaps remote. In B.C. 729 he secured a supreme position in S. Babylonia. He was overthrown by Tiglath-pileser; but on the death of that monarch he resumed his interference in Babylonian affairs, and proclaimed himself k. of Babylon. Sargon II. was too much occupied to deal with the affairs of S. Babylonia for some years. At last, in B.C. 709, he defeated M.-B., drove him out, and assumed to himself the title of k. of Babylon. At the death of Sargon, M.-B. again got possession of Babylon. It was probably then that M.-B. sent the embassy to Hezekiah as recorded in 2 K. 20. and Is. 39. M.-B. wd. then be anxious to confirm his own rule by alliances and to embarrass Sennacherib in the beginning of his reign. Sennacherib assailed him and pursued him into Elam. He seems to have intrigued agst. Asyr., but he never regained the possession of Babylon.

MEROM, WATERS OF, where Joshua defeated the Canaanites (11.[5, 7]), are prob. ident. with Baheirat el-Hûleh, "little lake Huleh," in the Jordan valley, ten miles N. of the Sea of Galilee. Josephus places the camp of the kings at Beroth, near Kadesh (Ant. V. i. 18). Relying as they did upon chariots, they wd. naturally prefer battle in the plain. When defeated, their path in flight was through familiar country, towards Gt. Zidon. Josephus refers to the same water as Lake Semechonitis (Ant. V. v. 1). The name Hûleh first occurs in the form of Ulatha (Ant. XV. x. 3), applying to the lake and the district. The springs of Jordan, and all the waters fm. the slopes on either side, drain into the Hûleh. N'ward the floor of the valley is a great marsh, with masses of papyrus reeds, haunts of multitudinous bird and animal life, while the lake itself is well stocked with fish. It is the private property of the Sultan, and a rent is paid for fishing. See JORDAN.

MERONOTHITE. This description is applied to (1) Jehdeiah, who was over the asses of king David (1 Ch. 27.[30]). (2) Jadon, who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Ne. 3.[7]). He is named after Melatiah the Gibeonite, and before the men of Gibeon and Mizpah. We may perhaps infer from this that Meronoth lay in the neighbourhood of these cities; but so far there is no clue to its identification.

MEROZ, whose inhabitants were cursed by the angel of the Lord for unpatriotic or cowardly sloth (Jg. 5.[23]), is named only here. If it were within hail of the battle, or if, in the line of Sisera's flight, it allowed him to escape (Moore, Judges, ad loc.), Deborah's wrath is easily explained. El-Murussus, a vill. 4½ miles N. of Beisān, alone in the district has any resemblance in name to M. If Betsa'anim be identical with Khirbet Bessūm, and Kedesh with Qādesh, SW. of Tiberias (Conder, Tent Work in Pal. 69; HGHL.[1] 396), Sisera may easily have made a detour by el-Murussus in order to escape pursuit. Sure identification is impossible.

MESHA, k. of MOAB, contemporary of AHAB, AHAZIAH, and JEHORAM, kings of Isr. (2 K. 3.[4, 5]). According to the Biblical notice of him he had been subject to the kings of Isr., giving a tribute of 100,000 lambs and the same number of rams annually. On the death of Ahab he rebelled. Jehoram, accompanied by his ally Jehoshaphat and the k. of Edom, who was subject to Judah, made an expedition agst. Moab. In order to take them by surprise, they proceeded fm. GILEAD direct E. into the desert; turning S. they reached Edom, and through Edom attacked Moab fm. the SE. The greater part of their march was through sandy desert, and the army was ready to perish with thirst till by the intervention of ELISHA an abundant supply of water was vouchsafed to them. M. on learning of the approach of the army of the three kings made a furious assault on them, but was repulsed with such heavy loss that town after town fell into the hand of the invaders without any attempt at further resistance till they encamped before Kir-Haraseth (Kerak). M. is shut up: after a desperate but unsuccessful attempt at a sortie, as a counsel of despair he offers up in sight of the army his eldest son as a sacrifice. A mysterious panic seizes the allies, and they leave their conquest incomplete.

Until 1868 this was all that was known, but in that year Mr. Klein, a missionary of C.M.S., was shown a slab of black basalt containing an inscription of M. (see MOAB). In this inscr. M. narrates his successful rebellion agst. Isr., and his conquest not only of the places wrested fm. the Moabites but also of cities that had formerly been occupied by Isr. Naturally he gives no account of the defeats inflicted on him by Jehoram. He appears to have taken advantage of the overthrow of the dynasty of Ahab to invade Isr. In comparing the hist. as given by M. with Scripture, the main difficulty is that M. declares that the oppression of Moab by Isr. lasted 40 years, whereas the united reigns of Omri and Ahab only amount to 28 years; the difficulty is increased by the statement that one-half the reign of Ahab with that of Omri = 40 yrs., a period of only 17 yrs. The difficulty seems insuperable, as the difference between 17 yrs. and 40 appears to be too great to be explained by the use of round numbers. One wd. think that M. had no motive to increase the glory of Isr. and the humiliation of his own country by more than doubling the yrs. of their subjection to the House of Omri. It is not open to us to lengthen the reigns of Omri or Ahab, as, on comparing the chronology of Kings with that of Assyria, we find that the scriptural chronology is too long, not too short. If Moabite years were reckoned only fm. solstice to solstice, as we reckon the beats of a pendulum, then as the years wd. only be six months we cd. explain the difference.

MESHA. (1) See preceding article. (2) The eldest son of Caleb (1 Ch. 2.[42]). (3) Son of Shaharaim, a Benjamite, who was born in Moab (1 Ch. 8.[9]).

MESHA is given in Gn. 10.[30] apparently as the western limit of the territory of the children of Joktan. Its position is quite uncertain. Among suggested identifications are the Greek Mesene, near the mouth of the Euphrates and the Tigris, the Syro-Arabian desert (Asyr. mashu), and, by changing the vowel points, Dillmann would read Massā', identifying it with a branch of the Ishmaelites. In this case it would be the northern limit of the Joktanite territory.

MESHACH, the Babylonian name of MISHAEL, one of Daniel's three friends. See DANIEL.

MESHECH, MESECH, son of JAPHETH (Gn. 10.[2]; 1 Ch. 1.[5]), generally associated with TUBAL. Ps. 120.[5] is exceptional not only in omitting Tubal, but also in AV. spelling the name Mesech. M. frequently occurs in Asyr. inscriptions in the form Moskai, first mentioned by Tiglath-pileser I. (c. B.C. 1100) as a people situated between the TIGRIS and the EUPHRATES near their sources. Ezekiel mentions that M. supplied Tyre with vessels of brass (Ek. 27.[13]). Later they seem to have occupied Commagene. Herodotus refers to Moschi and Tibereni (vii. 8).

MESHELEMIAH, a Korhite, whose son was a gatekeeper of the Tabernacle (1 Ch. 9.[21], &c.). He is called "Shelemiah" (26.[14]), "Shallum" (9.[17], &c.), and "Meshullam" (Ne. 12.[25]).

MESHEZABEEL, RV. MESHEZABEL. (1) Ancestor of MESHULLAM (Ne. 3.[4]). (2) One who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (10.[21]). (3) A Judahite, father of Pethahiah.

MESHILLEMITH, a priest, the son of Immer (1 Ch. 9.[12]).

MESHILLEMOTH. (1) An Ephraimite, ancestor of Berechiah, a chief of the tribe under Pekah (2 Ch. 28.[12]). (2) Identical with MESHILLEMITH (Ne. 11.[13]).

MESHOBAB, a Simeonite (1 Ch. 4.[34]).

MESHULLAM. (1) Grandfather of Shaphan the scribe (2 K. 22.[3]). (2) Grandson of Jeconiah, and son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3.[19]). (3) Chief of a family of Gad, who dwelt in Bashan at the time of Jotham, king of Judah (1 Ch. 5.[13]). (4) A Benjamite of the family of Elpaal (1 Ch. 8.[17]). (5) A Benjamite, son of Hodaviah, and father of Sallu, a chief who settled in Jerusalem after the Captivity (1 Ch. 9.[7]). (6) A Benjamite, son of Shephathiah, who lived in Jrs. after the return from Babylon (1 Ch. 9.[8]). (7) Son of Zadok and father of Hilkiah (1 Ch. 9.[11]; Ne. 11.[11]). (8) Ancestor of a priestly family dwelling in Jrs. (1 Ch. 9.[12]). (9) A Kohathite overseer of the work in the Temple, under Josiah (2 Ch. 34.[12]). (10) One of those sent from "the river that runneth to Ahava," by Ezra, to Iddo, who brought Levites for the service of the house of God (Ez. 8.[16]). (11) A man associated with Ezra in his efforts to have the offence of foreign wives abolished (Ez. 10.[15]). (12) Son of Bani, who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[29]). (13) Son of Berechiah, probably a priest, who helped in building the wall of Jrs. (Ne. 3.[4]) and that of the Temple (3.[30]) over against his own chamber. Johanan, son of Tobiah the Ammonite, married his daughter (Ne. 6.[18]). (14) Son of Besodeiah, who helped in repairing the old gate (Ne. 3.[6]). (15) One of the leaders who stood beside Ezra at the reading of the law (Ne. 8.[4]). (16) A priest who sealed the covenant (Ne 10.[7]). (17) One of the chiefs who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[20]). (18) A priest representing the house of Ezra in the days of Joiakim, who took part in the dedication of the wall (Ne. 12.[13]). (19) Also a priest at the same time, head of the family of Ginnethon (Ne. 12.[16]). (20) One of the porters keeping guard at "the storehouses of the gates" (Ne. 12.[25]). (21) A prince of the house of Judah who marched in the company on the right hand, upon the wall of Jerusalem, at its dedication (Ne. 12.[33]).

MESHULLEMETH, the mother of Amon, king of Judah, wife of Manasseh and daughter of Haruz of Jotbah (2 K. 21.[19]).

MESOPOTAMIA, the Greek and Latin translation, in the LXX and the Vlg., of the Heb. Aram-Naharaim, "Aram (Syria) of the two rivers," and adopted in EV. It may be regarded as doubtful how far these two names designated the same territory. The two cities associated with ARAM-NAHARAIM in Scripture, Pethor (Dt. 23.[4]) and Haran ("the city of Nahor," Gn. 24.[10]), are to be found within the bounds of the Mesopotamia of the Empire of Alexander and the early Seleucids. As the name indicates, M. designates the territory between the two great rivers the EUPHRATES and the TIGRIS, in its greatest extent stretching fm. the sources of the two rivers in Armenia to their junction SE. of BABYLON. It would thus be a great ellipse, the longest diameter of wh. is nearly 700 miles and its breadth at the greatest rather less than 200, with a narrow part where the two rivers approach rather less than a hundred miles NW. of Babylon, marked in ancient times by the Median Wall. The Greek province was less extensive than this, being bounded on the N. by Mt. Masius, the boundary of ARMENIA, and on the S. by the Median Wall. The Roman Province of M. under Trajan extended right down to the Persian Gulf. It was with some reason named by Arabian geographers el-Jezireh, "the island." While Babylonia is a dead flat, the northern portion had some hills, though none of any great height. The province must be taken in its widest sense in Ac. 2.[9]. It was originally well wooded and very fertile, and wd. be so again under better government. There was a large colony of Jews left in Babylon and the region round about when Cyrus gave them permission to return to their own land. Indeed some of the Jews declared that at that time the finest wheat of Judaism remained in Babylon, only the chaff returning to Jerusalem. It was probably largely fm. the Babylonian colony that those "dwellers in Mesopotamia" came. The famous Hillel was said to have come fm. Babylon to Jerusalem. The larger and more popular of the recensions of the Talmud is that compiled in Babylon. It wd. seem probable that the Masoretic text of the Scripture received its last adjustment there also.

In later days M. was the centre of the Syrian Church. To it we owe the Peshitta, one of the earliest translations of the NT. and a valuable aid to interpretation. For the churches of M. Tatian wrote his Diatessaron or Harmony of the Gospels, wh. for a time, among the Syrian churches, superseded in use even the Canonical Books. The Peshitta Version of the OT. is valuable also. The majority of the Syriac-speaking churches followed Nestorius.

MESSIAH (Heb. mashîah, Gr. christos). Like several races, the Jews in the midst of the humiliation of the years of subjection under foreign masters indemnified themselves by picturing a coming time in wh. the glories of David and Solomon shd. be surpassed. God had chosen the Jews for a special function. In them all mankind were to be blessed. He utilised these natural aspirations for a diviner purpose. The person that to the Jew was to be the restorer of Davidic glories was, according to the Divine plan, to bring in the reign of righteousness into the world. We shall trace the historic evolution and definition of the Messianic idea in the messages of the successive prophets, in the visions of the Apocalyptists, and in the expectations ruling among the Jews while our Lord was upon the earth. In considering these prophecies we wd. give special prominence to those the Messianic reference of wh. was recognised by the Jews, as shown by the Tgg. What is called the "Protevangel" is the sentence on the serpent, "It (the seed of the woman) shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel" (Gn. 3.[15], J.). It is difficult to imagine that all that is implied in this is that as a rule mankind shd. abhor serpents; certainly the traditional Christian view seems more adequate. All that is to be read into this is that there was to be a human deliverer from sin who wd. crush the power of evil, but in doing so, wd. suffer for it.

Though there is no reference to the M. in Tg. O., in Tg. Jrs. on this passage it is said, "There shall be a remedy for the heel in the days of King Mashīḥa."

Though it may be going too far to regard the blessing of Shem (Gn. 9.[26], J.) as Messianic, there is a preparation for it in the singling out of Shem as the progenitor of the race to whom JHWH shd. be God. The promise to Abraham (Gn. 22.[18], JE.), "In thy Seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," is not regarded by the Tgg. as referring to the M., yet fm. the fact that the apostles Peter (Ac. 3.[25]) and Paul (Gal. 3.[8]) use it with this application, we may presume it to have been common among the Jews at the time. In it there was a further restriction of the race whence the deliverer shd. spring. The next step in the definition is found in Jacob's blessing (Gn. 49.[10], J.) in the promise of the coming of "SHILOH," wh. is interpreted in the Tgg. as pointing to M.; the limitation is now to the tribe of Judah. Besides the restriction to the descendants of Judah there is an indication of the circumstances in wh. the people will be when the M. appears. Balaam's prophecy of the "Star" that shd. "come out of Jacob" and the "Sceptre" that shd. "rise out of Israel" (Nu. 24.[17], JE.) is rendered in Onkelos, "A king shall arise out of Jacob and the Meshiḥa be anointed fm. Israel." The Tg. of Jrs. has equivalent terms. This was regarded as foretelling a conquering king as M. In Moses' prophecy (Dt. 18.[15]) of a "Prophet . . . like unto" him whom the Lord "wd. raise up," though there is no indication in the Tgg. that the "Prophet" was identified with M., yet as the assumption of this identity is the ground of the arguments of Peter (Ac. 3.[22]) and Stephen (Ac. 7.[37]), it must have been a commonplace of Jewish Christology.*

After the law in the Jewish Canon come the prophets. In them fm. their office the doctrine of the M. was especially prominent. The evolution proceeded on different lines in prophetic literature fm. what it did in the Torah. In the Law the eye was always directed to a person; his descent and function were made step by step more definite: in the prophets attention is more turned to the background, the times of the M. rather than the M. Himself, "the Day of the Lord" rather than "the Lord's Anointed." Only later did the eyes rest on the M. who made the glory of the time. "The Day of the Lord" has two aspects wh. are presented to us in Is. 61.[2]: "To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God." The most common view of the "Day of the Lord" is the latter, as in Jl. 2.[11], "the D. of the L. is great and very terrible": this terror is sometimes due to the destruction of the enemies of God's people (cp. Jl. 3.[11-17]); again, as Am. 5.[18], the D. of the L. is one of chastisement to Israel. That wh. most impressed the Jewish people was the aspect of the times of the M. exhibited in Is. 2.[2-4] and Mi. 4.[1, 2]; it was to be a time of the splendour of Israel. As indicated above, this period of glory is associated with M. as in Ho. 3.[5]. As to the personal M., while the law had carried the definition only to the tribe of Judah, the prophets have taken the family of David as that fm. wh. the M. shd. spring. Frequently, as in Ho. 3.[5] and Is. 11.[1-10], it is David himself who is to reappear; this is prominent in Ezekiel, e.g. Ek. 34.[23], 37.[24, 25]; cp. Jr. 30.[9]. Another aspect is presented to us; it wd. seem as if the whole Davidic house was the object of the Messianic hope, as in Am. 9.[11] and Zc. 13.[1]. Again it is a scion of the House of David who is to be the M., as Is. 9.[6, 7], 11.[1]. The figure in the latter passage is modified slightly in Jr. 23.[5], 33.[15], "the Righteous Branch." While this designation of the Davidic House as that fm. wh. the M. was to come may be regarded as beginning in the promise to David that his "throne shd. be established for ever," it may be said to culminate in the prophecy of Micah (Mi. 5.[2], Heb. v. 1).

In this passage we have the place of the Messiah's origin stated. That this prophecy was regarded as relating to the M. is proved fm. Tg. Jn. l.c.: "Thou Bethlehem-Ephrath art reckoned as little among the thousands of the House of Judah; fm. thee shall come forth before me the Meshiḥa, to be made the ruler over Isr., whose name was spoken fm. of old fm. everlasting days." Although we cannot maintain that Micah realised the full meaning of his words, the last clause points to the eternal pre-existence of the M., and is thus in perfect harmony with the Christian conception of the nature of prophecy (1 P. 1.[11]).

The suffering M. of Is. 53. does not seem to have been generally recognised by the Jews at the time of our Lord, although later they devised a M. "ben Joseph." Yet the prophecy of Zechariah of the lowliness of the coming King mt. be regarded as preparing for this. The prophetic representation of the M. has greater definiteness than that in the law; further, the kingship of the M. is more emphasised; the last word of the law is "the prophet," the last word of the prophets is the "lowly King," "sitting on an ass."

* A singular passage in Tg. PJ. on Gn. 35.[21] must be noted: to that verse is added the clause, "The place whence the King Meshiḥa will be revealed at the end of the days."

The Hagiographa have not so many evidences of the Jewish expectation of a M. Daniel, reckoned among the Kethubim in our modern Heb. Bibles—tho' by the LXX, by the Jews of Palestine in the time of our Lord, by Josephus, by the Jews of Asia Minor in the time of Melito regarded as a prophet—has striking references to the times and person of the M. His kingdom is to be the final and permanent empire; it is to differ in character fm. all that preceded it; it is rock instead of metal (Dn. 2.[34]), it is human instead of bestial (7.[13]). In this last case the kingdom is merged in the King; he is "Messiah the Prince," who after 69 year-weeks "fm. the going forth of the commandment (dabar, 'word,' 'thing,' 'matter') to restore and build Jrs." "shall be cut off" (for fuller discussion of this see DANIEL). The Psalms are most frequently quoted in the NT. in proof of the Messiahship of Jesus. Without attempting to give all the passages, we may consider the leading features of the M. as presented in the Psalms. He is to be of Davidic descent, a King, a conqueror who shall reign in peace and righteousness over a vast empire. The Christology of the Psalms may be said to culminate in Ps. 110., when the M. is declared to be a "priest after the order of Melchizedek." That this was reckoned as Messianic by the Jews is proved by Mw. 22.[41-45] (cp. Mk. 12.[35-37] and Lk. 20.[41-44]).

The period between the Testaments is represented by the Apocrypha and the Jewish Apocalyptic Literature. The collection of books known as the Apocrypha, with the exception of 2 (4) Esdras, has nothing of the M. It is very different with the Apocalyptic books, wh. all point more or less to the M. and his times. During the period of Persian domination, and that portion of the Greek period when the Jews were under the Lagids, as they were allowed to pursue their own worship and customs unhindered, the hopes of a coming M. were in abeyance. With the advent of the Seleucids, with their determination to Hellenise the Jews, Messianic ideas revived. These are most prominent in the books of Enoch, the largest and most important portion of this literature, and that wh. is most closely linked with the NT. In Enoch the M. is spoken of in terms that make him if not Divine at least superhuman. He is called in one portion "Son of Man," yet sits on God's throne as the "Elect One"; he is to be supreme teacher: "The secrets of wisdom stream forth fm. his mouth." One passage (62.[5]) is to be noted where the M. is called "Son of the Woman," as it seems to have a reference to the "protevangel" in Gn. 3.[16]. The Psalter of Solomon is rich in references to the M. and his times. The 11th of these Psalms gives a glowing account of Messianic times, but the 17th is especially Messianic; the M. is the Son of David, he is called Χριστος κύριος (wh. suggests the Gospels), God makes him mighty in the Holy Ghost, and his kingdom is to be everlasting. The other Apocalyptic books are of less importance as to the Jewish notions of the M. The Apocalypse of Baruch devotes itself to a sensuous description of the pleasures of the times of the M., when Behemoth and Leviathan shall afford meat for the saints. The Assumption of Moses is only a fragment, and the Book of Jubilees avoids the subject wholly.

As to the time when our Lord was on earth, the ideas of the Jews as to the M. seem to have been that he was to be a man, the descendant of David, born in Bethlehem, and a conquering King. Yet he was to be endowed with immortality, and have almost Divine attributes; ideas wh. were summed up in the title "Son of Man."

It may be noted here that in regard to Jn. 12.[34] the arguments of Westcott and Godet are founded on mistake. It is true the natural meaning of the English implies that to those who used the words, "Who is this Son of Man?" the term was an unfamilar one; but the Gr., although not excluding the English meaning, naturally implies that the speakers knew the term, but the attributes assigned seemed to indicate another sort of person than that ordinarily designated "Son of Man." The deduction of Westcott is excluded by the connection. If in v. 32 He had designated Himself as "S. of M.," Westcott's view wd. have had some logical foundation; but the title only occurs once previously in the chapter, when the Greeks are introduced; then, speaking not to the multitude but to His disciples, our Lord says, "Now is the hour come that the Son of Man shd. be glorified." The multitude introduce the term themselves as the direct equivalent to the term "Christ." Their language may be paraphrased: "We always thought that 'S. of M.' meant 'Christ,' and that this Jesus, when He called Himself so, claimed to be M., but He speaks of being crucified. What Son of Man is this?" This is the view of Alford, Meyer, Lücke, Luthardt, Hengstenberg, Tholuck, and others.

The Jewish views did not include "the Suffering Messiah" (SERVANT OF THE LORD). In the Talmud we have "M. ben Joseph" who was to suffer, and "M. ben David" who was to reign; the earliest authority to whom this is attributed is Rabbi Dosa (c. A.D. 250) in the Tract Sukkah, 52ab. Even he is to begin as a conqueror. The Jewish imagination goes to wildest lengths in picturing the glories of Messianic times. An interesting side question is the Samaritan views of the M. Merx discovered a Samaritan poem of pre-Christian origin on the M. who was designated Thaheb; the most plausible explanation of this name is, "He who causes to return." He is to bring back Judah to Israel, to recover the sacred vessels wh. had been hid on Mt. Gerizim, to conquer seven nations, and to reign many years: he was not, however, to be immortal; after a life of 110 years he was to die; like Joshua, failing by ten years to attain to the years of Moses.

MESSENGER, tr. of Heb. mal'āk (2 S. 3.[12]), and of Gr. ἄγγελος (Lk. 7.[24]), usually trd. "angel." ἀπόστολος, "one sent out," is rendered "messenger" in 2 Cor. 8.[22] and Php. 2.[25].

METALS, METALLURGY, MINES, MINING. One of the earliest steps in budding civilisation was acquiring the art of extracting metals fm. the earth and using them to form weapons, tools, or ornaments. Very early men were attracted by the beauty of the precious metals gold and silver, and learned to form them into ornaments. These two metals are those most frequently mentioned in Scripture. Gold, while its superior value was recognised, was not used so much as silver for a medium of exchange. Wealth in gold was stored up in bracelets and necklaces, as it is at present among the Arabs. To show the frequency with which the word "gold" occurs in Scrip. we may mention that zāhāb, the common word for that metal, is found about 360 times. The word keseph, "silver," occurs about as often, but in two out of every three cases it is translated "money." It does not seem to have been circulated in the form of coins, but if we may judge fm. Egyptian paintings, in rings.* Rods of metal are used as money on the West Coast of Africa, and bars of metal may have been used in this way. Achan's "wedge of gold" probably implies some conventional shape (see MONEY). In the NT. these metals are more rarely referred to; chrusos (Mw. 2.[11]), chrusion (Ac. 3.[6]), "gold," and arguros (Mw. 10.[9]) and argurion (Mw. 26.[15]), "silver," occurring 22 and 14 times respectively. The proportionate value of gold to silver seems to be as one to nine. Brass (Aram. nĕḥāsh (Dn. 2.[32]); Heb. nĕḥōsheth (Gn. 4.[22]); nĕḥūshāh (Jb. 28.[2])), or, as it ought in general to be rendered, either copper or bronze, is the next most frequent in occurrence in Scripture. Probably where we have reference to mining of the metal, as Dt. 8.[9], the implication is that it is copper that is meant, but where the reference is to things, such as armour, e.g. 1 S. 17.[5], bronze must be intended. Before iron was rendered serviceable to man copper was used, and means were found of hardening it through alloys, so that it cd. be used for making swords and other sharp weapons of war. Cutting tools were made of it, by wh. the Egyptians carved statues of porphyry and engraved inscriptions on them. It is to be noted that in the only case where copper is mentioned (Ezra 8.[27]), "vessels of fine copper (Heb. nĕḥōsheth) precious as gold," it is probably "brass" that is really meant. Although the metal zinc, the union of wh. with copper produces brass, was only recognised and separated in the beginning of the eighteenth century, it was known that if "cadmia" (calamine), an earth wh. is recognised to be an oxide of zinc, were melted in a furnace along with copper, the result was a bright yellow metal—in short, brass (Plin. Nat. Hist. xxx. 10). It is poss. that the "fine brass" (chalkolibanos, Rv. 1.[15]) was what we mean by brass. In the NT. brass (bronze) is used for money (Mw. 10.[9]), the coinage for smaller values being usually bronze. The sonorous quality of bronze, unnoted in OT., is referred to by St. Paul (1 Cor. 13.[1]). Iron, the metal that is next in frequency of scriptural mention, was well known, but was used not for sharp weapons as swords or spears, but more for agricultural implements, as harrows (2 S. 12.[31]), coulters (1 S. 13.[21]), and axes (2 K. 6.[6]); weapons of iron (Jb. 20.[24]) were probably maces or battle-axes, weapons that were formidable by their weight rather than by their edge. Lead is known for its weight (Ex. 15.[10]), for its union with silver in ore (Ek. 22.[20]). Tin must have been well known as a component of bronze; but it was also known as present in silver ore (Ek. 22.[20]). It is mentioned as an article of commerce (Ek. 27.[12]). It is to be noted that quicksilver, though known to the Greeks, was not known to the Jews.

Mines and Mining.—Although fm. the description given of Palestine, "a land whose stones are iron and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass" (Dt. 8.[9]), one wd. think that metals were easily got there, they are really rare; copper was found in the Lebanon, and iron in the Anti-lebanon; but these were without the bounds of Palestine proper. One mt. almost be led to think that the iron hills of wh. Moses speaks are the masses of black basalt that here and there burst through the white limestone of Palestine. Basalt is black, hard, heavy, and is impregnated with iron. At the same time the writer of Job must have been well acquainted with the process of mining. The opening verses of chap. 28. have all the appearance of being written by an eyewitness of the process. In verse 4 "the shaft" that is "broken open" "away from where men sojourn" evidently refers to the earliest form of mine, in wh. an outcrop of metal was followed into the rock. The mention of "swinging to and fro" away fm. men implies that the miners whom the poet had seen used also perpendicular shafts, though not probably of any great depth. Pathways had been cut that neither bird had seen or wild beast had trod. There is reference (vv. 1, 2) to the mining of the four metals best known to the Jews, silver and gold, iron and copper. There is note of what is the great foe of the miner, the inflow of water: "He bindeth the streams that they trickle not." This information seems to have been drawn fm. watching the Egyptian miners in the Sinaitic peninsula. These date as far back as the reign of Thothmes II. and his sister Queen Hatasu. The exactitude of the delineation mt. excuse the Jews in ascribing to Moses,

* Though these rings frequently appear on the monuments, in no instance have the rings themselves been found.

Not only is there reference to mining but to other processes of metallurgy. There is the refining of gold; it often has an alloy of silver of a proportion of fm. 2 to 30 per cent.; it is a process of considerable delicacy. Fm. the word used, however, with regard to gold refining, it seems probable that the process referred to was the washing of alluvial gold and picking out the grains fm. the sand and mud. Silver has also to be refined, as tin and lead are generally present in the ore. There are several processes by wh. this purifying is carried out, but that wh. the Jews knew of appears to have been a variety of what is called "cupellation." The furnace and the blowpipe performed an important part in the process (Ml. 3.[2,3]).

even the Malagasy have a way of smelting iron without a flux; though fm. the abundance of limestone in Palestine the discovery of the use of lime as a flux for iron mt. be made even by accident. Most of the iron implements used by the Hebrews seem to have been hammered. Lead was used for writing, as is seen in Jb. 19.[24], "Oh, that my words . . . were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever." The lead would seem to have been set in the rock and then written on—a practice that implies the use of leaden tablets. Tradition removed the knowledge of metals back to a remote antiquity. In Genesis 4.[22] we are told that Tubal-cain was "an instructor of every artificer in brass (copper) and iron." The ability to make alloys that wd. give requisite hardness or softness to metals, implied in the existence of bronze, showed Figs. 1, 2 making jewellery; 3, blowing the fire for melting the gold; 4, weighing the gold; 5, clerk or scribe; 6, 7, 8, 9, washing gold; 10, superintendent. The remaining part relates to the preparation of the metal before it was worked.

Other forms of metallurgy seem also to have been understood: e.g., plating with fine plates of gold. The ark (Ex. 37.[2]) and the altar of incense (Ex. 37.[25]) prove that. It is probable that the statues said to be golden were in reality only plated with gold. It seems likely that the golden calf had a core of clay (Ex. 32.[4]). The rebellion of Korah gives the occasion of the fact being recorded that the bronze censers cd. be beaten into plates for a covering of the altar (Nu. 16.[38, 39]). We have in Isaiah (44.[12]) a picture of an ancient forge, of the smith seizing the glowing iron with the tongs out of the fire and hammering it with hammers, till with heat and exertion he is ready to faint. In Jeremiah we have a reference to the "iron furnace" as the symbol of the severest affliction, from the greater heat required to smelt iron than other metals known to the Hebrews. Some have maintained that the Jews must have been ignorant of iron for that reason, but a familiarity with metals of long date. Though the word "steel" occurs in our English AV. (Ps. 18.[34]; Jb. 20.[24]), it represents the word elsewhere translated "brass," and so it is rendered in the RV. That "bows" shd. be made of brass implies a mode of treatment of brass to make it so elastic unknown to modern metallurgy, and made the mistranslation excusable.

METEYARD (Heb. middāh, Lv. 19.[35]), usually translated "measure" (Ex. 26.[2]; Jb. 28.[25]).

METHEG-AMMAH. If this be the name of a city, it is not otherwise known (2 S. 8.[1]). RV. trs. "the bridle of the mother city." Perhaps we shd. read, as in the corresponding passage (1 Ch. 18.[1]), "Gath, the mother city" (Wellhausen, Samuel, 174).

METHUSAEL, RV. METHUSHAEL, a descendant of Cain, father of Lamech (Gn. 4.[18]).

METHUSELAH ("man of a dart," Ges.), son of Enoch and fr. of Lamech (Gn. 5.[21f.]). Accdg. to MT., M. lived 187 yrs. before the birth of Lamech and 782 after; according to LXX 167 before and 802 after the birth of Lamech; in all 969 yrs. The Sam. differs fm. both, and makes the age of M. before the birth of Lamech 67, after wh. he lived 653 yrs.; in all 720 yrs.

ME-ZAHAB, grandfather of Mahetabel the wife of Hadar, one of the "dukes" of Edom (Gn. 36.[39]; 1 Ch. 1.[50]). The obscurity of the man gave the later rabbis occasion for much play with the name, wh. means "waters of gold." Perhaps the name of a place is intended, in wh. case some wd. identify it with Dizahab.

MIAMIN. See Mijamin.

MIBHAR, son of Hagri, one of David's heroes (1 Ch. 11.[38]). In the parallel passage (2 S. 23.[36]) "of Zobah, Bani the Gadite," stands for "Mibhar the son of Hagri"; and it is probably the correct reading.

MIBSAM, "sweet odour." (1) A son of Ishmael (Gn. 25.[13]). No tribe with a name resembling this has been identified. It has been suggested that it may be associated with some district in Arabia rich in aromatics. (2) A son of Simeon (1 Ch. 4.[25]).

MICAH. (1) The story of Micah preserved in the 17th and 18th chaps. of Judges furnishes a priceless glimpse of the social and religious conditions prevailing among the Israelites in those old days when as yet "there was no king in Israel; every man did that which was right in his own eyes."

Micah lived in Mount Ephraim. He had stolen eleven hundred pieces of silver from his mother. His mother's hot curse upon the thief roused his superstitious fears, and he restored the silver. Her exclamation of relief shows that she believed in the efficacy of her curses, and her outcry was one of joy because her son, by restoration of the plunder, had escaped the peril. In her thankfulness she dedicated a portion of the silver, giving two hundred pieces to an artificer, who produced therewith a graven image and a molten image, to take their places "in the house of gods" owned by her son. In this house were an ephod and teraphim, and one of Micah's own sons was consecrated priest. He was aware that this was an irregularity, and welcomed the arrival of a young Levite from Bethlehem Judah, whom he engaged at a particular stipend to be to him "a father and a priest." With this arrangement Micah was well content. "Now know I," he said, "that the Lord will do me good, seeing I have a Levite to my priest." He had reckoned without the Danites. That tribe, becoming uneasy in their narrow territory, sent out spies to search the land, who might guide their brethren on a raid to secure for themselves wider quarters. The spies, going through Mount Ephraim, took shelter for the night with Micah. Hearing the voice of the young priest, probably conducting worship in the "house of gods," they knew it. He was none other than Jonathan, son of Gershom the son of Moses (18.[30])—the n in the name of Gershom's father was inserted, changing it from Moses to Manasseh, that the great lawgiver might be saved the disgrace of association with such a degenerate grandson. One with such a distinguished parentage was sure to be well known in the south country. Attracted by the voice they had recognised, they found him, and a few swift inquiries elicited the truth as to his position. Receiving an oracular response assuring them of prosperity, they went their way. This was the beginning of evils for Micah. When the six hundred raiders of Dan, girt with weapons of war, passed through Mount Ephraim, the spies brought them to the house of Micah. His erewhile guests entered and carried away the images and ephod by wh. he set such store. The priest's remonstrances were feeble, and, tempted with the prospect of being "father and priest" to a whole tribe, and not to the house of one man, he became a joyful partner in the theft, and went with them on their expedition. Micah's reasonable complaints were silenced by threats of violence. The idols of his careful providing became the gods of the new shrine at Laish; and the priest of his consecration became the founder of a line of priests who ministered in that idolatrous sanctuary "until the day of the captivity of the land."

The suggestions of this narrative need not be drawn out at length; but we may look at one or two of them, because of their special interest.

While his conduct betrays acquaintance with the provisions of the Mosaic law—e.g. his joy at securing a Levite to be his priest—Micah and the men of his time seem to have lost perception of its spiritual significance. His conception of how God might be acceptably worshipped was on a level with that of the idolatrous peoples of his time. There is no hint of surprise at his "house of gods," or at his procuring of graven and molten images. His ideas may therefore be taken as fairly representing those of his fellow-countrymen. Although a Levite, Jonathan did not belong to a priestly family, and was not eligible for that office. Yet he did not scruple to undertake the functions of priest, and that in a shrine full of the instruments of idolatry. Considering his relationship to the great lawgiver, we have here evidence of a startling kind as to the condition of religion in Israel. Again, if it were necessary for a grandson of Moses to wander about in search of some occupation, we may infer that in the general religious decadence the provision for the Levites was largely neglected. As Jonathan was from Bethlehem in Judah, a town never associated with the Levites, the members of that tribe would appear to have been scattered among the cities of Israel. The conduct of the Danites shows that not only was there no king, but also no central authority in Israel, capable of restraining lawless bands from enterprises that meant disaster to peaceful inhabitants of the land. The company of six hundred freebooters were a law unto themselves. They acted on the simple principle that right was might, and there is no suggestion that there was anything singular in this. Withal, they were very religious men, and apparently they would not have been comfortable without religious sanctions of some kind. But religion must in no way interfere with their selfish predatory designs; and in this regard the "priest" was on a level with themselves. In such circumstances, without organisation, destitute of any real sense of unity, the people must fall an easy prey to attacks from without. It was a time of religious decay, of social disorder, and of perpetual insecurity.

(2) Ancestor of Beerah, who was prince of the tribe of Reuben when it was led into captivity (1 Ch. 5.^{5}). (3) Son of Mephibosheth, grandson of Jonathan (1 Ch. 8.^{34}), called "Micha" (2 S. 9.^{12}). (4) A Kahothite Levite, son of Uzziel the brother of Amram (1 Ch. 23.^{20}). (5) Father of Abdon (2 Ch. 34.^{20}). (6) The prophet (see following article).

MICAH, sixth of the Minor Prophets, was a younger contemporary of Isaiah, and belonged to Moresheth, a small town in the maritime plain, near Gath. He was a man of the people, and has little to say about the political situation, wh. is so prominent in the prophecies of Isaiah. His interests are preeminently relgs. and moral, and though he lives in a time of keen political activity, he stands apart fm. it. It is the wickedness in the land wh. he condemns, and he speaks not of the political folly of the princes, but of their injustice. The competing claims of Asyr. and Egp. to influence in Judah are not even mentioned, and when he speaks of Asyr. at all, it is merely as the enemy. He denounces the prophets for their falseness, the priests for their selfishness, and the great men for their harshness to the poor. M. goes in advance of Isaiah, when he declares that their fancied security in Zion is vain, for in the day of reckoning Zion itself will be destroyed. The refc. to M. in Jeremiah 26.$^{17-19}$ shows not only that he prophesied in the time of Hezekiah, but also that his prophecy was the same as that which we possess. It reveals at the same time his influence over the k. and people. Fm. the denunciations of M. it is evident that Hezekiah's reformation had in great measure failed. To a superficial observer all mt. appear well, but the improvement was more apparent than real. The first part of M.'s prophecy, at least, was written before the fall of Samaria in B.C. 722. He was fearless in his denunciation of evil, and he attacked the unworthy rulers with a boldness and directness wh. are unsurpassed. But at the same time he was a prophet of hope. True, Zion shall be ploughed like a field, and Jrs. will become heaps, but a deliverer will afterwards come. Not only will He be a desct. of David, but he will be born in Bethlehem, the birthplace of David.

The prophecy begins with a picture of the coming of J". in power and majesty to deal with His people's sins. Samaria is to be destroyed, for she is past redemption, but the agony of the prophet is great, as he sees how the ruin of Samaria will affect his beloved Judah also (1.$^{2-9}$). The approach of the enemy is next described, with its effect on certain small towns in M.'s native district, on the names of wh. he makes a punning commentary (1.$^{10-16}$). The next chap. describes the evil doings of the great men, who spoil their poorer neighbours and refuse to give heed to the prophet's warning. They will only listen to those whose words are pleasant, and their punishment will be accdg. to their deeds (2.$^{1-11}$). The two following verses consist of a prophecy of restoration, as if the prophet were suddenly impressed by the thought of what mt. yet be, if only the people became difft.; but these verses break the continuity of thought, and may be out of their proper place in the book, if fm. the hand of M. at all (2.$^{12, 13}$). The next chap. describes in vivid detail the evil practices of the leaders of Judah. They think that, in spite of all their wicked deeds, no evil shall come upon them, for the Lord is in the midst of them. M. now announces that this hope is vain. Even Zion shall be destroyed (3.$^{1-12}$). This picture of destruction is followed, as often in the prophets, by a promise of restoration. The change of tone is so great, however, that many critics have concluded that we have in the rest of the prophecy the work of another hand, or of several hands. But it is quite poss. to attribute the whole bk. to M., for a prophet is a man of varying moods, like all other men, and difft. passages express his thoughts, it may be, at widely difft. times. It is prophesied that in later days the glory of Zion will be greater than before (4.$^{1-8}$), but the people must first pass through a time of trial. Zion shall be oppressed, but her enemies know not the thoughts of the Lord (4.^{9}–5.^{1}). In a magnificent passage, a Deliverer is foretold as coming fm. Bethlehem to defend His people, and to bring them back to His service fm. all false worship (5.$^{2-15}$).

There is greater force in the argument that chaps. 6. and 7. are fm. a difft. hand, but even here the case is not proven. They deal with a new situation, and can find a fitting background in the age of Manasseh. The style is dramatic, and the writing is full of vigour. The Lord has a controversy with His people, and He calls upon them to answer His charge, in the presence of the everlasting hills, wh. have witnessed all (6.[1, 2]). The Lord reminds them of His former mercies, and indicates the return He requires fm. them. In a passage, wh. is unsurpassed in the OT., the true sptl. worship of God is described, as it has been taught by God fm. of old (6.[3-8]). The people are accused of sin, cert. outstanding sins being specified, and are threatened with punishment (6.[9-16]). In the final chap. the prophet condemns the nation by confessing its sins in its name (7.[1-6]). But Isr. repents and turns to God, believing that God will still hear and deliver (7.[7-13]), and the prophecy ends with a promise of what the Lord will do for His people, and with a hymn of praise to God for His deliverance (7.[14-20]). JOHN DAVIDSON.

MICAIAH, s. of Imlah, was a prophet in Isr. in the time of Ahab, whose story is told in 1 K. 22.[4-28] and 2 Ch. 18.[3-27]. Ahab had invited Jehoshaphat of Judah to go with him agst. the Syrians, and they first inquired of the Lord as to their success. After the false prophets had spoken, M. was produced, and uttered his striking prophecy, in wh. he declared that Jehovah had allowed a lying spt. to take possession of all the prophets, that Ahab mt. be led to his doom. The vision of the scene in heaven reminds us of the first chap. of Job. M. was imprisoned in punishment of his uncompromising attitude, but his prophecy was fulfilled. In these few verses, wh. tell us all we know of M., we are made acquainted with a strong, brave servant of J″., who was prepared to deliver his message as it had been given to him, without regard to the favour or disfavour of men. JOHN DAVIDSON.

MICHAEL (" who is like God ? "). (1) A man of Asher, father of Sethur, who represented that tribe among the spies (Nu. 13.[13]). (2) Son of Abihail, a Gadite settled in Bashan (1 Ch. 5.[13]). (3) An ancestor of the foregoing (1 Ch. 5.[14]). (4) A Gershonite Levite, great-grandfather of Asaph (1 Ch. 6.[40]). (5) A chief man of Issachar, one of Izrahiah's five sons, who mustered their " troops of the battle host " in the days of David, " six and thirty thousand ; for they had many wives and sons " (1 Ch. 7.[3f.]). (6) A Benjamite, son of Beriah (1 Ch. 8.[16]). (7) One of the Manassite captains who cast in his lot with David at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.[20]). (8) Father of Omri, prince of Issachar in David's time (1 Ch. 27.[18]), poss. the same as No. 5. (9) A son of Jehoshaphat, murdered by his brother Jehoram (2 Ch. 21.[2, 4]). (10) Father of Zebadiah, one of those who returned with Ezra (Ez. 8.[8] ; 1 Es. 8.[34]). (11) The archangel (Dn. 10.[13], 12.[1] ; Ju.[9] ; Rv. 12.[7]). He is " the first of the chief princes," and the angelic head of the Israelite nation. He is " the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people " in the time of trouble. Angelic appearances, according to the sacred records, were most frequent in times when changes were imminent, e.g. in the period of the Judges, and in that of the Captivity : but the name of Michael is mentioned only in the later period, when angelic functions were distinguished and assigned to separate angels. Thus with Gabriel are associated angelic ministration towards men ; while Michael stands for them, in the name and strength of God, in the struggle against the power of Satan. And so in Rv. 12.[7] he leads in war against the great dragon, " the old serpent, he that is called the Devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world."

In the passage in Jude (v. 9), " Michael the archangel, when contending with the Devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing judgment, but said, The Lord rebuke thee," we have an echo of Jewish traditionary lore. There the archangel figures in many scenes in the life of the great lawgiver, and particularly at his funeral (Dt. 34.[6]). The cause of the contention there was a claim put forward by the Devil for possession of Moses' body, because in the old days, before the Deliverance, he had murdered the Egyptian. For further particulars as to Jewish views of Michael see Jw. En. s.v.

MICHAIAH. (1) Father of Achbor (2 K. 22.[12]), identical with " Micah," father of Abdon (2 Ch. 34.[20]). (2) Son of Zaccur, of the family of Asaph (Ne. 12.[35]), identical with " Micah," son of Zichri (1 Ch. 9.[15]), and with Micha, son of Zabdi (Ne. 11.[17]). (3) One of the priestly trumpeters at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Ne. 12.[41]). (4) Daughter of Uriel, wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (2 Ch. 13.[2]). She is called " Maachah the daughter of Abishalom," i.e. Absalom (1 K. 15.[2]). She was probably the grand-daughter of Absalom, by his daughter Tamar (so Josephus—see MAACHAH). (5) One of the princes sent out by Jehoshaphat to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Ch. 17.[7]). (6) Son of Gemariah, named only in Jr. 36.[11, 13].

MICHAL, younger dr. of Saul (1 S. 14.[49]). She loved David, attracted no doubt by the heroism and chivalry of the young soldier (18.[20]), a love reciprocated, if we may judge fm. the liberal fashion in wh. the strange dowry was provided (vv. 25ff.). The demand of Saul betrayed his sentiments towards David. Very soon M. had occasion, by feminine artifice, to save her husband's life (19.[11ff.]). After David's flight Saul gave M. to Palti of Gallim (25.[44]). Her romantic affection of early days was prob. undermined by David's marriages with Abigail and Ahinoam. When torn fm. Palti (2 S. 3.[14ff.]), prob. in order that the presence of the king's dr. might in a way legitimate David's claim to the throne, she seems to have been quite estranged. This easily accounts for her contemptuous words on the day of David's joyful arrival with the ark (6.[16, 20]). Childlessness is indicated as the punishment of her contempt (v. 22f.). See MERAB.

MICHMASH, MICHMAS. About six miles N. of Jrs. the face of the country is split open by the great rent of Wâdy es-Suweinît, wh. sinks swiftly down the eastern declivity into Wâdy el-Qelt. On the S. of the wady stands Jeba'—Geba of Benjamin—and on the N. the vill. of Mukhmâs. Between these villages runs the only path by wh. the gorge can be crossed (1 S. 13.²³). Saul encamped at M. (v. 2), whence he was driven by the Phil., who made M. their headquarters, guarding the passage of the wady. To the E. of the pass on the N. rises the great crag known to the Hebs. as Bozez; and further E. that known as Seneh. The Phil. mt. well think them absolutely unscalable. This formed the scene of the heroic exploit of Jonathan and his armour-bearer (14.). The occurrence of an earthquake assisted to throw the Phil. into terror and confusion. M. was occupied after the Exile (Ez. 2.²⁷, &c.). At a later time it was the headquarters of Jonathan the Maccabee (1 M. 9.⁷³; Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 6). For a description of the district see Conder, Tent Work, 254ff.).

SCENE OF ATTACK ON THE PHILISTINE CAMP BY JONATHAN

MICHMETHAH, "hiding place," on the boundary of Manasseh (Jo. 16.⁶, 17.⁷). It occurs only with the article, and is therefore probably the name, not of a town, but of some natural feature of the landscape. Possibly the name survives in Mukhneh, the plain E. of Gerizim.

MICHRI, ancestor of a Benjamite family (1 Ch. 9.⁸).

MIDDIN, an unidentd. town in the Wilderness of Judah, named between Beth-arabah and Secacah (Jo. 15.⁶¹).

MIDIAN, s. of Abraham by Keturah (Gn. 25.²), also the people who claimed to be his descendants (Nu. 22.⁴), who are called MIDIANITES (Gn. 37.²⁸). M. had five sons, Ephah, Epher, Hanoch, Abidah, and Eldaah (Gn. 25.⁴). We are told that "unto the sons of the concubines wh. Abraham had" he "gave gifts" (Gn. 25.⁶). These gifts wd. mean not only herds of cattle and flocks of sheep but also bands of slaves; these slaves were regarded as part of the clan of their proprietor. They seem to have combined with the kindred Abrahamite tribe of Ishmaelites. We see this in the story of Joseph, in wh. those who carried him down to Egypt are sometimes called Ishmaelites and sometimes Midianites (Gn. 37.²⁵; cp. v. 28, also Jg. 8.²⁴). They appear to have taken the carrying trade with their camels; crossing the Jordan fm. Gilead they made their way down to Egypt, wh. naturally was the principal market for Syria. They then seem to be inhabiting the region E. of Jordan. We next encounter Midian in the peninsula of Sinai. When Moses fled fm. Egypt he found refuge with Jethro, priest of Midian (Ex. 2.¹⁵). Jethro and those about him appear to have retained a purity of faith and worship wh. suggests a tradition of Abrahamic practice. This purity of ritual was acknowledged by Moses. When in the desert Jethro came to meet Israel, Jethro acted as priest, and the brethren Moses and Aaron partook of the sacrifice (Ex. 18.¹²). There is a geographical difficulty wh. is enhanced by the moral difficulty of the idolatry of the Midianites met with later; the land of Gilead is far fm. Mt. Sinai. A further point of contrast is the fact that the Abrahamic rite of circumcision is not practised among them, hence Zipporah's horror of it (Ex. 3.²⁵). It is to be noted that, in the narrative connected with Jethro, Midian is always a region, never a race (see Ex. 4.¹⁹). It may be that a chance resemblance has resulted in an identification. This is further confirmed by the fact that Jethro is declared to have been a "Kenite" in Jg. 1.¹⁶. Little more than a generation later we find the Midianites in Gilead practising impure rites in the worship of Baal-peor. They seem to have dwelt in the lands E. of Jordan among the Moabites and other settled races, much as the nomadic Bedouin wander about in Palestine at present. It is to be noted that the victory of Hadad, k. of Edom, over the Midianites was gained "in the fields of Moab" (Gn. 36.³⁵). The Moabites seem to have made an alliance with them against Israel. They unite with them in hiring Balaam to curse Israel (Nu. 22.⁴); their daughters unite with those of Moab in seducing the children of Israel to worship Baal-peor (Nu. 25.¹; cp. v. 6). War is declared against Midian by Moses, a war of extermination (Nu. 31.[1-18]). Nothing of the kind is decreed against Moab or Ammon, although according to the genealogy Midian is nearer to Isr. than either of those nations. There is, not to speak of religious affinity, nothing of the kindly relationship wh. subsisted between Isr. and Jethro. Midian is next found intervening in the affairs of Israel in the days of GIDEON (Jg. 6.[1]–8.[28]). We are told that "the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and the Lord delivered them into the hands of Midian seven years." The M. had combined with the Amalekites and the "children of the East," i.e. the Bedouin of the desert to the east of Gilead, to raid the territory of Israel. They are said to have encamped in the land and eaten up the country like locusts. They represented the forces of lawlessness, wh. had to be annihilated if civilisation was to be possible. The Israelites, if we may read between the lines, did not submit tamely; there had been conflicts, in one of wh. brothers of GIDEON had fallen (Jg. 8.[18]). Gideon, taking advantage of the confusion which in an undisciplined host is apt to occur when sentinels are changed, made, as recorded in Jg. 7., a night attack upon their huge camp, adopting a stratagem which led them to imagine that they were being assailed from three different directions. In the panic which ensued, all rushing in terror through the darkness, it was impossible to distinguish friend from foe, and each one slew, or attempted to slay, every one he met. The greatest number of those who escaped from this mad turmoil of panic and slaughter turned to the Jordan valley, towards Abel Meholah and Zererath. Attempts made to effect a rally only delayed the flight, and enabled the Israelites to take the fords of Jordan against them. A considerable number, however, succeeded in crossing under their kings ZEBAH and ZALMUNNAH. Passing over Mount Gilead, they reached the remote quiet of their desert haunts, east of Nobah and Jogbehah, and there, in fancied security, they set no watch. But Gideon, though faint, yet pursued, and taking them by surprise, "discomfited all the host" and captured their two kings. After their defeat and slaughter at Moreh and the death of their princes, Oreb and Zeeb, and their kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, the Midianites disappear fm. Bible history. If Delitzsch is correct in identifying the Hayapa of the days of Tiglath-pileser with Ephah, the s. of Midian, the race remained extant to a much later time.

MIDWIVES were early employed by the Hebs. (Gn. 35.[17], &c.). They do not appear to have been numerous: only two are named in Ex. 1.[15ff.] The Heb. women, like other Orientals, had not much need of their assistance. See BIRTH.

MIGDAL-EDER, AV. EDAR, "flock-tower," an unidentd. place where Jacob spread his tent, between Bethlehem and Hebron (Gn. 35.[21]; cp. vv. 19, 27).

MIGDAL-EL, "tower of God," a town in Naphtali, named between Iron and Horem (Jo. 19.[38]). It may be either Khirbet el-Mejdel, three miles N. of Qedes, or Mejdel Islim, five miles NW. of this.

MIGDAL GAD, "tower of fortune," an unidentd. city of Judah, in the Shephelah (Jo. 15.[37]). There is no guide to its position. Three sites have been suggested: (1) Khirbet Mejdeleh, five miles S. of Beit Jibrīn; (2) Khirbet Mejādel, seven miles further S., with Tell Mejādel, an eminence with ruins, hard by. (3) El-Mejdel, 2½ miles NE. of 'Askalān.

MIGDOL is the Egyptian form of the Heb. Migdāl. (1) An unidentd. town near wh. Isr. encamped on leaving Goshen (Ex. 14.[2], &c.). The papyrus Anastasi (5.[20]) mentions a M. of the Pharaoh Sety I. in this district. (2) One of the Egyptian cities in wh. Jews dwelt (Jr. 44.[1], 46.[14]), marking the N. frontier of Egp., as Syene did the S. (Ek. 29.[10], 30.[6], RVm. is cert. correct). The Rm. Itinerarium Antonini notes a "Magdolo" 12 Rm. miles S. of Pelusium. Tell es-Semūt, a ruin on the old caravan road, 12 miles S. of Pelusium, agrees well enough as to position: but no certainty is possible.

MIGRON. (1) A place near Gibeah in Benjamin (1 S. 14.[2]). This is S. of Wādy es-Suweinīt, and cannot be identd. with (2). No trace of such a place has been found. While it is poss. that two towns so near each other had the same name, it is not likely. There may be some error in the text. (2) The mod. Makrūn, NW. of Michmash (Is. 10.[28]).

MIJAMIN. (1) Head of the sixth of the courses of priests instituted by David (1 Ch. 24.[9]). (2) One who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[7]), the same as Miamin (12.[5]) and Miniamin (12.[17]). (3) One who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[25], AV. Miamin), called "Maelus" (1 E. 9.[26]).

MIKLOTH. (1) Son of Jehiel of Gibeon (1 Ch. 8.[32], 9.[37f.]). (2) An officer in David's army (1 Ch. 27.[4]).

MIKNEIAH, a Levite, a gatekeeper of the ark (1 Ch. 15.[21]).

MILALAI. One of those who took part in the dedication of the walls (Ne. 12.[36]).

MILCAH. (1) Daughter of Haran, sister of Lot, and wife of her uncle Nahor. She was the mother of eight children. Bethuel, her youngest son, was father of Rebekah (Gn. 11.[29], 22.[20, 23], 24.[15, 24, 47]). (2) Fourth daughter of Zelophehad (Nu. 26.[23], &c.).

MILCOM. See MOLECH.

MILE (Gr. milion, fm. Lat. millarium) is only once mentioned (Mw. 5.[41]). The Roman mile was = 1618 yards. This was the unit of measurement used on their roads, and the remains of the Roman milestones are to be seen in many parts of Palestine —pillars, or columns by the wayside, with distances cut upon them. In NT. and Josephus, distance is generally reckoned in stadia—" furlongs."

MILETUS, an Ionian city on the coast of Caria, touched by St. Paul on his way to Jrs. (Ac. 20.[15, 17]; cp. 2 Tm. 4.[20]). Founded c. B.C. 1000 on the S. shore of the gulf of Latmos, into wh. flowed the Mæander, it became an important Gr. colony. Taken by the Persians, B.C. 495, it passed to the Seleucidæ. In the 2nd century it fell to Pergamos, and finally to the Romans, who joined it to the province of Asia. There was a considerable Jewish colony in M. (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 21). The silt of the river has enclosed the bay, making it an inland lake, and cut off M. fm. the sea by flat land, some five or six miles in breadth. What was once the island of Lade is now a hill in the plain. The poor vill. Palatia stands on the old site.

MILK and its products have always formed an important part of the diet (see FOOD, p. 201). Goat's milk is at the present day most generally used, and most highly prized in Palestine. It is almost invariably boiled before being drunk. It must in any case be " scalded " at once, if it is not to be used forthwith, or it will inevitably "turn." It is, however, very largely employed in a "curdled" form, called leben, the milk, when it is properly prepared, going to a firm curd. Perhaps the most refreshing of all drinks in the heat of an Eastern day is what the Arabs call shanīny. Milk is poured into a skin " bottle," in wh. are the sour remains of the last milking. It is shaken gently, and in a little time it becomes slightly sour. This, as it is, or mingled with a little water, is greatly appreciated. Milk in this latter form is clearly intended by the word wh. EV. trs. " butter " in Jg. 5.[25] (cp. 4.[19]). It also acts as a soporific. In other passages, however, butter is meant (Gn. 18.[8]; Pr. 30.[33], &c.). This is made by putting the milk in a skin bottle, wh. is then hung on a tripod (see illustration, page 201), and shaken until the butter comes. Butter, however delicious when it is fresh, cannot be kept for any time in the heat. It is therefore boiled, and in the form of samn, " clarified butter," it is restored to the skin bottles, in which it may be kept for considerable periods. This is used extensively for cooking purposes, rice prepared with samn being a favourite dish. It is also an article of barter with merchants from the city.

Cheese is made by removing the whey from the curd mentioned above, and a little salt is added. It is shaped in small disks about 6 in. in diameter and about 1 in. thick, and dried in the sun. This may be kept for a long time. A refreshing drink, also called shanīny, is made by grating this " cheese " into a glass of water. As it is easily carried in these small cakes, if water is available the traveller may often be regaled with this beverage in the tents of the Arabs.

The prohibition of seething a kid in its mother's milk (Ex. 23.[19], &c.) may have referred originally to some magical or idolatrous rite, of wh. we have now no knowledge. The Rabbinical Jews understood it to bar the taking of meat and milk at the same meal: and so particular are certain orthodox Jews at the present day, that they will not take milk in their tea, if they have had meat at the midday meal.

Whatever may have been the original significance of the phrase, " a land flowing with milk and honey," as applied to Palestine (Ex. 3.[8], &c.), it must always have conveyed a fairly accurate idea of the country. The multitudinous flocks furnish the milk, and the wild bees make abundant honey, in the securing of which the Arabs are adepts.

MILL, MILLSTONE. The most primitive form of " mill " for the grinding of grain in Palestine was the " rubbing-stone," specimens of which have been brought to light by recent excavations. (See illustrations in Macalister's Bible Side Lights, Fig. 28; Vincent's Canaan d'après l'exploration récente, Figs. 282, 283. Fig. 282 represents a flint rubbing-stone of the paleolithic age: 283, one from Egypt of the third dynasty.) It consisted of a large stone with slightly hollowed surface, on wh. the grain was laid, and crushed or rubbed down with an oblong stone which had a slight convexity on its under surface.

ARAB WOMEN GRINDING CORN WITH A HANDMILL, ROLLING OUT THE DOUGH, AND BAKING THE BREAD

The introduction of the " quern " was a distinct step in advance. Mr. Macalister figures some of the older type, discovered in the course of excavation at Gezer (PEFQ., 1903, p. 119f.). The lower and larger stone was fitted with an upright spindle, which passed through a perforation in the centre of the upper stone. Through this aperture also the grain was poured in. There was no handle by which the upper stone could be turned. This had to be done by grasping it with the hands. A complete rotation was thus inconvenient; and the stone appears to have been worked backward and forward, " through about one-third of a rotation."

The insertion of an upright handle near the outer edge of the upper stone, by which it could easily be made to rotate, was a great improvement. The stones were made larger, retaining something like the same proportion to each other in size, and the corn was passed through a perforation in the upper stone. It was usually turned by two women who sat over against each other, grasping the handle, one hand above the other (Mw. 24.[41]). This is still a familiar sight in many parts of Palestine. Under the Greek and Roman influence larger mills were introduced, the upper stone being turned by an ass (Mw. 18.[6], Gr. "a millstone turned by an ass," RVm.).

The grinding was the work of the women (Ex. 11.[5]; Mw. 24.[41]), as it is to this day in the East, wherever the old methods are used. This doubtless added to the ignominy of Samson's task (Jg. 16.[21]). The upper millstone was a weapon ready to a woman's hand (Jg. 9.[53]; 2 S. 11.[21]).

The water mill, now so common in Palestinian wadies, was unknown to the Hebrews. In most of them work is possible only during the rainy season. They stand silent during the long months of summer: and then the old hand mill is requisitioned again.

Both upper and nether millstones are frequently made of the hard, porous basalt which abounds in Palestine. There is a famous quarry where these are made near Khabab on the W. border of el-Lejā', whence they are transported by camels to all parts of the country: one stone forming a camel-load.

The mill was regarded as indispensable to the people's life (Dt. 24.[6]), and therefore might not be taken in pledge. The cessation of the sound of the millstones is the sign of utter desolation (Jr. 25.[10]; Rv. 18.[22]). See also MORTAR.

MILLET (Ek. 4.[9]), Heb. dōḥan, Arb. dukhn, is the Panicum miliaceum, a tall plant bearing dense clusters of small white seeds, wh. are often mixed with wheat and barley for bread. It shd. be distinguished fm. dhurah, wh. in seed resembles it.

MILLO. (1) The house of M. (Jg. 9.[6, 20], where we shd. prob. read "Beth M."), a place near Shechem, unidentd. (2) A tower on the fortifications of Jrs. built by Solomon (1 K. 9.[15], &c.), but prob. planned by David (2 S. 5.[9]): poss. the scene of Jehoash's murder (2 K. 12.[20]). See JERUSALEM.

MINISTER, MINISTRY. (1) Heb. mĕshārēth, part. of shārath, "to serve," one who renders the honourable service of a free man, as Joshua to Moses (Ex. 24.[13]; Jo. 1.[1]), an attendant to a monarch (1 K. 10.[5]), &c. The term is also used by the prophets for those who serve in the Temple, and officiate at the altars—the Levites and priests (Jr. 33.[21]; Jl. 1.[13], &c.). In both senses the verb constantly appears throughout OT. It is distinct in meaning fm. 'ābad, wh. means "to serve as a slave." This word is used, indeed, of service rendered to J"., as that of willing slaves (Ex. 3.[12], 10.[24]; Ps. 2.[11], &c.), but it is mainly employed of slavery to conquerors (Gn. 14.[4], &c.), or to idols (Dt. 4.[28], &c.): only twice is it trd. M. (Nu. 4.[47]; 1 Ch. 9.[28]). (2) In NT. a like distinction obtains between diakonos, leitourgos, and hupēretēs on the one hand, and doulos on the other. The first three render free service to Christ and to men (Mw. 20.[26]; Rm. 15.[27]; 2 Cor. 4.[1]). Once leitourgos implies the service of a representative (He. 8.[2]), and there it refers to Christ: once the verb has a similar meaning, alluding to the priests of the old dispensation (He. 10.[11]). Hupēretēs in Lk. 4.[20] signifies the servant of the synagogue, now known as Ḥazzān. See BISHOP, DEACON.

MINNI, a country mentioned along with ARARAT and ASHCHENAZ as acting against Babylon (Jr. 51.[27]). The LXX takes it as a preposition with pronominal suffix, and trs. παρ ἐμοῦ, "with me." It was the Mannu of the Assyrians, to the W. of Lake Urumiya, and to the E. of Van. Its inhabitants were the Mannai, who are mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions—those of Shalmaneser II., Sargon, Ezarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal.

MINNITH, an unidentd. place on the way taken in flight by the Ammonites fm. Aroer (Jg. 11.[33]), famous in later times for its wheat (Ek. 27.[17]; cp. 2 Ch. 27.[5]). OEJ. places it four miles from Heshbon on the way to Philadelphia. But it must have been further north. The text, however, is prob. corrupt.

MINT (Gr. hēduosmon, "sweet-smelling," Mw. 23.[23], &c.) is the ordinary fragrant garden mint, much cultivated in Pal., and used in salads, &c.

MIPHKAD, a gate in the wall of Jrs., on the E. or NE. of the city (Ne. 3.[31]). See JERUSALEM.

MIRACLES, a somewhat unfortunate tr. of σημεῖον, "a sign" (Heb. 'ōth). Miracle is to be regarded as a "sign" of Divine presence; a word spoken claiming to be spoken with Divine authority justifies that claim by a work of power. The abstract possibility of miracle cannot be denied by any one who believes in a personal God; the only questions are as to the "credibility" and "evidential value."

Credibility. — Hume's famous argument, by asserting in the premise that universal experience is against M., assumes the thing to be proved, as the real matter in dispute is, "Have miracles ever formed part of experience?" What is really meant by most people when they declare an event "incredible" is, that they feel themselves incapable of forming a mental picture of the event as occurring. The Siamese sovereign who had never seen water frozen, in the same way regarded the tale of men and horses going on the surface of a river as a flagrant falsehood. Even with abundant experience we find it very difficult to imagine vividly the sensations of health when we are sick, or vice versa. Further, there is the fact to be explained that every past age has believed in miracle. Our own is no exception, with its belief in spirit-rapping and in Christian Science. Very few gamblers but have their mascots, on wh. they imagine their success depends, even tho' they may profess to be atheists and materialists. If we neglect such irregular phenomena, still there is the fact that, given a moral occasion of sufficient magnitude, all men, normally constituted, expect an interference with the course of nature, and recognise the non-appearance of such a sign of the Divine as a disappointment of their expectation. If our belief in the constancy of nature is due to inherited experience we must believe that this expectation is the result of miracle having, in similar circumstances, formed part of the experience of the race; in instances, too, of very considerable magnitude and number, else the effect wd. not be so widespread and indelible. If, on the other hand, this belief in miracle is innate—built into our constitution—and not the inherited result of ancestral experience, then as Nature never makes half joints, never makes eyes without light, or fins without water, so over against this expectation of miracle there must be this reality.

Evidential Value.—At first sight it seems a plausible objection to say, "Force is no evidence of truth." When a bully knocks down one who has denied the truth of a statement he has made, he proves himself a bully by his violence, not that he is not a liar. The analogy, however, does not hold; from the presence of one of a bundle of qualities wh. go to make up our idea of a given substance we infer the presence of the others. Thus we see before us a disc of yellow metal stamped with the profile of the king. We lift it and find it heavy; the colour and the weight lead us to believe it to be gold—that were we to test it we shd. find it extremely ductile and malleable (qualities of gold), and also that it wd. present all the chemical reactions of gold. Our idea of God implies that He possesses all physical, mental, and moral perfection. He is Omniscient as well as Omnipotent; All-Holy as well as Almighty; therefore we argue that the Power that can raise the dead and check the flow of the sea implies Divinity behind it: it so transcends the power wh. can be ascribed to a creature that we may presume the other transcendent qualities of Deity to be present. Every age has recognised vast power as an attribute of Deity. When Elijah calls for fire fm. heaven to prove the Divinity of JHWH, as over against the claims of Baal, no one, unless committed to that view, wd. regard it as a non sequitur when he claims the burning up of the sacrifice as proof demonstrative of his thesis. Shd. it be urged that such arguments wd. accredit all the marvels of superstition, it shd. be noted that the scriptural miracles have several characteristics wh. distinguish them fm. the wonders of superstition. They are connected with such crises in the moral history of the world as form an adequate occasion for such a display. The miracles noted in the Biblical narratives are mainly confined to three groups, connected with three events of world-wide importance: the Exodus, the setting apart of a race to guard the sacred deposit, Divine revelation; the period of Elijah and Elisha, when there was a danger of Isr. becoming apostate; and the time of our Lord, when the message of salvation was being declared. To exhibit this distinction clearly we have but to consider the efforts of Jewish and Christian imagination in devising miracles wh. seem suitable to the various patriarchs and apostles. The aim of these marvels has as its object to enhance the glory of the individual. Whereas in the Biblical the individual sinks into the background, what he does is in order that the works of God may be manifested. This is the case even with regard to our Lord, who sought not His own glory but His that sent Him. Further, the miracles of Scrip. are usually works of mercy; if of judgment the moral purpose is in general so obvious, that in the dubious cases we may presume that, were all the circumstances known, these too wd. have as obviously a moral purpose also. In the case of the miracles of our Lord there are only two that have not the alleviation of suffering as their immediate object—the blasting of the barren fig tree and the destruction of the Gadarene swine; each of these appears to involve at all events the destruction of property. As to the first of these, the action was symbolical, and at this distance of time we cannot dogmatise as to whose property the fig tree in question was. The other is connected on the one side with a great work of mercy, and on the other with the mysterious question of demoniac possession, and how far the land consecrated to be the inheritance of JHWH was to be regarded as under the Levitical law. When we consider the numerous cases of healing that are slumped together, these miracles of judgment form a much smaller proportion of the works of Christ than appears on the face of the narrative.

MIRIAM. (1) Daughter of Amram (Nu. 26.[59]), sister of Moses and Aaron. When the infant Moses was drawn from the water, at the request of Pharaoh's daughter she brought a nurse—her own mother (Ex. 2.[4, 8]). She was therefore considerably older than Moses; and as the latter was only three years the junior of Aaron (Ex. 7.[7]) she must have been the oldest of the three. As a member of a gifted family we are not surprised to hear that she ranked as a prophetess, and that, timbrel in hand, she led the triumph song and dance of the women in the hour of deliverance (Ex. 15.[20f.]). The Ethiopian wife of Moses was an offence to his brother and sister, and the thought of her seems to have fired the envy of him wh. was in their hearts. They sought to undermine his authority, claiming to be prophets by whom the Lord spake as much as he. Miriam was smitten with leprosy, and deeply humiliated, being healed only at the prayer of Moses. The march of the people was delayed seven days, until she could be brought again into the camp (Nu. 12.[1ff.]). Her case was subsequently made a warning (Dt. 24.[9]). That she exercised great influence we may infer from her being mentioned by Micah (6.[4]) along with her brothers as leading the people. She died and was buried during the sojourn of the people at Kadesh (Nu. 20.[1]). According to Josephus (Ant. III. ii. 4: vi. 1) she was the wife of Hur, and through him, grandmother of the distinguished artificer Bezaleel. (2) A person of the house of Caleb, mentioned in the genealogies of the children of Judah, but whether a man or a woman is not clear (1 Ch. 4.[17]).

MIRROR. See Looking-glass.

MISGAB (Heb. misgāb, "secure height"), the name of a place mentioned with Nebo and Kiriathaim in the denunciatory oracle of Jeremiah (48.[1]). It may possibly be a descriptive name applied to Kir-Moab. No name resembling it has been recovered. The word occurs in Is. 25.[12], where EV. tr. "high fort." It is used fig. of security (Is. 33.[16]), and of God as a refuge (2 S. 22.[3], &c.).

MISHAEL. (1) Son of Uzziel, and cousin of Moses (Ex. 6.[18, 22]), who, with his brother Elzaphan, carried the dead bodies of Nadab and Abihu out of the sanctuary. Their white linen coats were used for shrouds, and the victims of God's jealous anger were buried without the camp. (2) One of the leading men who supported Ezra, standing at his left hand as he read the law (Ne. 8.[4]; he is called Misael in 1 Es. 9.[44], the Greek having no sh, corresponding to the Heb. שׁ). (3) One of Daniel's three companions, better known by the name given him in Babylon, Meshach (Dn. 1.[6], &c.). He also is called Misael in the Song of the Three Children.

MISHAL, a town in the territory of Asher given to the Gershonite Levites (Jo. 19.[26], 21.[30]). In 1 Ch. 6.[74] it is called Mashal. The name occurs between Amad and Carmel. Amad is still unidentified, so that no indication of the site of M. is possible.

MISHRAITES, one of the four families of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch. 2.[53]), who doubtless colonised the town from wh. they took their name. There is no trace known of the site of Mishra. But as colonies from Mishra seem to have founded Zorah and Eshtaol, it was probably in that neighbourhood.

MISREPHOTH MAIM, to wh. Joshua chased the Can. (11.[8]), on the S. border of Zidonian territory (13.[6]), may be mod. Musheirifeh, on the S. slope of Ras en-Naqūrah, N. of the plain of Acre. The promontory and the mountain behind it mt. well have been the S. boundary of the Zidonians.

MITE, a coin equal to half a farthing (Mk. 12.[42]; Lk. 12.[59]). See Money.

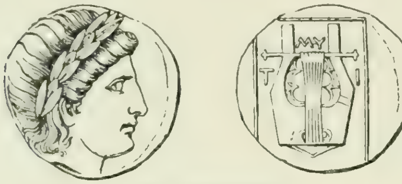
MITHCAH, RV. MITHKAH, possibly meaning "place of sweetness," one of the stations in the Wanderings, mentioned in Nu. 33.[28f.]; unidentified.

MITHNITE. This gentilic name is applied to Joshaphat, one of David's guard, in 1 Ch. 11.[43]. From the names adjoining his in the catalogue we may perhaps infer that he came from the east of the Jordan: but no place with a name such as Methen, from wh. "Mithnite" could be derived, has yet been recovered.

MITHREDATH, "given by Mithra"—Mithra being the Iranian sun-god. (1) The Persian treasurer to whom Cyrus entrusted the sacred vessels of the Temple for transference to Sheshbazzar (Ez. 1.[8]; 1 Es. 2.[11]—in the latter the name is given as Mithridates). (2) A Persian officer whose station was at Samaria. He took part in the representation made to Artaxerxes (Longimanus) with the object of hindering the Jews in their work of rebuilding the Temple (Ez. 4.[7]; 1 Es. 2.[16]).

MITRE. (1) Mitznepheth, from tzānaph, "to wind." This is the name given to the official head-dress of the High Priest (Ex. 28.[4], &c.). RVm. suggests "turban," in every case save one, viz. Ek. 21.[26], where AV. reads "diadem" and RV. "mitre." The term used for the head-dress of ordinary priests is migbā'ōth, probably because of its conical shape, from the root gāba', "to be high," or "convex." EV. render "bonnet." Both consisted of a long piece of fine linen—the Talmud makes it 16 cubits in length—wound round the head in the form of a turban. Exactly how they were distinguished it is impossible to say; probably it was by some difference in shape. The description given by Josephus (Ant. III. vii. 6) is confused and contradictory. A golden plate, with the words "Holy to the Lord" engraved upon it, was attached to the "forefront" of the High Priest's mitre, above his forehead. The "blue lace" secured it, being tied round the mitre. This doubtless formed the fillet or "diadem" referred to as "the holy crown" (see Crown, Diadem). Apparently the royal crown of Judah also consisted of turban or mitre, and diadem or crown (Ek. 21.[26]). (2) Tzanīph, from the same root as mitznepheth, EV. render "mitre" (Zc. 3.[5]), where it obviously applies to the head-dress of the High Priest. In Jb. 29.[14] (AV. "diadem," RVm. "turban"), it is the symbol of the righteous man's nobility. In Is. 3.[23] it refers to some female finery. In Is. 62.[3] it suggests the dignity and honour wh. God will bestow upon restored Israel.

MITYLENE, a town on the island of Lesbos, to wh. it now gives its name, with a good natural harbour facing the mainland, wh. is some 11 miles distant. When St. Paul visited M. (Ac. 20.[14]) it belonged to the Rm. province of Asia, enjoying the freedom wh. Pompey had bestowed on it, B.C. 63. It was founded as an Æolian colony. Daughters of M. were Sigeum and Assos. It favoured Xerxes in the war with Greece. In consequence of a revolt from the Athenian League wh. it had joined, it suffered grievously (B.C. 428). It opposed Rome in the Mithridatic War. It was famous for the beauty of its buildings in Roman times. It is one of the few cities which, even under Turkish rule, has maintained its prosperity to the present day.



COIN OF MITYLENE

MIXED MULTITUDE (Heb. 'ēreb, Ex. 12.[38] E.; Ne. 13.[3]; and 'asaphsuph, Nu. 11.[4] J.), the crowd of aliens that joined the Israelites when they left Egypt. The first Heb. word is derived fm. 'ārab, "to mix." The second is contemptuous = "riff-raff," fm. 'āsaph, "to collect."

It is evident that many of the Egyptians were impressed with the wonders wrought by Moses. When the plague of hail was threatened, certain among the servants of Pharaoh "feared the word of the Lord," and "made his servants and his cattle flee into houses." Such disciples of fear might well be expected to join the Israelites in their Exodus. As at present there are Arabs among the inhabitants of Egypt—nomads that have come into it fm. the desert—so there mt. be then: these might join also. Such accretions wd. be liable to discouragement when exposed to hardship by the way. We cannot be sure that the one word refers to one class and the other to the other. The passage in Nehemiah refers to the pentateuchal account of the Exodus, and seems to deduce fm. it that it was incumbent on them to separate themselves fm. all aliens—a deduction that does not seem justified by the text as we have it.

MIZAR, apparently the name of a mountain in the NE. of Palestine (Ps. 42.[6]). No height with a name resembling this has been discovered. The phrase mĕhar mitz'ār may be rendered "the mountain, or hill of littleness," i.e. "the little mountain" (EVm.), deriving mitz'ār from a root tzā'ar, "to be scanty" or "small." Some would therefore read "I think upon thee (O God!) far from the land of the Jordan and of the Hermons, far from the little mountain," i.e. the sacred hill at Jerusalem, infinitely dear to the exile. Others would drop the "m" from mēhar, as due to dittography, and read, "I remember thee from the land of Jordan and of the Hermons, O, thou little hill (of Zion)." Prof. G. A. Smith calls attention to certain names in the neighbourhood of "the Hermons"—i.e. triple summits of the mountain—resembling Miz'ār, and suggests "that these may be a reminiscence of the name of a hill in this district, called Mitz'ār" (HGHL.[1] 477 n.). It is impossible at present to reach any certainty.

MIZPAH, MIZPEH, "watch tower." (1) A city in Gilead (Gn. 31.[49]; Jg. 10.[17]), the home of Jephthah (Jg. 11.[11]). It was taken by Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 5.[35]). Poss. it is = Ramath Mizpeh (Jo. 13.[26]). These passages point to a position N. of the Jabbok, and N. also of MAHANAIM. Jerash, Sūf, and Qal'at er-Rabad, among others, have been suggested, but no prob. site of Mahanaim has been found to the S. of these. Dr. Schumacher found a place NW. of Jerash called Maṣfā (M. & N. DPV., 1897, 86). This name exactly corresponds with the Heb. Mitzpāh. (2) The land and the valley of M. (Jo. 11.[3, 8]) under Hermon denote the land NE. of el-Ḥūleh, i.e. the W. slopes of Hermon and the plain. (3) A city of Judah in the Shephelah (Jo. 15.[38]). It may be = Tell eṣ-Ṣāfieh, S. of Wādy es Sunṭ, 7½ miles N. of Beit Jibrīn, a high white limestone cliff, the Blanche Gaarde of the Crusaders. (4) A town in Benjamin (Jo. 18.[26]), a place of assembly for the men of Isr. (Jg. 20.[1, 3], 21.[1, 5, 8]; 1 S. 7.[5], &c.). Samuel visited M. in his official circuit (1 S. 7.[16]). It was fortified by Asa (1 K. 15.[22]). Here the governor Gedaliah, who had chosen M. as his seat, was slain by Ishmael, who, having murdered also 70 pilgrims, threw their bodies into the great reservoir wh. Asa had made (Jr. 41.[1ff.]). M. is described as an anct. Israelitish sanctuary, and was the scene of an inspiring assembly during the war under the leadership of Judas Maccabæus (1 M. 3.[46]). It is prob. = Neby Samwīl, wh. crowns an imposing height, 4½ miles NW. of Jrs., the traditional burying-place of Samuel. No more spacious view is to be found in S. Pal. (5) M. of Moab (1 S. 22.[3]), unident. (6) For "watch tower" (2 Ch. 20.[24]) perhaps we shd. read "Mizpah," wh. wd. denote a place in the wilderness of Judah, somewhere near Tekoa (cp. v. 20).

MIZRAIM. (1) Son of Ham and father of LUDIM, ANAMIM, LEHABIM, NAPHTUHIM, PATHRUSIM, CASLUHIM (whence went forth the PHILISTINES), and CAPHTORIM (Gn. 10.[6, 13f.]). (2) The name of Egypt in the Hebrew tongue.

MNASON, a native of Cyprus, "an early disciple" (by wh. prob. is meant that he was among the first to believe, possibly on the Day of Pentecost), with whom, according to EV. rendering, St. Paul and his friends lodged in Jrs. on his last visit (Ac.

21.[16]). Possibly, however, we should read "brought us to Mnason." The distance from Cæsarea to Jrs. was rather great for a single day's journey—about 70 miles. Mnason may have had a house on the way. D. (Latin) reads, "And when they had come to a certain town, we lodged with Mnason, an old disciple of Cyprus, and leaving there we came to Jerusalem."

MOAB (Asyr. Ma-'aba). No etymology that can be regarded as more than plausible has been suggested. In the LXX it is interpreted "from my father": in principle this is the etymology held by Simonis, Onomasticon, Gesenius, and Fuerst. A derivation fm. yā'ab, "to desire," is suggested and applied to the land. Against this last is the fact that territories were named anciently fm. their inhabitants, not inhabitants fm. the land: though "the land of Moab" was certainly a land to be desired. It lay to the E. of the Dead Sea. At its greatest extent it occupied roughly a parallelogram of 50 miles by 30. It was bounded on the west by the Dead Sea; on the north by the territory of Reuben, and to some extent by that of Ammon; on the east by the territory of Ammon and the desert, the home of the Amalekites and other nomads; to the south by the desert and the land of Edom. These are the political neighbours whose territories limited those of Moab, but the physical boundaries varied very much. When the Israelites arrived, Sihon, the Amorite king of Heshbon, had wrested the land south to the river Arnon (Mōjib). Originally Moab must have extended much further north; for "the plains of Moab" in wh. the Israelites encamped (Nu. 22.[1]) were over against Jericho. Reuben, and to some extent Gad, became heirs of Sihon, but it is probable that the Moabites never acquiesced in this. In Is. 15.[4] Heshbon and Elealeh are regarded as in Moab, so too Medeba and Nebo; the languishing of "the vine of Sibmah" is the result of the overthrow of Moab; yet all these places are about thirty miles north of the river Arnon. At times, indeed, Moab seems to have possessed all the cities assigned to Reuben in Joshua. Probably the boundaries of Moab in regard to the other contiguous states varied as much as they did in regard to those of Israel. Near the sea it consists of barren, rocky, limestone hills, interspersed with basalt; behind these is a level plateau wh. is nearly treeless; this is very fertile. Low mounds, the tombs of buried cities, are numerous; frequent fragments of columns near them tell of wealth and splendour; the character of the columns dates this time of glory in the period of the Antonines. These mounds, however, bear names that carry them back to the days when Isaiah and Jeremiah prophesied in Jerusalem.*

* One of the identifications can be carried back to the Targum of Jonathan, in wh. Qir-Hareseth and Qir-Heres is rendered in Is. 16.[7] and in Jr. 48.[31, 36] Kerak: in 2 K. 3.[15] it is called Qartta.

The original inhabitants were called Emims: they were numerous, and were regarded as cognate to the Anakim and giants: they had been dispossessed by the Moabites (Dt. 2.[10, 11]) before the Exodus. The people were cognate to Israel, Moab being the son of Lot, the nephew of Abraham, through incest with his elder daughter (Gn. 19.[37]). The Israelites came in contact with M. before they crossed the Jordan. Moab seems at this time to have been oppressed by Sihon, king of Heshbon. The arrival of the tribes of Israel supplied them with powerful allies. Sihon was conquered and slain; his territory was seized by the Israelites. The Moabites began to dread their previous allies. Balak, the then k. of Moab, unable to try war, hired Balaam to blight Israel with his potent curse. He came but he was not allowed to curse Israel. Though he knew the impotence of his maledictions, as he had been hindered fm. uttering them, yet he endeavoured to succeed by indirect means, seducing Israel so to sin that JHWH would Himself curse them. Balak united himself with Midian to accomplish this purpose by alluring the children of Israel to take part in the lustful rites of Baal-peor. During the conquest of Canaan M. held aloof, although the herds and sheepfolds of Reuben cd. only have been barely defended when the choice of the Reubenite warriors were westward of the Jordan, and wd. appear a ready prey. After the death of Joshua, and of Othniel, who had delivered Israel fm. the power of Chushan-Rishthathaim, the people again sinned, and Eglon, k. of M., who had united under his rule Amalek and Ammon to his native kingdom, captured Jericho and held the southern portion of Palestine in subjection. He was slain by Ehud (Jg. 3.[12-31]). With this exception the relations between Israel and Moab appear to have been friendly, as may be seen in the story of Ruth. Notwithstanding, in the Deuteronomic law the Moabite and Ammonite were excluded fm. the "congregation." This prohibition must have meant that no sept of Moabites cd. settle down in the land of Israel, and, in virtue of this, claim the covenant privileges of Israel. Although Saul maintained war against Moab (1 S. 14.[47]), yet David, pleading possibly his descent fm. Ruth, committed his father and mother to the care of the king of Moab (1 S. 22.[3, 4]). When David conquered Moab there seems to be a bitterness in his treatment of the people wh. points to some act of very special treachery either to him or to Israel wh. has not been recorded; perhaps they had taken advantage of David's absence in his Syrian wars to invade the fields of Reuben. While tributary under David and Solomon, they appear to have taken the opportunity afforded them by the division of the kingdom to regain their independence. This they retained until Omri made them once more tributary (Moabite Stone, lines 4, 5). After the death of AHAB Moab rebelled (2 K. 1.[1]) against Israel. This subjugation lasted, according to the Moabite Stone, 40 years. Mesha does not claim to have regained independence, but to have wrested most of the territory of Reuben, and to have destroyed local sanctuaries of JHWH. Jehoram, against whom he had rebelled, summoned to his aid JEHOSHAPHAT his ally, and made an expedition against Moab round the southern end of the Dead Sea. After suffering great hardships the army of Israel gained such successes that only his capital city was left to Mesha; then some mysterious disaster appears to have fallen on the confederate force.

The invasion of Judah by "Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir" narrated in 2 Ch. 20. is difficult to place, especially in relation to the expedition recorded in 2 K. 3.[4-27]. At first sight it mt. be thought to be a garbled account of that campaign. Closer inspection renders that improbable; indeed, except that Jehoshaphat is on one side, and Moab, presumably under Mesha, on the other, there does not seem any resemblance at all. It wd. seem most natural to regard it as taking place after the campaign of Jehoram and his allies. After the host of his enemies had melted away fm. the land of Moab, not impossibly Mesha induced the king of Edom to break away fm. Jehoshaphat, as he seems to have been in correspondence with Mesha before. When he attempts his desperate sally fm. Kir-Hareseth the effort is to cut through to the king of Edom. The Ammonites wd. be ready enough to join in an attack on Israel north or south. To pick up the forces of Edom they wd. naturally proceed round the south of the Dead Sea. They appear to have made their way along the shore, and only emerged into the uplands of Judea through the gorge at Engedi. After the decisive overthrow inflicted on them the confederacy was broken up: Edom again became tributary to Judah, Ammon fell back to a purely observant attitude, and Moab sank to a secondary place.

The revolution wh. annihilated the house of Omri kept the Northern Kdm. fm. intervening in Moab.

The war with Syria wh. JEHU, who had succeeded to the house of Ahab, had to carry on, and the advance of the Assyrian power, gave Moab opportunity to retain its independence. We next hear of Moab by Salmannu, a king of Moab, subdued by TIGLATH-PILESER (B.C. 733); a later king, Chemoshnadab, paid tribute to SENNACHERIB (B.C. 701); later still Mushuri is catalogued as a vassal king in the lists of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, along with Manasseh of Judah. When Nebuchadnezzar reclaimed for Babylon the Assyrian Empire, Moab appears to have submitted without a struggle. When JEHOIAKIM rebelled against Babylon the Moabites showed their loyalty to their master and indulged their spite against Judah by combining with the Syrians and Ammonites to assist the bands of Chaldeans to ravage the land of Judah (2 K. 24.[2]). It seems probable that they shared in the rebellion of Zedekiah and that then the destruction denounced upon them by Isaiah and Jeremiah actually occurred (Is. 15., 16.; Jr. 48.). After this M. disappears fm. history. In Maccabean times the Nabatæans occupy the land of Moab (1 M. 5.[25-28]).

The character of the Moabites can only partially be deduced fm. the notices of them in Scripture and fm. the stela of Mesha. Physically the Moabites seem to have been characterised by bigness and stoutness. The fatness of Eglon is a distinct feature in the Hogarthian picture of his assassination. When Ehud proceeded fm. the murder of Eglon to rouse his countrymen to rebel and hurl the Moabites fm. the land, he took the fords of Jordan against them, "and they slew of Moab at that time about ten thousand men, all lusty (Heb. 'fat'), and all men of valour" (Jg. 3.[14-30]). The suggestion of such a description is not that they were unwieldy, but that compared with the spare nomads and slightly built Hebrews, they were men of bulk. The men whom Benaiah the son of Jehoiada slew (2 S. 23.[20]) are called Ariel, "lions of God," a title wh. wd. suggest size, if also courage.

It is to be noted that the LXX inserts huious, "sons," taking Ariel for a man's name; on the other hand the Psh. renders ganborîn, "heroes." Although the reading of the LXX is accepted by RV. and by Dr. Driver, for our part it seems to show the effort of the Gr. translator to get over a difficulty, and not to be the evidence of another reading.

The moral characteristic of Moab, as seen in the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah, is pride—a not unnatural result of their physical strength. The oppression they inflicted on Israel wd. be the natural outcome of this; and wd. be the harder to endure because of it. The numerous cities they possessed confirm the statements of the prophets in ascribing to Moab wealth and luxury. As they have left no literature we can say nothing of their mental endowments. Clay tablets or potsherds may turn up at any time, wh. may reveal much to us.

The greatest light was thrown on the language and religion of Moab, and to some extent on its history and geography also, by the discovery about forty years ago of the stela of MESHA, commonly called the "Moabite Stone." M. Clermont-Ganneau heard of this monument in 1868, and secured a squeeze of it. The Arabs, thinking it must be a talisman, or that the inscription was a magic formula, and afraid to let such a thing pass into the possession of unbelieving Franks, broke it in pieces, and distributed the fragments. Most of these have been recovered, and have been pieced together. From the squeeze most of the missing sections of the inscription have been deciphered. It was a slab of black basalt about 3½ feet high by 2 feet wide, curved on the top. The inscription is in the angular script found in the Phœnician inscriptions, and afterwards in that of Siloam. Though it is easily accessible to scholars it may be well to give the translation of it here.

(1) I am Mesha, son of Chemoshgad, king of Moab, the Dibonite. (2) My father reigned over Moab thirty years, and I (3) reigned after my father. And I made this High Place to Chemosh in QRḤH., a High Place of Salvation

(4) because he had delivered me fm. all that assailed me, and because he let me see (my desire) on my enemies. (5) Omri, king of Israel, afflicted Moab many days, because Chemosh was angry with his land. (6) His son succeeded him, and he also said, "I will afflict Moab"; in my days said he (thus). (7) But I saw (my desire) upon him and upon his house, and Israel perishing, perished for ever. Omri had annexed the land of (8) Mehedeba; and Israel dwelt therein during his days and half his son's days, forty years, but Chemosh restored it (9) in my days. And I built Baal-Meon and I made in it the ? reservoir? and I built (10) Qiryathaim. And the men of Gad had dwelt in the land of 'Ataroth fm. of old, and the king of Israel (11) had built for himself 'Ataroth. But I fought against the city and took it. And I slew all the people of (12) the city, a spectacle to Chemosh and to Moab, and I brought thence the ?altar hearth of Dodoh? (?the Ariel of David?) and I ?brought? (13) it before Chemosh in Qeryioth, and I settled in it the men of ?Sharon? and of (14) MḤRT. And Chemosh said to me, "Take Nebah against Israel," and I (15) went by night and fought against it fm. break of day till noon and I took (16) it, and I slew it wholly, seven thousand (men and boys) and women (17) and strangers, and slaves, for I had devoted it to ?Ashtoreth-Chemosh? and I took thence the ? vessels ? of (18) JHWH, and I dragged them before Chemosh. And the king of Israel had built (19) Yahatz and abode in it while he fought against me. But Chemosh drove him out from before me, and (20) I took of Moab two hundred men all its chiefs and I caused them to go up against Yahatz and took it (21) to add it to Dibon. I built QRḤH, the wall of the forests, and the wall of (22) ? the mound (ophel): and I built its gates and I built its towers. And (23) I built the king's palace and I made two reservoirs for water in the midst of (24) the city in QRḤH, and I said to all the people, "Make (25) for yourselves every man a cistern in his house." I dug the moat (cut the cutting) for QRḤH by means of the prisoners of (26) Israel. I built Aroer and I made the highway by the ARNON (27). I built Beth-Bamoth for it was pulled down. I built Betzer (28) for it had become ruins, with the help of fifty men fm. Dibon, for all Dibon obeyed me. And I reigned (29) over a hundred chiefs in the cities wh. I added to the land. And I built (30) Mehedeba and Beth-Diblathen and Beth-Ba'al-Me'on; and I took thither . . . (31) . . . sheep of the land. As for Ḥoronain there dwelt in it . . . (32) And Chemosh said to me, "Go down, fight against Ḥoronain," and I went down . . . (33) . . . and Chemosh restored it in my days. . ." After this the inscription survives only in detached letters.

The Language.—The script, as we have already said, is practically identical with that found in the Siloam inscription, those in Phœnicia, and in Sinjirli. It may be regarded as a dialect of Hebrew. It has some most striking peculiarities of Hebrew, e.g. the waw conversive, the definite article ha, and 'eth, the sign of the accusative. There are, however, several distinct points of difference. The plural of nouns masculine is n, not im as in Hebrew. In this it relates itself to Aramaic, as also by its use of oh for the pronominal suffix of the third pers. masc. instead of ô as in Hebrew. This peculiarity is found in Phœnician. Another peculiarity it shares with that dialect also is the first personal pronoun anokh instead of anokhi as in Hebrew. The most remarkable characteristic is its affinity with Arabic as manifested in a form of the verb (a conjugation) wh. is found only in Arabic, ifta'el. The presence of Aramaic and Arabic forms is easily explicable fm. their proximity to the desert and the caravan route fm. Damascus to Arabia. Were more inscriptions discovered it is possible we shd. find more affinities, and perhaps relations to other Semitic languages than those mentioned.

Religion.—The Moabites appear to have worshipped only Chemosh; even when he speaks of Ashtaroth-Chemosh Mesha means merely that Chemosh has the attributes of Ishtar. There is no distinct evidence that the Moabites universalised Chemosh so as to recognise in him the supreme God. They wd. thus be strictly "henotheists." On the other hand we have no certain knowledge that the Moabites did not do so; Mesha refers to JHWH and His sacred vessels, but we have no certain evidence that they did not regard Chemosh as supreme and look on JHWH as merely the national god of the HEBREWS. Certainly the argumentum ad hominem wh. Jephthah addressed to the Ammonites implies that they believed Chemosh to be their god distinctively, and that JHWH stood merely on the same level (Jg. 11.[24]). Only it wd. seem a point worth noticing that Chemosh is there spoken of as god of the Ammonites, and not Molech.

As, however, Molech is certainly attributive, being simply the Hebrew word for "king," with the vowels of bosheth, "shame," the probability is that Chemosh is so also; the word seems to mean "the subduer." He might be worshipped in Moab as the War God, the counterpart of the title JHWH among the Jews, "the Lord of Hosts." As it was the influence of the Prophets that kept before Israel the universal aspect of their God, "the Creator of heaven and earth," and there are no evidences of the existence among the Moabites of such an order, on the whole the probability is that they were strictly "henotheistic." Although Mesha sacrificed his son in the extremity of the siege, it wd. seem that human sacrifices were not so common in the worship of Chemosh as they were in that of Molech. There is unquestionably a certain parallelism between the religion of M. and that of Israel; the devotion of Nebo by Mesha to absolute destruction being paralleled by that of Jericho; and the offering up of the son of Mesha by that of the daughter of Jephthah. The fact that they had become "henotheistic," and were thus on the sliding scale towards polytheism, put them out of the line of the religious progress of the world.

MOLADAH, an unidentd. city of Judah (Jo. 15.[26]), or Simeon (19.[2]), wh. prob. lay near Beersheba. It has nothing to do with Tell el-Milḥ, with which some would identify it. The site has not been recovered.

MOLE. (1) Tinshemeth (Lv. 11.[30], RV. "chameleon"), a species of lizard. The same word denotes an unclean bird, trd. by RV. "horned owl" (Lv. 11.[18] = Dt. 14.[16]). Tristram suggests the ibis or water-hen; Gesenius the pelican. (2) Hăpharpārāh, pl. hăpharpārōth (Is. 2.[20]; MT. haphorpērōth). The word occurs here only, and the meaning is obscure. It prob. refers quite generally to the "burrowing" animals wh abound in Pal. The true mole does not occur there, but the mole-rat, wh. belongs to a different order, is found in multitudes. "It is about nine inches long, yellowish brown tinged with slaty grey in colour, without any apparent ears and hardly any eyes. It has large, projecting, powerful incisor teeth, wh. give its face a strange and dangerous expression" (Hart. Animals of the Bible, 155f.).

MOLECH (MOLOCH, MILCOM), really Melek with the vowels of bosheth, "shame." The Hebrews probably pronounced it "Bosheth"; just as JHWH, the sacred name, received the vowels of Adonai, and was pronounced by the reader "Adonai." The name is simply attributive, hence to say that M. was the "god of the Ammonites" is merely to announce that they worshipped their principal deity under this title. It seems to have become a personal name, as his full title became Melek-Baal, "King Lord"; wh. may be compared to the scriptural "Lord God" (JHWH 'Elohīm). He was worshipped by offerings of infants. It has been urged that the phrase "to cause to pass through the fire to Molech" described not a sacrifice, but rather a rite of initiation, or consecration, a heathen equivalent of circumcision. It is probable enough that the rite mt. become softened to that extent; Jerome renders Jr. 32.[35] in this sense. There is, however, no possible ambiguity in Jr. 7.[31]: "They have built the high places of Tophet, wh. is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire" (cp. 2 K. 23.[10]: "He defiled Topheth, wh. is in the valley of the sons of Hinnom, that no man mt. make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech"). The practice is expressly forbidden in Lv. 18.[21]: "Thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass ('give any of thy seed to cause them to pass,' RV.) through the fire to Molech." Where the title Melek was given to deity there appears frequently to have been a similar worship. "The Sepharvites burned their children in the fire to ADRAMMELECH and ANAMMELECH, gods of Sepharvaim" (2 K. 17.[31]). Among the Phœnicians and their descendants the Carthaginians, under the title Melkarth (Melek-Qartha), Baal was worshipped, as seen by such names as Hamilcar, Bomilcar, &c. The Greeks identified this deity with Kronos, and the Romans with Saturn, and to him classic historians represent the Carthaginians sacrificing boys (Diodorus Sic. xiii. 86, xx. 14). Some have thought that there was a very widespread worship of this divinity in Israel independently of the action of such monarchs as Solomon, who have the odium attached to their names of introducing it. This is implied in the fact that such offerings were expressly forbidden in Lv. 18.[21], 20.[2f.] There indeed appears to have been a tendency to mingle the worship of Molech-Baal with that of the God of Israel, for only in that way can we explain the disclaimer wh. Jeremiah puts in the mouth of " the Lord of Hosts" (Jr. 19.[5]) : "They have built also the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt-offerings unto Baal, wh. I commanded not, nor spake it, neither came it into My mind." Such names as Malchishua, Malchiram, &c., seem to point in the same direction. Solomon, while he is represented as turned away fm. God by his wives, probably reasoned philosophically, that Molech (Melek) was J.″ known by an attribute, and, moreover, that many of his people so worshipped; therefore that it was right that he, as king, shd. represent the feelings of his subjects. " The hill before Jrs." on wh. Solomon built the high places to Molech and Chemosh was clearly Mount Olivet, on wh. tradition has placed them. Later, these burnings to Molech appear to have been perpetrated in the valley to the SW., the valley of the sons of Hinnom, instead of on a hill to the E. AHAZ and MANASSEH, of the subsequent kings of Judah, are recorded as having been guilty of this worship. The stern opposition of Law and Prophets to the worship of such deities was due to the fact that, altho' they had been originally names of the supreme God, they had become henotheistic, and naturally tended to polytheism, with all its moral and spiritual degradation. The name is spelt Moloch in Am. 5.[26] and Ac. 7.[43]. Milcom is only another form of M., and really means " their king," as proved by 1 K. 11.[5] (cp. 11.[7]). It occurs three times (1 K. 11.[5, 33]; 2. K. 23.[13]). Some have maintained these to be separate, but without any plausibility.

MONEY. Money defined as " metal stamped in pieces of portable form as a medium of exchange and measure of value " seems to have been an invention of the kings of Lydia in the seventh century B.C. In this sense it was not used by the Hebrews until after the Exile. But the age of barter pure and simple had passed before the beginning of Old Testament history. Silver and gold were the media of exchange, and the Hebrew word for silver is often translated " money " in the English version.

The early Hebrew legends refer often to incidents in the land of Palestine long before it was occupied by the Hebrew people. In this early age the land was already highly civilised, and strongly influenced by—often under the direct governance of—Babylonia and Egypt. During this period gold and silver were used for purchases, and were kept in the form of bars, either straight or, in Egypt at least, sometimes curved into rings. The system of weighing these would naturally be that of the two countries. That the Babylonian system of weighing money was in use then not only in Babylonia but also in Syria and Palestine, is known for the fifteenth century B.C. from the Tel el-Amarna tablets. This scale was—

60 minas = 1 talent.

(Cf. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.) The ordinary commercial shekel weighed about 126 grains. There was also another series of weights of the same names but double the weight of these, i.e. the heavy shekel weighed about 252 grains. These values were kept in weighing gold, but for silver a shekel a third heavier was adopted, i.e. one of 168 grains, while the mina was now made to contain only 50 shekels. Apparently this alteration was made in order that a shekel of silver might be one-tenth of a shekel of gold in value, instead of three-fortieths, as it would have been had the weights been the same.

In addition to the common standard for the weights as already given, there was a royal standard, according to which the shekel of gold in the first scale weighed 130 grains instead of 126.

From the time of their entrance into Palestine to the Exile the Hebrews used gold and silver by weight for purchasing. Nothing is known of any official standard of purity. Buyers and sellers alike could test the weight of the metal by the balances they carried in the wallet (Dt. 25.[13]). At the same time pieces of a known weight were probably in use (as the quarter-shekel in 1 S. 9.[8]), though these, too, would be tested by any but a prophet. Judging by the information of Josephus, the Hebrews seem to have adopted the Babylonian scale in weighing gold. In regard to silver, however, while the proportions of the shekel and mina (Heb. maneh) remained the same, there is found a shekel a third lighter in weight, i.e. about 112 grains. This was the weight of the Phœnician shekel, which was widely used in the commercial world of the period. It has been carefully calculated by Professor Kennedy (HDB. iii. 420) that the value of the heavy gold shekel in ordinary use was about £2, 1s., that of the silver shekel about 2s. 9d. Thus the gold maneh was about £102, 10s. and the talent £6150, while the silver maneh was about £6, 16s. 8d. and the talent about £410.

In the books of Ezra and Nehemiah and once in Chronicles (1 Ch. 29.[7], an anachronism), mention is made of " darkemōnim," translated in the Revised Version by " darics." These darics were Persian coins (see below) generally supposed to have been first coined by Darius, and worth about £1, 1s. But the Authorised Version is probably correct in translating " drams," referring to weight. In Ezra 8.[27] the reference is undoubtedly to weight. The Hebrew word seems to be a transliteration of the Greek " drachma," which was a weight of $66\frac{1}{2}$ grains.

The "shekel of the sanctuary" which is mentioned in the P. documents of the Pentateuch (belonging to this period) is the old silver shekel of 224 grains. During the Persian period Persian coins circulated in Palestine. There were the golden stater or daric (mentioned above), on which is represented the king kneeling and holding bow and spear; and the silver siglos or shekel (called the Median shekel) weighing about 87 grains and worth a little over a shilling.

From the time of Alexander the Great coins must have been numerous and varied. Alexander's gold didrachm (of 133 grains), his silver tetradrachm (266 grs.), and drachm (66½ grs.) were used here as elsewhere, and bronze coins were introduced. Some of the tetradrachms have been discovered in Palestine. At the same time the silver coins of such cities as Tyre, Sidon, and Gaza were in circulation.

For about 100 years after Alexander's death (B.C. 301–198) Palestine was ruled by Egypt, and its coins were taken from the Egyptian mints at Alexandria and other Mediterranean cities. These coins followed the Phœnician standard. The drachm weighed 56 grains and the double drachm or silver shekel 112 grains, worth about 1s. 5½d. The term didrachm is, however, often used in the Alexandrian version of the Old Testament to translate the Hebrew shekel, just as it had come to be used in ordinary language for the tetradrachm. In B.C. 198 Palestine passed to the Seleucids, and again the coinage changed. The Seleucid coins were gold, silver, and bronze. The standard used was the Attic, though the Phœnician still existed beside it (at any rate from B.C. 150 to 100), while, as the Seleucid power declined, various autonomous cities issued their own coins. The weight, too, varied, the tetradrachm being sometimes as high as 265 grains. As on the Ptolemaic coins, the head of the ruler appeared on one side, and his name and title in Greek with a device on the other.

In the reign of Antiochus Epiphanus (B.C. 175–164) came the revolt under the Maccabees, and with it after a time the issue for the first time of a native Jewish coinage. According to 1 M. 15.[6] Antiochus VII. Sidetes (B.C. 138–129), writing to Simon Maccabæus, said: " I give thee leave to coin money for thy country with thine own stamp." Whether Simon exercised this right or not is disputed. Some silver shekels and half-shekels have been found in Jerusalem and Jericho with inscriptions on both sides in the old Hebrew character. On the obverse is " Shekel (or half-shekel) of Israel," on the reverse " Jerusalem the holy," with numbers from 1 to 5. On the obverse is also a jewelled cup, on the reverse a branch of lily with three flowers. The belief that these are coins of Simon has been held of late years by most numismatists, but has been seriously attacked by Prof. Kennedy (HDB. III. 424), who in turn has been answered by Theodore Reinach (Jewish Coins, London, 1903), who gives reasons for believing that they must be assigned to this period. It is certain, however, that the right of coining gold and silver was very strictly guarded by kings, and that if this privilege was granted to Simon, it was withdrawn from his successors, whose coins are of copper only, until the later revolts under Hadrian and Vespasian. According to the Mishnah the silver of Tyre, which about this time won the privilege of coining silver shekels, was used in paying the Temple tax. John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135–104) issued small bronze coins (weighing about 28 grains). Three specimens of these are in the British Museum. On one side in Hebrew is " John the High Priest and the Commonwealth (or Senate) of the Jews," on the other a double cornucopia with a poppy-head between. Nearly all the types used on Jewish coins (cornucopia, flower, star, &c.) are borrowed from Seleucid coins, care being taken only to avoid the representation of any living thing, in accordance with Jewish law. From the time of Alexander Jannæus (B.C. 104–78) it was customary to have the king's name in Hebrew on one side of the coin and in Greek on the other, the Hebrew name being used in the one case, the Greek in the other. Thus the coins of Alexander have in Hebrew " Jonathan the king," in Greek " Alexander the king." The last Maccabean, Antigonus II., has " Antigonus the High Priest " in Hebrew and " Antigonus king " in Greek.

The Idumean dynasty founded by Herod (B.C. 37) was entirely subordinate to Rome. But the coinage of gold was entirely forbidden in Roman provinces, while that of silver was only allowed to certain cities. Herod's coinage was therefore of copper only. The inscriptions were now in Greek only " King Herod." The types were still those of the Seleucid coins (such as the cornucopia, pomegranate, helmet, &c.), and from respect to Jewish feeling were inanimate until, towards the end of his life, Herod introduced an eagle on them. Archelaus used the title " ethnarch "; Antipas has the inscription " Herod tetrarch " on one side and the name of the Emperor Tiberius on the other. The coins of Agrippa (" King Agrippa ") were the last lawfully struck in Jerusalem. While the coins mentioned above were used for local purposes, the money of the Roman Empire (of which Judæa was a province in A.D. 6) was in circulation for business purposes. There were the gold aureus, worth from £1, 0s. 6d. under Cæsar to 18s. 8d. under Nero; the silver denarius, which was a twenty-fifth of the aureus, i.e. about 9½d. Beside this imperial money was the provincial silver and copper coinage of Antioch and later of Cæsarea Cappadociæ, based on the Greek and Phœnician standards, as well as the copper money issued from the Procurator's mint at Cæsarea, while the Tyrian tetradrachms (=4 denarii) were also in use up to the time of Josephus.

The money mentioned in the New Testament is for the most part of Greek or Roman origin, and consisted of gold, silver, and copper (Mw. 10.[9]). The talent (Mw. 18.[24], 25.[15]) represents a sum of money equivalent to 6000 denarii, i.e. about £240, and the mina or " pound " (Lk. 19.[13]) the sum of 100 denarii or £4.

Of actual coins, the stater (Mw. 17.[27]), translated " piece of money " in the AV., " shekel " in the RV., was the Tyrian tetradrachm mentioned above. The didrachm (Mw. 17.[24]), translated " tribute money " in the AV., " half-shekel " in the RV., was a somewhat rare coin half the value of the preceding. The drachme (Lk. 15.[8, 9]), translated " piece of silver," was a silver coin of Greek origin, in commerce equivalent to the denarius, but in official payments reckoned as worth only three-fourths of that coin.

The denarion (of Roman origin = denarius), translated "penny" in the English versions (the American revisers wished to translate "assarion" penny, and "denarion" shilling, except in Mw. 22.[19]; Mk. 12.[15]; Lk. 20.[24], where they proposed to give the name of the coin, "denarius") (Mw. 18.[28], 20,[2, 9, 13], 22.[19]; Mk. 6.[37], 12.[15], 14.[5]; Lk. 7.[41], 10.[35], 20.[24]; Jn. 6.[7], 12.[5]; Rv. 6.[6]), was a silver coin worth about 9½d.

The assarion (of Roman origin), translated in AV. and RV. "farthing" (Mw. 10.[29]; Lk. 12.[6]), was a bronze coin worth about two-thirds of a penny. The kodrantes (of Latin origin = quadrans), also translated "farthing" (Mw. 5.[26]; Mk. 12.[42]), was a bronze coin worth about a sixth of a penny. The lepton or "mite" (Mk. 12.[42]; Lk. 12.[59], 21.[2]) was the smallest bronze coin (of Greek origin), worth about a twelfth of a penny.

Twice in later times Jewish coins were again struck. To the period of the "first revolt" (A.D. 66–70) Prof. Kennedy assigns the shekels mentioned above under Simon. Some coppers are also ascribed to this revolt. At the time of the "second revolt" (A.D. 132–135) imperial denarii, drachms and tetrachms were re-struck with Jewish types and Hebrew inscriptions. Many of these are extant.

MONEY-CHANGERS. There was obvious need of the money-changer in Palestine in the time of Christ, who might change the money brought by pilgrims and others from all quarters of the empire into the current coin of the country. His modern counterpart is equally indispensable to-day. The multitude of coins of various denominations floating about in the market and among the people is quite bewildering to any but an expert. Regular charge is made, not only for changing money from one currency to another, but also for "change" in our colloquial sense, turning, e.g., the pound into shillings and pence. In this matter the simple country folk are often grievously over-reached. The main business of the money-changers in the Temple court was no doubt connected with the payment of the Temple dues. This must in every case be paid in the money of the Sanctuary; the half-shekel alone being accepted. This coin was worth about 1s. 4½d. of our money. The recognised charge for furnishing the half-shekel, according to the Talmud, was a kollubos, worth about 1½d. Hence the money-changer was called kollubistēs (Mw. 21.[12]; Mk. 11.[15]). The convenience of these men in the outer court of the Temple, for Jews of the Dispersion, is obvious. Then, as always, attempts were made to cheat the money-changers by palming off on them spurious coin. This required them to be constantly on the alert, and gave point to the unwritten saying of Christ to His disciples, "Be ye expert money-changers," exercising the same skill and care as to the teaching which should be received.

The reference to "exchangers" (RV. "bankers") in Mw. 25.[27], and to the "bank" in Lk. 19.[23], with a view to interest (RV.), shows that certain of these men at least were accustomed to receive money on deposit, at a certain rate of interest, making a profit, no doubt, by lending it out to others.

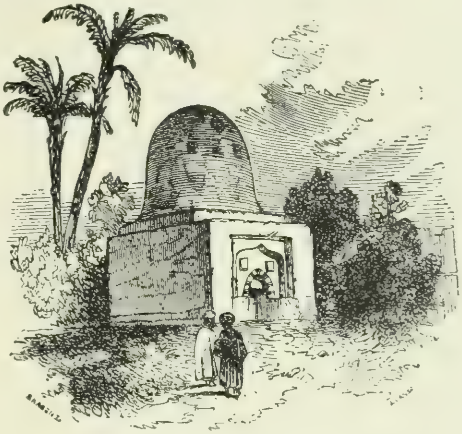
MOON (Heb. yārēaḥ and lĕbānāh; in Asyr. irriḫu, and in Eth. wareḥ; in Aram. the corresponding word means "month," Gr. selēnē). In Gn. 1.[14-16] the M. and the other heavenly bodies have as the purpose of their being to "be for signs and for seasons, and for days and for years," and "to give light upon the earth." This geocentric view was the natural one to present itself to primitive peoples. The brilliant white light of the M. is at once more striking and more useful in the E. than in more northern latitudes. But as the most noticeable feature in the phenomena presented by the moon was her changing phases and her continually varying relation to the constellations, fm. wh. latter it got its most common Heb. name of yārēaḥ, "the wanderer," it was as a measurer of time that she was primarily observed. It is likely that it wd. be a much longer time before the progress of the sun through the heavens wd. be observed in semi-tropical countries like Babylonia and Egypt, in wh., as they had no mechanical means of measuring time, the difference between the longest and shortest days, though amounting to between three and four hours, wd. not be definitely noted. It is thus not impossible that the earliest year, shānāh, "repetition," was reckoned by the changes of the moon. It does not seem that the Jews had any idea that the M. shone with a borrowed light; in Gn. it seems to be thought as much an independent source of light as the sun. Singularly, although the variation in the phases of the moon mt. be supposed to suggest changefulness, to the Jew it was the symbol of permanence. The regularity and invariableness of the succession seem to have made a greater impression than the changes themselves. So we find in Ps. 72. that the reverence given to the Messiah shd. be "as long as the sun and moon endure," and his "peace so long as the M. endureth" (see also 89.[37]). It was regarded as having at once a beneficial and a hurtful effect; thus in Dt. 33.[14] the blessing of Joseph was to consist of "precious things put forth by the moon"; but at the same time in Ps. 121.[6] one of the blessings of the saint is that the moon shall not smite him by night. The Hebrews do not seem to have supposed any connection between madness and the phases of the M. such as is implied in the Gr. selēniazomai. They had noticed the phenomena of eclipses of the moon, but do not appear to have had any idea of their periodicity. In Jl. 2.[31] the description of the M. being turned into blood gives a vivid picture of the scene.

Lunar Festivals.—Although the feast of New Moon does not appear to have formed part of Mosaic legislation, that it shd. be a holiday was assumed, and the special sacrifices for that day arranged (Nu. 28.[11]), in succession to the sacrifices for the Sabbaths. It seemed to be a day when, according to court custom, all members of the court feasted with the king; hence the necessity David felt himself under of apologising for his absence (1 S. 20.[5, 18, 24]). In the Northern Kingdom the pious seem to have been in the habit of visiting the prophets on New Moon (2 K. 4.[23]). According to Chronicles one of the purposes of the Temple and the priesthood was for the offering of the sacrifices appropriate to the New Moon. In the ceremonial religiosity in Jrs. rebuked by Is. the celebration of New Moons is prominent. In later Judaism the day of the appearance of the New Moon was fixed by observation, nominally, but calculation fixed the time when the watchers went out. The full moon was the time when the Passover was celebrated.

Worship of the Moon.—The worship of the heavenly bodies was one of the earliest forms of polytheism. Especially was the M. an early object of worship. In Jb. 31.[26, 27], "If I beheld . . . the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, and my mouth hath kissed my hand," there is reference to some part of heathen ritual, kissing the hand at the sight of the M. In Egypt Isis was identified with the Moon. In Phœnicia Ashtoreth, as the feminine equivalent of BAAL, was the Moon Goddess. In Assyria Sin was the Moon God; and not a few names manifest the prevalence of his worship, e.g. Sennacherib, "Sin has multiplied brothers." Jericho by its name wd. seem to have been the seat of Moon-worship in times before the Israelite conquest. It seems doubtful whether the Queen of Heaven, for whom the women of Jerusalem made cakes, was the Moon (Jr. 7.[18]).

MORDECAI, cousin and foster-fr. of ESTHER (Est. 2.[7]). When he is introduced into Bible story he is an exile in the Persian capital; a Benjamite, his family had been carried captive with Jeconiah (Est. 2.[5, 6]). Contemporary with the elevation of his foster-dr. M. becomes an official of the court (Est. 2.[19]) and thus is in a position to learn of a conspiracy against AHASUERUS and to frustrate it. When the king raised HAMAN to be vizier M. refused to do him reverence (Est. 3.[2]). We are not informed why he did so. It may be that he regarded Ex. 17.[16] as requiring every Jew to show enmity to Amalek. Haman determined on his part not only to destroy M., but also the whole Jewish race. The service that M. had rendered him was brought to the remembrance of the K., and he called upon Haman to show honour to M. (Est. 6.[1-11]). After the deliverance of the Jews was secured through the intercession of ESTHER, M. became vizier instead of Haman. The etymology of the name is not certain.



ALLEGED TOMB OF ESTHER AND MORDECAI

MOREH (from the Heb. verb yārāh, "to teach," "to instruct") is a "teacher," "director" (2 K. 17.[28]; Is. 30.[20], &c.), or "prophet" (Is. 9.[15]). The M. was often consulted sitting under a tree (see MEONENIM). (1) The plain (RV. correctly, "oak") of M. (Gn. 12.[6]), a name wh. may have preserved the memory of Abraham's experience near Shechem. (2) The terebinths of M. (Dt. 11.[30], RVm.) were also near Shechem, but neither position is now known. (3) The "hill of M." (Jg. 7.[1]) may be Jebel ed-Duhy, popularly called Little Hermon. It lay N. of the Midianites' position (6.[33]), while, if the identification of "the spring of Harod" with 'Ain Jalūd is correct, Gideon lay on the N. slopes of Gilboa. "The M." (Heb.) may point to an anct. sanctuary, the successor of wh. is the white-domed Neby Duhy.

MORESHETH. See MORESHETH-GATH.

MORESHETH-GATH (Mi. 1.[14]) may be the native place of Micah, who is called the Morashtite (1.[1]; Jr. 26.[18], RV.). The meaning is not clear. It may be M. of Gath; then M. wd. be near that city. OEJ. places it near Eleutheropolis—Beit Jibrīn.

MORIAH. Abraham was directed "to the land of M." (Gn. 22.[2]), nowhere else mentioned in Scrip., and on "one of the mountains" there to offer up Isaac. He had journeyed three days fm. the land of the Phil. when he saw the appointed place "afar off." As we know nothing of where the land was, or what its boundaries were, it is imposs. to ident, the place. The Samaritans lay the scene of the sacrifice on Mt. Gerizim: Jewish tradition places it on the Temple hill. This seems to be the mind of the writer in 2 Ch. 3.[1], who calls the hill "Mt. Moriah."

MORTAR. Before the hand-mill came into use grain was often prepared for culinary purposes by being pounded in a mortar. During recent excavations in Palestine many ancient mortars have been brought to light. They consist of stones, in the upper surface of which a hollow is made. The pestle is also of stone, cylindrical in shape, and rounded at the end. Mortar and pestle may often have been made then, as now, of hard wood. Not only was grain ground in the mortar, the manna was also beaten in it (Nu. 11.[8]). It was also used for pounding spices (Ex. 30.[36]) and for the meal-offering (Lv. 2.[14], RV. "bruised corn"). It is said that a mortar made of gold was used in preparing the incense in the Temple of Herod, by the family of Abtines. After the destruction of Jerusalem it was taken to Rome, where it remained till the time of Hadrian.

Now that coffee is universally used in the East the coffee mortar is one of the indispensable pieces of furniture. The master of the house deems it no indignity to pound the brown beans himself, and very dexterous many men are in the use of the pestle. A common dish, kibbeh, is made of pieces of flesh with burghul, boiled wheat, pounded together in a mortar. This may be the process glanced at in Pr. 27.[22]. Maktesh, "mortar," is the "hollow place" of Jg. 15.[19], probably in some way resembling the mortar. It is also the name applied to a quarter in Jerusalem, most likely for a similar reason.

MORTAR, MORTER. Ḥomer denotes the cement by which building stones are held together. Bitumen was used for this purpose in Babylonia (Gn. 11.[3], RVm.). Usually in ancient times, as now, clay would be used in Pal. It is trodden by the feet, to prepare it for use (Na. 3.[14]), chopped straw being added. The mud, ashes, &c., with wh. the walls are often plastered (Lv. 14.[42, 45]) and the roof laid are mixed with great care, and altho' the present writer has not seen it, oil is said to be added at times, so that it better resists the rain. Lime is now in much more common use in the East.

MOSERAH, a station in the wilderness, where Aaron died and was buried. It is named between Beeroth Bene-jaakan and Gudgodah (Dt. 10.[7]). In Nu. 33. it appears in the plural form, Moseroth: Bene-jaakan appears without the "Beeroth," and Gudgodah becomes Hor-haggidgad. The order is also changed. Beyond the fact that it was on the way to Mount Hor there is nothing to guide us as to its position.

MOSES, son of AMRAM and JOCHEBED, a descendant of LEVI (Ex. 6.[16, 20]; Nu. 26.[59]), the liberator of Israel fm. their Egyptian bondage, and their lawgiver; he that gave them a religion and welded them into a nation; one of the greatest names in all history. The Hebrew nation, fm. enjoying special favour, as they did under the Hyksos Kings, under whose rule they had entered Egypt, had fallen into a disfavour that had deepened into persecution. Joseph appears to have been sold into Egypt during the reign of Apepa I., the greatest of the Shepherd Kings, whose inscriptions have been found in Upper Egypt. He it was that made Joseph his vizier, and under him Jacob and his family, his slaves and his herds, were received into Egypt. Apepa, so far as can be discovered fm. the few remains wh. the spite of the later dynasties have allowed to come down to us, had assimilated himself thoroughly to his subjects; a state of matters wh. harmonises with the narrative in the book of Genesis and the habits and views of the court there presented to us. Under Apepa II., a son, it may be, of the friend of Joseph, a quarrel broke out between him and his vassal king at Thebes. The struggle was prolonged, but at length the native forces triumphed, and the armies of the Hyksos Kings were driven out of Egypt. This event seems to have taken place some time during the fifteenth cent. B.C. The Israelites did not follow the dynasty that had favoured them, but remained in Egypt. Suspicion began to grow in the minds of the new native Pharaohs that the Hebrews mt. not be true to them. The Shepherd Kings had established themselves in Palestine, if we are to believe Josephus; they mt. be liable to reinvade Egypt, and the dread was not chimerical that the Hebrews mt. join the side of those who had favoured them so much in the days of their power. Hence the Egyptians began to make efforts to weaken the Hebrews. Notwithstanding, they increased in numbers, and suspicion became dread. In true governmental fashion, the king wishes to destroy the Hebrews, but does not wish his hand to appear in the matter, so he strives to seduce the midwives to do the work for him. The two he experiments on will not be his instruments. The next plan that suggests itself to the king is the drowning of the male children of the Hebrews. This wd. not be an open order. Secret orders wd. be given to such officials in ancient Egypt as answered to police, that, whenever it cd. be done secretly, the boys belonging to the Hebrews, especially of the leading families, shd. be so disposed of. The oppressed wd. soon come to a knowledge of the real meaning of the disappearance of their boys. It was in these circumstances that Moses was born. His personal beauty led his parents to be specially careful about their infant son, hiding even the fact of his birth, lest the myrmidons of Pharaoh shd. be able to lay hold of him. It may have been that the faith with wh. Amram and Jochebed are credited in He. 11.[23] was that God wd. not leave the seed of Abraham His friend thus desolate, but wd. raise up a deliverer for them. When concealment was no longer possible Jochebed drew courage fm. her despair, put her boy in an ark of bulrushes, and consigned it to the river herself. It is probable that it was known that the daughter of Pharaoh was accustomed to bathe in the Nile about this part. It may also have been that the character of this princess was known and calculated on. It all fell out as was hoped for. The daughter of Pharaoh, accompanied by her maidens, came down to bathe in the Nile, and, seeing the infant in his coffer, sent one of her maids to fetch it to her. When the coffer was opened the babe wept, and so won the heart of the princess. It somewhat confirms the idea of calculation that Miriam, who had been placed to watch, was so ready with her suggestion of a nurse; she must have been previously "coached" to come forward so opportunely. The princess cannot have known of the conspiracy against Israel, nor can she have shared the dread and hate that had occasioned it: she recognised the babe to be a child of the despised Hebrews, but that did not move her to have it cast into the river again. Moses was adopted by Pharaoh's daughter, but was given back to his mother, and thus passed his infancy and early childhood among his own people. In the most impressible years of his life he had the opportunity of learning the faith and hopes of Israel. In his early youth he was removed to the palace and formally adopted as the son of the daughter of Pharaoh.

This princess Josephus calls Thermouthis (Ant. II. ix. 5); Eusebius, on the authority of Artapanus, says her name was Merrhis, and that she was the wife of Chenephren, ruler of Memphis, but having no children herself adopted Moses. One of the daughters of Ramses II. was called Meri.

Fm. the Biblical narrative we learn that the princess called his name Moses "because I drew him out of the water."

This wd. make the probable etymology mo, "water," and ushe, "saved," as suggested by Josephus. We are told that this etymology is no longer "fashionable" (Bennett, HDB.). The received etymology is, it seems, to regard "Moses" as a modification of mesu, "child." There is no reason assigned for the preference that seems adequate. That the name shd. be modified to suit the Heb. language is but natural.

His education embraced not only all the wisdom of the Egyptians in the ordinary sense of the term, if we are to believe Josephus, but he also was instructed in military affairs, in wh. he manifested so great proficiency that he was appointed commander of an expedition against the Ethiopians, and brought it to a successful termination. Artapanus, as quoted by Eusebius, has a similar account of a conflict with the Ethiopians under the leadership of Moses. That, brought up as a prince, Moses shd. learn something of military organisation is extremely probable. No training cd. well have been more necessary for one who was to lead the thousands of Israel through the wilderness. Meantime it wd. seem that the more murderous part of the royal policy with regard to Israel had been departed fm.; perhaps the action of the princess may have had something to do with this. Oppression was again tried: toil and scourges were the means by wh. it was hoped that the Hebrews wd. be diminished. Now a new actor came upon the scene. Sympathy with his kinsfolk, intensified on the one hand by sacred memories of his early childhood, and on the other by taunts at his parentage wh. wd. not be wanting, Moses determined to revisit them. The sight of their misery moved him to be their deliverer. It is probable he hoped to be able to mould these oppressed slaves into warriors who, under his leadership, mt. wrest their freedom fm. the Egyptians by force of arms. His first act towards the assumption of leadership was to slay one of the taskmasters whom he saw abusing one of his kinsmen, and to hide the body of his victim in the sand. It may have been that his plan was to paralyse the Egyptian oppression by removing its instruments. That the oppressed Hebrews shd. have hailed as their leader the talented student and successful general who had left the pleasures of the court to acknowledge them as his brethren, was a not unnatural expectation. If he was to deliver, they must be ready to yield to him obedience, and further be prepared to preserve an absolute silence as to his plans when they knew them. An opportunity soon occurred to test this. Two Hebrews were quarrelling, and Moses endeavoured to act as peacemaker between them; but his efforts were rejected in a way that led him to see that everything was already known to the king. He fled instantly, and, travelling along the eastern coast of the Red Sea, came at length to the land of MIDIAN. He wd. have to avoid the workers in the Egyptian mines in the Sinaitic peninsula. He had an opportunity of benefiting the daughters of the priest of Midian, Jethro or Reuel.* One cannot help deducing fm. the treatment the daughters of Jethro received fm. the shepherds that, though influential as being priest, he cd. not be the king of Midian. Moses became shepherd to Jethro, and married his daughter ZIPPORAH. His lengthened stay in the desert of Sinai, and not less his intercourse with the permanent inhabitants, wd. teach him the lore of the desert, and thus fit him in a very special manner to act as guide of his people through the wilderness. While acting as shepherd to his father-in-law he had "led his flock to the backside of the desert, and came to the mountain of God, to Horeb": then he had the Divine call to go and deliver Israel. "The Angel of the Lord (JHWH) appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush." God then proclaimed the purpose of His appearing. Moses was to lead His people out of Egypt and bring them into "a land flowing with milk and honey." Diffidence had now taken the place of confidence, and he seemed to seek for excuses to avoid taking up his great commission. God met all his difficulties, revealed His covenant name of JHWH, gave miraculous signs by wh. to attest the reality of his mission, and, finally, when he complained of inability to speak effectively, gave Aaron his brother to be his spokesman. Dismissed with a blessing by his father-in-law, and taking his wife and children with him, Moses departed for Egypt. On the way occurred the strange but illuminating incident at the inn or khān. A messenger of God met Moses on the way, in the khān where they had rested for the night, and threatened to slay him. This may have been a sharp, severe illness, in wh. Moses read Divine rebuke of his neglect in not circumcising his second son. Learning fm. her husband the meaning of his danger, she with a flint knife performed the rite, evidently against her will (Ex. 4.[24-26]). This incident reveals how little religious sympathy there cd. have been between Moses and his wife; it also shows a certain weakness in the great prophet. The messenger of God to bring Israel the Divine law has not fulfilled the law himself. After this episode Zipporah appears to have returned to her father and taken her children with her.

* Colonel Conder has shown that the difference between these two names when written in cuneiform is very small, so that one might easily be mistaken for the other (First Bible, p. 104).

It may be doubted whether we are to take the "forty years" assigned to the residence of Moses in Midian as more than a round number; although it harmonises with Ex. 7.[7], and with Moses' statement in Dt. 31.[2], wh. may have been modified by harmonising copyists.

As God had been fitting Moses to be the leader of His people, so, concurrently, had He been preparing His people to submit to the guidance of Moses. The Egyptian oppression was making the Hebrews groan. Aaron, too, was called by God to go forth to meet his brother. The two brothers met after their long separation, and compared visions. This was not all: they proceeded together and gathered into an assembly "all the elders of the children of Israel." Those that had rejected Moses before, now, on seeing the signs, believed in his mission and bowed their heads in grateful worship. The two brothers next proceeded into the presence of Pharaoh and delivered to him the message of JHWH, God of Israel: "Let My people go that they may hold a feast to Me in the wilderness." Pharaoh met this request as a challenge fm. JHWH, because He had declared Himself the God of Israel, and claimed their freedom to worship Him: therefore Pharaoh doubled their oppression. They are to make bricks as many as before, but now they have to gather the binding straw. This cruelty of oppression overwhelms the rulers of Israel, and leads them to reproach Moses and Aaron, whom they regard as the cause of this additional misery. It was little wonder, then, that Moses was bowed down and nigh unto despair, crying out to God in his anguish. God, however, let him know that He had accepted Pharaoh's challenge. Again the brothers went into the king's presence and demonstrated to him by works of wonder that the Lord God of the Hebrews was a God of might. The astrologers gave a colourable imitation of what Moses and Aaron did, and Pharaoh's heart was hardened. Now when Pharaoh would not yield to evidence, judgment was meted out to him; he was warned that the sacred river Nile was to be turned into blood. It happened according to Moses' prediction; yet the king's heart was hardened because the magicians could do the same. The plague of frogs followed; though the magicians cd. increase the plague, this time he called upon Moses and Aaron to pray for him, and promised to let the people go. When, however, the respite came, again his heart was hardened, and he wd. not fulfil his promise. Another plague was sent, wh. to the fastidious Egyptians was a yet sorer—lice were sent in all their borders; yet Pharaoh's obstinacy was not conquered to let Israel go. Following on this was a plague of flies, or as some think, beetles; "swarms" is all that is in the original. For a moment Pharaoh's obstinacy yielded, only to return in all its former obduracy when the plague was removed. Meantime the marvel is that the monarch made no attempt to have these bold challengers of his authority removed by assassination if not by execution. The dread of JHWH, the God behind these His messengers, must have held the hand of the tyrant. Murrain on the cattle followed; then boils; after that hail; next locusts; then darkness over all the land for three days. The last terrible demonstration of the power of JHWH was announced, and then there was a pause. Attention was now turned fm. the Egyptians to Israel; a feast was ordained for them in connection with this threatened tenth plague. A lamb was to be slain, and its blood sprinkled on the lintels and doorposts, that the Angel of Death might "pass over" their dwellings. The lamb was to be roast whole and eaten in haste. Then when all things were ready the stroke fell. There was not a house in all Egypt in wh. there was not one dead; and so up to the silent moon rose the bitter cry of desolation. Then under the leadership of Moses, laden with the gifts of the Egyptians, who thus strove to propitiate the terrible God of the Hebrews, Israel took his departure. There was a new trial before Moses; hardly had the children of Israel started when Pharaoh repented of the permission he had given. Meantime the people were led into what seemed a trap. Hearing that they had gone by way of the mountains, Pharaoh assembled his chariots to pursue after them. Again the murmur rose against Moses; but he called upon them to trust: "Fear ye not, stand still. . . . The Lord shall fight for you and ye shall hold your peace." Then the cloud that told God's presence came and stood between the host of Egypt and the camp of Israel. At early dawn Moses stretched his rod over the sea that hemmed them in, and it opened and afforded a pathway to them. When the Egyptians endeavoured to follow, again the hand was stretched forth, and the waves flowed over the host of Pharaoh (Ex. $13.^{20}$–$14.^{31}$). When they had crossed over the Red Sea and had seen their enemies overwhelmed the Israelites were full of joy. Here once more Moses led the people; he voiced their feelings in the great song of deliverance wh. his sister set to music and led the daughters of her people in singing: "I will sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously."

As to the point where the crossing took place, it probably was at the "Bitter Lakes" (see EXODUS, THE). Textual questions must be looked for in connection with the Book wh. contains the narrative (see EXODUS, THE BOOK OF). We shd., however, like to remark that while Canon Driver (LOT., p. 21) assigns Ex. 3. mainly to E. (the writer who prefers Elohim, "God," as the Divine designation), and directs the reader's attention to the prevalence of "God" in the narrative, he assigns the triumph song of chap. 15. to the same source although "God" occurs only twice, while JHWH is found twelve times. At the same time Dr. Driver is moderation itself compared with some others.

After the song of triumph the host appears to have moved inland, leaving the sea coast, into the desert of Shur; probably the object was to avoid the Egyptian frontier fortresses. When they began to encounter the hardships of the desert, at once they murmured against their leaders. All their difficulties were met and their distresses relieved. The bitter waters of Marah were rendered pleasant, and "manna" was sent fm. heaven to satisfy their hunger. In connection with the sending of the manna we have the emphasising of the Sabbath.

According to Genesis the Sabbath is old as creation (Gn. $2.^{3}$). As pointed out by Dr. Sayce (Gifford Lect. p. 476), the Sabbath was known in Babylon—word and thing. It was a day of rest, "a day of rest of the heart"; it was a day of restriction; even the king was not to eat cooked food. The Babylonian Sabbath was arranged in relation to the month; the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th days of the month were Sabbaths, also the 19th, which was approximately the seventh seventh fm. the beginning of the preceding month; a mode of reckoning wh. points to the Babylonian reckoning being a modification of an older mode, in wh. the days were grouped in sevens irrespective of the phases of the moon (see SABBATH).

The people came at length to Rephidim, where the Hebrews again murmured against Moses. It was thirst that afflicted them, and they complained, "Thou hast brought us up fm. Egypt to kill us and our children and our cattle with thirst." Moses was told to take the rod with which he had smitten the "river," and with it to smite the rock in Horeb. He did so, and the water flowed forth. The place was called in consequence Maṣṣāh, "temptation," and Mĕrībāh, "strife." But they soon learned that hunger and thirst were not the only disagreeables to be encountered in the desert. The freebooting tribe of Amalek assailed them, cutting off the stragglers, and generally harassed them on their march (Dt. $25.^{17-19}$). The leadership of the soldiery was given to JOSHUA: Moses, accompanied by Aaron and Hur, stood on the top of a neighbouring height "with the rod of God" in his hand. While Moses kept the rod stretched out Israel prevailed, but when he let his hand down Amalek prevailed; so Aaron and Hur supported the hands of Moses, and Amalek was discomfited before Israel. In commemoration of this event Moses erected an altar to JHWH, wh. he called Jehovah Nissi, "JHWH is my banner" (Ex. $17.^{8-16}$). The news of the deliverance of Israel fm. their Egyptian bondage had reached Midian, and Jethro came to the camp of Israel bringing with him Zipporah the wife of Moses, and his two sons with her. Moses treated Jethro with all the ceremony of Eastern courtesy, making obeisance to him, and kissing him. A feast was made and a sacrifice offered, in wh. Jethro officiated. Observing how the whole burden fell on Moses, that all causes, great and small, were brought before him, Jethro suggested the appointment of subordinate judges who shd. decide all ordinary matters. Moses listened to the advice of Jethro, and chose men fitted for the office of judge (Ex. $18.^{1-27}$). Jethro then departed to his home.

After leaving Rephidim the Israelite host came to the neighbourhood of Mt. Sinai. They had already left behind them the bondage of Egypt for two complete months when they encamped under the shadow of Sinai. A cloud settled on the top of the mountain; the cloud unfolded itself and revealed flames of fire within it; there were lightnings and thunderings, and an earthquake; more terrible was "the voice of a trumpet exceeding loud"; it "sounded long and waxed louder and louder. Moses spake, and the Lord answered him out of the cloud." Into that dreadful fire went Moses to hear the words of God, to tell them to Israel. The law he received fm. the Lord was the "Ten Words," or, as we name them, the "Ten Commandments." In the first table we have the unity and spirituality of God to be recognised, and the reverence and service He requires to be rendered: in the second table, after the fifth commandment, in wh. lies the essence of all authority and government, we have reciprocal duties between equals laid down, each wrong being forbidden in its extremest form—murder, adultery, theft, and perjury. It is shown in the tenth commandment, "Thou shalt not covet," that everything that leads to these extremes is also forbidden. No other code of laws can approach this in profound spiritual morality. From Ex. $20.^{22}$ to the end of Ex. 23. may be regarded as exposition of these fundamental commands, but arranged on no distinct principle: early lawgivers were not careful of logical arrangement. The earlier code of Ḥammurabi is not gathered up as this is into principles, but is frittered away in details. Another step in the hallowing of Israel is taken in Ex. 24.; a covenant is solemnly made between Israel and JHWH, a covenant of blood: in this transaction Moses is MEDIATOR. Again Moses is called up into the presence of God, and is accompanied towards the awful fires by Aaron and his two elder sons, with 70 of the elders of Israel; they are left to go down to the camp, where they are to carry on the government in the absence of Moses; only Joshua is left alone without the fiery cloud and above the camp. While thus forty days and forty nights with God, Moses received in vision the plan of the Tabernacle and the figures of its various vessels. Aaron and his sons were designated as the servants of the sanctuary; and Bezaleel and Aholiab were appointed artificers to carry the work to completion. It may be noted that there appears to be a contradiction between the ordinance in Ex. 20.[24], that the altar was to be an altar of earth, and the directions in chap. 27.[1-8], for the making of the brazen altar; but the altar was essentially a box, wh. was filled with earth when used to offer on it burnt-offerings.

While Moses in ecstatic vision had unveiled before him the Tabernacle of Meeting, in all its glory of curtains of fine twined linen, and courts with pillars that had silver sockets, a change was taking place in the mind of the multitude in the camp of Israel. Moses had left them for nearly six long weeks. Aaron had not the commanding personality of his brother. The people wished a deity they cd. see, and compelled him to make the "golden calf." It was probably a reminiscence of the Apis-worship wh. they had seen in Egypt, and wh. they probably knew was an excrescence on a spiritual religion, that led them to take the figure of a young bull as the symbol of their deity. God broke the current of revelation to tell Moses of the moral tragedy that was taking place among His people. When God Almighty threatened to destroy the "stiff-necked" race, and coupled with this the offer to make of him a great nation, Moses again came forward as mediator. Resisting the temptation, so strong to the Eastern, of being remembered with reverence by a numerous and powerful progeny, he pleaded the cause of Israel for the sake of God's own glory. He came fm. the awful presence bearing in his hands the tables of the law—the solemn "Ten Words." Moses said no word to Joshua of what had been told him regarding the apostasy in the camp. As they came nearer Joshua heard the shouting and, warrior as he was, he thought at once of war, of the assault anew of Amalek or of some other warlike tribe. Moses directed his attention to the fact that the sounds were not the sounds of strife, but those of feasting. When Moses came within sight of the camp and saw their orgiastic worship and its object, the wrath that had been gathering in his soul burst forth, and the sacred tables of the law that had been consecrated by the finger of God he dashed to the ground and broke. They were unworthy of this proof of Divine condescension. He pounded the golden calf in pieces, and pouring its dust on water made its worshippers drink of it. Nor was this all; he called upon the tribe of Levi, his own tribe, to arm themselves and execute the vengeance of the Lord upon those who had turned the glory of Israel into shame. Three thousand fell on that day. In the midst of his wrath he was yet full of yearning love for his kinsfolk, and again he entreated God on their behalf; nay, in the sublimity of his self-devotion offered himself as the substitute for Israel. Let him perish if only Israel might be saved. But some obvious sign must be given of Divine displeasure, so Moses now removed his tent fm. the centre of the camp, where it had been, to wh. the people had been wont to come for judgment and to receive Divine oracles, to the outside of the camp, and required that they shd. don the garb of penitents before God. At this point, when Moses had reached the highest point of unselfish love for his people, God gave him His highest revelation. He was placed in a cleft of the rock, and covered over by the cloudy hand of God while the awful glory passed by; then the hand was lifted, and he saw a vision of vanishing yet surpassing splendour. God made all His mercy and His goodness pass before him. Then it was that the strange splendour began to illuminate the face of Moses, so that when he came fm. the presence of God he had to put a veil upon his face.

Now he began to endeavour to realise in actual fact the vision he had received when in the mount with God. He called for the people to bring their voluntary offerings of gold, of linen, and gems, in order that the Tabernacle might be erected, so that the people might have before them the visible symbol of JHWH's presence among them; and Bezaleel and Aholiab were summoned to carry out and superintend the work. Thus it was all made according to the pattern wh. Moses had seen in the mount. At the same time it is probable that Egyptian models were used by God to give definiteness to the thought of Moses; the sacred ark itself had prototypes in Egyptian worship. The book of Leviticus is so wholly occupied with the consecration of Aaron and his sons as priests, and the arrangement as to sacrifices, that there is in it only one biographical note; but it is striking and illuminative. When Nadab and Abihu perish before the Lord for offering strange fire on the altar (Lv. 10.[1-20]), Aaron and his two remaining sons refrain fm. all outward signs of mourning, yet they cannot eat the sin-offering. Moses, to whom the sense of the Divine swallows up everything else, rebukes his brother for this failure to perform his ritual duty; yet when Aaron presents the human side to him, "how such things have befallen" him, Moses is at once "content." The narrative is resumed in Numbers with the census of the people; following it there are some ceremonial regulations. We have reference to a visit of Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses (Nu. 10.[29-32]). We are not told, but it seems as if he had accompanied them in their journeys thereafter, and put his knowledge of the desert at the service of Israel. He was promised a share in the blessings God had spoken of to Israel. Again Moses was tried by the murmuring of the people, the "mixed multitude" especially (see MIXED MULTITUDE). They despised the manna that was sent fm. heaven to them. Moses was so much depressed by this renewed expression of petulance that he prayed to be delivered fm. his responsibilities by death (Nu. 11.[15]). He was required to bring seventy of the elders of Israel to the Tabernacle. Two remained behind in the camp, named Eldad and Medad; when the Spirit of God fell upon those who were with Moses in the precincts of the Tabernacle, then it fell also on the two who remained in the camp. When Joshua appealed to Moses to rebuke those irregular prophets, Moses answered him: "Enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord wd. put His spirit upon them." He did not regard the possession of inspiration as a thing to be jealously restricted to himself alone. Meantime a plague broke out among the people, especially among the mixed multitude who had desired flesh, and had eaten of the quails; many were the graves in Kibroth-hattaavah. Thence the people journeyed to HAZEROTH; while there a family quarrel came to the surface. Zipporah, here called a Cushite woman (her mother mt. have been an Ethiopian), did not agree with her sister-in-law MIRIAM. Moses became involved in the dispute, and Miriam in her heat proceeded to deny that Moses had any special mission; Aaron was drawn in to take the side of Miriam. Moses, ready as he always seems to have been to yield where merely his own dignity was in question, was willing to submit to the arrogance of his sister and brother; but God Himself interfered and smote Miriam with leprosy. It wd. seem that in some way the sin of Miriam was worse than that of Aaron, as the punishment fell only on her. Aaron besought Moses to intercede with God on her behalf, wh. he readily consented to do; God would, however, only grant her healing and pardon after seven days' exclusion fm. the camp (Nu. 12.[1-16]). Fm. the wilderness of PARAN, their next resting-place, spies were sent into Canaan, one fm. each tribe. Of these twelve spies only two, CALEB and JOSHUA, brought a favourable report; the other ten, while admitting the fertility of the land, declared it impossible that Israel cd. conquer the nations wh. possessed it; they had strongly fortified cities, and were themselves giants. The people became utterly downhearted; nothing that cd. be said was able to infuse courage into them. Then their despair turned to rage, and they were ready to take up stones to stone Moses and Aaron. But at this point "the Glory of the LORD appeared in the Tabernacle of the Congregation." JHWH threatened to destroy the whole nation and make of Moses a people mightier than they. Again Moses put behind him the glittering prospect, and again became the advocate of the people. As before, the point of his intercession was God's glory; it was involved in fulfilling His promises to Israel; he pleaded also His past mercy. "Pardon, I beseech Thee, the iniquity of this people according to the greatness of Thy mercy, and as Thou hast forgiven this people fm. Egypt even until now." Though God answered, "I have pardoned," yet He punished them by declaring their exclusion fm. the land. "Your carcases shall fall in this wilderness, and your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years." When they heard the sentence on their rebellion, too late repentant, they wd. now rush to the conquest of the land. Despite the fact that Moses warned them, they rushed on, but were driven back with ignominy (Nu. 13., 14.). Another subject of discontent arose; the question of precedence. It assumed two forms: one ecclesiastical, whether the Aaronites shd. have the precedence of the other Levites; the other civil, whether the tribe of REUBEN, as that of the eldest son, shd. not supply the ruler of Israel. The former of these movements found a leader in KORAH, while the latter was led by three sons of Reuben—DATHAN, ABIRAM, and ON. Meek though Moses was, this rebellion of the Reubenites and of Korah roused him. He denounced the vengeance of God upon them. Those Reubenites who shared in the revolt were swallowed up, their tents and all their possessions. Those that joined Korah were burnt up with fire when they wd. offer incense. The exact time-connection of these events cannot be definitely ascertained. The precedence of the house of Levi was fixed by Aaron's rod budding (Nu. 16.[1]–17.[13]).

There is a lacuna in the history; 37 years are passed over without record. Towards the end of the 40 years the curtain is lifted, and we find them at Kadesh; and there Miriam died. The new generation showed that they had inherited the evil dispositions of their fathers: "They gathered themselves against Moses and against Aaron" (Nu. 20.[2]). Again was Moses commanded to take the rod in his hand and go and speak to the rock. When the congregation were assembled before the rock Moses said, "Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock?" then smote the rock twice and the water came out abundantly. It was in regard to this incident that Moses, and with him Aaron, incurred the special guilt wh. excluded them fm. Canaan. Whether it was the assertion by implication of equality with God in the phrase, "Must we fetch you water"; or his contempt of the people and rage at them wh. made him say, "Hear now, ye rebels"; or whether, when commanded merely to speak to the rock, he smote it twice, as if implying that without the redoubled stroke the miracle wd. not have happened, we cannot tell. This place was called, as was the place near Horeb, "the waters of Meribah," "the waters of strife," but distinguished fm. it by being called Meribah Kadesh (Dt. 32.[51]; Nu. 20.[1-13]; cp. Ex. 17.[7]; see MERIBAH). The people passed on eastward, and Moses endeavoured to get the Edomites to allow Israel to pass thro' their territory, but they wd. not. When the children of Israel arrived at Mt. Hor on the boundary of Edom, Aaron was informed that the time had come that he must die. Moses conveyed his brother and Eleazar his son to the top of Mt. Hor, and there Aaron died and was buried, and Moses was left alone.

In Dt. 10.[6] it is said that Aaron died at Mosera, but this was possibly the district where the camp was placed and the hill rose up from it. It is certain that the mountain near Petra called Jebel Neby Harūn is not the scene of Aaron's death. It is a sandstone mountain, and on the top there is a wely wh. purports to be Aaron's tomb, hung round with tokens of the piety of pilgrims (see HOR).

The march was now taken away to the SE. to compass the territory of Edom. The heart of the people was depressed with this retrogression, and again they murmured against Moses. Their punishment for this renewed rebellion was that fiery serpents were sent among them, and many died fm. the envenomed bites. Moses set up a brazen serpent, and whoever looked to it was healed. Israel had now come to the E. of the territory of Moab at Ije Abarim. MOAB at this time had been driven back before the attacks of SIHON, king of the Amorites, and they seem to have been inclined to enter into an alliance with Israel. Sihon refused, as had the king of Edom, to permit Israel a passage through his country. War ensued, and Sihon was utterly overthrown and slain; his territory was taken. It wd. seem that fm. this time Moses contemplated settlements for Israel E. of Jordan. He proceeded N. to Jazer and dispossessed the Amorites who dwelt there. This roused the suspicions of Og, king of Bashan, and he too was overthrown and slain, and his territory taken. The Moabites began now to be afraid of Israel, and, making an alliance with the Midianites, they sent for BALAAM to curse the invaders. Though prevented from cursing, Balaam suggested that Israel mt. be lured to destruction by Moabitish and Midianite maidens, leading them to join in the impure worship of Baal-peor. A plague was sent in punishment; and 24,000 perished (Nu. 22.[1]–25.[18]). While thus in the neighbourhood of the land promised to their fathers a new census was ordered, when it was found that, so far fm. there being an increase in the 40 years, there was a falling off to the extent of 3000 of males able to bear arms. The Levites were estimated on a different principle, and they show an increase of 1000 males (Nu. 26.[1-65]). At their request Moses assigned the extensive territory conquered on the E. of Jordan to the tribes of REUBEN and GAD, and the half tribe of MANASSEH, on promise that they shd. assist their brethren in the conquest of Canaan proper (Nu. 32.[1-42]). In the plains of MOAB, according to the record, Moses delivered to assembled Israel DEUTERONOMY, "the Second Law." While to some extent a recapitulation of the events connected with their journey through the wilderness, and a promulgation anew of the law, at the same time it is more than that, for the events are sometimes presented in a new light, and the laws have modifications introduced into them. For the various questions involved see DEUTERONOMY. In the 32nd chap. of Deuteronomy we have what is called the Song of Moses. It is not improbable that the nucleus dates as far back as Moses, but it appears to have been added to, as such compositions are to this day. There is a characteristic note running through the whole composition; the title "Rock" is given to God throughout. There is also the alternation of threatenings of judgment and declarations of loving pity. After a final exhortation to keep the law of God, as "it is their life," Moses received the intimation that, as Aaron went up Mt. Hor to die, so was he to ascend Mt. Nebo. Then in the 33rd chap. we have the blessings of the separate tribes. There are several peculiarities in it worthy of note: the omission of Simeon; the assigning of other geographical situations to some of them than those they occupied; Dan leaps fm. Bashan, wh. he never occupied; Naphtali, the most northern of the tribes, is declared to possess "the west and the south"; the comparative insignificance of the place assigned to Judah. Probably here also modifications have been introduced in the course of transmission. Moses then went up the lonely hill above the Dead Sea and saw the land stretched out before him,* and there he died and there God buried him. No man knoweth his sepulchre unto this day. It is impossible in a few sentences to estimate the character of the great lawgiver, whose influence is felt equally in Christian and Mohammedan countries. Sublime faith in God and love for Him are the foundations of his character. Towards men, unless when, like Pharaoh, they were enemies of God, he was gentle almost to weakness. We can scarcely deny him the possession of poetic gifts, whatever our ideas of the authenticity of what is ascribed to him. Power of winning affection seems to have been his; witness the devotion of Joshua to him. After all, Moses is too great to be estimated. Criticism of the documents fm. wh. we learn his story may be considered under the articles on the various books of the law.

* Some have maintained that Jebel Osha' near es-Salt was the true Nebo. Certainly the whole land can be seen from it. The Mohammedans place the tomb of Moses on the west side of Jordan above the Dead Sea. It is visited annually by bands of fanatical Dervishes.

MOST HIGH (Heb. and Chal. 'elyōn, Gr. ὕψιστος). A title first given to God (Gn. 14.[18-23]) in relation to the priesthood of MELCHIZEDEK. It occurs in the speech of BALAAM (Nu. 24.[16]); in Is. 14.[14] it is put in the mouth of the king of Babel. It is frequent in the Psalms (21 times), and twice in Lamentations. Out of these two poetic books "Most High" always occurs in connection with the heathen; e.g. Dt. 32.[8]. In the NT. it is frequent in the writings of LUKE. It is found nine times, as applied to God; of these five are in the Gospel, and two in Acts: one of the remaining cases (He. 7.[1]) is a quotation fm. Gn. 14.[18]. According to Philo of Byblus (quoted by Eusebius, Prep. Ev.) there was a deity of Tyre called Elioun.

MOTH (Heb. 'āsh, Gr. ses). The clothes moth is invariably referred to, and the references show a keen appreciation of its destructive powers. Clothes, if left for any time shut up, seem almost to crumble to dust before the industry of these ubiquitous creatures (Jb. 4.[19f.], &c.). This gives special point to the allusion in Mw. 6.[19], &c.; so much of an Oriental's treasure has always consisted in fine apparel. It is used also as a symbol of fragility (Jb. 4.[19]; Ps. 39.[11]).

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN. As was natural in a country like Pal. mountains play a great part in its history. They are treated in articles under their individual names. Some ambiguity arises fm. the use of the word har, now for a mountain range (Gn. 31.[21], &c.), now for a single height (Ex. 3.[1], &c.), and again for a definite part of a mountain range (Jo. 21.[21], "Mt. Ephraim"). See EPHRAIM, HILL.

Certain mountains connected with the life of our Lord are mentioned without name in the Gospels. "This mountain" in Mw. 21.[21] is the Mt. of Olives: in Jn. 4.[20] it is Gerizim. The scene of the Temptation may be laid correctly on the bleak uplands W. of Jericho; but if the phrase, "an exceeding high mountain," is to be taken literally, there is nothing in the region at all resembling this. But "wild beasts" (Mk. 1.[13]) still haunt these dreary wastes.

"The mountain" of Mw. 5.[1] can only mean the rising ground behind the plain of Gennesaret, as the same phrase, el-Jebel, does on the lips of the natives to-day. There is absolutely nothing to justify the identification with Qurūn Ḥaṭṭīn, popularly known as "the Mt. of Beatitudes." It is difficult of access fm. the plain: the identification dates only fm. Crusading times.

"The mountain" of Mw. 28.[16] was an appointed rendezvous, therefore some particular height, prob. a familiar object to the followers of Jesus, near Gennesaret, and lofty enough to afford a wide view. A not unlikely spot is Jebel Kan'ān, six miles N. of the plain, 2761 ft. above the Mediterranean. It commands a view of unusual beauty and interest, including northern and central Pal. on the W., and eastern Pal., fm. Hermon to Gilead, with the blue mirror of Galilee below, deep in its mountain frame. See also TRANSFIGURATION, MOUNT OF.

MOURNING. Amongst Easterns, esp. the Jews and kindred Semitic peoples, the whole ceremonial of M., both in its activities and in its abstinences, was designed with a view to publicity, and consequently its rites are not to be regarded as evidence of the feelings of the human heart, but rather show the respect wh. the mourner thought due to the deceased. It was regarded as a debt owing, and in the case of the death of a "wise man" in rabbinical times, its payment was compulsory on the part of the whole community (Mod. Kat. 25a; Shab. 105b). It was in agreement with this idea that Herod sought to have "the honour of a memorable M. at his funeral" by compassing the death of the leading men of Isr. (Jos. Ant. XVII. vi. 5). The OT. is full of expressions for and examples of M. for the loss of friends, possessions, and country, and in all these cases it was of a like nature. There was generally the rending of the clothes (Gn. 37.[34]; Jb. 1.[20]) and the substitution of dark-coloured garments—sackcloth (2 S. 3.[31], 14.[2]; Is. 15.[3]; Jr. 8.[21]), the shaving of the head or beard (Jb. 1.[20]; Jr. 16.[6], 41.[5]), or powdering the head with ashes and earth (2 S. 15.[32]; Jb. 2.[12]), sitting on the ground (Gn. 23.[3]; Jg. 20.[26]; 2 S. 13.[20]; Jb. 2.[8]) and, indeed, doing anything that presented a general appearance of negligence and uncleanness. There was also self-affliction in the beating of the body, generally the breast or the thigh (Ek. 21.[12]), and in cutting the flesh (Jr. 16.[6, 7], 41.[5]). Mourners were looked upon as in a sense unclean, and so they had to abstain fm. all sacrificial food (Lv. 7.[20]; Dt. 26.[14]), as also to fast for a time (2 S. 1.[12], 3.[35], 12.[16]). All ritual M. was prohibited to the High Priests and the Nazarites (Lv. 21.[10, 11]; Nu. 6.[7]), and the inferior priests mourned only for their near relatives (Lv. 21.[1, 2, 4]).

Professional mourners are to be met with as early as the days of Amos (5.[16]). The practice of engaging such continued in Isr. (Jr. 9.[17]; Mw. 9.[23]), and is common in the East to-day. Their duties consist of weeping, screaming excessively (Jr. 22.[18]), tearing their hair, face, and hands, throwing earth and sand on their heads, and winding up every few minutes with the wilwala, and that present-day usage represents the old custom we may be sure in this case, for the Talmud quite approves of "flutes and a tumultuous crowd," while it directs that at the funeral of even a poor man there should be "not less than two flute players and one mourning woman." In ordinary circumstances their duties would end with the day of death and burial, but the official M. in the home still continued. The usual period was seven days, and this time we find to have been observed in the case of Saul (1 S. 31.[13]), but it might be extended as circumstances seemed to require. Thus for Aaron and Moses there were thirty days M. (Nu. 20.[29]; Dt. 34.[8]). For Jacob there were seventy days in Egp. (Gn. 50.[3]) and seven days more before the burial (Gn. 50.[10]).

Modern Judaism has reduced all the Scripture practices to a system. It prescribes thirty days M. with abstinence fm. shaving, and new, white, or clean clothing. The first seven of these days are those of lamenting, and there must be no saluting, no servile work, no anointing, little washing, no sandals, no bedstead, no reading of the law, Mishna, or Gemara; only of Lamentations, Job, and portions of Jeremiah. The first three days (of weeping) were still more severe, and included abstinence fm. all sacred things, including phylacteries. On the first day, that of the death and burial, mourners had to abstain fm. all positive precepts of the law, including prayer; also from wine, meat, and society. The first seven days are spent at home, and in harmony with Scrip. example (Gn. 50.[3]; Jb. 2.[11], 30.[25]) friends and neighbours are expected to join and try to comfort the mourners. As soon as they shake the head in acknowledgment of condolence visitors must leave (Moed. Kat. 27b). Behind all this there is doubtless often a real sorrow, but the impression made on the onlooker is that it lacks the depth the western heart can feel. The deepest and sincerest of all M. is that for a first-born or only son (Jr. 6.[26]; Am. 8.[10]; Zc. 12.[10]). The loss of a female child is so little thought of that it is usually considered a sufficient condolence to say, "What does it matter? It was only a girl."

MOUSE. The Heb. word 'akbār is a generic term covering a wide variety of animals. In Palestine there are many species of mice, including the field-mouse, the dormouse, the porcupine-mouse, &c. The term denoted other small rodents, and probably even the hamster and the jerboa. The 'akbār was to the Hebrews an unclean animal (Lv. 11.[29]), and they evidently regarded with disgust people who could eat such things (Is. 66.[17]). But among the Arabs the hamster and the jerboa are eaten, and even field-mice. The hamster is about the size of a brown rat. It eats much grain, and also carries away in its cheek-pouches supplies which it stores up for winter. The field-mice are the most destructive, and so prolific are they that but for the birds that prey upon them little grain would see maturity. These no doubt were the mice that marred the land of the Philistines (1 S. 6.[5]). The offerings of golden mice probably show that the mouse was the recipient of Divine honours; with the view possibly of inducing it to spare the crops. For the agency of mice in spreading disease see Diseases and Remedies: Bubonic Plague.

MOUTH. (1) Gārōn (Ps. 149.[6]) = "throat." (2) Hēk (Jb. 12.[11], &c.) = the interior of the M. (3) 'Adī (Ps. 32.[9], RV. "trappings"; 103.[5], RV. "years") = "ornament." (4) Peh (very frequent = Chald. pūm, Dn. 7.[5], &c.), also signifying "edge" (Gn. 34.[26], &c.), and "border" (Ps. 133.[2]). (5) Panīm (Pr. 15.[14]) = "face." (6) Tera', Chald. "door" (Dn. 3.[26]).

MOZAH, a town in Benjamin (Jo. 18.[26]), named with Mizpeh and Chiphirah, prob. = mod. Beit Mizzeh, a ruin N. of Qulōnieh, four miles NW. of Jrs.

MULBERRY TREES are mentioned only in EV. of 2 S. 5.[23f.]; 1 Ch. 14.[14f.], where the one thing sure is that the M. is not the tree intended. Balsam trees are suggested in RVm. It is doubtful if they cd. grow at that elevation (see Baca, Valley of). The M. is mentioned in 1 M. 6.[34] and the black M. (Sycamine) in Lk. 17.[6].

MULE (Heb. pered). The earliest notice is 2 S. 13.[29], where, after the murder of Amnon, it is said "all the king's sons arose and every man gat him up upon his mule"; apparently the M. was used only by people of rank. The breeding of the M. was forbidden in Lv. 19.[19], but not the possession of them (Ez. 2.[66]; Jth. 15.[11]), hence they were imported. Ezekiel mentions Togarmah (Armenia) as the source (Ek. 27.[14]). Mules are not mentioned in the NT. Now, however, they are greatly prized, and rank next to the camel as beasts of burden in Pal. They are very hardy and sure of foot, and they are not difficult to feed. The soft, easy pace of the mule also makes it a favourite riding animal, especially among Eastern ladies.

MUSIC is so universal and so innate that the Hebrew writers ascribe its invention to primeval times (Gn. 4.[20-22]). Music and poetry go together, and both appear at the earliest dawn of literature. The Heb. language is eminently poetical; even its prose is rhythmical; and where there is rhythm music is already present. Rhythmical cadence in sound, and rhythmical movement in the dance, are instinctive, and manifest themselves at the earliest stages of human history. We find music employed to give expression to the most varying feelings in all the relations of the common life. At harvest and vintage feasts (Jg. 9.[27], 21.[21]; Is. 9.[3]), at family festivals (Gn. 31.[27]; Jb. 21.[12]; Jr. 25.[10]), at social banquets (Is. 5.[12]; Am. 6.[5, 6]), music is spoken of as a matter of course. The women sing to the well as they draw water (Nu. 21.[17]), the shepherd solaces himself with music as he tends his flock (1 S. 16.[18]), the young men have their songs at the gates (La. 5.[14]). Music is sought for to drive away Saul's melancholy (1 S. 16.[16]); Jephthah and Saul and David are welcomed with song and dance on their return victorious fm. battle (Jg. 11.[34]; 1 S. 18.[6]); and when Solomon was proclaimed king, "the people piped with pipes and rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them" (1 K. 1.[40]). A time of national adversity is a time when the mirth of tabrets and the joy of the harp cease (Is. 24.[8]). The poetical pieces associated with some of the more outstanding national events have been handed down to us; and these being of a lyrical char. were no doubt intended to be sung, and were sung to some musical accompaniment. Such were the song at the Red Sea (Ex. 15.), the Song of Moses (Dt. 32.), the Song of Deborah (Jg. 5.), &c. The Hebrews drew no hard-and-fast line between secular and sacred, and national affairs are under the sanction of religion. So we find music at an early time employed in the service of religion, and apparently music of the same kind as was in ordinary use; for David dances before the Ark, while the people play with all manner of instruments (2 S. 6.[5, 14]). It seems to have been a regular exercise in the schools of the prophets fm. the time of Samuel (1 S. 10.[5, 10], 19.[20]), and we read of Elisha on one occasion that he called for a minstrel, and when the minstrel played the hand of the Lord came upon him (2 K. 3.[15]).

Although music, both vocal and instrumental, came to be a very prominent feature in the Temple service, there is no ordinance of sacred song to be found in any of the laws of the Pentateuch; the only music that is mentioned being the trumpets wh. were to be blown to announce certain feasts (Nu. 10.[1-10]). This is a very significant fact, wh. should not be left out of consideration in connection with the discussions as to the date of the priestly legislation of those books. For, if the Priests' Code was composed or compiled during or after the Exile, and its laws ascribed to Moses to give them greater authority, it seems incredible that an element of the worship wh. was so prominent in the second Temple, and must have long prevailed in the pre-exilian Temple, was not attributed to the great legislator. It is not to Moses but to David that the sacred writers ascribe the institution of Temple music, as they also trace to him the use of sacred song or psalmody (2 S. 23.[1]; 1 Ch. 15.[16ff.]). It is true that it is in books of post-exilian origin, Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, that we have full details of the institution and arrangements of the Temple music, though we are not without hints of its employment in pre-exilian times (e.g. Is. 30.[29]; Am. 5.[23]). But it is plain that the singers and musical guilds who appear immediately after the Restoration could not have originated in the Exile, but were simply resuming and continuing the functions wh. their ancestors had exercised before that time. The numbers, gradations, and duties of these officials are so carefully given that we must assume the pre-exilian music to have been a matter of long development. The growing importance of the Temple musicians is seen in the fact that they are sometimes reckoned among the Levites (Ez. 3.[10]; Ne. 11.[22]; 1 Ch. 6.[31ff.]), and in other passages distinguished fm. them (Ez. 2.[41, 70], 7.[7, 24]; Ne. 7.[44, 73]). At a later time Josephus tells us (Ant. XX. ix. 6) that Agrippa II. gave the singers permission to wear the white garment of the priests. Though the OT. writers give so many details as to the names, divisions, and functions of the Temple singers—matters wh. were of importance to the officials—they leave us very much to conjecture what was the nature of the music, and what were the precise forms and uses of the instruments employed. We have to be guided here by what is known of modern Oriental music, and by monumental representations of instruments used by Assyrians and Egyptians. In all probability antiphonal singing was a feature of the worship (see Ne. 12.[31-43]), and some of the Psalms would seem to indicate that the worshippers may have joined in a refrain or doxology (Ps. 106.[48], 136.; cp. 1 Ch. 16.[36]). "Harmony," or part singing, is not a characteristic of Eastern music, wh. consists merely of "melody"; and that this was the case with the Temple music is perhaps implied in 2 Ch. 5.[13], where it is said that "the trumpeters and singers were as one," i.e. perhaps rendering the same melody though on different octaves. Oriental music (and no doubt the ancient Temple music was the same) seems rude and noisy to western ears; but it has a charm for Oriental people, and it has been elaborated with more technical skill, and cultivated with more scientific art, than is generally supposed. The influence of the Temple music no doubt passed over to the synagogue. The Talmud relates that "Joshua ben Hananiah, who had served in the Sanctuary as a member of the Levitical choir, told how the choristers went in a body to the synagogue fm. the orchestra by the altar, and so participated in both services" (Jew. Ency., vol. ix. p. 120). But it is doubtful if the influence was strong or lasting, as the char. of the synagogue service was so different fm. that of the Temple. The cantillation wh. is heard in the reading of Scripture is no doubt ancient (see Ne. 8.[8]), and may have retained ancient elements; but the more elaborate musical compositions that came at a later time into the synagogue service were rendered with music wh. probably echoed or imitated that of the countries in wh. the Jews lived, and it varied in different localities.

Instruments of music were early used, and no doubt were at first of a very primitive char. They are of three kinds: Stringed instruments, Wind instruments, and instruments of Percussion.

(1) Two stringed instruments are mentioned in the OT.: the kinnôr or lyre, and the nébel or harp, both of wood, and both employed as accompaniments of song. The kinnôr is the only stringed instrument mentioned in the Hexateuch, and there only twice (Gn. 6.[21], 31.[27]). It was the instrument played by David (1 S. 16.[23]), and by the exiles in Babylon (Ps. 137.[2]). The nébel is first mentioned in connection with the prophetic bands in the time of Samuel (1 S. 10.[5]). The kinnôr seems to have been the more common, being mentioned 44 times in the OT., as compared with 27 times in wh. the nébel occurs; and it seems to have been used as much for secular as for sacred purposes (see Is. 23.[16]).

(2) Of wind instruments three are particularly mentioned. (a) The shôfār, AV. "trumpet," was the simplest, being merely the ram's horn (Jo. 6.[4, 5]). It was used to give a signal, to call to arms, and to summon an assembly (Am. 3.[6]; Jl. 2.[1]; Jg. 3.[27]; 1 S. 13.[3]; 2 S. 15.[10]). A similar rude horn is still used in the Jewish synagogues on some special occasions. (b) The ḥătzôtzerā, or trumpet proper, was of metal, and was employed by the priests to announce the set feasts, and to give the signal for the march in the desert (Nu. 10.[1-10]). It is mentioned also in warlike operations (Nu. 31.[6]), at the proclamation of a king (2 K. 11.[14]), and prominently in the Temple orchestra (1 Ch. 13.[8]; 2 Ch. 5.[12], &c.). This was the straight instrument represented on the Arch of Titus, and, in a modified form, on Jewish coins. (c) The ḥālîl or flute was no doubt at first a reed or simple pipe, such as may be seen, single or double, in use among Oriental peoples at the present day. It was essentially a peaceful instrument; and it is mentioned in connection with the bands of prophets (1 S. 10.[5]), at the proclamation of Solomon (1 K. 1.[40]), and in processions to the Temple (Is. 30.[29]). No doubt a similar instrument is referred to in the NT. (Mw. 11.[17], and 9.[23], where for "minstrels" the RV. has "flute-players").

(3) Of instruments of percussion the simplest and most common was: (a) The toph, rendered tabret or timbrel, used to mark the rhythm in singing or dancing. It was employed not only on common festive occasions, but also in religious service (Ps. 81.[2], 149.[3], 150.[4]). (b) Cymbals are mentioned among the Temple music (1 Ch. 15.[16], &c.), and a word fm. the same stem, rendered "loud cymbals," occurs in Ps. 150.[5]. (c) The word rendered "castanets" in 2 S. 6.[5] (RV.) is from a root meaning to shake, and is probably to be rendered as in RVm., sistra.

(4) Of uncertain meaning are: (a) The word rendered in AV. "organ" (Gn. 4.[21]; Jb. 21.[12], 30.[31]; Ps. 150.[4]), but by RV. in all cases "pipe." It may have been the same or similar to the "flute" of Dn. 3.[5]. (b) The "sackbut" of Dn. 3.[5] may have been a triangular instrument of four strings. (c) The shālîshîm, mentioned only in 1 S. 18.[6], may have been "three-stringed instruments" as in AVm., or "triangles" as in RVm. (d) Ṣumpōnya in Dn. 3.[5] is rendered in AV. "dulcimer," but in RVm. "bagpipe."

MUSTARD. This is the Senapis nigra—Arb. khardal, a plant very common in Pal., both under cultivation, where it may be seen at times 10 to 12 ft. in height, and also wild, e.g. in the plain of Gennesaret. It bears great quantities of very small seeds, wh. are eaten by birds sitting ("lodging") on the branches. M.-seed is the symbol of what is very minute (Mw. 13.[31], &c.). The plant, although an annual, fm. its great size is not inappropriately described as a "tree" (Lk. 13.[19]).

MYRA, a city on the S. coast of Lycia, touched by St. Paul on his voyage to Rm. (Ac. 27.[5]). It lay on an eminence $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles fm. the sea, its port town being Andriake. Under the Empire M. reached its greatest prosperity. The prevailing winds in the E. Mediterranean are westerly. The corn ships of Alexandria were therefore accustomed to sail direct to M., wh. possessed an excellent harbour, and thence, under protection of the shores and islands, to work their way westwards. The mod. name is Dembre.

MYRRH. The M. of mod. commerce is derived fm. a shrub, Balsamodendron myrrha, wh.

grows abundantly in SE. Arabia and Somali-land. It is a gum exuded through incisions made in the bark, wh. speedily solidifies. The M. of OT. (Heb. mor = Arb. murr) is frequently spoken of as "flowing" (Ex. 30.[23], RV.) or "liquid" (SS. 5.[5], RV.).

MUSTARD. (See p. 491.)

It may have been the product of the Balsamodendron opobalsamum, the Mecca Balsam, valued for its aromatic properties. But the term may also have covered the produce of the former plant. M. was an ingredient in the holy anointing oil (Ex. 30.[23]). It was used in fumigation, and for perfumes (Est. 2.[12]; Ps. 45.[8], &c.). M. was used in preparing the dead for burial (Jn. 19.[39]). The Romans mixed M. in wine, to lessen its intoxicating power. Wine mingled with M. was given to dull the pain of crucifixion (Mk. 15.[23]); see GALL. Lot (Gn. 37.[25], 43.[11]) is not M., but a resin derived fm. a species of Cistus, a low shrub with pink flowers, wh. grows in the lands bordering the E. Mediterranean.

MYRTLE (Heb. hădas, fm. wh. Esther's Heb. name Hadassah is derived) is a small shrub with white flowers and small bluish berries, much relished for their pleasant flavour. The leaves when pressed emit a delightful perfume. It is found in all the Mediterranean basin except where moisture is lacking. The Messianic time is to be marked by the springing of myrtles in the desert (Is. 41.[19], 55.[13]). In the latter passage "trees" is an error. It is not in the Heb.

MYSIA, a district in the NW. of Asia Minor, bounded on the N. and W. by the Propontis and the Hellespont, on the S. by Lydia, and on the E. by Phrygia and Bithynia. St. Paul passed through M. on his way fm. Galatia and Phrygia to Troas (Ac. 16.[7f.]). Assos and ADRAMYTTIUM were also in M. The name was derived from that of a Thracian tribe, the Mysi. It was within the dominions of the Persians and of Alexander the Great. Subsequently it belonged to Pergamus, and fell with that kingdom to the Romans in B.C. 133, becoming part of the province of Asia. It is said to have been evangelised in part by one Onesiphorus, who suffered martyrdom at Parium in the second decade of the second cent.

MYSTERY (Gr. μυστήριον). In classic usage "mystery" means something concerning wh. one must keep silence, especially the religious "mysteries": e.g. the Eleusinian. In these certain symbolic actions were done, through wh., according to some, esoteric doctrines were revealed. The NT. sense is derived fm. this last. It is something that, to be known, must be revealed; generally this revelation is by symbol wh. must be explained. Hence the parables of our Lord are the "Mysteries of the Kingdom" (Mw. 13.[11]). So the symbol of the "seven stars" (Rv. 1.[20]) is called a M. The apostle Paul, when he looks upon marriage as a symbol of Christ's relationship to His Church (Eph. 5.[32]), calls it "a great M." When he regards NERO as a symbol of lawlessness (2 Th. 2.[7]) he calls him "the M. of iniquity." His use of M. for the Gospel (Eph. 3.[9]; Col. 1.[26]) seems slightly different; unless he regards the Incarnation and death of Christ as the symbol by wh. a transaction in the heavens was revealed. The sacramental idea is reached through this; certainly the Sacraments are spiritual truths revealed in symbol. When the modern sense of M. is intruded, i.e. something incomprehensible, then erroneous views are reached. The transition has been made all the easier fm. Vlg. tr. of M. into "sacramentum."

NAAM, a son of Caleb the son of Jephunneh (1 Ch. 4.[15]).

NAAMAH. (1) Dr. of Lamech, sr. of Tubal-cain (Gn. 4.[22]). (2) An Ammonite w. of Solomon, mr. of Rehoboam (1 K. 14.[21]). (3) A town of Judah in the Shephelah, named with Beth-dagon and Makkedah (Jo. 15.[41]), prob. = Nāʿaneh, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles S. of er-Ramleh. duced by the words of an Israelite slave girl to go to Elisha to be cured. The prophet tells him to wash seven times in Jordan. At first indignant, he yields to the remonstrances of his servants and obeys the prophet's command, and "his flesh came again like unto the flesh of a little child." On his cure he professes himself a worshipper of J″. alone. The case of conscience N. presents to Elisha about the apparent conformity to idol-worship his position in the court necessitated is full of interest. As N. does not seem to have survived long, Providence solved the difficulty for him. The exploit referred to ("by him the Lord had given deliverance unto Syria") may mean that he commanded at the battle of Karkar, where Shalmaneser, altho' he claims a victory, was forced to abandon his attempt to conquer Syria. Josephus' idea that he shot Ahab is unlikely. His request for two mules' burden of earth fm. Canaan shows he had the idea that J″. cd. only be worshipped on His own ground. There may be a reference also to the command in Ex. 20.[24]. The affection of all who came in contact with him, Benhadad and the little Heb. maid, proves his amiability, and the fact that tho' he is in a towering rage at Elisha his servants can venture to reason with him shows that past experience had taught them their master was amenable to reason. The way he presses his gifts upon Gehazi shows his frank generosity. His acceptance of J″. as his God shows his enlightenment. Altogether N. is one of the most attractive characters of OT. heathendom. (2) A son of Benjamin, born before the migration to Egypt (Gn. 46.[21]). He is called the son of Bela, son of Benjamin, in Nu. 26.[40]; 1 Ch. 8.[4]. He was the ancestor of the family of Naamites (Nu. 26.[40]).

NAAMATHITE. See Naamah.

NAAMITE. See Naaman (2).

NAARAH. (1) One of the wives of Ashur the father—poss. "founder"—of Tekoa (1 Ch. 4.[5]). (2) A town in Ephraim (Jo. 16.[7]; 1 Ch. 7.[28] Naaran), poss. = el-ʿAujeh, six miles to the north of Jericho.

NAARAI, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch. 11.[37]), the son of Ezbai. In 2 S. 23.[35] he is called "Paarai the Arbite." The change from one form to the other is easy in writing; but so far as can be seen now, either form might be the original.

NAARAN. See Naarah (2).

NAARATH, a place on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh (Jo. 16.[7], RV. "Naarah"), called in 1 Ch. 7.[28] "Naaran." OEJ. places it at Noorath, five Rm. miles fm. Jericho. The name has disappeared, but the site may be el-ʿAujeh, or es-Sāmieh, both in Wādy el-ʿAujeh.

NAASHON, NAASSON = Nahshon.

NABAL, the churlish sheep farmer of Carmel in Judah, a Calebite (1 S. 25.). His boorish treatment of David, whose band had protected his flocks agst. marauders, exposed him to a fate fm. wh. only the wise policy of his w. delivered him (see Abigail). The effects of his carousal, and the terror inspired by his wife's story, seem to have paralysed him, and in ten days he was dead. His conduct had amply justified his name: Nabal = "fool." His wife thoroughly understood the man (1 S. 25.[25]).

NABOTH, the owner of the land by Jezreel wh. Ahab coveted, who was foully done to death by Jezebel, to gratify her lord's desire (1 K. 21.). The crime made a deep impression on the popular mind, and when the downfall of the house of Ahab was accomplished, it was regarded as vengeance for this particular deed of infamy (2 K. 9.[25f., 36f.]; cp.

21.[20ff.]). Naboth's unwillingness to part with the vineyard inherited from his fathers, even although the king desired it, illustrates the tenacity with which the people clung to their ancestral possessions. The owner held himself as the guardian for the time of the family property, which only dire straits could induce him to alienate.

NACHON (RV. NACON), THRESHING FLOOR OF. Here on the journey with the ark from Kirjath-jearim, owing to some movement of the oxen, stumbling or becoming restive, the ark was in danger of being thrown off the cart. UZZAH reached out his hand to steady it and was stricken dead for his rashness (2 S. 6.[6f.]). The place was thenceforth called Perez-uzzah, "breach of Uzzah," because here the Lord broke forth upon him. There is no trace of the name here given to be found, nor is there any tradition pointing to any particular locality. The site therefore remains in obscurity. In 1 Ch. 13.[9] Nachon is called Chidon.

NACHOR, the form in which the name of Abraham's grandfather appears in Lk. 3.[34].

NADAB AND ABIHU, sons of AARON (Ex. 6.[23]), destroyed for offering strange fire (Lv. 10.[1, 2]). This action implied a disregard for God's commands wh. was subversive of all true worship. A highly spiritual idea of God, wh. mt. be above forms, Isr. had not attained, and had to be led to it by way of reverent obedience. The action of N. and A. was subversive of all reverence, and ultimately of all belief in God.

NADAB. (1) See preceding article. (2) Son and successor of Jeroboam I. king of Israel. He reigned for two years (1 K. 15.[25ff.]). What circumstances led to his besieging Gibbethon we do not know. It was a town within the territory allotted to Dan (Jo. 19.[44]), but assigned to the Levites (21.[23]). At this time, however, it was occupied by the Philistines. While the siege was in progress a conspiracy against him was organised by one of his generals, Baasha, a man of Issachar. The conspiracy succeeded, and Baasha slew Nadab, before the beleaguered town. Thus fell the last member of the house of Jeroboam, in accordance with the prophecy of Ahijah (1 K. 14.[10]), and the first dynasty of the kingdom of Israel came to an end. (2) A man of Judah, son of Shammai, a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch. 2.[28, 30]). (3) A Benjamite, son of Gibeon (1 Ch. 8.[30], 9.[30]).

NAGGE, an ancestor of Jesus (Lk. 3.[25]).

NAHALAL, a town in Zebulun allotted to the Levites, out of wh. the Can. were not driven (Jo. 19.[15], 21.[35]; Jg. 1.[30], Nahalol). The rabbis ident. N. with Mahlul (Tlm. J. Meg. i. 1). This may be the small vill. Ma'lūl, 3½ miles W. of Nazareth. Another possible site is 'Ain Mahil, about the same distance to the NE. of Nazareth.

NAHALIEL, a halting-place of the Israelites between the Arnon and the Jordan (Nu. 21.[19]). It is named with Mattanah and Bamoth. OEJ. places it close to the Arnon. If it is rightly translated "torrent-valley of God," it may be sought in one of the tributary valleys of the Arnon; perhaps in Wādy Wāleh, which, under different names, drains a large area of the district to the NE. of the Arnon.

NAHALOL, a variation in spelling of the name NAHALAL, occurring only in Jg. 1.[30].

NAHAM, brother of Hodiah, the sons of the latter being the father of Keilah the Garmite, and Eshtemoa the Maacathite (1 Ch. 4.[19]).

NAHAMAIN, one of the chiefs who returned with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Ne. 7.[7]) whose name does not appear in the list of Ez. 2.[2]. In 1 Es. 5.[8] he is called "Eneneus."

NAHARAI, a native of Beeroth (1 Ch. 9.[39]), the armour-bearer of Joab (2 S. 23.[37], AV. "Nahari").

NAHASH. (1) K. of the Ammonites fm. whom Saul rescued the people of Jabesh Gilead (1 S. 11.[1ff.]), whose appearance seems to have suggested to Isr. the idea of having a k. of their own (12.[12]). (2) Fr. of Hanun (2 S. 10.[2]; 1 Ch. 19.[2]). (3) Fr. of Shobi of Rabbath Ammon (2 S. 17.[27]). (1), (2), and (3) may all refer to the same man, although this involves a very long reign, fm. before the beginning of Saul's reign till David was well established on the throne. (4) Abigail (2 S. 17.[25]) is called the "daughter of Nahash," and "sister to Zeruiah," while 1 Ch. 2.[16] makes her sister to David. "Nahash" in 2 S. 17.[25] is prob. an error for "Jesse." The rabbis have always taught that Nahash was identical with Jesse. Some have thought that Nahash the Ammonite king was the first husband of Abigail's mother. This inference rests, however, upon too slender a basis. Others suppose that Nahash was the name of Jesse's wife, the mother of his children. The name may equally well denote either a man or a woman. But the matter must rest in uncertainty.

NAHATH. (1) Eldest son of Reuel, son of Esau; a phylarch in Edom (Gn. 36.[13]; 1 Ch. 1.[37]). (2) A Kohathite Levite, an ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch. 6.[26]). (3) A Levite who in Hezekiah's time was one of those who had oversight of tithes and dedicated things (2 Ch. 31.[13]).

NAHBI, the prince of Naphtali who represented his tribe among the spies (Nu. 13.[14]).

NAHOR. (1) Fr. of Terah and grandfr. of Abraham (Gn. 11.[22ff.]; 1 Ch. 1.[26], &c.). (2) Son of Terah and br. of Abraham (Gn. 11.[26f.]; Jo. 24.[2]). He settled in Haran, having married his niece Milcah, who bore him eight sons (Gn. 22.[20ff.]). His concubine Reumah bore him other four (v. 24). His son Bethuel was fr. of Rebekah. Bethuel and Laban are described as Aramæans (Gn. 25.[20], 31.[20], RVm.). Cert. Aramæan tribes traced their descent to N. through his sons BUZ, UZ, ARAM, &c.

NAHSHON, NAASSON, son of Amminadab, was prince of the children of Judah when the people were first numbered in the wilderness (Ex. 6.[23]; Nu. 1.[7], &c.). According to the genealogy he was in the fifth generation from the patriarch Judah (1 Ch. 2.[10]). His sister Elisheba was married to Aaron; and his son Salmon married Rahab, who was saved at the destruction of Jericho. He takes the first place in the offerings of the princes, and in the order of the march (Nu. 2.[3], 7.[12], 10.[14]). He died in the desert (Nu. 26.[64f.]). David was in the fifth generation from him (1 Ch. 2.[10ff.]), and he appears also as an ancestor of Jesus Christ (Mw. 1.[4]; Lk. 3.[32], AV. Naasson).

NAHUM, seventh of the Minor Prophets, whose name means "consoler," announced the cert. and immediate destruction of Nineveh, the city of the Asyrs., who had long been the oppressors of Judah, and of the whole world. He speaks in the name of all the nations agst. their common enemy, and while his book has little relgs. teaching, its moral and poetic value is of the highest. It is written with a poetic force and grandeur of expression wh., short though it is, place N. among the masters of prophetic speech. The pathos and passion of it come fm. the heart, for it is a cry of pain and revenge, uttered in the name of outraged humanity, by one who has long been sorely puzzled by the apparent indiffc. of J″. to the cause of righteousness and of His chosen people. The prophecy is unique, in that it does not once mention the sins of Judah and the need for repentance. Even his contemporaries, Jeremiah and Zephaniah, denounce the sins of their own nation, but N.'s mind is so absorbed in the coming manifestation of J″.'s power and righteousness, that he has no place for any other thought.

Of the person of the prophet we know nothing more than is given by the heading of his bk., and though the name occurs in the genealogy of our Lord in Lk. 3.[25], and in the word Capernaum, which means "Vill. of Nahum," we cannot say that these names have any connection with our prophet. He is introduced as "the Elkoshite," wh. implies that he was a native or inhabitant of Elkosh, but it is doubtful where this place was situated. At a modern Elkush, near the site of Nineveh, the tomb of Nahum is shown, but the tradition dates only from the 16th cent., and its origin is easily understood. Other localities suggd. by the name are claimed in Galilee and in Judæa. The time of Nahum's prophecy lies between two important dates in the latter half of the seventh cent. B.C. Refc. is made in 3.[8] to the capture of No Amon, or Thebes, the capital of Upper Egp., wh. was taken by the Asyrs., under Ashurbanipal, in B.C. 664. Between this date and that of the fall of Nineveh itself in or about B.C. 607, the prophecy of Nahum must be placed. Some commentators insist that it should be placed soon after the fall of No Amon, to act. for the vivid remembrance of the event, while others incline to place the prophecy on the eve of the final capture of Nineveh. The triumphant prediction of overthrow, and the vivid picture of the catastrophe caused by the victorious onset of a hostile army, the falling of the walls, the confusion in the city, the terror and destruction of its inhabitants, all give the impression that the prophecy was immediately fulfilled, and not given with a long interval before the event, such as the earlier date requires.

After its double title, the prophecy deals with the char. of J″., who is a jealous Avenger, slow to anger but great in power. The mighty forces of nat. are but His instruments, and none can stand before His indignation (1.[2-6]). J″. is a stronghold to those who trust Him (1.[7]), but His vengeance is about to fall upon His enemies, and He will make an utter end (1.[8-10]). Nineveh is addressed as having already suffered J″.'s vengeance in the experience of Sennacherib: "Did not one come forth out of thee, who imagined evil agst. J″.?" His host had been destroyed. Now again J″. will afflict Nineveh, but this time it will be final (1.[11, 12]). Judah and Asyr. are next addressed in alternate verses. To Judah is the promise given that the yoke of Asyr. will be broken, and Asyr. is threatened with the overthrow of its gods. Judah is told that the messenger is already on the way with the good tidings of peace, and now she can keep her feasts and perform her vows in safety (1.[13-15]).

Traces of an acrostic poem have been found in this first chap., and attempts have been made to reproduce the original by modifications of the text, but these attempts can hardly be described as convincing.

Chap. 2. gives an act. of the attack on Nineveh, the main theme of the prophecy. The hostile armies are described as ready for the conflict, and the reason for it all is given, in passing (v. 2), that J″. restoreth the excellency of Judah. Inside the city of Nineveh all is confusion; the chariots jostle each other in the streets, the k. calls on his nobles to man the walls, for already the enemy is battering them. It is all in vain; the water gates are opened, the palace taken, and the queen and her attendants are without defence. The vast population melts away like water, and the call to stand and resist finds no response. Nineveh is fallen, the lion's den, where, in fancied security, the Asyr. conquerors had gathered for a hundred yrs. the riches of the world.

Chap. 3. contains the song of triumph over Nineveh. She is destroyed because of her evil deeds, and the poet revels in the destruction: "a multitude of slain, and a great heap of carcases; and there is none end of the corpses; they stumble upon their corpses." With great wealth of imagery and with burning passion N. hurls his denunciations agst. the doomed city. Her defences will fail, her traders will forsake her, and her nobles will be helpless in the day of her trouble. She has no friends to take her part, for all have experienced her wickedness and oppression, and, at the report of her destruction, all will clap their hands over her in joy and in derision. JOHN DAVIDSON.

NAIL (Heb. yātād = Arb. watad, "a tent-peg"). If it be not fastened in a sure place the tent is unsafe (Jg. 4.[21]; Is. 22.[23, 25]). The Heb. maşmēr = Arb. mismār (1 Ch. 22.[3], &c.) is the usual nail of metal. Tzippōren may signify the point of a stylus (Jr. 17.[1]) or the finger nail (Dt. 21.[12]). "In the observances prescribed in Dt. 21.[12f.] the paring of the nails corresponds to one of the acts by which an Arab widow dissolved her widowhood and became free to marry again" (Robertson Smith, Kinship,[1] p. 178). It may have symbolised the putting away of mourning for her captivity: or possibly it was part of the process of purification by which an alien woman became a fit mate for a Hebrew man. Certainly in Israel the neglect of the finger nails was a sign of mourning (2 S. 19.[24], LXX).

NAIN, the scene of the miracle in Lk. 7.[11], is = the mod. vill. of Nein, on the N. slope of Little Hermon (Jebel ed-Duhy—see MOREH, HILL OF). The ruins show that the vill. was once much larger. The decay of the place is locally attributed to speculation in the cultivation of simsum, the market for wh. unexpectedly failed, bringing ruin to the inhabitants. The rock tombs to the E. are ancient. The name of Jesus is preserved in that of the little shrine, Maqām Sīdna 'Īsa. A fine view is obtained of Esdraelon, Carmel, and the northern hills. The mention of the "gate" of the city has led some to suppose that it must have been a walled town; and Tristram thought he could trace remains of the ancient walls. Fuller investigation has shown that he was mistaken. "The gate" probably only signified the point at which the road entered the town.

NAIOTH (1 S. 19.[18f.]), a place near RAMAH where SAMUEL dwelt with the prophets when DAVID fled to him. It has been customary to regard N. as meaning "houses," "dwellings," but there is no distinct evidence in favour of this. The LXX transfers the word; the Psh. has yonath and the Tg. Jn. has "the house of instruction." From v. 20 it wd. seem that whatever the etymological meaning of the word it was the abode of the prophets—one of the schools of the prophets (see Driver, Samuel, on passage).

NAMES. Place-names usually contain reference to physical peculiarity, as Beer, "a well" or "cistern," e.g. Beer-sheba; Abel, "a meadow," e.g. Abel-meholah; En (ain), "a spring" or "well," e.g. En-gedi; Beth, "a house," e.g. Bethlehem; Ramah, Ramoth, "a height" or "heights," e.g. Ramoth Gilead. The second part of the N. supplied the distinctive. Sometimes these were commemorative, as "Beer-lahai-roi," "the well of the living one who seeth me," commemorating J″.'s appearance to HAGAR; or indicated some local peculiarity, as the presence of certain plants, e.g. Abel-shittim, "the meadow of the acacias"; or again it is the territory where it occurs, as Ramoth Gilead, "the heights of GILEAD," or Mt. Ephraim and Mt. of the Amorites (cp. mod. Jebel ed-Druze). A number of the names, being of foreign origin, have no Heb. etymology, e.g. Gaza, Ashdod, &c.

Personal Names.—A true name of a person as well as of a place ought to be descriptive of his character, but as each individual presents different sides of his nature to each of his friends, he wd., were he truly named by them, have to each a different name. This to some extent explains nicknames and pet names. In the E. there are many superstitions in regard to names; some are supposed to be of good omen. When Jacob changed the N. of his youngest son fm. BENONI, "son of my sorrow," to BENJAMIN, "son of the right hand," his motive was to change a name of evil omen to one of good. The name is supposed to be singularly related to the person. A thing wh. not infrequently happens, when a child has taken a serious illness, is to change its name, that when the Angel of Death comes commissioned to slay a child named, e.g., "Daoud," and finds instead one named "Yusuf," he will go away and let the child live. Divine names form frequently a part of personal names, as El, e.g. Israel, Eliezer. After the time of DAVID, J″. became a very common element of such names in Israel, e.g. Jehoshaphat, Ahaziah, Jehoram, Obadiah, &c. Tho' more common after the time of David, J″. is found in earlier names, as Jehoshua (JOSHUA). We have also occasionally the names of heathen deities introduced, as Jerubbaal, Ethbaal, Benhadad, Hadadezer. This characteristic is seen in NT. names as well, e.g. Hermadorus (HERMAS), THEOPHILUS, Apollonius (APOLLOS), &c. Such names are common still in the E., as Abderrahman, "the servant of the Merciful," i.e. God. Less commonly than in the mod. E. we find names of animals used, e.g. CALEB, "a dog"; NAHASH, "a serpent"; DEBORAH, "a bee"; JONAH, "a dove"; while now the name of the animal is supposed to carry with it some of the qualities of it, as Asad, "a lion": but scarcely cd. any one have been called Caleb in this expectation. As Caleb seems to have been of foreign extraction, the root might have been in some other language and modified into Caleb, as that was intelligible in Heb. Names of plants occur, as Tamar, "a palm tree"; of objects of nature, as Shimshon (SAMSON), "the sun"; Peninah, "coral." Pet names are sometimes perpetuated, as probably is the case in regard to David and certainly in regard to SOLOMON, for Jedidiah. With the Greek domination the perpetuation of certain names in families was adopted. Thus Simeon Hatz-Tzadiq was the son of Onias—his son was Onias also and his grandson Simeon. So, if we may trust the Talmud, there were six Gamaliels, all descendants of Hillel in a direct line.

The name of God is used for God in His supremacy, e.g. Jo. 7.[9], "What wilt Thou do unto Thy great N.?" It has something of idea of reputation: "continually every day is My N. blasphemed" (Is. 52.[4]). God's character was so misrepresented by the conduct of those who professed to be His people that it was as if a calumny were uttered against Him. The action of the sons of Sceva show this superstition; they adjured the demon "in the name of Jesus whom Paul preacheth." The name awakened thoughts and feelings in the brain of the madman, and he leaped on them and drove them out. Power was supposed to be conveyed with the name (cp. Ac. 19.[13]): certainly the apostles used the N. of Jesus when they worked miracles (Ac. 3.[6]); but they recognised God as the real agent (Ac. 4.[30]). The reason why the name of Jesus was used was to show clearly to the Jews that Divine power was manifested thus in order to prove the mission of Him whom "with wicked hands they had crucified and slain." This evidence was all the more fitted to be convincing with the Jews fm. their belief in the power those had who knew the great Shem-hamphorash (the name of God) of 42 letters: here the name of the Crucified had equal power.

It is well known that the true pronunciation of the Divine name of the Covenant God of Israel has been lost. "Jehovah" it certainly is not. The most probable appears to be Jahweh, in wh. the first h is to be pronounced. The Jews pronounce Adonai when they come to the sacred name in reading the Scripture, and hence the vowels of that word are placed under the four consonants JHWH, and that is the origin of our word "Jehovah." The sacred name was to be truly pronounced only in the Temple. When it was pronounced in the priestly benediction the singers broke in to drown the voice of the High Priest, lest any unworthy person might hear it. Originally when he pronounced it the name was heard as far as Jericho—so Talmudic authorities assure us (Jew. En., SHEM-HAM-PHORASH). This was a perversion of an earlier relationship. The sanctity of places was indicated by the N. of God being recorded there (Ex. 20.[24]). The Temple itself was holy because it was built for the N. of God. His name was therein (1 K. 8.[16]). Persons were sanctified by this. The Angel of the Presence that led Israel in the wilderness had His power because of the divine N. in Him: "Provoke Him not . . . for My name is in Him" (Ex. 23.[21]). The name of God gave sanction to an oath. He was called to witness and to avenge any breach of the oath. Here it may be observed that taking the name of God in vain seems to refer not to perjury but to the habit common in all countries of invoking God on trivial occasions. The primary lesson Israel had to learn was reverence, and this invoking God on every occasion when it was merely wished to give emphasis to a statement, tended to lessen that awful reverence wh. God required. This is the point of the horror all religious people have of profane swearing. The swearers put no meaning in the words they use, but they have broken the awful reverence that ought to hedge in everything connected with God and Divine things.

Change of N. occurred when one entered a new service, e.g. Joseph (Gn. 41.[45]), Daniel and his friends (Dn. 1.[7]). Similarly Necho changed the N. of ELIAKIM to JEHOIAKIM (2 K. 23.[34]). Perhaps the "new N." of Rv. 2.[17] may refer to this. New covenant relationships to God were signalised by change of name, as ABRAHAM, JACOB, and SIMON PETER.

NAOMI, "my pleasantness," a native of Bethlehem, w. of Elimelech, mr. of Mahlon and Chilion (Ru. 1.[2], &c.): see RUTH. Her experience was peculiarly "bitter." Driven to Moab from Bethlehem by reason of a famine, her husband died in the land of the alien, and her two sons, having married maidens of that land, also died there. Her return thus bereaved to Bethlehem must have stirred many memories wh. enable us to understand her play upon her name (Ru. 1.[20]).

NAPHISH, the second youngest son of Ishmael (Gn. 25.[15]; 1 Ch. 1.[31]). His descendants were among the peoples E. of Jordan, who were subdued by the Israelitish tribes settled there (1 Ch. 5.[19]). They have not been identified with any Arabian people.

NAPHTALI, fifth son of Jacob, the second of Bilhah, br. of Dan (Gn. 30.[7f.]). At the descent into Egp. he had four sons (Gn. 46.[24]). He is said to have been swift of foot (Tg. Ps. J.) and to have lived 132 yrs. (Test. of the Twelve Patriarchs). For strength of the tribe see NUMBERS. N.'s position in the desert was on the N. of the Tabernacle, with Dan and Asher; and on the march, in the rear (Nu. 2.[29, 31]).

The territory assigned to N. lay to the W. of the Sea of Galilee and the Upper Jordan (Jo. 19.[32ff.]). Josephus is surely wrong in saying that on the E. it reached Damascus (Ant. V. i. 22). In Jo. 19.[32ff.] nineteen cities are assigned to Naphtali. The most important was the famous City of Refuge, KEDESH-NAPHTALI, the ruins of which are still to be seen on the heights W. of the Waters of Merom. Few of the others can now be identified. The boundaries cannot be drawn with certainty. On the S., SW., and W., Naphtali bordered on Issachar, Zebulun, and Asher: on the N. it reached the Liṭāny, and included part at least of the plain of Ijon, the mod. Merj A'yūn. The boundary may have run roughly fm. the E. roots, or "ears" (Aznoth) of Tabor, by way of Ḥaṭṭīn and Yaqūq, turning W.-ward by er-Rāmeh to the border of Asher, and then in an irregular line N.-ward to the Liṭāny. It included thus the broad, fertile terraces and plains W. and NW. of the Sea of Galilee, and the bulk of Upper Galilee, with its lofty mountains and deep gorges, its picturesque hills and fruitful valleys. Dan carved a portion for himself out of the NE. part, apparently with no opposition on the side of Naphtali (see DAN). The old inhabitants also continued to occupy many of the towns (Jg. 1.[33]). The open, free life of these spacious uplands seems to have developed a fine wholesome spirit of independence. Josephus pays a high compliment to the courage and military skill of the people (BJ. III. iii. 2). They distinguished themselves in the attack on Sisera (Jg. 5.[18]). They made an important contribution to David's strength at Hebron (1 Ch. 12.[34]). Lying on the northern border, N. suffered much during the wars of the kings (1 K. 15.[20]; 2 K. 12.[18], 13.[22]), and its people were the first W. of Jordan to be taken captive (2 K. 15.[29]); see GALILEE. Barak alone of Naphtali made for himself an enduring name, and if he were joint author of Jg. 5., lent colour to the saying, "He giveth goodly words" (Gn. 49.[21]). Naphtali contained the highest mountain in Pal. proper, Jebel Jermuk (see MT. OF TRANSFIGURATION). Much of the land is very good, and the peasant farmers to this day are among the most prosperous in the country. The villagers devote themselves largely to the cultivation of vegetables for the markets of Ṣafed, Tiberias, Nazareth, and Acre. On the hillsides are many excellent vineyards. The olive groves that flourish in the rich hollows yield abundance of fine olive oil: while preserved olives are also sent in great quantities to the above-named towns. Quince, citron, lemon, fig and mulberry grow to perfection; and splendid harvests are gathered from its upland fields. It still supports a considerable population. The chief mod. city is Ṣafed, crowning the mountain due north of the Sea of Galilee, containing well over 20,000 inhabitants. It occupies a position of great strength, which must always have been of importance, but it cannot be identified with any ancient city. The ruined fortress which dominates the whole region was the stronghold of the Templars. The garrison surrendered to Sultan Bibars in 1266, and were forthwith massacred. In 1759 it was ruined by an earthquake. The city suffered appalling disaster from a similar visitation on 1st January 1837. It is now reckoned one of the holy cities of the Jews. Among the Sephardim community polygamy is still practised. Within the limits of N., including as it did the land of Gennesaret, with Bethsaida, Capernaum, and Chorazin, much of the Saviour's public life was passed, and here He found the most prominent of His apostles.

Mt. Naphtali is that portion of the range dominated by N. See MOUNT.

NAPHTUHIM (Gn. 10.[13]), a people connected with EGYPT. No very plausible identification has been reached. Napata, the capital of Ethiopia, has been suggested. Erman's suggestion of a corruption of Patemka, the northern division of Egypt as distinguished fm. Pathrum the southern, seems as probable as any. Dr. Johns has suggested that it is a Heb. modification of the name modified in Asyr. to Naṭḥu, and means a district in the Lower Egypt.

NAPKIN occurs only in the NT. in connection with its use for binding the face of the dead (Jn. 11.[44], 20.[7]), and as that in which the unprofitable servant buried his lord's money (Lk. 19.[20]). The name soudarion is borrowed from the Latin (sudarium), and signified primarily a cloth carried for the purpose of wiping off perspiration.

NARCISSUS. In Rm. 16.[11] slaves of N. are saluted. N. is supposed to be the freedman of CLAUDIUS, who had boundless influence over him, and through this acquired great wealth. He was put to death by Agrippina on the accession of Nero, and all his property taken by the Emperor. It is supposed that his slaves, tho' added to those of Cæsar's house, mt. still be called Narcissiani. The name Narcissus was common among slaves, and consequently among freedmen.

NATHAN. (1) The trusted adviser of king David, who appears first as approving the king's purpose to build the Temple. He soon withdrew that approval in consequence of a vision: but at the same time comforted the monarch with a great and splendid promise (2 S. 7.[2ff.]). We next find him rebuking David for his peculiarly heinous sin. Bringing home to him his guilt—making him condemn himself—by means of his famous parable of the "one ewe lamb," he led the royal offender to penitence (12.[1ff.]). In token that sincere repentance had been accepted, he called the infant son of the now forgiven parents Jedidiah, "beloved of Jah" (v. 25). Solomon's designation and final anointing as king were clearly in some measure due to the influence of Nathan, acting in concert with BATHSHEBA (1 K. 1.[8ff.]). It was natural for Solomon, in gratitude to the prophet who had so effectually befriended him, to find high office for Nathan's sons, Azariah and Zabud (1 K. 4.[5]). Nathan is said to have written a history of these times (1 Ch. 29.[29]; 2 Ch. 9.[29]). (2) A son, probably the third, borne to David by Bathsheba (2 S. 5.[14]; cp. 12.[24]). The line of Solomon appears to have become extinct with Jehoiachin. The right of succession to David's throne therefore passed to Salathiel, the descendant of Nathan, who is probably referred to in Zc. 12.[12]. Nathan thus appears as an ancestor of our Lord (Lk. 3.[31]). (3) Father of Igal, one of David's mighty men (2 S. 23.[36]). In 1 Ch. 11.[38] he is called the brother of "Joel." (4) One who returned with Ezra (8.[16]; 1 Es. 8.[44]). (5) One who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[39]). (6) Son of Attai, of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. 2.[36]).

NATHANIEL, a native of CANA OF GALILEE (Jn. 21.[2]), one of the first disciples of Christ, a friend of Philip, who brought him the good news, "We have found Him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph." He received the news, apparently, with incredulity, but willingly followed his friend to put the declaration to proof. Jesus perceived and spoke of the utter simple-heartedness of the man. On seeing Jesus and hearing His words his doubts vanished, and with awe and reverence he exclaimed, "Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel" (Jn. 1.[45ff.]). Nothing further is known about Nathaniel, and we cannot with certainty identify him with any other. Many think that he is identical with Bartholomew. The latter is not a personal name: it is lit. "son of Talmai," and it does not appear at all in St. John's Gospel. Nathaniel is mentioned as one of those to whom Jesus appeared at the Sea of Galilee, after His resurrection. It would seem strange if he only of that company were not an apostle. Again, one so well known as N. must have been would surely have been chosen among "the seven," if not for the place left vacant by Judas Iscariot, if he had not already been numbered with the apostles. Friendship with Philip may be indicated by their being named together in the lists. The use of the name Bartholomew by the other evangelists may be due to the ancient and universal custom in the Orient of calling a man by his patronymic—Yehūdah ibn Zeideh, Ḥassan ibn 'Abdullah, or only ibn Zeideh, or ibn 'Abdullah. So Nathaniel bar Talmai would often be referred to simply as Bar Talmai. These considerations make the identification probable. Nathaniel's name has become proverbial for simplicity and guilelessness.

NAZARENE (Gr. Ναζωραῖος, Ναζαρηνός), inhabitant of NAZARETH, used of Christ (Mw. 2.[23]) and changed into a denominative of Christians (Ac. 24.[5]).

In regard to the prophecy referred to in Mw. 2.[34] there are five explanations given: (a) Nazarene is there equivalent to NAZIRITE (nazir), the argument being that though our Lord was not a Nazirite, yet as the essence of this was consecration, He might be regarded as really a Nazirite (Lightfoot, Hor. Tal. ii. 44). This, however, is unlikely fm. the contrast between our Lord's conduct and the asceticism of the Nazirite. (b) The general idea that He wd. be despised, fm. the low esteem in wh. NAZARETH was held (Jn. 1.[46]). This also is unlikely, as we have no reason to think that the estimate of NATHANIEL was one generally held. (c) A play on natzur, "preserved" (Is. 49.[6]); the objection to this is that the "preserved" of the passage does not refer to the Messiah but to His people. (d) That it refers to a lost prophecy is poss. but unlikely. (e) That Nazareth meaning a "sprout," and netzer, "a branch," is applied to the Messiah (Is. 11.[1]). This seems on the whole the best explanation. The strongest objection is that drawn fm. the Gr. transliterating tz by z, contrary to the custom of the LXX: this wd. imply that the middle consonant in the name of the town was z, not tz as in netzer; but the mod. Arb. name has as middle consonant ṣ=tz.

NAZARETH FROM THE EAST

NAZARETH, a town in Galilee (Mk. 1.[9], &c.), the home of Joseph and Mary (Lk. 2.[39], &c.), the scene of the first 30 yrs. of Jesus' life (Mw. 2.[23]; Lk. 2.[51], 4.[16], &c.). He was therefore known as Jesus of N., and His followers were called Nazarenes. With the Arabs to this day Naṣrāny is "Christian."

N. is not mentioned in OT. Quaresimus says its ancient name was Medina Abiat, doubtless intending el-Medīnat el-Beiḍā, "the white town"; a description wh. perfectly suits N. The Mishna (Menachoth, viii. 6) speaks of the "white house on the hill," wh. supplied wine for the drink-offering. A lament for the 9th of Ab, anniversary of the destruction of Jrs., seems to speak of N. as a priestly station. But nothing is known of it with certainty (Delitzsch, Ein Tag in Kapernaum,[3] 142).

The mod. en-Nāṣirah, "the victorious," lies in a cup-like hollow among the hills of Lower Galilee, five miles W. of Mt. Tabor. It is built of white limestone, mainly on the NW. slope. The road to Carmel and the sea runs over the SW. height, and a gorge breaks down S.-ward to the plain of Esdraelon, past the crag known to tradition as the Mt. of Precipitation (Lk. 4.[29]). This is more likely to be the cliff hard by the ancient synagogue, wh. is still shown in the W. part of the town. The one spring of any volume in N. is under the Gr. Orthodox Church. The water is now led by a conduit to a mod. fountain. This spring Mary and her little Son must often have visited. NW. of the town rises the height of Neby Sa'īn, whence a most beautiful and comprehensive view is obtained. Of the 6000 or 7000 inhabitants, the largest community is the Gr. Orthodox, with between 2000 and 3000. The Moslems number some 1600. In the late spring the valley, with its cactus hedges, fig and olive trees, and spreading vineyards contrasting with the glistening white of the walls, presents a very attractive appearance. The centre of an agricultural and pastoral district, many of the people are engaged in these pursuits. It was formerly under the government of Acre, but is now under that of Jrs. An important work has long been carried on here in the Orphanage (now under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society) among the girls of Galilee. Medical missionary work is also successfully prosecuted by the agents of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society.

Nazareth : Mount of Precipitation

NAZIRITE (Heb. nazīr, fm. nāzar, "to separate," connected with nadar, "to vow"). The Nazirite vow was a peculiar institution, by wh. certain persons vowed to separate themselves to Divine service for life, or for a time. It seems to be of primitive origin, as the Code of Ḥammurabi takes for granted the existence of "votaries," apparently only women; it may be noted that they were forbidden even to enter a wine-shop. It may be regarded as parallel with the "hierodouloi" of Hellenic heathendom. Among the Romans the priestesses of Vesta—the Vestal Virgins—may be said to occupy something of the same position. In the East in modern times the Dervishes represent something of the same movement; they do not cut their hair, and as rigid Moslems drink no wine; the like is true of the monks and nuns of Catholicism in the West, not, however, in the matter of the hair and wine. It wd. seem, then, to be a primitive practice wh., as in the case of the blood feud, Mosaism received and regulated. In the account of the restrictions implied in the Nazirite vow wh. we have in Nu. 6.[1-21], it is taken for granted that the ceremonies by wh. one became a Nazirite were well known. Talmudic authorities, who wrote long after the Nazirite vow was impossible owing to the destruction of the Temple, assert that a man had only to say "May I be a Nazirite" to be under the vows. Yet the ceremonies wh. took place when by accident a man's N. vow was broken seem to imply that after the offerings for sin were completed the votary was to consecrate himself anew before the High Priest, so it might be presumed his first consecration wd. be equally before the priest. The long locks worn on their temples by orthodox Jews, wh. may be regarded as in some sort a survival of Naziritism, are consecrated usually at some feast; in Northern Pal. it is done generally at the burning of Meiron in commemoration of Shimyon ben Yohai: all the rest of the hair is cut and the locks in front left. May it not have been that the hair was solemnly cut and then left to grow during the period of the vow? It wd. almost seem as if Paul had taken on him temporary Nazirite vows when he shore his head at Cenchræa, "for he had a vow"; his haste at Ephesus wd. be explained by his wish to be released fm. his vow at Jrs. at the expiry of the 30 days. The period, unless something specially to the contrary was mentioned, was understood to be 30 days. The passage in Numbers is occupied with summarising the restrictions and describing the ceremonies of release, with, as an episode, the ceremonies connected with the accidental breach of his vow above referred to. The restrictions were: during his vow his hair was not to be cut, he was not to drink wine nor eat anything made of the vine, he was to shun all contact with the dead. The consecration of the N. had many points of resemblance to that of the High Priest: like the N. the High Priest might not come in contact with the dead, like him (while engaged in the service of the sanctuary) he must not taste wine (Lv. 10.[9]); there is no word of the High Priest's hair being consecrated. One may compare the restrictions under wh. the Roman Flamen Dialis was placed, even more numerous and troublesome than those of the Nazirite. While there is nothing said as to the persons who cd. lawfully make these vows, the law in Nu. 30.[3-16] wd. apply to N. vows when taken by women. Probably males while minors wd. be under similar restrictions. When the days of his separation were completed, the N. had to bring to the Temple two lambs, a male and a female of the first year without blemish, and a ram, for burnt-offering, sin-offering, and peace-offering respectively, and a basket of unleavened bread and wafers; his head was solemnly shaved, and the hair was "put in the fire under the sacrifice of the peace-offerings." Then, after they had been put in the hands of the N., the priest was to wave "the sodden shoulder of the ram, one unleavened cake, and one wafer . . . for a wave-offering before the Lord"; after that the N. mt. drink wine.

References to the N. are not numerous in Scripture. Samson is repeatedly called a Nazirite (Jg. 13.[7], 16.[17]). Not only is he personally to refrain fm. wine or strong drink, but before his birth his mother is to be equally abstinent, with the addition that she is not to eat anything that "cometh fm. the vine." His long hair is prominent in the narrative. Nazirites are referred to in Am. 2.[11, 12] as members of a well-known institution, and one equally with that of the prophets showing God's signal favour for Israel. It is regarded as a special sign of apostasy that the Israelites gave the Nazirites wine to drink. In L. 4.[7] their beauty is mentioned as one of the great but vanished glories of Israel; they were now, fm. being "whiter than milk, more ruddy in body than rubies," blacker "in visage than a coal; their skin cleaving to their bones." A personage yet more potent than Samson in the evolution of Israel is Samuel; though he is not called a Nazirite, yet the restrictions his mother consecrates him to, especially if we follow the text behind the LXX, wh. mentions "wine and strong drink" as debarred to him, prove him to have been one. As any one may see, the sacrifices that a N. had to offer when the period of his vow was accomplished wd. be burdensome to a poor man, hence it was a common evidence of zeal for the law for a man of means to pay those charges on behalf of the poorer Nazirites; thus king Agrippa I., when he returned to Jrs. from Rome, besides the offerings of thanksgiving he presented for himself, arranged for the sacrifices of "very many Nazirites" (Naziraiōn mala suchnous). When the apostle Paul visited Jerusalem for the last time he was urged to pay the charges for certain Jewish Christians who had taken on them the Nazirite vows and whose time of release had come, in order that he might prove that for himself he had not abandoned Judaism. This affords evidence that even Christians became Nazirites. It is true that Critical opinion has decided that this portion of Numbers is late; Kuenen (Hex. 92) assigns it to P.[3], who must on his showing have written close upon B.C. 400 (Paterson [Polychr. Bib.] agrees): a period during wh. we know absolutely nothing of the history of Israel. Still, tho' the record may be late, the institution itself may be early. As to Samson, Moore (Polychr. Bib.) dates that section of the book of Judges about B.C. 850. Budde further declares it to be glossed, and asserts that the original document contained nothing about wine. He further maintains, as Samson made a banquet for the Philistine relatives of his wife, that therefore he had partaken himself. Further, it is argued that, as a N. was forbidden to touch a dead body, Samson cd. not have been a N. since he took the honeycomb fm. the carcase of the lion. But it was only dead human beings the N. was forbidden to touch, not dead animals, or the High Priest, who was under the restriction, cd. never have offered sacrifice. Moreover, the carcase of the lion at the time of Samson's descent wd. be a mere desiccated skeleton; everything that cd. be devoured wd. have been eaten by the ants. But it is objected that in his frequent battles he touched many dead men. But the dead in his battles were not dead when Samson touched them, whatever they were after. Hence fm. the history nothing can be drawn against the law of the N. in Numbers. Singularly enough, Jewish tradition wd. claim Absalom to be a N. on account of his long hair. The object of this institution was to protest against the luxury so apt to set in when a nomadic people became settled, and especially when they began to grow the vine. The Rechabites carried this protest a little further, but it was the same protest. It may be noted that the protest was in its simplest form in this institution. The Nazirites formed no communities so far as we learn. The Essenes appear to have endeavoured to fulfil somewhat of the office of the Nazirites. At the same time John the Baptist, Banus the tutor of Josephus, and, according to tradition, James the brother of our Lord, resembled the Nazirites not a little.

NEAH, a town in the territory of Zebulun (Jo. 19.[13]), possibly identical with Neiel (v. 27). It is named with Gath-hepher and Rimmon. It has not yet been identified.

NEAPOLIS, the seaport of Philippi, where St. Paul landed when he crossed fm. Troas (Ac. 16.[11]), now either Eski Kavalla or the mod. Kavalla, ten miles further E., on the coast of Macedonia. It was the eastern terminus of the great highway, the Via Egnatia, which, starting at Dyrrhachium, traversed the country, touching at the main centres of population, Thessalonica, Amphipolis, &c., forming the principal avenue of commerce between east and west. See also Shechem.

NEARIAH. (1) One of the sons of Shemaiah, a descendant of king David, after the return from Babylon (1 Ch. 3.[22f.]). (2) Son of Jehi, one of the captains of the marauding Simeonites, who in Hezekiah's time raided the Amalekites in Mount Seir (1 Ch. 4.[42]).

NEBAI, RV. NOBAI, one of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ne. 10.[19]).

NEBAIOTH, the firstborn of Ishmael (Gn. 25.[13]; 1 Ch. 1.[29]), fm. whom a large pastoral tribe was named. The "rams of N." are mentioned along with the "flocks of Kedar" (Is. 60.[7]). As Josephus assigns to the sons of Ishmael (of whom the eldest was, to use his form, Nebaiothes) the region of Nabatene, it seems obvious that he identified this tribe with the Nabatæans of his own day (Ant. I. xii. 4). Jerome follows him in the same identification (Com. on Gen.). Doubt has been thrown on this recently by Dr. Glaser. In the Annals of Ashurbanipal there occur repeated references to a race called Naba-ai-te : with them are associated Kidrai and Aribi. There is an etymological difficulty in the identification proposed by Josephus and Jerome that the third consonant in the name Nabatæan is ṭ while in Nebaioth it is t. That, however, is not insuperable, as the Heb. verb qaṭal becomes qatala in Arabic. Notwithstanding the authority of Dr. Glaser we venture to approve of Jerome's view.

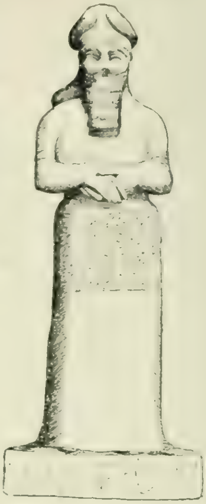
NEBALLAT, a town in Benjamin, occupied after the Exile (Ne. 11.[34]), but not mentioned in the original list of Jo. 18.[11ff.] It is named with Zeboim, Lod, and Ono. It is prob. = mod. Beit Nebāla, three miles NE. of Lydda.

NEBAT, father of Jeroboam I., king of Israel. His son was born in Zered in the Jordan valley, of which place we may presume Nebat was a native. He is entirely unknown to history except as the father of his distinguished son (1 K. 11.[26], &c.). Jeroboam is constantly called " son of Nebat," possibly to make clear the distinction between him and the second Jeroboam, the son of Joash.

NEBO. (1) A mountain in Moab, part of the mountains of Abarim, climbed by Moses to view the promised land and die (Nu. 33.[47] ; Dt. 32.[49], 34.[1]). It was a mountain one head or top of wh. was called Pisgah (Nu. 21.[20], 23.[14] ; Dt. 3.[27], 4.[49], &c.). On the back of a ridge wh. runs out W.-ward fm. the Moab tableland, c. five miles SW. of Ḥesbān, we find the name en-Nebā. A little further to the W. the ridge terminates in the height of Siāghah, wh. commands a view of the Jordan valley to Mt. Hermon, and all the main points of the land W. of Jordan, to the uplands of Judah (HGHL. 563, Birch, PEFQ. 1898, 110ff.). We may safely identify this with Moses' outlook. (2) A city in Moab fortified by Reuben (Nu. 32.[3, 38]). It was taken and destroyed by Mesha (Moab St., lines 14ff.), and is later referred to as Moabite (Is. 15.[2] ; Jr. 48.[1, 22]) : perhaps identified with the ruins at en-Nebā, mentioned above (Buhl, GAP., 266). (3) A town in Judah (Ez. 2.[29] ; Ne. 7.[33]), poss. = Beit Nubā, 12 miles NW. of Jrs., or Nuba, 4 miles SSE. of Adullam.

NEBO, an Asyr. and Bab. deity (Is. 46.[1] ; Jr. 48.[1]), originally supreme god of Borsippa near Babylon, then, drawn into the pantheon of the greater city, he became in the popular mythology the son of Bel-Marduk. He is regarded as the interpreter of the gods, and is associated with the planet Mercury, wh. is messenger of the Sun. The name is connected with nābā, " to prophesy," an etymology wh. agrees with the function assigned him in the mythology of Babylon. His worship was very popular in Babylon, as may be seen by the number of names in wh. it occurs as an element, as Nebuchadnezzar, Nabopolasar, and many others. He is the god of prophecy and learning. Very suitably, Tashmit, " hearing," is given him as spouse.



Nebo (from a Statue in Brit. Mus.)

NEBUCHADNEZZAR (2 K. 24.[1f.], 25.[1f.] ; 2 Ch. 36.[6f.] ; Ez. 2.[1f.] ; Jr. 27.[1f.], 34.[1] ; Dn. 1.[1f.]), NEBUCHADREZZAR (Jr. 21.[2f.], 39.[1f.] ; Ek. 26.[7], 29.[18, 19]), Asyr. Nabu-kudurri-utzur, " Nebo protects the boundary " ; Gr. LXX Nabouchodonosor ; Jos. Nabouchodonosoros. The n instead of r in the commoner but less correct form is due to the fact that the Heb. verb natzar is equivalent to the Asyr. yatzar, the r in the second element of the Assyrian name being dropped before the Heb. n. Exclusive of Daniel, in which the first form occurs 31 times, that form is found 28 times, 10 times of these in Jeremiah ; the second is found 31 times. When the Assyrian empire had become weakened by the expenditure of blood and treasure in the conflicts and conquests of Ashurbanipal, the Chaldæan Nabu-pal-utzar seized the throne of Babylon. For a considerable period he occupied himself with the consolidation of his Babylonian dominions. When, however, the Assyrian empire was beginning to stagger beneath the blows of the Manda (Medes), he entered into an alliance with these assailants of what had so long been the dominant power in SW. Asia, and took as a wife for his son, N., Amytis (Amuhea, Eus. Chron. 1, quot. fm. Polyhist.), the daughter of the Median king Astyages (Istu-vegu). The allies besieged Nineveh and ultimately took it ; meanwhile Pharaoh-Necho, anxious to secure some share of the falling empire, conquered Syria and occupied Carchemish, wh. guarded the ford over the Euphrates. Nabupolasar, who had associated his son N. with him on the throne, sent him to encounter Necho. A battle was fought at Carchemish, and Necho was completely defeated. The young conqueror followed up his victory by demanding the submission of all those who, having been vassals of Assyria, had become tributaries of Egypt. Among the others thus brought into subjection was Jehoiakim, who appears to have been taken prisoner, and to have ransomed himself by giving over to N. a " part of the vessels of the Lord's house." At this time was Daniel taken as a hostage along with others of the Jewish nobility, including his three friends. At this point, when possibly meditating an invasion of Egypt, N. was informed of the death of his father; Berosus informs us that he sent his hostages, heavy baggage and heavy armed troops to the north, while he himself with his light troops struck across the desert, and arrived in time to prevent any attempt at revolution. N. began his independent reign in the month Iyyar (May), B.C. 604. Unlike his Assyrian predecessors in empire, N. in his inscriptions rarely chronicles his conquests: we cannot tell his wars in any detail, but as Elam and Anshan appear to have become independent about that time, he mt. have to keep his armies near the eastern frontier. Meantime Hophra had succeeded Necho in Egypt, and began to intrigue with the former vassals of Egypt. Three years after his submission to N. Jehoiakim rebelled against him. At the moment N. cd. not himself engage in the affairs of the West, but the garrison troops of Chaldæa, with the troops of the allies that remained loyal, harassed Jehoiakim. Possibly it was about this time that N. had the dream of the gigantic statue (Dn. 2.). At length Jehoiakim died, and was succeeded by his son Jeconiah. N., now free to intervene, besieged Jerusalem and again took it. He carried Jeconiah away captive to BABYLON, and made his uncle Zedekiah king in his place, as vassal of Babylon (B.C. 597). He directed his arms against Phœnicia, captured Sidon, and laid siege to Tyre, but after a long investment appears to have been unable to capture it. It may have been after he had raised the siege of Tyre that N. turned his arms S. and began the two years' siege of Jerusalem. Famine helped the besiegers, and at length the city was taken. Zedekiah was brought before N. at Riblah and deprived of his eyesight. If we are to believe the date given in LXX and Theodotian versions of Daniel, N. celebrated his triumph by erecting a golden image. Not very long after this N. seems to have carried his arms into Egypt. Though for the moment he conquered it, he did not attempt to retain possession of it. In one of the few inscriptions of the many he has left in wh. N. tells of his campaigns, an invasion of Egypt is assigned to his 37th year. Some time during his latter years N. was afflicted with madness, and had to be put under restraint. If this event be transferred fm. the reign of Nabunahid to that of Nebuchadnezzar, the former was a number of years in Tema when his son reigned in his stead. On the other hand Neriglissar (Nergal-Sharezer) claims that his father, Bel-sum-iskun, had been king of Babylon: it is possible that during the madness of N., as one wd. have to fulfil the functions of royalty, Bel-sum-iskun may have done so. He reigned 43 years, and with him departed the glory of Babylon. Of his genius as a general we have no means of judging, save by the fact that he was stronger than any one opposed to him. His governmental methods were to some extent inherited fm. his Ninevite predecessors, but he seems, if we must judge fm. the list of officials in Daniel, to have maintained the unity of his empire more by governors than did the Assyrian monarchs, and less by tributary sovereigns; there was, however, the same system of deportation in the case of nations specially prone to rebellion. He adopted the somewhat hazardous custom of employing Hellenic mercenaries wh. had proved so advantageous to Psammetichus of Egypt; perhaps the valour of these mercenaries at Carchemish had impressed Nebuchadnezzar, for Necho wd. assuredly not encounter such a formidable foe as N. without his choicest troops. Strabo (Bk. xiii. under heading "Lesbos") states that Antemenidas, the brother of the Lesbian poet Alcæus, served as a mercenary in the Babylonian army when Nebuchadnezzar was king. In Daniel a very vivid picture is given of the character of N., liable to fits of ungovernable rage, having no measure in the vengeance he was eager to wreak on those who offended him, but generous to those who won his favour. Like all men of the highest type of greatness, he was not above attention to the minutest details; he arranged the dietary of the hostages who were being trained to take part in the Babylonian civil service, and the Melzar felt that he risked his life to make any change in what the king had ordained. The greatest testimony to his character is the feeling of love that Daniel has for the man who burned the holy city and carried himself captive. Very different is the attitude of the later Jews; Jos. asserts that Jehoiakim admitted him into Jrs. voluntarily, but that N. treacherously slew him, a statement that has no justification in the Biblical narrative. In Rabbinic Lit. vengeance is taken on his memory for his capture of Jrs. in tales in wh. the venom is lost in the childishness. His inscriptions are generally more occupied with an account of the temples he reared than with the cities he took; he seems to have been eminently religious.*

NEBUSHAZBAN (Asyr. nabu-suzib-anni, "may Nebo save me"), one of the chief captains in the army of Nebuchadnezzar when Jerusalem was captured (Jr. 39.[13]). His title, Rab-Saris, naturally suggested "chief of the eunuchs"; this is not improbable fm. the number of eunuchs that appear as warriors in the armies of SENNACHERIB. Possibly, however, it really meant "chief of the captains."

* There is a cameo engraving on black stone purporting to be a portrait of Nebuchadnezzar—it is a votive offering to Merodach. The character of the work is distinctly classic: it can scarcely be authentic, yet the reason for making it as a votive offering seems difficult to fathom (Kennedy, Daniel, p. 59); see p. 120.

In v. 3 of the chap. Sarsechim has this title: the verse seems corrupt (see SARSECHIM). The LXX has omitted v. 13 altogether, and in v. 3, instead of Rabsaris after Nabousachar, the name wh. occupies the place of Sarsechim, we find Nabousaris, wh. looks like a telescoped version of "Neboshasban Rabsaris."

NEBUZARADAN (Asyr. Nabu-zira-iddina, "Nebo has given seed"), "captain of the guard," Heb. rab-ṭabāḥim, literally "prince of the butchers." ARIOCH in Daniel has the same title; he probably was predecessor of N. The work of destroying Jerusalem, burning the Temple, the royal palace, and the dwellings of the nobles, and breaking down the wall of the city was superintended by N. (2 K. 25.[10]); he removed the captives "and those that fell away" to Babylon; he and other princes of Nebuchadnezzar "sent and took JEREMIAH out of the court of the prison and committed him to GEDALIAH" (Jr. 39.[9-14]). He was later sent to Pal., after the murder of Gedaliah, to carry "away captive of the Jews seven hundred and forty-five persons" (Jr. 52.[30]).

NECHO (1 Ch. 35.[20, 22], 36.[4]), PHARAOH-NECHOH (2 K. 23.[29]), king of Egypt (Egp. Nekau, Asyr. Nekuu). Egypt had sunk fm. the lofty position she had occupied under the monarchs of the 18th and 19th dynasties. For some centuries, though there had been kings of Egypt, the majority of those of mark had been Nubians or Ethiopians. Meantime the Assyrian monarchs had conquered Palestine, but their hold on this province was always weakened by the intrigues of the kings of Egypt. To stop this Sargon carried his arms into Egypt, but did not retain his hold of it. SENNACHERIB, finding that Hezekiah of Judah had entered into an alliance with Egypt, determined to strike at the source of these intrigues and defeated Shabataka at Eltekeh; a later expedition against Egypt resulted in the destruction of Sennacherib's army by pestilence. His successor Esarhaddon conquered all Lower Egypt and divided it into satrapies. The first-named of the satraps on the list of Esarhaddon is Neku-u. He made some attempts to rebel, but abortively; his son, the Psammetichus of Herodotus, set up once more the kingdom of the Pharaohs. During his long reign he endeavoured to consolidate his dominion; according to Herodotus he strengthened his native soldiery with Greek mercenaries; a portion of these latter he placed in TAHPANES (tel-Defneh), where many tokens of their presence have been discovered by Dr. Flinders Petrie. When N. his son came to the throne Assyria was falling; successful rebellions were being made everywhere; his own power was secure, so N. determined to attempt to revive the Empire of Thothmes. At first he was successful. He carried his arms into Palestine; Josiah, whether out of loyalty to the power whose vassal he had been, or himself intending to bid for the imperial position, ventured to oppose Necho, and encountered him at Megiddo; Josiah was defeated and slain. It wd. seem as if N. had not wished to encounter Josiah; he claimed divine orders to march against Assyria, as if appealing to the piety of the Jewish king; he wished to take an unbroken army to encounter the Assyrians on the Euphrates. After his victory at Megiddo N. held on his march to Carchemish (Jerablus), where he established a garrison to hold the ford over the river there; he returned to Egypt, and on the way asserted his suzerainty over Judæa by deposing Jehoahaz, whom the people had made king, and carrying him a captive to Egypt; in his stead he set up his brother Eliakim, whose name, in token of his being a vassal of Egypt, he changed to JEHOIAKIM. He was, however, soon called to defend his more distant dominions. The Babylonians had captured Nineveh with the assistance of the Medes; according to Herodotus, the capture was the deed of the Medians alone, wh. is less likely. Babylonia claimed to have a right to all the Ninevite empire as representing the same race. The army of Babylon was under the command of Nebuchadnezzar when Necho met them at Carchemish. The Babylonians were completely triumphant. Necho seems to have made a precipitate retreat towards Egypt, pursued by the youthful victor, who claimed the allegiance of all who had been subject allies of Assyria. Before he had followed Necho into Egypt Nebuchadnezzar was informed of his father's death, and hastened to Babylon to secure the throne for himself. Necho is celebrated in Herodotus for having attempted to unite the Mediterranean with the Red Sea by means of a canal; not, however, directly, but by endeavouring to make a mouth of the Nile in the Red Sea. After sacrificing numerous lives he was forced to desist. Another feat of his wh. Herodotus chronicles is his circumnavigation of Africa. He was succeeded by Psammetichus II. (Psemtek), the father of Hophra.

NECK. The neck is a part of the frame which offers itself readily for ornamentation by means of chains and other objects of adornment (Pr. 1.[9]; Ek. 16.[11]). The arms thrown around the neck in the kiss of greeting is a token of great cordiality and warmth of affection (Lk. 15.[20], &c.). The neck of the bullock being put unwillingly into the yoke, this becomes a figure of the servitude to which conquered peoples are subjected (Dt. 28.[48]). To break the yoke was to be set free (Jr. 30.[8]). From the bullock, strong and hard of neck, difficult to guide in ploughing, comes the phrase "stiff or hard of neck" (Dt. 31.[27], &c.). One with his neck under his enemy's foot was clearly in evil case (Is. 10.[24], &c.). Where Nehemiah says that the "nobles put not their necks to the work" we should probably say, "put not their shoulders to the wheel" (Ne. 3.[5]).

NECKLACES are not mentioned by name in EV., but the custom of hanging ornaments round the neck is one of great antiquity. Chains of the precious metals worn round the neck might be the symbol of authority (Gn. 41.[42]); but they also served for simple adornment (Pr. 1.[9]; Ek. 16.[11], &c.). The "strings of jewels" mentioned in SS. 1.[10] (RV.) were probably necklaces. The like is true of the "chain of thy neck" in 4.[9]. The golden crescents worn by the kings of Midian (Jg. 8.[26]; cp. Is. 3.[18] RV.) were probably worn on the breast in some form of necklace. The camels also were furnished with golden chains about their necks. The horse, mule, and camel are often decorated with strings of beads or shells, which are supposed to act as amulets, guarding them specially against the evil eye. Necklaces of coins are popular among Oriental women to-day. Strings of fruit seeds, amber beads, mother-of-pearl, and necklaces of filigree work are also common.

NECROMANCER (Dt. 18.[11]). See DIVINATION.

NEDABIAH, a member of the royal family of Judah (1 Ch. 3.[18]).

NEEDLE'S EYE. In the saying recorded with merely slight verbal differences in the Synoptics our Lord declares, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Mw. 19.[24], &c.). In the East the camel is very commonly taken as the type of size, as it is the largest animal with wh. the natives are acquainted. Thus our Lord, in rebuking the Pharisees, declares that they "strain out a gnat and swallow a camel." Some have thought to improve the saying first in question by asserting that "the needle's eye" means a small door cut in the heavy wooden gate of a city. Such small doors are common enough, not merely in the gates of cities but the gates into courtyards, but they are never now called by that name, and we have no evidence that they ever were so designated.

NEESING. The Heb. word 'aṭīshāh, from 'āṭash, "to sneeze," corresponds to the Arabic 'aṭsah (Jb. 41.[18]). It is obviously onomatopoetic, and cannot, as some have thought, mean "snorting," or "hard breathing." A different word, zārar, is used of the child's sneezing in 2 K. 4.[35]. A sneeze has always been regarded as of happy omen in the East.

NEGEB. This Heb. word is in EV. rendered "south," as in "south land" (Jo. 15.[21], &c.), and "southward" (Gn. 13.[14]). While correctly so rendered, it is the name applied to a definite tract of country which is often mentioned in Scripture. It is associated with the sojourning of Abraham and Lot (Gn. 12.[9], 13.[1]) and also of Isaac (24.[62]). By the Negeb the spies entered Palestine (Nu. 13.[22]); there Amalek dwelt (v. 29). It was the district sloping southward from Hebron, through which the more fertile uplands of Judah shade off into the desert of et-Tīh. This was the region assigned to the tribe of Simeon (Jo. 19.[1ff.]). Within it lay Ziklag, associated with the exile of David (1 S. 27.[6]). At that time it was occupied in part by Judah, part by the Jerahmeelites, and in part by the Kenites. The Cherethites of 1 S. 30.[14] were doubtless the Philistines, who held the western part of the Negeb. The Amalekites took advantage of the absence of the Philistine army at Gilboa to make a raid upon their territory. Caleb's portion, of course, belonged to Judah.

The country is broken into a series of ranges of bare hills, which run from east to west, forming a secure defence for Palestine against invasion from the south. For centuries it has been entirely pastoral, but there are many evidences of ancient cultivation, and ruined sites of considerable extent are numerous. Means were found in old times to imprison the winter rains in the wadies for use in irrigation. Great cisterns also were constructed, so that life in an otherwise dry land was made tolerable. These arts may be employed again, and already some slight improvements have been attempted, with promising success.

NEHELAMITE is used of Shemaiah, one of the false prophets who opposed Jeremiah (29.[24], &c.). It may mean that he was a native of a place called Nehelam, or that he was descended from a man bearing that name. But neither place nor man with a name resembling this has been discovered. AVm. suggests "dreamer," as if the word were connected with ḥālam, "to dream."

NEHEMIAH. (1) Son of Hachaliah, prob. of the tribe of Judah. The one source of information regarding this patriotic leader of the Jews is the book known by his name. He is introduced as acting in the capacity of cup-bearer to king Artaxerxes Longimanus at SHUSHAN, where the Persian monarchs were wont to spend the winter. There intelligence was brought to him by a company of Jews from Judæa, a kinsman of his own among them, of the distressful condition of things in Jerusalem. The tidings cast him into great sadness. He earnestly sought Divine guidance as to how best he might serve his people and restore the city. The king observed the downcast face of his attendant, and learning its cause, forthwith appointed him governor of Judæa, gave him a guard, and letters to the satraps in the provinces through which he must pass. He also received orders to the keeper of the king's forests for the supply of such timber as he should require. His appointment was for a limited term, at the end of which he was to return to the king.

Arriving in Jerusalem, he first surveyed the situation, and determined the line to be followed in restoring the walls which Nebuchadnezzar had broken down. The state of the people appears to have been even worse than that of the walls. They were in deep poverty, and, exposed as they were to perpetual attacks of enemies, who pillaged their country and carried off their sons and daughters as slaves, demoralisation proceeded apace. Their one hope was the rebuilding of the city's defences. With the security thus afforded a stable government might again be organised and the Temple services resumed: the spirit of the people might revive, and a new lease of prosperous life might be entered upon. With remarkable energy and skill Nehemiah set about the work. In spite of the opposition of his people's enemies, Sanballat, Tobiah, and others, who exhausted their ingenuity in their attempts to entangle and hinder him, he so guided and inspired the Jewish workmen whom he had gathered that the walls were completed within two months. Measures of religious reform were inaugurated. Ezra the scribe read the book of the law in the hearing of all the people. Arrangements were made for the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles according to the directions of the law: a practice that had been long neglected. The people then gathered with every token of mourning, and national confession of sin was made. A "solemn League and Covenant" was drawn up and sealed by the heads of houses as representing the whole people, whereby they became bound to observe the requirements of the law. The book then gives an account of the religious service at the dedication of the walls, on the strength and durability of which so much depended. These events seem all to have taken place within the year (B.C. 444), but it is impossible to say if they are stated in strict chronological order.

Whether specially summoned or in fulfilment of his agreement, Nehemiah returned to the Persian king, and was absent from Jerusalem for some years. He may have continued to hold the governorship, some officer meantime representing him in Jerusalem. His absence may have lasted about twelve years. Some such time would in any case be required to permit development of the abuses which, on his return, he was called upon to correct. Intermarriage of Jewish men with heathen women, which had become very common, was bound to bring many evils in its train. In spite of Ezra's stern measures against it, the practice seems to have been growing, and had even received official sanction, the son of Eliashib the priest being son-in-law to Sanballat the Horonite. The offspring of these marriages spoke half in the speech of their heathen mothers. The priest had given Tobiah apartments within the Temple enclosure. The portions of the Levites had not been given, and they had fled every one to his field. From the country people brought their produce for sale on the Sabbath day, as did also the Tyrian fish merchants, and trade was done as on other days. Nehemiah threw himself into the task of reform with his old promptitude and energy. He cast forth the household stuff of Tobiah, and cleansed the chambers it had polluted. The priest's son, Joiada, son-in-law of Sanballat, he "chased" from him. He closed the gate before dark on Sabbath eve, and put an end to the Sabbath trading. He handled the men who had married foreign wives with great severity. He cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair and made them swear by God that they would discontinue the practice. He rearranged the work of the Levites, and put matters on a satisfactory basis.

Here the narrative closes. Nothing further is known of Nehemiah with certainty. Josephus says he did many other excellent things, and died at a great age. In 2 M. 1.[18ff.] a curious story is told of the preservation of the sacred fire by which Nehemiah's sacrifices were consumed.

It is impossible to estimate the services Nehemiah rendered to Judaism. At a time of national demoralisation and religious decay, when everything seemed to point to the speedy extinction of Judaism, he cast his strong personality athwart the stream of tendency, and by the blessing of God was able to arrest its progress. His pure patriotism was shown by his leaving a position of wealth and comfort in Persia to face the perilous and toilsome tasks that awaited him in Jerusalem. He had the eye of an engineer, the mind of a statesman, and the heart of a religious enthusiast. Fearless, yet kindly, keen of insight, swift in decision and prompt in action, he was a man of incorruptible integrity, absolutely devoted to the honour of God and the welfare of His people. The affectionate and reverential memory in which he is held is more durable than the walls of Jerusalem, which, Josephus said, should be his eternal monument (Ant. XI. v. 8). See also EZRA AND NEHEMIAH.

(2) One of the heads of the people who returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[2]; Ne. 7.[7]). (3) One who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Ne. 3.[16]).

NEHUM, one of the heads of the Jewish community who returned with Zerubbabel (Ne. 7.[7]). In Ez. 2.[2] "Rehum," and in 1 Es. 5.[8] "Roimus."

NEHUSHTA, the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem, wife of Jehoiakim, and mother of Jehoiachin, kings of Judah (2 K. 24.[8]). When her son was taken captive to Babylon she accompanied him as a prisoner (v. 12).

NEHUSHTAN (2 K. 18.[4]). The BRAZEN SERPENT wh. Moses had made for the cure of the serpent-bitten among the Israelites had been preserved, and fm. being an object of natural interest had become an object of worship. Hezekiah, pursuing his religious reform, not only destroyed the "high places" (bāmōth), but broke in pieces this interesting relic, and called it contemptuously N., "a bit of brass." There seems to have been a play on the resemblance of the sound of the two words nĕḥōsheth, "brass," and nāḥāsh, "a serpent." The transliteration adopted by the LXX, neesthan, wd. indicate that the Egyptian translators connected N. rather with nāḥāsh than with nĕḥōsheth. The necessity for this destruction was clear if Judah was to be led to feel that God alone ought to be worshipped. Neither artistic beauty nor historic interest ought to be allowed to intrude between the worshipper and God.

NEIEL, a place on the boundary of Asher (Jo. 19.[27]) named between Jiphthah-el and Cabul. It may be identical with Neah of v. 13: unidentified.

NEIGHBOUR. In ancient Pal., as in that country at the present time, isolated dwellings were rare: the inhabitants collected themselves in small towns, wh., in virtue of having walls, were called cities; travel to any distance was fraught with danger, hence social duties were naturally summed up in those to the "neighbours." The Heb. word rē'a, wh. EV. most frequently tr. "neighbour," does not suggest propinquity so much as intercourse. It is also very frequently rendered "friend." The Greek word plēsion conveyed the idea of physical nearness. A new meaning was imported into the commandment by the Pharisees. In the Targum the word for N. was ḥaber or ḥabra; in the Pharisaic schools this word became restricted to mean "a brother Pharisee": when this meaning was transferred to the commandment its meaning became changed fm. the widest philanthropy to the narrowest bigotry. In the parable of "The Good Samaritan" our Lord gave it even a deeper meaning than it had at first.

NEKEB, "pass," joined to ADAMI (Jo. 19.[33]). LXX makes two names. Poss. we shd. read "Adami and Nekeb." Later N. was called Tzīyadathah (Neubauer, Geog. d. Tlm. 225): poss. therefore = Khirbet Seiyadeh, E. of ed-Dāmieh, and c. four miles SW. of Tiberias.

NEKODA. The children of Nekoda were a family of NETHINIM, who returned from Babylon (Ez. 2.[48]; Ne. 7.[50]; 1 Es. 5.[31], "Noeba"). (2) A family whose genealogy had been lost during the Exile (Ez. 2.[60]; Ne. 7.[62]).

NEMUEL. (1) Son of Eliab, of the tribe of Reuben, eldest brother of Dathan and Abiram (Nu. 26.[9]). (2) Eldest son of Simeon, from whom the Nemuelites claimed descent (Nu. 26.[12]; 1 Ch. 4.[24]). In Gn. 46.[10] he is called Jemuel.

NEPHEG. (1) Son of Izhar son of Kohath, and brother of Korah (Ex. 6.[21]). (2) A son of David, born after he had transferred his capital from Hebron to Jerusalem (2 S. 5.[15]; 1 Ch. 3.[7], 14.[6]).

NEPHEW, in every case where it occurs in AV., should be "grandson" (Jg. 12.[14]; Jb. 18.[19]; Is. 14.[22]; 1 Tm. 5.[4]).

NEPHISH = NAPHISH.

NEPHISHESIM. The children of N. were among the NETHINIM who returned with Zerubbabel (Ne. 7.[52]): the Nephusim of Ez. 2.[50]; Naphisi of 1 Es. 5.[31].

NEPHTOAH. The spring and waters of N. are mentioned (Jo. 15.[9], 18.[15]), on the boundary of Judah and Benjamin. N. is often identified with Lifta, on the E. bank of Wādy Beit Ḥanīnā, two miles N.W. of Jrs. (see ELEPH). The Tlm. (Neubauer, 146) places it at 'Ain 'Aṭān, beside the Pools of Solomon, S. of Bethlehem. There is no certainty.

NER, son of Jehiel, who was probably the founder of Gibeon, and his wife Maachah (1 Ch. 9.[35]). His sons were KISH the father of king Saul, and ABNER, who became the captain of Saul's host.

NEREUS and his sister, Christians in Rome, are saluted by St. Paul (Rm. 16.[15]). "All the saints that are with them" may point to their house being a meeting-place for Christians in the capital. Origen thinks he may have belonged to the household of Philologus and Julia. A Nereus is said to have been baptized at Rome by St. Peter; but we have no means to identify them.

NERGAL, the principal deity of Cutha; "the men of Cuth made Nergal" (2 K. 17.[30]): his Babylonian name was Ne-uru-gal, "the Lord of the Great City," i.e. the place of the dead. Later he was regarded as the son of Bel of Nippur. He was the god of war and devastation, and the planet Mars was sacred to him. The month associated with him is Kislev, December, when the sun appears to die. His worship seems to have been popular, as his name frequently occurs on seals as a component of personal names.

NERGAL-SHAREZER (Asyr. Nergal-shar-utzar, "Nergal preserves the king"). (1) A high officer in the army of Nebuchadnezzar (Jr. 39.[3]). There is a doubt about this name: Dr. Sayce wd. omit it; it is represented in the LXX by Marganasar, but the verse is hopelessly corrupt; all we can say is that some name stood here that was capable of being confounded with N.-S. His place in the second list of nobles is occupied by Nebuzaradan. (2) Named in the same list as No. 1, but also in that in v. 13; N.-S. is called RAB-MAG, formerly interpreted "chief of the magicians," now understood to be equivalent to "chief physician." This, however, does not involve much of difference, as cures among the Babylonians were usually wrought by magical formulæ, not by medical remedies. He was son-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar. He conspired against his brother-in-law, Evil-Merodach, had him assassinated, seized the throne, and reigned for four years. His father, Bil-sum-iskun, he claims to have been king. This is difficult to explain, unless that during the madness of Nebuchadnezzar he occupied the place of vice-king. In classic literature he is known as Neriglissar. His son, Labasi-Marduk, a mere lad, succeeded him, but was murdered after a reign of a few months..

NERI was a descendant of David's son, Nathan. On the line of Solomon becoming extinct in Jeconiah, Neri's son, Salathiel, succeeded to the status of David's successor and heir, and thus appears in the genealogy of our Lord (1 Ch. 3.[17]; Mw. 1.[12]) as the "son" of Jeconiah. St. Luke preserves the fact that Neri was the father of Salathiel (Lk. 3.[27]).

NERIAH, father of Baruch, the friend and amanuensis of Jeremiah the prophet (Jr. 32.[12], &c.). In Ba. 1.[1] Nerias.

NERO was the last of the emperors of Rome that cd. claim any relationship to the great dictator,

Coin of Nero (with Harbour of Ostia)

Julius Cæsar. His father, Cnæus Domitius Ahenobarbus, was the grandson of Octavia, the sister of Augustus, and grand-niece of Julius: his mother, Agrippina, was daughter of Germanicus and of the elder Agrippina, the grand-daughter of Augustus. On the murder of his nephew, Caius, the brother of Agrippina, Claudius became emperor; by his wife, the notorious Messalina, he had a son, Britannicus, and a daughter, Octavia. On account of her publicly scandalous conduct Messalina was put to death, and Claudius married his niece, Agrippina, then a widow. Shortly, through the influence of his mother, Lucius Domitius was adopted by the emperor, and his name changed to Nero Claudius Cæsar Drusus Germanicus, and generally known as Nero. Claudius began after a year or two to show indications of a growing preference for his own son over Nero, his son by adoption, and at the same time an alienation fm. Agrippina; she promptly had him poisoned and her son proclaimed emperor. When his mother threatened to espouse the cause of her cousin, Britannicus, against her son, as he was proving unmanageable, Nero procured that he shd. be poisoned while sitting at his table. Notwithstanding this inauspicious beginning, the first five years of Nero's principate gained the commendation of Trajan; he wisely allowed matters to be directed by his erstwhile tutor, the philosopher Seneca, and Burrus, Prefect of the Prætorians. The government of the vast empire was no easy matter: in Rome the mob had to be fed and amused; in the provinces justice had to be administered and means of communication maintained; the frontiers must be guarded, and the armies must be kept in discipline; at the same time the temper of their commanders had to be understood, so that no unforeseen rebellion shd. set up a claimant to the empire. During this "quinquennium" things went well, but Nero himself was becoming more and more debauched. His mother was murdered by his orders; his wife Octavia put away, first for Acte, a slave girl, then for Poppæa Sabina, and then murdered. At the same time this ruthless parricide and debauchee wept when he signed the warrant for the execution of two highway robbers. He had an artistic nature, had written poetry fm. childhood, fancied himself an accomplished musician, and probably was above the average. He admired statuary and painting, and delighted in gorgeous architecture; he does not seem to have revelled in mere size like the Flavians—delicate and abounding ornament afforded him more pleasure. Like many youths of artistic temperament, he became stage-struck; innocent though this was, it did more to lower his popularity than his murders. These murders began to avenge themselves, especially that of his mother, in dreams prompted by unavailing remorse, and deeper and deeper debauchery was the remedy to wh. he turned. Burrus, the stern soldier who wd. not aid him in his parricide, died, possibly by disease—rumour said by poison. Tigellinus became prefect in position, but in office minister of his master's vices. Seneca, feeling that now he had no influence over his quondam pupil, retired to his estates. We need not spend time over campaigns wh. N. surveyed fm. a distance in Armenia under Corbulo, successful, with an interval of disaster when Pætus had the command; and in Britain, where massacres like those of the Indian Mutiny were avenged by Suetonius. While these things were going on a new factor entered into Roman politics. An obscure peasant teacher in Pal., Jesus by name, had been crucified under Pontius Pilate in the reign of Tiberius, but had risen from the dead; followers had gathered to His memory; above all an eloquent young rabbi of purest Jewish descent, of Greek culture, possessing the political privilege of Roman citizenship, became a convert. His zeal carried him through Syria, Asia, Galatia, Macedonia, and Achaia, proclaiming his Gospel, not only to Jews, but also to Greeks, and making many converts. At first the doctrines of Paul, regarded as merely those of an eccentric Jewish sect, were looked upon by Roman society with the lack of interest with wh. the British public wd. survey a peaceful Babist propaganda among the Mohammedans in India. More than modern London, ancient Rome gathered to herself members of all the nationalities of the empire; into Rome had come this new Jewish "superstition"; there had been conflicts about these views, and riots in the days of Claudius. Paul came at last a prisoner on appeal; his bonds did not hinder him preaching to all and sundry, and proclaiming the insufficiency of the Jews' religion. The Empress Poppæa Sabina was a Jewish proselyte of a kind. Paul was brought before Nero and set at liberty. His liberation did not lessen his activity—more and more numerous became the followers "of this way"; some even of the Roman nobles became infected with this "foreign superstition." The zealots for old Roman manners saw in this influx of Eastern religions only the introduction of foreign vice, a view that not a few occurrences had done much to justify. Meantime the orgies of Nero's debauchery had become monstrous; history can only draw a veil over the scenes. Nero was an artist, and had designed a palace worthy the abode of one so gifted, but the site was cramped; mean dwellings that shocked the imperial taste pressed on the walls of Cæsar. An opportune fire broke out and swept over the centre of the city, till the whole valley between the Palatine and Aventine was a lake of fire. Any attempt to stop the fire was hindered by men who claimed that they had authority: some of them scattered firebrands to spread the fire. The emperor hurried fm. Antium to Rome to see what cd. be done. The sight of the sea of fire struck a chord in his artistic soul; he hastened to a tower fm. wh. he cd. view the conflagration, and recited passages fm. his poem on the destruction of Troy. The black cloud of smoke that hung like a pall, torn here, reddened there, by the pillars of flame that mounted up towards heaven, the porticos of the marble temples reddened by the glow, accompanied by the roar of the fiery billows, the crash of falling buildings, and the disconsolate wail of the houseless and the ruined, wd. make a scene of appalling impressiveness; that Nero shd. have been affected by its æsthetic character was but natural. That, however, roused wrath against him among the people of Rome; moreover, sayings of his were remembered in wh. he had inveighed against the narrow streets of the city. He was condemned by the popular verdict of Rome for having burned the city. In vain he exerted himself to stop the spread of the fire; he was believed to be guilty. Another victim must be found to sate the vengeance of the Roman mob. He thought of the Christians; they had few friends, they were regarded as Jews, and they were looked on as contrary to all men; but the Christians were hated by the Jews. To accuse them wd. involve no great mass of persons, and those it did involve were disliked and suspected by every one. He, however, overdid his cruelty: even a Roman audience, who cd. listen unmoved to the groans of a robber crucified on the stage, were horror-struck at the shrieks of the victims, wrapt in the molesta tunica of cloth saturated with naphtha and pitch, blazing to illuminate the gardens. After that he went mad with the lust of blood; men were hurried to the arena to be torn of wild beasts, Christian maidens were fastened to the horns of wild bulls to give a realistic representation of the fate of Circe. It was under his rule that Paul was beheaded and Peter was crucified. We need not pursue his career further, or tell of his journey to Greece and his exhibition of himself as a singer on the stage before the Greeks. It is not to be denied that the canal he planned at Corinth wd. have been useful, but nothing cd. win back the respect he had lost. Galba rebelled in Spain and joined Vindex in Gaul; the Pretorian guards, misled by Tigellinus that he, Nero, had deserted them and fled to Egypt, easily accepted a donative to proclaim Galba. N. fled fm. the city and attempted to end his life by suicide; and only succeeded when his freedman drove home the dagger. He died saying, "What an artist perishes in me." So died Nero, the flagitious product of a flagitious age. Coming to the throne of empire a mere boy, surrounded by men and women the most unprincipled, it was small wonder he became what he did. It was only after the conspiracy of the Pisos that his suspicions struck at those around him; then only did the conspiracy become general.

One of the commonest theories of the reference of the number 666 in Revelation is to Nero; his name in Hebrew, נרון קסר, amounts to that number when the letters are assigned their natural numerical value. It is more interesting than conclusive. At the same time there is much that wd. suit this identification. Rome is certainly meant by the city that ruleth over the kings of the earth. The reverence the emperor claimed was more like that wh. ought to be given to God only than what shd. be offered to a man. All things about the situation of the emperor of Rome, his awful power, his solitary and unique grandeur, make him a suitable representative of Antichrist, the power that is the enemy of all righteousness. Altho' he is not named, yet the fact that it was he to whom Paul appealed, and that he may have been intended specially by Antichrist, make it necessary to present some account of his history and character to our readers.

NETAIM, a town named in 1 Ch. 4.[23], RV., "the inhabitants of N. and Gederah": unidentified.

NETHANEEL, RV. NETHANEL. (1) Son of Zuar, prince of the tribe of Issachar (Nu. 1.[8], &c.). (2) The fourth of the sons of Jesse; brother of David (1 Ch. 2.[14]). (3) One of the priestly trumpeters who accompanied the ark on its removal fm. the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch. 15.[24]). (4) A Levite of David's time, father of the scribe Shemaiah (1 Ch. 24.[6]). (5) A son of Obed-edom (1 Ch. 26.[4]). (6) One of the princes of Judah who, at Jehoshaphat's direction, went round to teach the people in the cities (2 Ch. 17.[7]). (7) One of the Levites who took part in the celebration of the Passover under Josiah (2 Ch. 35.[9]). (8) One of the priests in the time of Ezra who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[22]). (9) A priest representing the family of Jedaiah in the time of Jehoiakim (Ne. 12.[21]). (10) A Levite musician who took part in the solemn dedication of the completed wall of Jerusalem (Ne. 12.[36]).

NETHANIAH. (1) A man of the blood royal of Judah, father of ISHMAEL, who murdered GEDALIAH (2 K. 25.[23], &c.). (2) One of Asaph's sons, chief of the fourth division of the Temple singers (1 Ch. 25.[2, 12]). (3) One of the Levites who accompanied the princes of Judah who were sent by Jehoshaphat through the country to teach the law (2 Ch. 17.[8]). (4) Son of Shelemiah and father of Jehudi (Jr. 36.[14]).

NETHINIM. This word is derived fm. the Heb. nāthan, to give, and means "given, set apart, dedicated." The name was applied to those who were appointed to the lowest offices in the Temple service, and to whom were assigned all the menial duties. This designation is only found in the later OT. books—Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah—but such a class and the services they rendered are met with during the whole hist. The first N. were really the Levites who were given by Moses to serve the priests (Nu. 3.[9], 8.[19]) as attendants and servants —to guard, transport, and clean the house and its vessels and assist generally. Their duties were many, and as soon as captives were taken in war (Nu. 31.[47]) they were relieved by the appointment of 320 to the charge of the tabernacle and 32 to the service of the priests. Soon after (Jo. 9.[21]; 1 Ch. 9.[2]) the Gibeonites were reduced to slavery and added to this class, and in this position they remained till, perhaps through the slaughter by Saul (2 S. 21.[2]), they were so reduced in numbers as to be insufficient for the work, and the N. proper came into office—"those whom David and the Levites appointed for the service of the Levites" (Ez. 8.[20]). Rabbinical references wd. lead us to think that they were all along a subject and menial class, and that their alien origin was never forgotten. If this were so we should infer that they were introduced fm. among the remnants of the Canaanites or fm. among captives taken during David's wars. Still, with the rest of Isr., they were carried into captivity, and on the return, when there were many priests and few Levites, the position of the N. was more important and prominent (Ez. 8.[17]). They were allowed residence and possessions in the priestly cities (1 Ch. 9.[2]), the record of their families was kept (Ez. 2.[43]), and, by the decree of Artaxerxes (Ez. 7.[24]), they too were relieved of taxation. Under Ezra they numbered 220, and in the days of Zerubbabel 390. They are not mentioned later by name either in the Apcr., Jos., or the NT., but the servants sent by the Pharisees and chief priests to take Jesus (Jn. 7.[32, 45]) in the Temple, as also Malchus, may have belonged to this class. WM. M. CHRISTIE.

NETOPHAH. The name of the town itself first appears in the lists given in Ez. 2.[22]; Ne. 7.[26], of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, but natives of the place, Netophathites, are mentioned long before. Such were Maharai and Heleb, two of David's heroes (2 S. 23.[28f.]), and others (1 Ch. 27.[13], &c.). It is probably represented by the mod. Beit Nettīf, at the mouth of Wādy es-Sunṭ.

NETS were used chiefly in fishing, and were prob. not unlike those used in Palestinian waters to-day. (1) Shabakeh, "cast net," prob. = Heb. ḥērem (Ek. 26.[5], &c.) and Gr. amphiblēstron (Mw. 4.[18]). It is of fine mesh, circular in form, with lead sinkers round the circumference. It is lifted by a string attached to the centre, and so laid on arm and shoulder that by a dexterous movement it is thrown out, fully extended. It is used only in shallow water, the fisherman wading in to secure the fish enclosed. (2) Jarf, "draw net" = Heb. mikmoreth (Is. 19.[8], &c.), and Gr. sagēnē (Mw. 13.[47]). It is of great length, and as much as 20 ft. deep, with sinkers on the lower, and cork floats on the upper edge. The mesh is small, so that when let down and drawn to shore, it sweeps the waters. If caught on any obstacle, "naked" fishermen (Jn. 21.[7]) dive to relieve it. Diktuon (Mw. 4.[20], &c.) is a general term for net. No net corresponding to the mod. m'baṭṭen is mentioned in Scripture. It is a triple net, the inner being of small, the two outer of wide mesh. The net is let down in a likely place. The fish entangle themselves, entering the outer net, and pushing the middle net through that on the other side. They are secured by lifting the net. See HUNTING, SNARES.

NETTLE. (1) Ḥārūl (Jb. 30.[7]; Pr. 24.[31]; Zp. 2.[9]). RVm. trs. always "wild vetches," but these wd. hardly be found near salt-pits. It is perhaps best taken with Post (HDB. s.v.), as a generic term, applied to thorn, scrub, or brushwood. (2) Qimmosh (Is. 34.[13]; Ho. 9.[6]) is most likely the common Urtica pilulifera, wh. flourishes abundantly on ruined sites in Palestine.

NEW MOON. See MOON, FEASTS.

NEW TESTAMENT. Although nowhere used in Scripture, the title is recognised as applied to the specially Christian portion of the Bible. It represents the Greek hē kainē diathēkē, wh., literally translated, means "the New Covenant." For the question of the Canon of the NT. see SCRIPTURE; and under the different books the questions connected with them.

NEW YEAR. In the beginning of the Talmudic treatise Rosh hash-Shānā there are four New Years reckoned: the New Year for the kings and the feasts, the 1st of Nisan (March–April); the N.Y. for the work of the field, the 1st of Tishri (Sept.–Oct.); the N.Y. for the tithing of cattle, the 1st of Elul (Aug.–Sept.)—this, however, mt. be reckoned fm. Tishri; the N.Y. of the trees, the 1st or 15th of Sebat (Jan.–Feb.). Among the Jews now the N.Y. is always celebrated on the 1st of Tishri, when they don the brightest garments, and give gifts to each other. It is announced by the blowing of the Shofar in the synagogue. In some places there is a solemn bathing and washing of clothes in token of cleansing fm. sin. In some places where the sea or a large lake is in sight there is, or till lately was, a quaint custom of turning the back towards the sea and, quoting Is. 38.[17], throwing a stone over the shoulder. On the N.Y. wh. begins a new 19-year cycle the custom is to get up to the top of the nearest height in time to see the sun rise fm. it and to greet the sun with certain prayers. Some of the more ignorant Jews are credited with the belief that a new sun is created for each cycle. Scripture contains no traces of such observances. The question of the relation of this N.Y. to the beginning of the Sacred Year on the 1st of Nisan will be considered under YEAR.

NEZIAH, a family of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[54]; Ne. 7.[56]), called "Nasith" in 1 Es. 5.[32].

NEZIB, a town in the Judæan Shephelah, in the same group with Keilah and Mareshah (Jo. 15.[43]). OEJ. places it on the road between Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrīn) and Hebron, seven miles from the former. It is represented to-day by Beit Naṣīb, a village on an ancient site which quite meets these conditions.

NIBHAZ, a god of the inhabitants of Avva, brought with them to Samaria (2 K. 17.[31]). Nothing further is known of him. The rabbis derived the name from nābaḥ, "to bark," and so concluded that he was in the form of a dog.

NIBSHAN, a city in the wilderness of Judah (Jo. 15.[62]). It was known by name to Eusebius and Jerome (OEJ. s.v.), but they give no hint as to its site, which has not yet been recovered.

NICANOR, one of the seven chosen by the apostles to attend to the business of the daily ministration (Ac. 6.[5]). Nothing more is known of him.

NICODEMUS. All that is known of N. is recorded in the Gospel of John. He was a Pharisee, and a man of authority among the Jews (3.[1]). Jesus calls him "the teacher of Isr.," prob. implying such a function as interpretation of the law. He was a member of the Sanhedrin (7.[50]). His gift of spices for the body of Jesus shows that he was a man of some wealth (19.[39]). He was cautious, perhaps even timid. He sought Jesus by night to avoid critical eyes—whether in Jrs., on Olivet, or in the retirement of Bethany there is nothing to show. The earnest address of Jesus proves His appreciation of the man. Conviction does not seem to have come to N. at once; but in the Sanhedrin, when his colleagues were ready to condemn Jesus unheard, he had the courage to risk suspicion by contending for a fair and legal procedure; and at last he frankly associated himself with Joseph of Arimathæa in providing honourable burial for the Crucified. Not distinguished by the spirit of initiative, he was clearly not fitted to be a leader: but there is a consistency in the representations of this man, suggestive of great fidelity and deep loyalty. Some have identified N. with Nikdemon ben Gorion mentioned in the Tlm. (Taanith, xx. 1), who was alive when Jrs. was captured and destroyed. If this is correct, wh. is hardly prob., he must have lived to extreme old age.

NICODEMUS, THE GOSPEL OF, an Apocryphal writing wh. had much influence on the religious thought of mediæval times. It is composed of two separate works. The first contains an account of the trial of our Lord before Pilate, a work wh. seems to have been extant separately under the title of Acta Pilati. It is largely made up of excerpts fm. the accounts given of our Lord's trial in the canonical Gospels, some of the passages being transferred with little alteration: e.g., cp. Mw. 27.[19] and G.N. 2 (1st G.); Lk. 23.[39-42] and G.N. 10; Jn. 18.[33-39] and G.N. 3. Besides there are references to events elsewhere narrated in the Gospels, as the massacre of the innocents, the cure of the woman with the issue of blood, &c. There is prefixed to these an account of the standards bowed down before Jesus, and the proof that He was not born of fornication, &c., and appended to it an account of the imprisonment of Joseph of Arimathæa by the Jews and his deliverance fm. prison, with many interpolations in the course of the relation. This work exists in several forms, both in Greek and Latin, in some of wh. Nicodemus writes the work in Heb.; in others he is represented as translating it into Greek. The Acts of Pilate have all the characteristics in style of being the work of a Jew. The two Greek forms seem to have emanated fm. a common source wh. may have been composed early in the second cent. One striking feature is the accurate way in wh. the source must have dated the crucifixion—the 15th year of Tiberius and the consulships of Fufius Geminus and Rubellius Geminus; Rufus is an evident change of the unfamiliar for the familiar. The second part, Descensus ad Inferos, is a much more rhetorical production. It purports to be the writing of Simeon and his two sons, who had risen fm. the dead at our Lord's resurrection. They describe what took place in Hades when Christ descended there. While rhetorical, it has passages of some poetic power. It has the appearance of being considerably later than the Acta Pilati, possibly originally written in the third cent., but having features added in the fifth.

NICOLAITANS (Rv. 2.[6, 15]), a sect mentioned as present in the churches of Ephesus and Pergamos. Irenæus (Advers. Hæres. i. 26) declares them to have been the followers of Nicolaus the deacon (Ac. 6.[5] "Nicolas"), and further says they lead lives of unrestrained indulgence. Hippolytus has a similar, though not quite identical account of them; Nicolaus, he asserts, inculcates "indifferency of both life and food" (vii. 24). Tertullian gives a description that does not seem to be borrowed fm. Irenæus nor founded on the passages in Revelation. "He (Nicolaus) says that Darkness was seized with longing—in the foul and obscene sense—after Light; out of this conjunction it wd. be a shame to say what other and unclean things resulted" (Preas. Hæret. xlvi.). It seems clear that they were a semi-Gnostic sect who exhibited their contempt of the body, not by asceticism, but by licentiousness. The connection that Nicolaus of Antioch had with them may be doubted. Baur, obsessed with the idea of an antagonism between St. Paul and the older apostles, at wh. he had arrived by à priori methods, saw in the Nicolaitans a caricature of Paulinism. There is no evidence that the "pillar apostles" ever identified themselves with the Judaisers. This view has been revived by v. Manen, without, however, advancing any further evidence of a positive kind.

NICOLAS, a Jewish proselyte fm. Antioch, one of the seven chosen to attend to the daily ministration (Ac. 6.[5]). By many of the Church Fathers he was regarded, it seems erroneously, as the founder of the sect of Nicolaitans.

It is worthy of note that this is perhaps the first case in which a proselyte was admitted to office in the Christian Church. The other six appear to have been Jews in the fullest sense.

NICOPOLIS, the city in wh. St. Paul "had determined to winter" (Tt. 3.[12]). There were many cities of this name; but the general opinion is that N. in Epirus, on the W. shore of the Gulf of Ambracia (G. of Atba), is here intended. It was founded by Augustus to commemorate his victory over Antony and Cleopatra, B.C. 31; and, enjoying imperial favour, it speedily assumed the leading place in all that region. For many of its finest buildings it was indebted to Herod the Great (Ant. XVI. v. 3). It probably contained a strong Jewish community. It was the scene of great festivals and athletic contests, wh. drew crowds fm. far and near. A position gained here wd. enable the apostle to influence a wide district. This no doubt formed its attraction for him. The site, on a peninsula W. of the bay of Actium, was low and unhealthy. It was destroyed by the Goths and restored by Justinian. It gave place, however, gradually to its more favourably situated rival, Prevesa, further south. The site is marked by extensive ruins.

NIGER (Ac. 13.[1]), the Gentile surname of Simeon (RV. Symeon), a prominent believer in Antioch at the time when BARNABAS and PAUL were sent on their first missionary journey. His first name proclaims that he was a Jew, and his second, as it is Latin, that he had a connection with Rome: probably he had been a slave and was now a freedman. Nothing is known with certainty about him: even tradition is silent.

NIGHT HAWK (Heb. taḥmâṣ), an unclean bird (Lv. 11.[16]; Dt. 14.[15]); it is not possible to identify it with any certainty. The VV. are very little assistance; Tg. O. has tzītzā', wh. Levy says means either "an owl or an ostrich," the Psh. shale' nuna', wh. Brockelmann renders "heron," and Castelli "gull or ibis," and the LXX hierax, "a hawk." Bochart identified it with the male ostrich, while Niebuhr found that the Jews of Mosul call the "swallow" taḥmāṣ.

NILE, THE RIVER, is one of the most interesting of the world's great waterways. It is the creator of the land of Egypt, and its fertile banks have been the scene of busy life from the dawn of human history.

The name by which it is known to us is a modification of the Greek Νεῖλος, the origin of which is obscure. This name does not appear in the English Bible, but the river itself is very often referred to. The most common Heb. name is just the Egyptian word for river, ye'ōr, which first occurs in the account of Pharaoh's dream regarding the fat and the lean kine (Gn. 41.[1], &c.). Out of its waters Moses was drawn (Ex. 2.[5ff.]); and it figures frequently in connection with the plagues. We must distinguish it from Naḥal Mitzraim (see EGYPT, RIVER OF), which is probably Wādy el-'Arīsh.

The fertile valley of the Nile is bordered on either side by desert hills and wastes of burning sand. It is like a long ribbon of green stretched across the brown wilderness. The rich soil is alluvium deposited through millenniums by the inundations of the Nile. This annual overflow, having created the land, has maintained it against encroachment by the desert. If for any reason it should cease, Egypt wd. speedily be buried beneath the drifting sand. Failure for a single year wd. produce disaster. To this cause must have been due the seven years of famine in the days of Joseph. Although no authentic record of that particular calamity has been preserved, both history and tradition furnish parallels which enable us to appreciate its character. The rise of the Nile has therefore been a matter of careful observation from the earliest times. A fair average rise was the desire of all. If the waters were too high they endangered both property and life, and were regarded as only a less misfortune than an abnormally low rise. The seed was sown as the waters subsided. The river begins to rise about the middle of June, and the subsidence begins about the middle of October.

Fish abound in the river, and there also the hippopotamus and crocodile are found. From ancient times the Egyptians were skilful fishermen, and the harvest of the waters formed an important part of their diet. Some of the Heb. terms for fishing-tackle were borrowed from Egypt (see FISHING). The Nile is the one source of water supply for the country. It has also from old time been the great highway of traffic between various points of the country, and the avenue of communication with the outside world. The seven mouths of the river spread out fan-like, forming a figure not unlike the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet. The part thus marked out was therefore called the Delta. By the most westerly of these mouths the vessels trading with Greece and the islands entered; and those of the Phœnicians by the most easterly. Of these arms of the river only two remain, the others having been silted up in the course of centuries: that to the W. is known as the Rosetta, and that towards the centre as the Damietta branch.

The main permanent supply of water comes from the great Central African lakes, by means of the White Nile. The streams of the Blue Nile and the Atbara shrink to small proportions during the rest of the year, but in summer and autumn they are swollen by the torrential rains which annually descend upon the Abyssinian highlands. To this is mainly due the inundation which has meant so much for Egypt.

In ancient times one crop was taken off all the land covered by the inundation, and in districts of a lower level a second crop was secured by irrigation. The shadūf, and at a later time the wheel, were used to raise the water, which was led whither the peasant would, by means of channels hollowed in the surface of the fields. This old method may still be seen at work in many parts of the East. Great developments have taken place in Egypt within the last few decades in the way of water storage. Enormous dams have been constructed which retain the overplus of the inundation, and reserve it for use in irrigation during the long dry months. The productivity of the land is thus incalculably increased.

The sources of the Nile were for ages wrapped in obscurity. The ancient Egyptians knew nothing of its course beyond the cataracts, whence it seemed to burst upon the land in the full maturity of its beneficent powers. From one mighty spring at the first cataract poured the river that made Egypt; from another, they thought, rose a stream that flowed southward. All life-giving and refreshing agencies were associated by them with the river. The rains that fertilised other lands—for no rain fell in Egypt—came from a Nile in the sky: another Nile underground fed the springs. "That the Nile should have been worshipped throughout the land of Egypt is natural. The very land itself was his gift; the crops that grewupon it and the population it supported all depended upon his bounty. When the Nile failed the people starved; when the Nile was full Egypt was a land of contentment and plenty. It is only wonderful that the cult of the Nile should not have been more prominent than it was. The temples built in its honour were neither numerous nor important, nor were its priests endowed as the priests of other gods. But the cause of this is explained by history. The neolithic population of the country lived in the desert; the Nile was for them little more than the creator of pestilential swamps and dangerous jungles, where wild beasts and venomous serpents lurked for the intruder. The Pharonic Egyptians brought their own gods with them, and these naturally became the divinities of the nomes. When the river had been embanked and its waters been made a blessing instead of a curse, the sacred animals and the gods of the nomes were too firmly established to be displaced" (Sayce, The Religions of Anct. Egp. and Bab., p. 141). While this is true in general, there was no lack of gratitude and devotion of individuals, and in the hymns that are preserved to us these are expressed in a way that leaves nothing to be desired (Sayce, op. cit., pp. 141f.; Breasted, A History of Egp., pp. 374f.). The deities representing the Nile and its canals are portrayed as stout, with large female breasts, crowned with flowers, and wearing only the narrow girdle of prehistoric Egypt.

The Nile boats with their lateen sails form a picturesque feature. They still play a large part in the transit of goods. In the winter season the Nile is now transformed into a veritable "river of pleasure," the glorious climate of Egypt attracting visitors from all parts of the world.

NIMRAH. See Beth Nimrah.

NIMRIM, WATERS OF, named with Zoar and Horonaim, a stream in the S. of Moab (Is. 15.[6]; Jr. 48.[34]): prob. = Wādy N'meirah, wh. enters the Dead Sea fm. the E., about three miles fm. the S. end.

NIMROD (Gn. 10.[8-10]), the son of Cush. Of him we are told that "he began to be a gibbōr (a warrior hero) in the earth"; further, we are told that "he was a gibbōr tzayid" (a heroic hunter); yet again we are informed that "the beginning of his kingdom was Babel and Erech and Accad and Calneh in the land of Shinar." When we look at the passage we see that N. is not named along with the other sons of Cush. While the first-named "sons" are clearly peoples, in N. we have to do with a person; it wd. seem, the first who founded a kingdom. All the cities, with the exception of Calneh, have been identified, and even in regard to it a plausible suggestion has been made. Several ideas have been mooted as to the person meant. Etymology most probably affords no guidance, as the Jews were so prone to mutilate foreign names, and the connection of "Nimrod" with marad, "to rebel," renders one at once suspicious. The sovereign that seems most nearly to suit the requirements is Sargon of Agade (Accad). He appears to have united all Babylonia under him. He resembled Moses in being set afloat in the river by his mother; he confesses that he did not know his father. It may be of interest to know that if we take the Gematria of minimum values then Sargon and Nimrod have the same numerical value. The other identifications are Gilgamesh,

Boats in Nile

the hero of the Babylonian Epos, and the god Marduk. Nimrod has impressed the imagination of the East very greatly. The legends of his contests with Abraham are many of them very beautiful, though others are grotesque. They may be found in a popular form in Baring-Gould's Legends of OT. Characters.

NIMSHI, father of Jehoshaphat the father of Jehu king of Israel (2 K. 9.[2]). He was thus the grandfather of the king, who is elsewhere described as his son (1 K. 19.[16], &c.).

NINEVEH (נִינְוֵה, Νινευί), the later capital of Assyria, on the east bank of the Tigris, opposite Mosul, and 18 miles north of Nimrûd (Calah) at the junction of the Tigris and Upper Zab. It was called Ninâ and Ninua in Assyrian, and the name was popularly derived from nunu, "fish"; like Ninâ in Babylonia, however (of wh. it may have been a colony), it really took its name from Nina, a title of Istar, around whose sanctuary the city had grown up. It is now represented by the mounds of Kouyunjik on the north and Nebi Yunûs on the south, the sites of the palaces of Sennacherib, Esar-haddon, and Assur-bani-pal, between wh. ran the Khusur (now Ḥoser). The city was in the shape of a rectangle containing about 800 acres, the west side of wh. was washed by the Tigris, while the southern end was only 873 yds. in length. The northern wall (2150 yds. long) was defended by a moat, the eastern partly by the Khusur, partly by two artificial ditches, 150 and 108 ft. wide and 20 ft. deep, beyond wh. was a double line of ramparts some 5400 yds. in length. These seem to have consisted of earth and rubble; the inner wall, however, was of stone and brick, surmounted with gradines and intersected by numerous towers and gates. According to Diodorus Siculus the walls were 100 ft. high, three chariots being able to drive upon them abreast. In the time of the Later Assyrian Empire Nineveh was further defended by being enclosed in the fortified triangle between the Tigris and the Upper Zab, wh. extended from Calah (Nimrûd) to Dur Sargina (now Khorsabad), built by Sargon (B.C. 707) to the north The circumference of this triangle is as much as 90 miles; see Jh. 3.[3], where "Nineveh" means the whole fortified complex of the capital and its suburbs.

NIN, THE FISH-GOD

Nineveh was more conveniently situated on the high road of trade to Asia Minor and Syria than Assur (Qala'at Sherghat), the old capital of the country. The earlier Assyrian kings, accordingly, built palaces there, and Shalmaneser I. (B.C. 1300), the builder of Calah, may have made it a royal residence. But it did not finally supplant Assur till the reign of Assur-bil-kala (c. B.C. 1080). In B.C. 823 it followed the fortunes of the rebel king Assur-danipal (Sardanapallos), and underwent a siege; Sennacherib made it the capital of his empire, and as such it remained until in B.C. 606 it was taken and destroyed by the Manda or Scyths, and with it Assyria itself came to an end (see Na. 2., 3.; Zp. 2.[13-15]).

NISAN (Asyr. Nisannu), the first month of the Hebrew year (Ne. 2.[1]); it was originally called ABIB, but it was changed after the Babylonian Captivity to the name the month had at Babylon. It was the harvest month (see YEAR). The word is supposed to mean the "month of flowers"; a name wh. in Pal. wd. be thoroughly appropriate.

NISROCH, an Assyrian deity in whose temple SENNACHERIB was worshipping when he was murdered by his sons (2 K. 19.[37]; Is. 37.[38]). It is a matter of doubt what deity is meant by N., for no such name is found in the Asyr. pantheon. Ges. suggested a derivation fm. nesher, "an eagle"; following this, Layard named several eagle-headed figures "statues of N." The Jewish tendency to mutilate the names of heathen deities renders it very probable that this has taken place here. As Asshur was the principal god of Nineveh, the idea of Schrader that Nisroch = Asshur is plausible; it becomes still more so if one adds Dr. Pinches' suggestion that Nisroch represents "Asshur-Aku," in wh. the name of the national Asyr. god is compounded with "Aku," the Accadian name of the Moon-god, called in Asyr. "Sin"; the god whose name occurs in that of Sennacherib.

NITRE (Heb. nether), not our "nitre," wh. is otherwise called "saltpetre," but "natron," i.e. native carbonate of soda, found in certain lakes in Egypt and elsewhere; it effervesces with vinegar (Pr. 25.[20]); it was used for the manufacture of soap (Jr. 2.[22]). Gesenius wd. regard it as potash.

NO (Jr. 46.[25]; Ek. 30.[14, 15, 16]; Na. 3.[8]), NO-AMON (RV. Na. 3.[8]), a city in Egypt known to the Greeks as Thebes, and surviving to modern times in the ruins at Karnak and Luxor, ruins wh., at the end of thirty centuries, despoiled and dilapidated by the ravages of countless armies, fm. the hosts of Ashurbanipal to the army of Napoleon Bonaparte, still awe the tourist into admiration. Already in the Iliad, Thebes of the hundred gates is the symbol of populousness and wealth. It appears in hieroglyphic as n · ṭ: the vowel is supposed to have been e or a, hence the Heb. No and the Asyr. Ni': the ṭ seems to have disappeared in speech. The word neṭ really meant "city"; the complete name was Neṭ-Amen, "the city of Amen." The vowel in the Heb. is probably a blunder of possibly a late date. This identification is confirmed by the LXX rendering of No in the passages in Ek. as Diospolis, the known Ptolemaic Greek equivalent of the older Thebes, or Neṭ-Amen. The rendering of LXX in Na. 3.[8] is meris Ammōn, "the portion of Amen." This passage is of special interest as describing at once the splendour of the city and the terrors of its sack by Ashurbanipal. The prophet, denouncing Nineveh, demands of her, "Art thou better than No-Amon," on wh. such a terrible destruction fell? By implication it was supposed to be even more splendid than the Assyrian capital. Founded in remote antiquity, No became prominent when fm. it sprang the 11th dynasty; it was less prominent again till the time of the 18th dynasty, and thereafter to the 20th. During this period most of the buildings were erected that are the glory of Thebes. It died slowly; Diodorus Siculus, under the later Ptolemies, estimates its circumference to be 140 stadia, about 17 miles (Diod. Sic. i. 45): he was impressed with its marvellously adorned temples. About half a century later Strabo estimated its circuit at 10 miles. It was the principal centre of the worship of Amen, regarded as the equivalent of the Greek Zeus; hence its name Neṭ-Amen, of wh. the later Greek "Diospolis" was a translation. The more ancient Greek "Thebes" seems to have been an adaptation of Tape, "the head," "the capital."

NOADIAH. (1) One of the Levites to whom was entrusted the inventory of the sacred vessels of silver and gold brought back from Babylon (Ez. 8.[33]). He is called "Moeth" in 1 Es. 8.[63]. (2) A prophetess associated with Sanballat and Tobiah in their opposition to Nehemiah (Ne. 6.[14]).

NOAH, in the Gospels (AV.) NOE, the son of Lamech the Sethite (Gn. 5.[28-32], 9.[29]), father of Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Altho' the MT., the Sam., and the LXX differ in the ages of the preceding patriarchs they agree in declaring N. to have been 500 years old at the birth of his three sons. In the midst of the abounding wickedness of the world God Himself testifies of N.: "Thee have I seen righteous before Me in this generation" (Gn. 7.[1]). In 2 P. 2.[5] he is called "a preacher of righteousness." God reveals to him that He is about to destroy the world with a flood, commands him to build an Ark, and to collect into it a pair of every species of animal in the world in order that the seed of life may be preserved.

In the 7th chap. it is said, "Of every clean beast thou shalt take seven seven, a male and his female (lit. 'a man and his wife'), and of the beast wh. is not clean pairs, a male and his female (lit. 'a man and his wife'): even fm. the fowls of heaven the clean seven seven male and female, and every bird wh. is not clean pairs, male and female." According to the Critical hypothesis this is due to a difference of source; while fm. Gn. 6.[9] to 6.[22] the narrative is fm. P., the source of the account of the emphasis given to the distinction between clean and unclean is J. The old interpretation was that greater precision was given to the directions when they were on the point of being carried into action.

N. obeyed the commands of God, and in the 600th year of the life of Noah, "in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the selfsame day entered Noah into the Ark," a notice that has all the appearance of being a statement of an exact date; the same may be said of the time of his leaving the Ark, "the second month and seven and twentieth day of the month." When he left the Ark "N. builded an altar unto the Lord, and took of every clean beast and of every clean fowl and offered burnt-offerings on the altar"; and it is added, "The Lord smelled a sweet savour; and the Lord said in His heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake." The reason assigned is that "the imagination of man's heart is evil fm. his youth." This passage is also ascribed to J. In the blessing of N. wh. follows animals as well as vegetables are given to man for food; the punishment of death is decreed on the murderer; and the rainbow is appointed as a token of the covenant of God not to destroy the earth again with a flood. The rainbow is seen when the sun has broken through the clouds. Noah began to cultivate the vine, as if this fruit had not been cultivated before, nor wine made. Then follows the mysterious curse of Canaan for the dishonour done to his father by Ham the father of Canaan. This transaction looks like a preparation for the devotion to destruction of the inhabitants of Canaan. At the age of 950 Noah died.

As already considered under FLOOD, there is an account of the Noachian Deluge in the Babylonian Epos of Gilgames, in wh. he is called Nuh-Napishtim or Hasisadra, the latter being the original of the Xisuthrus of Berosus. As we saw there, the Heb. narrative is the more primitive.

The Book of Noah.—In our book of ENOCH there are portions in wh. N., not Enoch, is the spokesman, wh. are regarded as fragments of a book of Noah. In En. 106. we have an account of the birth of Noah narrated by Methuselah to his father Enoch in defiance of scriptural chronology: "His body was white as snow, and red as a blooming rose, and the hair of his head and his long locks were white as wool, and his eyes were beautiful. And when he opened his eyes he lighted the house like the sun, and the whole house was full of light." We venture to differ fm. Dr. Charles in his opinion that we have the whole of the book of Noah; in our opinion it was considerably larger, and that it is to be dated between the nucleus of Enoch and the section 1–41. For legends about Noah see Baring-Gould, Legends of Old Testament Characters.

NO-AMON. See No.

NOB, a station of the priests visited by David in his flight fm. Saul, with disastrous consequences for the priests who befriended him (1 S. 21.[1], 22.[9], &c.); occupied by Benjamites after the Exile (Ne. 11.[32]); apparently close to Jrs., and between the city and Anathoth (Is. 10.[30ff.]). No trace of the ancient name is found. Stanley (S. & P. 187) suggests the N. summit of the Mt. of Olives. Others favour the height N. of Jrs., popularly called Scopus, the traditional site of the camp of Titus at the siege of Jerusalem. From this point one approaching from the north obtains the first view of the city. It wd. thus suit admirably the description of Is. 10.[32], where the Assyrian halts at Nob and shakes his hand at the mount of the daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerusalem. We should infer that here it had just come into view. For an argument in favour of Gibeon see BE. s.v.

NOBAH. (1) A Manassite ancestor of the clan wh. conquered KENATH and called it by his name (Nu. 32.[42]). (2) A city, apparently in Gilead, mentioned with Jogbehah as on the line followed by Gideon in his pursuit of the Midianite kings, Zebah and Zalmunnah (Jg. 8.[11]). Poss. we shd. read with the Syr. "N. wh. is on the desert," instead of "Nophah wh. reacheth unto Medebah" (Nu. 21.[30]). It may have been the original settlement of the clan called by this name. The site has not been recovered, but is probably to be sought somewhere to the N.E. of 'Ammān.

NOBAI, one who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ne. 10.[19]).

NOBLEMAN. (1) Basilikos (Jn. 4.[46, 49]), "kingly," a term loosely applied, now to persons of royal blood, and again to those intimately connected with them. Here "courtier" (AVm.) or "king's officer" (RVm.) wd. be more accurate. He was evidently a Jew in the service of Antipas. (2) Eugenēs anthrōpos (Lk. 19.[12]), "well-born man." Some think this N. is Archelaus, son of Herod the Gt.

NOD, "flight" or "exile," the land of the "wandering" of Cain. There is nothing to indicate any particular locality. The phrase "to the east of Eden" (Gn. 4.[16]) furnishes no guidance.

NODAB, a tribe with whom Reuben made war, mentioned along with the Hagarites, Jetur and Nephish (1 Ch. 5.[19]). From the nature of the spoil taken we gather that they were pastoral tribes, their wealth consisting of cattle; camels, sheep, and asses. No trace of the name is now to be found, if it be not in that of the mod. village Nudeibeh, to the SE. of Boṣra in the Ḥaurān.

NOE, the patriarch Noah (Mw. 24.[37], &c.).

NOGAH, one of the sons born to David in Jerusalem (1 Ch. 3.[7]). The name does not appear in the parallel list of 2 S. 5. A similar name, wh. may refer to the same person, is given in the genealogy of Lk. 3.[25], "Noggai."

NOHAH, Benjamin's fourth son (1 Ch. 8.[2]).

NORTH, NORTH COUNTRY, are vague terms, indicating generally the direction whence the people of Palestine had most to fear in the matter of invasion. In point of fact, while from the south Egypt at times struck hard, and "the children of the East" occasionally inflicted serious damage, the really paralysing blows all fell upon Palestine from the north. Syria, Assyria, Babylon, Greece, Rome, each in turn appeared upon the northern horizon, and the war-clouds broke southward in disaster. The absence of good seaports was a protection on the west, and the deserts made impracticable approach from the east, so that even Babylon, wh. is almost in the same latitude as Samaria, had to send her armies by a detour, to enter the country from the north.

NOSE, NOSTRILS. A man with a flat or "slit" N. might not make offerings (Lv. 21.[18]). N. is used figuratively for anger (Gn. 27.[45], &c.), prob.

fm. the distension of nostrils and swift breathing caused by anger.

The nose or nostril is the organ of the breath of life (Gn. 2.7, &c.). This, so easily interrupted, becomes the symbol of life's transiency (Is. 2.22). The putting of a hook in the nose (2 K. 19.28, &c.) doubtless refers to the control thus gained over recalcitrant animals. Pr. 30.33 refers to the ease with which blood is drawn from the nose. The prominence of the feature led to the nose being adorned with nose-rings as jewels (Is. 3.21), a form of finery still much affected in the East. The putting of a branch to the nose (Ek. 8.17) was evidently a part of some idolatrous rite; but the meaning of this is lost.

NOVICE, Gr. neophytos, lit. "newly planted," i.e. one recently baptized, whom lack of experience and proof disqualifies for the office of "bishop" (1 Tm. 3.6). Later the word came to signify technically one who had not yet taken upon him the religious vows.

NUMBER. Although no examples have come down to us in the few and short inscriptions that have survived fm. ancient Israelitish times, it is so highly probable as to amount almost to a certainty that among the Hebrews there was a system of numerical notation. It wd. seem as if the indication of number wd. precede the recording of thoughts. In Egypt and Phœnicia, the immediate neighbours of Palestine, there were such systems; in Babylonia and Assyria, whose influence over Palestine in the very dawn of history was so great, there was also a similar system. The simplest system was one wh. founded itself, as did the original measures of length, on the members of the body. The five fingers on the hand gave the V. of the Roman notation, and two of these joined at their apexes gave X; the Egyptians sometimes united the five in a star; as, however, three was the number of separate strokes that the eye can most easily grasp, six was represented by two groups of three lines either one above the other or succeeding each other; seven was three above, four below, and so on; when ten was reached it was represented by an arch. The Phœnician was very much the same. It may be noted that these systems were both decimal: the Babylonian was sexagesimal. Among the rabbis there was a system of notation much used, the age of wh. it is impossible to fix with absolute accuracy; only it must have been old, dating possibly from the age before the Exile. This used the letters as numerals; fm. א to ט for the units, fm. י to צ for the tens, and fm. ק to the end of the alphabet with the help of the finals for the hundreds. This system may sometimes be of use in explaining mistakes. The Babylonian system, as mentioned above, was sexagesimal; its first group was formed by multiplying together three, four, and five; we have the result of this in our minutes and seconds, and in the days of the year, wh. are sixty multiplied by six and five added; it was, however, too cumbrous for ordinary use.

Besides the use of numbers in the exact sense, we have the loose use—approximating vaguely without attempting exactitude. Thus we have "two" for a few; the widow of Zarephath, when Elijah asks her for bread, tells him she is "gathering two sticks" that she may cook the meal for herself and her son (1 K. 17.12). So also "five" is used in this way: in Lv. 26.8 the Israelites are told that "five of them should chase a hundred." A moderately large number is indicated by "ten"; as when Jacob reproaches Laban with the frequent changes he made in his wages, he declares that he changed them "ten times" (Gn. 31.7). After Israel in the wilderness, discouraged by the report of the spies, refused to enter Canaan, God declares, "Those men have tempted Me now these ten times" (Nu. 14.22). "Forty" is used when a very considerable number is intended; when Hazael brought to Elisha "forty camels' burden . . . of every good thing of Damascus," we are not to understand that exactly that number, neither more nor less, came as a present fm. king Benhadad. This is more obvious in regard to a space of time: "forty years" means really a long space of time, a generation; thus three times are we told in the book of Judges that "the land had rest forty years" (3.11, 5.31, 8.28). That Saul, David, and Solomon shd. all reign each "forty years" (cp. Ac. 13.21; 2 S. 5.4; 1 K. 11.42) is improbable. It must simply be taken as an indefinitely large number. A very large number is indicated by a "hundred," as in Ec. 6.3: when the hypothetical case is presented, "if a man beget an hundred children," we understand what is meant. So "a thousand" (Dt. 32.30), "ten thousand" (Lv. 26.8), "forty thousand" (Jg. 5.8). There is, besides, the ordinary indefinite use of numbers, as "two or three," "four or five" (Is. 17.[6]), for a few.

We must also take account of what are called sacred numbers. The idea that numbers had a potence of themselves meets the investigator into the progress of human thought everywhere. Pythagoras founded his whole philosophy of the universe on number; Plato is full of discussions of "odds" and "evens"; Lenormant says, "Speculations upon the value of numbers hold a very important place in the religious philosophy of the Chaldæans." All the gods were designated by whole numbers, and the various kinds of inferior spirits by fractions. In these circumstances it is to be expected that among the Hebrews there shd. be traces of something similar. The smallest of these numbers is "three." We see this special significance of three in Elijah stretching himself three times on the dead boy (1 K. 17.[21]). Simon Peter's sheet was three times let down (Ac. 10.[16]). It is supposed by some that the peculiar place "three" has in thought is due to the fact that heaven, earth, and sea emphasise a threefold division; but to the Babylonians the sea, however important in mythology, was not phenomenally prominent—the vast plain was much more perceptible. It is really fundamental to the human mind; as two is the natural symbol of division, three is the natural symbol of stability. It is not far-fetched to connect this with the Christian doctrine of the Holy Trinity, since man is made in the image of God. "Four" is the next; its peculiar significance is seen in the four rivers of Paradise (Gn. 2.[10]); in the four pre-Messianic empires in Daniel (2.[31f.], 7.[3-7]); the four horns in Zechariah (1.[18]), and elsewhere. This is supposed to be connected with the four points of the compass; rather the four directions relatively to the human body, before, behind, to the right, and to the left. The most obviously sacred of numbers is "seven." This is illustrated by the Divine rest at the close of the work of creation (Gn. 2.[2, 3]). Noah is ordered to take "seven clean animals" into the Ark with him (Gn. 7.[2]), and in many other cases. This is supposed to represent the addition of the two former numbers; rather, we think, man wd. regard himself as centre, and add to that the six directions from that: above, below, behind, before, right, and left. To the Babylonians this wd. be emphasised by the seven planets wh. they as astronomers had observed. The number "twelve" is marked among the Israelites, as it is the number of their tribes, and the twelve apostles of the Lord. It was the number of the months among the Babylonians: twelve times the phases of moon recurred in the year, so they may have observed this, and consequently made twelve a sacred number. The fact that it is the multiple of three and four, the component parts of seven, mt. help that decision. In Apocalyptic literature there is a symbolical use of number wh. is akin to this. We find this in Daniel and in Revelation. In Daniel "one" is the symbol of Babylon, and "two" the symbol of the Medo-Persian Empire; from the "three" ribs in the mouth of the Persian bear one mt. think that "three" mt. possibly be the symbol of Lydia. "Four" is the symbol of the Græco-Macedonian Empire, and "ten" is the symbol of the Roman Empire. This is made clear by the Apocalypse, in wh. we have further "seven" as the symbol of the city Rome. It has been observed by Gesenius that the number five has some special affinity in Heb. thought for Egypt; as "Five cities in the land of Egypt shall speak the language of Canaan" (Is. 19.[18]). This was carried much further by the Kabalists.

From the fact that numbers were indicated by letters a number was sometimes put for a name, the sum of whose letters amounted to that number. In the book of Revelation the number 666 at once occurs to one. Another scriptural instance, though naturally less recognised, is "Eliezer," the sum of the letters of whose name is 318, the number of Abraham's servants when he went to encounter Chedorlaomer. This estimation of names and representing them by numbers is called by the Rabbins "Gematria," a word that seems to be derived fm. the Greek geometreia. In the Talmud it becomes an elaborate system with modes and rules; certain letters mt. be inserted or omitted, mainly those called matres lectionis. Sometimes the letters were taken in their ordinary value; again they mt. be reckoned according to minimum values, in wh., instead of א being one and י ten and ק a hundred, these three letters were all equally reckoned one, so ב, כ, and ר were each regarded as two, and not two, twenty, and two hundred respectively. Again, one or both the words or phrases mt. be modified by Athbash, in wh. the first letter of the alphabet is put for the last and the second for the second last, and so on; or by Albam, in wh. the first letter is put for the twelfth and the second for the thirteenth, and vice versâ. These methods are used sometimes for the interpretation of Scripture with ludicrous results. They served a useful purpose as mnemonics, as may be seen in the Massoretic notes at the end of each book in the Hebrew Bible; thus at the end of the book of Joshua we are not only told that the number of verses in it are 656, but also are given VTRN, the first word of the verse in Heb. (Is. 35.[6]), "and the tongue of the dumb shall sing," in order to remember it by, as the sum of these letters in Heb. is 656. In some instances what seem to be interpretations are really statements of mnemonics that may be useful to the student.

The Greeks had a system of numeration in

wh. the first four units were represented by lines and "five" by Π, the letter with wh. penta, the Greek word for "five," begins, and "ten" by Δ, the letter with wh. deka, "ten," begins; so with H for hekaton, "a hundred," and M for murias, 10,000. The system of numeration more commonly used, however, was to give a numerical value to the letters of the alphabet, adding a character for six in the place of the ancient digamma, wh. in the original Greek alphabet had occupied the place of the Heb. waw. Another character was used for 90 and yet another for 900. For higher numbers the alphabet as augmented was used with a dash below each character. To these letters also Gematria was applied, as the Heb. letters were among the Jews. A classic example of the practice to wh. we refer may be seen in the Sibylline Oracles, i. 328–331, in wh. the name of our Lord is said to be represented by "eight units, as many tens added to these, also eight hundreds." This is the summation of the numerical values of the Greek letters that make the name Jesus. This we think has an important bearing on the vexed question of the "number of the Beast," 666. The writer of this portion of the Sibylline Oracles may be held as representing the mind and methods of the Apocalyptic Jewish authors who had embraced Christianity and wrote in Greek. It wd. seem to us that we ought to argue back fm. the Sibylline author to the greatest of the Apocalyptists, and presume that later Greek-writing Apocalyptists followed the example he left them: so the solution, whatever it be, of that enigma is not to be sought in Hebrew but in Greek; hence it follows that Nero is not the person meant. Although it is impossible to deny that there is a vast amount of trifling in these theories of numbers and the use made of them by the Jews, yet it is advantageous to know them, as occasionally we may find the interpretation of riddles otherwise insoluble.

NUMBERS, the fourth book of the law, called in Heb. bĕmidbar, "in the wilderness (of Sinai)," fm. the word that follows the formula, "And the Lord spake unto Moses"; the Greek name Arithmoi, of wh. the English title is a translation, is derived fm. the fact that it contains two enumerations of the people. It is to some extent a resumption of the history of the journey of Israel through the desert after the interruption caused by the intrusion of the ceremonial regulations wh. occupy the book of Leviticus. There is a great lacuna in the regular history between the end of the 14th chap. and the beginning of the 20th, bridged over by the rebellion of Korah among the Levites and that of Dathan and Abiram among the Reubenites; and further by the dry enumeration of the successive encampments of the people wh. is to be found in chap. 33. There are, besides the history, various enactments of a ceremonial kind. Though the book begins with "and," it has many features wh. wd. suggest that it had been composed as a separate work, though in continuation of those wh. precede it.

Contents.—The book may be divided into three portions: there is first the account of events mainly in the second year after the Exodus; the thirty-eight years' wandering, in the course of wh. occur the rebellions above mentioned of the Levites under Korah against Aaron, and of the Reubenites against Moses (see Moses), and certain ceremonial enactments; the last portion contains the history of the last year of the wanderings and the stay in the plains of Moab. The first section extends fm. the beginning of the book to the end of chap. 14. The 1st chap. gives an account of the order for the first census and preparations for it, the numbers of each separate tribe, the reason for the exclusion of the Levites fm. the census, and the position they were to occupy in the camp. The arrangements regarding the position each tribe shd. occupy in the camp round the Tabernacle are given in chap. 2. They were divided into four divisions, arranged under four leading tribes: (1) Judah with Issachar and Zebulun; (2) the tribe of Reuben, with those of Simeon and Gad; (3) the tribe of Ephraim, with the kindred tribes of Manasseh and Benjamin; (4) the tribe of Dan, along with Asher and Naphtali. These were to take up their position as follows: Judah to the E., Reuben to the S., Ephraim to the W., and Dan to the N. In the Tg. PJ. we are told that the flag of each camp had a special blazon; that of Judah was a young lion; that of Reuben was originally an ox, but was changed into a stag by Moses, "lest the sin of the calf mt. be remembered against them"; that of Ephraim a young man; and that of Dan a venomous serpent. In chaps. 3. and 4. are narrated the encamping, the numbers, and the duties of the various Levitical families. The family of Gershon was to encamp on the W. of the Tabernacle, that of Kohath on the S., while that of Merari encamped on the N.; the Aaronites being encamped at the door of the Tabernacle to the E. In the two chapters that follow we have the law of the ordeal fm. jealousy, and the regulations concerning the Nazirite, ending with the priestly benediction. The long 7th chap., with that wh. follows, describes the consecration of the Tabernacle by the offerings of the princes of the different tribes, and the consecration of the Levites by Aaron. The 9th chap. begins with the account of the celebration of the second Passover and regulations to meet special circumstances; then follow regulations as to the march wh. are continued into the 10th; in regard to this there is the manufacture of the silver trumpets with wh. the signal was sounded for the movement of the successive "camps" or brigades, when by the lifting of the cloud over the Tabernacle the token of the breaking up of the camp was given. At the end there is given the proclamation of Moses when the march began and that wh. he made when it concluded. The next two chapters give the account of two murmurings, one public by the people against Moses on account of the manna. God listened to their murmuring and gave them their desire, but in wrath. They desired flesh—a flock of quails are sent: these, flying only some two cubits above the ground, are easily knocked down; the people split them up and spread them in the sun to dry—they are satiated with flesh. The other murmuring is domestic, by Aaron and Miriam against him because of his wife, presumably Zipporah; the term of "Cushite" * was probably a reproachful designation, wh. a swarthy complexion may have explained. But murmurings had their punishments: numbers were slain by the pestilence wh. it wd. seem the eating of the quails' flesh induced; and Miriam was struck with leprosy. The tribes had now reached the southern boundary of the land to wh. they had been journeying, and spies are sent into it to see the nature of the country and of what sort the inhabitants were. One fm. each tribe is chosen; they are away forty days on this errand. On their return, while they praise the fertility of the soil, they declare that the fortified towns and the stalwart inhabitants preclude them fm. attempting the conquest. So say all the spies save two—Joshua, who had commanded at Rephidim, and Caleb the Kenizzite, the representative of Judah. The people are discouraged, and again murmur against Moses and Aaron. The wrath of God is kindled against them, and He threatens to destroy them, and offers to make of Moses a nation mightier than they. Alluring as is the prospect to one with the Eastern's respect for a multitude of descendants, Moses pleads for Israel; at his entreaty they are forgiven, but forty years of wanderings is their punishment. Now presumption follows the cowardice the people had displayed; in disregard of the warning of Moses they advanced up the mountain in front of the camp, but they were driven back ignominiously by the Canaanites and Amalekites. The second section embraces chaps. 15.–19. There are first in chap. 15.[1-31] enactments as to offerings to be made when, after their forty years are over, they enter the Promised Land; enactments as to atonements for unconscious guilt, and the punishment of presumptuous wickedness. Then follow two incidents. The first is short; the punishment of one who profaned the Sabbath. The second is an account of the twofold rebellion, of Korah, and of Dathan and Abiram, against Moses. This event, or rather these conjoined events, are more fully considered under KORAH, DATHAN, and ABIRAM. The precise point in the wanderings when these two rebellions occurred is not indicated, but the space given to them is a proof of their importance; the authority of Moses and the priesthood of Aaron received a Divine sanction through these rebellions wh. otherwise they wd. not have had. To Aaron, whose priesthood is thus confirmed, and to his seed, is given the ordinance of first-fruits, &c.; they are to live of the altar. To the Levites, now definitely under their authority, is given the tithe. This was an ordinance that looked forward to the occupation of Palestine, when there wd. be threshing-floor and winepress; it cd. have no meaning in the wilderness. From the fact that Eleazar is presumed to act as priest, the ordinance of the RED HEIFER may be taken to be late in the intermediate space; yet the necessity for purification fm. contact with the dead must have often arisen before. The last section contains an account of events wh. occurred during the last year of the wanderings. The people arrive in the wilderness of ZIN, once more back again whence they had set out on their generation-long wanderings; there Miriam dies. Untaught by previous judgments of God, the people murmur against Moses and Aaron because of the drought and the thirst. Whether it was that Moses sinned by calling them "rebels," or whether it was because, being told to speak to the rock, he struck it twice, or that he assumed Divine power when he said, "Must we fetch you water out of this rock?" it is impossible to decide; or what the sin of Aaron in the matter that he shared his brother's punishment. Both are declared not to have believed God to sanctify Him in the eyes of the children of Israel, and both are excluded fm. Palestine, the land towards wh. their longing hopes had been directed for all the foregoing forty years. The death of Aaron followed when the people had removed "fm. Kadesh and come to Mount Hor"; Moses and Eleazar accompanied Aaron up the slope of Mount Hor, and there he died and there he was buried. Before he died his priestly robes were stripped off him, and his son was clothed in them as his successor. As the Israelites passed eastward they took vengeance on Arad the Canaanite, who had assailed them causelessly. Now again, after forty years of knowledge of Moses, did Israel murmur against him and against God; and God sent fiery serpents among them, "and they bit the people, and much people of Israel died." When Moses prayed for them God commanded him to make a brazen serpent to wh. the sufferers were to look—they looked and were cured. The march of the people brought them to the east of Moab; in the wilderness there, want of water tried them, but the rulers superintended while the diggers digged the well; and Isr. sang

* This may have suggested the story told by Josephus (Ant. II. x. 2), of the Ethiopian campaign, at the close of which Moses married Tharbis, an Ethiopian (Cushite) princess.

"Spring up, O well." Now only the territory of Sihon was between them and the land promised to their fathers. He, though courteously requested, refused to allow them a passage; Isr. conquered him in battle and took his land. It wd. seem as if Isr. and Moab had a treaty, and that they were allies against Sihon (see MOAB). They turned northward, probably in this unassisted by Moab, and encountered Og, king of Bashan, defeated and slew him, and took his territory (chap. 21.). This new conquest made the Moabites feel suspicious of their ally; they sent for Balaam to come and curse Israel. He came, but was compelled by God to bless them altogether (chaps. 22.–24.). Balaam counselled that guile mt. be used; the daughters of Moab and the daughters of Midian seduced Isr. to idolatry, and a plague fell upon the people, wh. was stayed by Eleazar's prompt action (25.). At this point there is a second census of the people taken (26.). The case of the daughters of Zelophehad led to new legislation (27.[1-11]). Moses is told of his own approaching death, and is commanded to consecrate Joshua to be his successor (27.[12f.]). While what follows was transacted in the plains of Moab, all naturally took place before Moses received the command to ascend Mt. Abarim; hence the last nine chapters are of the nature of an appendix. The 28th and 29th chaps. form what may be regarded as the sacrificial calendar, i.e. the sacrifices fixed by their date. There is the morning and evening offering, afterwards called the tāmīd, "the continual," fm. the word used in the beginning of v. 6. The Sabbath sacrifice and that for New Moon follow. The two cardinal months of the Jewish calendar were the first and the seventh, the month of the Passover and that of the Great Day of Atonement; special offerings were enjoined on different days in these months, and these are defined in these chapters. In the next chap. Moses considers the special case of a woman who makes a vow; her position of tutelage until she has become a widow requires special legislation in the matter of her promises to God. The next chapters are secular. There is first vengeance on Midian for the treacherous endeavour to lead the people into idolatry; 12,000 men go forth and exterminate the branch of that nationality whose dwellings were eastward of Moab; the distribution of the spoil occupies the end of the section. The next question that arises is the disposal of the territory wh. they had conquered fm. the two kings of the Amorites. Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh request that it be assigned to them, and have their request granted on condition that their armed men accompany their brethren across the Jordan. The 33rd chap. has every appearance of being copied fm. an original document, possibly a clay tablet, in wh. Moses had recorded the various places where the camp had been placed; the fact that the names assume different forms fm. the same root when they reappear in Dt. 10. proves the antiquity of the record. A singular and interesting document is chap. 34., in wh. Moses marks off the boundaries of the inheritance of the children of Israel: it may be noted that only in the time of David did they possess the going in of Hamath and Riblah, and even then not as an inheritance but as a subject territory. Another supplemental document is the law regarding the cities of the Levites and the cities of refuge, by wh. the Semitic custom of blood feud was limited, and ultimately, so far as Isr. was concerned, suppressed. The last chapter contains final arrangements regarding the inheritance of the daughters of Zelophehad, restricting their choice of husbands to men of their father's tribe.

Critical Analysis.—On the Critical hypothesis at present dominant fm. 1.[1] to 10.[28] is assigned to P.; within this, however, there are several further attributions by different authorities; Kuenen wd. assign the whole to the writer he calls P.[3], "or still later formations"; Paterson (Polych. Bib.) assigns five vv. in the 3rd chap. and two in the 10th to the "Law of Holiness," whereas the whole of the 7th chap. except the last v., and the whole of the 9th except the first five vv., with seven vv. in the 4th and in the 8th chaps. and two vv. in the 10th, are assigned to the later strata of the Priestly Code; besides these there are overlinings that mark modifications and interpolations; Harford-Battersby (HDB.) rings the changes on P^t, P^g, and P^s, sometimes giving half a v. to one authority while the adjacent vv. go to another. The keenness of Critical acumen here is, to say the least, marvellous. We have had, in recent times, writers collaborating, and, despite memory assisting criticism, it has been impossible, with absolute accuracy, to assign to each his share in the joint result. Yet the Critics of Scripture have neither qualms nor doubts. In the next portion, fm. 10.[29] to 14.[45], i.e. to the point at wh. the lacuna begins, a larger amount is attributed to the older authorities, J. and E., either separately or conjointly, with a few verses, sometimes single words, inserted here and there fm. P. To give an idea of the process and its results we shall take chap. 11. The first three vv. are assigned by Paterson and Harford-Battersby to E.; although the characteristic of E. was the use of Elohim for God, while J. used "Jehovah," yet the only Divine name used is JHWH; then follow three vv. assigned to J., with one word, "again," derived fm. P. The two vv. describing the manna are credited to P.; then follow six vv. fm. J., including one v. supposed to be a joint product of J. and E., then two vv. to E., six vv. to J., seven to E., and five to J. Of the sixteen vv. of the 12th chap. the first fifteen vv. are assigned to E. with the exception of four Heb.

words representing "for he had married an Ethiopian woman," credited to P.; only the last v. is credited to J. In this we have followed Paterson, with whom, in the main, Harford-Battersby agrees. Canon Driver, with greater sobriety, says, "Data do not exist for separating the sources employed." The section in regard to the spies Paterson and Driver assign in almost equal proportions to JE. and P.: Harford-Battersby agrees so far, but wd. distinguish between J. and E. The 15th chap. belongs to the Priestly Code, with some intrusions of later and earlier strata. In the episode of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, all connected in the 16th chap. with Korah is assigned to P., while what is connected with the Reubenites is derived fm. JE. Chap. 17. is assigned to P.; in the Heb. it begins with $16.^{36}$ of the EV., wh. follow LXX and Vlg. The consecration of Aaron and his sons (chap. 18.) is part of the original priestly document, whereas the enactment in regard to the Red Heifer is declared to be wholly fm. the later stratum of P. After the lacuna, chaps. 20. and 21. are mostly credited to JE., the clauses telling of the moving of the camp being assigned to P., with accounts of Meribah and the death of Aaron. The conquest of Og is said by Paterson to be fm. D., the Deuteronomist, who is not introduced either by Driver or Harford-Battersby. The story of Balaam ($22.^{2}$–$25.^{5}$) is distributed in fairly equal proportions between J. and E. The episode of Cozbi is attributed to P. The second enumeration of the people is naturally assigned to P. also, as well as the decision in regard to the daughters of Zelophehad. The arrangements for the morning and evening sacrifice, and for the Sabbaths and for the New Moons, the celebration of the feasts of the first month and of the seventh, are assigned to the later stratum of the priestly document. The war of vengeance against Midian is assigned to the same source, while Harford-Battersby assigns the whole of chap. 32. to P., with the exception of the four last vv., wh. he credits to J. Driver assigns it in the main to JE., except a few vv. attributed to P. Addis (Doc. of the Hex.) assigns vv. 1–5, 16, 17, 20–27, 34–38 to JE., 39–42 to J.; vv. 6–15 he assigns to a later Deuteronomist (as to this section, Kuenen wd. assign it to the latest priestly writer): 28–33 he ascribes to D. Paterson in the main agrees with this. A consensus of Critical opinion ascribes the last four chapters to P. Harford-Battersby assigns them to the latest priestly document, to wh. Paterson ascribes only eight vv. at the beginning of chap. 35.

While it is unquestionable that the book as we have it is composite, it seems to us impossible to do more than indicate in a general way the sources fm. wh. these elements were drawn. We must remember that writing was an accomplishment very generally possessed by the inhabitants of Palestine into wh. the children of Isr. came, and as much so in the land of Egypt wh. they had left, so we may assume that the primitive elements were documents. All this splitting up of the text into such minute fractions that sometimes a single word is assigned to another source fm. the rest of the verse in wh. it occurs, while very ingenious, seems to us mere trifling, and devoid of scientific value. That Moses was personally the author of much in the book is quite possible, and in the light of persistent tradition may even be said to be probable. Certain elements of legislation presuppose a settled state of society; it is of course not impossible that this was prophetic—that Moses, foreseeing what wd. be the condition of things in the land whither they were going, legislated in regard to these conditions. Palestine, we must remember, was by no means an unknown country to the inhabitants of Egypt; Egyptian governors had long exercised authority there; Moses, it may be presumed, wd. know all about its character and climate. Another hypothesis may, however, be suggested. As new conditions arose new laws were needed; and men endowed with the Divine spirit, or some wise judge, enunciated a law that met the new circumstances, and this new decision wd. naturally be added to the body of Mosaic law. Such additions to the body of law, as they proceeded on the same principles as the original legislation, wd. not vitiate the claim of the whole still to be called the "Law of Moses." We venture to think that the record of the stations of the children of Isr. in the desert may be an original document. Sacrificial ritual was not necessarily committed to writing, yet the minutiæ were so numerous that writing must have been resorted to ere very long. It must, at all events, have been committed to writing before the time of Amos, from the acquaintance wh. he, a layman, manifests with the detail of sacrificial worship. The record of the rebellions of Korah and of the Reubenites might well have been engrossed on clay tablets at the time of the occurrences, and combined by a later editor. The source whence we have got the prophecies of Balaam mt. be himself. With the exception of the episode of the ass, he appears creditably. Fm. the language one wd. think that last incident had another source; it may have contemplated another audience. The 7th chapter, with its repetition after repetition, has an undeniable aspect of lateness. The position that seems to us the most reasonable is that, while many of the elements of the book may be of Mosaic date, the book did not assume its present form till the people had already been settled in the land of Palestine; at the same time there is no evidence that in any part it is post-exilic.

Historicity.—The presence of miracle does not afford a reason, unless one is prepared to deny the possibility of such occurrences altogether, for rejecting a narrative. Our religion is founded on miracle, the miracle of the resurrection of our Lord; in it all miracles are rendered possible. Premising this, we must also bear in mind that we have no right to multiply marvels, if some other explanation can be given wh., without destroying the credibility of the whole narrative, is tenable. In the case of the book of N. the question of historicity applies to the episodes of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, of Balaam, and of the twofold census: the manna, the quails, and the water fm. the rock, tho' not restricted to N., occur in it. In regard to the first of these, the necessity for a sanction to the authority of Moses and Aaron wh. wd. be both unmistakable and striking, is obvious if Isr. was to be fitted for the function in the economy of redemption for wh. it was destined; such a sanction was given by the earth opening her mouth, and the descent of fire fm. heaven. The speaking of the ass to Balaam mt. be purely subjective; for moral significance it did not need to have any objective reality. In regard to the MANNA the reader must consult the article on that subject. As to the quails, when it is said that the Lord "let them fall by the camp as it were a day's journey on this side and as it were a day's journey on the other side round about the camp, and as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth," it does not mean that a province of some thirty or forty miles each way was covered for about a yard in height with the dead bodies of birds. It means that their flight was only about three feet above the ground, and that throughout that great extent of country they were alighting and, wearied as they were with their flight, were easily caught and killed. The camp, too, would not be one closely compacted collection of tents or huts like a Roman camp, or surrounded, like it, by a rampart; it wd. more probably be like the encampment of an Arab tribe, made up of small groups of tents spread over an immense area. The gushing forth of the water when Moses struck the rock was a miracle, and not only was it necessary for the preservation of the nation to fulfil their function, but it involved, by the dependence on God it taught, a moral training that wd. fit them for their task.

Kuenen regards it as suspicious, in regard to the historicity of the book before us, that the legislation is crowded into two portions: "The laws are congested in the first year after the Exodus and the closing months of the fortieth year" (The Hexateuch, pp. 18, 19, Eng. tr.). This is, however, precisely what wd. be natural; the first year of their existence as a nation there wd. of necessity be a press of legislation; then, when they were about to change fm. being nomads to become agriculturists, again was there a necessity for a "congestion" of legislation. Another difficulty, and one that proved in the hands of Colenso the source of the more recent Critical attacks on the Pentateuch, is the numbers of the various tribes and of the whole nation. It is not so much the increase in four centuries fm. seventy persons, as they are stated to have been when they came down to Egypt, to approximately two millions and a half; the numerous slaves that accompanied them when they went down to Egypt are not included in the number, and they wd. amount to several thousands; if we include the possible purchase of slaves, the increase, though great, wd. not be at all incredible. The difficulty of encamping and feeding such a number in the wilderness, even with the intervention of the manna, the quails, and the water fm. the rock, wd. certainly be great. The difficulties become much greater when we find them encamped in Gilgal after the manna had ceased. A population as large as that of Berlin wd. in the first place occupy more space than cd. be denominated Gilgal, and in the next place it wd. be impossible to feed such a number with the deficient means of communication then in use in Palestine, even if the whole country fm. Dan to Beersheba cd. supply food to such an addition to its population. Yet again, the inundation of half a million warriors bent on a mission of extermination wd. have swept the country bare of inhabitants in a single campaign. This difficulty has suggested two possible solutions. Recalling the fact that 'eleph means not only "a thousand" but also "a family" (Jg. 6.15), Dr. Petrie has suggested rendering it so in N. In that case Judah wd. not be said to have 74,600 tribesmen but to have 74 families and 600 warriors. Another suggestion has been made by Mrs. Gibson, that 'eleph was an interpolation, in wh. case the denominator of the thousands wd. become a simple unit; hence Judah wd. have not nearly fourscore thousand warriors but only 746. In both cases the resulting number seems to err as much by defect as the Massoretic errs by excess; both also imply manipulation on the part of the editor to harmonise the summations to the presence of 'eleph, or his interpretation of it. In favour of Dr. Petrie's suggestion is the fact that it demands less emendation of the text, and that mainly in the summations. In favour of Mrs. Gibson's we have the numbers ending in exact units, a thing to be expected in a census. In the Massoretic numbers we have nothing less than hundreds save in two cases, one in each census, wh. must be further considered. In the first census Gad has 45,650, and in the second Reuben has 43,730. But it happens that the Heb. words for fifty and for thirty have the same consonants as two words that mean "warriors," and as in Heb. only the consonants were written originally the mistake might easily be made. If we take the words, then, to mean "warriors," and to refer not merely to the tribes immediately mentioned but to all the tribes, we may take these numbers as denoting merely the fully equipped men-at-arms as distinguished fm. the multitude who cd. not afford to provide themselves with costly arms and armour. It was a common thing in the Greek citizen armies that the heavy armed soldiers formed but a small portion of the inhabitants; thus at Platæa every Spartan hoplite was accompanied by seven helots; a similar if not a greater proportion of light armed or unarmed mt. be expected to be found among the Hebrews, who so recently had been slaves. So that, having reduced the number according to either of the schemes indicated, we have then to multiply by seven or eight at least to get the men able to bear arms. If we apply this to the tribe of Judah, and if we calculate the number of their fighting men according to Dr. Petrie's scheme, the number of adult males wd. be between 4000 and 5000 men; on Mrs. Gibson's they wd. be between 3000 and 4000. The whole of the heavy armed warriors of Isr. according to Dr. Petrie's scheme wd. be 6100, representing about 50,000 adult males, and a population of 200,000: Mrs. Gibson's is 5405, representing 45,000 and 180,000 respectively. This, however, is a different thing fm. maintaining that the numbers in either census or both were manufactured. In both schemes it is assumed that there was a true series of numbers to begin with. According to Dr. Petrie the scribes made a blunder as to the meaning of a word; according to Mrs. Gibson, for the greater glory of Isr., they deliberately falsified by inserting the word "thousand" after the units. On the whole our preference is for Mrs. Gibson's scheme. It is impossible to maintain with any show of reason that the figures in either census have the look of being manufactured. There is no prevalence of significant figures; no endowing tribes afterwards famous with great numbers, with the sole exception of Judah, on the Massoretic figures; no favouritism or vindictiveness is shown in the diminution; Simeon, the tribe wh. suffered, was not among those named as prominent in rebellion. It ought to be noted that while, according to the Massoretic numbers, there is a net decrease of the people at the latter census of 1820, on Dr. Petrie's scheme it is 720, equivalent to between 5000 and 6000 of adult males; by Mrs. Gibson's there is an increase of nearly 1000—that is to say, an increase of between 7000 and 8000. Dr. Moore (EB.) declares the census in chap. 26. to be the primitive, and that in chap. 28. to be manufactured fm. it, because he (Dr. Moore) can see "no manifest end" for it being taken. As three millennia and a half have elapsed since the Exodus, it is possible that "ends" enough mt. have been "manifest" when the census was taken wh. have ceased to be manifest now.

NUN, the father of Joshua (Ex. 33.[11], &c.). He is mentioned only in connection with his son. An Ephraimite by descent, he probably died in Egypt before the Exodus.

NURSE. In ancient Israel the nurse (Heb. mêneqeth) was employed, and held an honoured place. Rebekah's nurse, Deborah, accompanied her to her new home. Of the affection with which she was regarded we may judge from the name given to the place of her burial, "oak of weeping" (Gn. 24.[59], 35.[8]). Moses' mother was called as nurse to her own child (Ex. 2.[7ff.]). Heb. women, however, were accustomed to suckle their own children, and, as now in Pal., weaning was often delayed till the third year (Gn. 21.[7f.]; 1 S. 1.[23f.]; 2 M. 7.[27]), and when it occurred it was the occasion of a festal gathering of friends. The "nurse" of Ru. 4.[16]; 2 S. 4.[4] (Heb. 'omêneth) was only one to whose care a child was entrusted.

NUTS. (1) Boṭnîm (Gn. 43.[11]), the well-known pistachios, wh. did not grow in Egp. but have always been plentiful in Pal. The Gadite city Betonim, prob. received its name fm. these trees. (2) Ĕgôz (SS. 6.[11]), the walnut, Arb. el-jôz, introduced at an early date, prob. fm. Persia. It has long been cultivated in extensive orchards, as, e.g., those near Damascus to-day. The tree furnishes excellent timber, and other products of commercial value. Natives of Pal. are exceedingly fond of nuts, and the various kinds figure largely in the confectionery of the East.

NYMPHAS, a Laodicæan believer saluted by the apostle Paul (Col. 4.[15]). It seems better to follow WH. in reading "Nympha," and regard N. as feminine, and also read "the church wh. is in her house." Probably she was a wealthy believer, and cd. accommodate certain of the Christians. Fm. this it wd. seem that the Laodicæan Church proper was wealthy enough (Rv. 3.[17]) to have a hall, not a private house, for their assembly.

O

OAK. The Heb. êlah (Gn. 35.[4], &c.) or allâh (Jo. 24.[26]), often trd. "oak" in RV., is prob. the Terebinth (Is. 6.[13], "teil tree"; Ho. 4.[13], "elm"; RV. "terebinth"). Allôn (Gn. 35.[8], &c.) or êlôn (Gn. 12.[6]; Dt. 11.[30], &c.) is wrongly rendered "plain" in AV. RV. uniformly and correctly translates "oak." These trees seem to have had religious associations in ancient times (Ho. 4.[13], &c.). This would be true especially of great trees standing apart, as it is to this day in Palestine; see Tree (Gn. 12.[6], 35.[8]; Jg. 9.[37], &c.).

Palestine is not now a richly wooded country, but among the trees found there the oak takes a prominent place. Two patriarchs now remain on Tabor, where 60 years ago there were many great trees; but shady groves are found on Carmel. They also add to the beauty of the district watered by the fountains of the Jordan; and they clothe many of the slopes of the mountain of Bashan. Nine varieties of oak are found in Syria. The finest in stature and appearance is the Quercus coccifera, which is frequently seen solitary, protected by a neighbouring sanctuary. "The oaks of Bashan" (Is. 2.[13]; Zc. 11.[2]) probably correspond to the Quercus ægilops, the acorns of which are prized for dyeing. The oak bush, which abounds, consists of shoots from old roots, the trees having been cut for firewood. The bush is largely used for making charcoal.

OATH. The almost universal custom in the E. of confirming every statement, even the most trivial, with an oath, such as "by Allah," "by my life," &c., is doubtless a legacy fm. the practice of ancient times. It prob. arose before there was any properly constituted authority to enforce fulfilment of promises or observance of contracts. A god was invoked as witness, who mt. consider himself insulted by any breach of promise or contract, and inflict the penalty prescribed. Fear of the deity became the guarantee of truth and fidelity. The practice was legalised in the code of Isr. (Ex. 22.[11]), was imposed by judge or priest (Nu. 5.[21]), and mt. be registered in the Temple (1 K. 8.[31]). One swearing an O. called upon himself some calamity, i.e. "curse," in case of violation: hence in EV. ālāh is trd. now "oath" (Gn. 24.[41], &c.), now "curse" (Dt. 29.[19], &c.). The usual word for O. is shebū'ah, fem. part. of shāba', "to swear": this, derived fm. the same root as sheba', "seven," a Semitic sacred number, meant lit. "to come under the influence of seven things" (RS.[2] 182; cp. Gn. 21.[28], 33.[3], &c.; Herod. iii. 8). See COVENANT.

Twice we read of the hand being placed under the thigh in swearing (Gn. 24.[2], 47.[29]), in which there was a symbolic reference to posterity. Possibly it meant an appeal to posterity to vindicate the oath taken to their father. It was usual to raise the right hand (Ps. 144.[8]; Rv. 10.[5], &c.). Perjury involved ejection fm. the religious community (Ek. 16.[59]; cp. Ps. 15.[4]).

Jesus discouraged oaths as of the evil one (Mw. 5.[31ff.]). They arise fm. distrust of men's spontaneous truthfulness. One who is bound by an O. may be tempted to think lightly of a word spoken without that solemnity. The variety of oaths then in use (loc. cit.) prob. indicates a flippancy like that of the mod. Arab, who holds himself seriously bound by none of his multitudinous oaths, save only the yamīn, "the faithful." This is an oath wh. differs in form with different tribes.

Regarding these Arab oaths Doughty gives some interesting information. "There is a certain faithful form of swearing which they call halif el-yemîn; one takes a grass stalk in his fist and his words are: Wa hyât hâtha el-aûd, 'By the life of this stem,' wa' r-rubb el-mabûd, 'and the adorable Lord.'" He found, however, that even after swearing some betrayed him, and when he "reproached them to the heart," they declared that oaths taken to a kafir (infidel) were not binding. "Magnanimous fortitude in a man to the despising of death where his honour is engaged were, in their seeing, the hardihood of a madman: where mortal brittleness is fatally overmatched we have a merciful God, and human flesh, they think, may draw back from the unequal contention" (Arabia Deserta, i. p. 267).

Jesus must not be taken to condemn the judicial O., wh. He tacitly sanctions (Mw. 26.[63]). St. Paul also uses solemn forms of asseveration (2 Cor. 1.[23]; Gal. 1.[20]).

OBADIAH ("servant of J″."). This name seems to have been very popular among the Jews, as the corresponding 'Abdallah, "servant of Allah," is among the Arabs. (1) An officer holding a high position of trust in the court of Ahab. During the persecution instigated by Jezebel, he protected a hundred prophets of Jehovah, hiding them "by fifty in a cave," and feeding them with bread and water (1 K. 18.[4]). He shared with the king himself the search for water and herbage towards the end of the long drought. By him, Ahab and Elijah were brought face to face and the contest on Carmel arranged (1 K. 18.[7ff.]). Rashi preserves the tradition that the "certain woman of the wives of the sons of the prophets" who came to Elisha (2 K. 4.[1]) was the widow of Obadiah. (2) A descendant of king David, grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3.[21]). (3) One of the sons of Uzzi and great-grandson of Issachar, and a leader of the mighty men of valour reckoned to the tribe (1 Ch. 7.[3]). (4) A Benjamite, son of Azel, and a descendant of king Saul (1 Ch. 8.[38], 9.[44]). (5) A Levite, son of Shemaiah, one of the Temple musicians in the time of Nehemiah (1 Ch. 9.[16]; Ne. 12.[25]). (6) One of the famous Gadite warriors, the second of the three, who joined David at Ziklag. Their faces were like the faces of lions, and they were as swift as roes upon the mountains (1 Ch. 12.[9]). (7) A prince of Judah, who under Jehoshaphat went round the cities of Judah, teaching the law (1 Ch. 17.[7]). (8) Son of Jehiel, of the sons of Joab, who returned from Babylon with Ezra in the second caravan (Ez. 8.[9]). (9) Representative of a priestly family who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[5]). (10) Chief of the tribe of Zebulun in the days of David (1 Ch. 27.[19]). (11) A Merarite Levite, one of those who in the time of Josiah were overseers of the work of restoration in the Temple (2 Ch. 34.[12]). (12) The prophet: see next article.

OBADIAH is fourth of the Minor Prophets, and his is the shortest written prophecy in OT. The name Obadiah means "Servant of J"."," and was common among the Hebs. Of the prophet himself we know nothing, and the widest diversity of opinion exists as to his date. Dates as far apart as B.C. 889 and B.C. 312 have been given and upheld by eminent scholars. The prophecy deals with Edom, and expresses in forcible language the hatred of Judah for her neighbour; but the hostility between the two peoples was not peculiar to any time in their hist. It never ceased. The immediate occasion of the prophecy was some recent disaster wh. had befallen Jrs., over wh. the Edomites showed a malignant delight. They had also taken an active part in intercepting the fugitives and sharing in the plunder. Some have fixed the date of this disaster in B.C. 848–844, when the Phil. and Arabians attacked Jrs., and carried away the possessions of the k. (2 Ch. 21.[16, 17]). But the most natl. refc. is to the destruction of Jrs. in B.C. 586 by the Chaldeans, and we know fm. other sources of the active hostility of the Edomites on that occasion (cf. Ek. 35.; Ps. 137.). Malachi refers to the punishment wh. fell on the Edomites (Ml. 1.[1-5]), when, after the fall of Jrs., they were attacked by the Arabians, and it is prob. this event wh. occasioned the jubilant strains of O. over the defeat of his country's hereditary foe. But if O. was a prophet of the Exile, an interesting point arises in connection with Jeremiah. O. vv. 1–9 and Jeremiah 49.[9, 14-16] have such a close resemblance that some explanation of their inter-relation is called for. This part of Jeremiah's prophecy dates fm. before the fall of Jrs., but very few commentators have sought to maintain that O. is here quoting from Jeremiah, for there is considerable unanimity of opinion that O. possesses the more original form of the prophecy. The facts may be accounted for by the supposition that both are quoting fm. an older writer, and such a supposition as this is necessary if O. is referring to the final destruction of Jrs. O. was prob. a prophet among the exiles in Bab., or he may belong to a later date still.

The bk. opens with an announcement of the fate of Edom. Her rocky dwellings will not protect her in her day of trouble, her friends will deceive her, and her wisdom will fail her (vv. 1–9). The reason for their punishment is next given, and the attitude of Edom to Jrs. in her affliction is indicated (vv. 10, 11). In vv. 12–14 the prophet urges them to cease fm. their wicked delight in others' misfortunes. The prophecy concludes (vv. 15–21) with the prediction of the Day of the Lord, when all nations will receive their retribution. The Edomites will be destroyed, the boundaries of Judah will be extended, "and saviours shall come up on mount Zion to judge the mount of Esau, and the kdm. shall be the Lord's."

JOHN DAVIDSON.

OBAL, a son of Joktan (Gn. 10.[28]). In 1 Ch. 1.[22] he is called Ebal. He prob. represents an Arabian tribe; but no identification is possible.

OBED. (1) The son borne by Ruth the Moabitess to Boaz in Bethlehem (Ru. 4.[17]). His birth was the signal for a popular expression of goodwill to Naomi, his grandmother: "He shall be to thee a restorer of thy life, and a nourisher of thine old age; for thy daughter-in-law which loveth thee, which is better to thee than seven sons, hath borne him." He was the father of Jesse, grandfather of David, and so an ancestor of our Lord (Mw. 1.[5], &c.). (2) Grandson of Zabad, one of David's heroes, and a descendant of Jarcha, the Egyptian slave of Sheshan (1 Ch. 2.[37f.]). (3) One of David's mighty men (1 Ch. 9.[47]). (4) A gatekeeper in the Temple, grandson of Obed-edom (1 Ch. 26.[7]). (5) Father of Azariah, who took part in the revolution which was fatal to Athaliah (2 Ch. 23.[1]).

OBED-EDOM (Heb. 'obed edom, "servant of Edom," the latter part of the name being, prob., that of a god), a native of Gath, poss. a refugee, or a hostage in Isr., in whose house the ark was left after the death of Uzzah, until evidence of blessing wh. it brought encouraged David to remove it (2 S. 6.[10ff.]; 1 Ch. 13.[13ff.]). Poss. the same man is intended in 1 Ch. 15.[18], &c., 26.[4], &c. For others see 1 Ch. 16.[5, 38]; 2 Ch. 25.[24].

OBEISANCE. See SALUTATION.

OBIL, an Ishmaelite who doubtless by birth and training was well acquainted with the management of camels, and who was appointed to the charge of David's herds of those animals (1 Ch. 27.[30]). The Heb. 'ōbīl = Arb. 'abbāl, "camel-driver."

OBLATION (in the law "oblation" trs. Heb. qorbān, in Is., Jr., Dn. minḥāh, in Ek. tĕrūmāh), a general name for a sacrifice (see SACRIFICE).

OBOTH, an encampment of Israel, prob. east of Moab (Nu. 21.[10], 33.[43]). The site is unknown.

OCRAN, RV. OCHRAN, father of Pagiel, chief of the tribe of Asher (Nu. 1.[13], &c.).

ODED. (1) Fr. of Azariah, who prophesied under Asa (2 Ch. 15.[1f.]: "the prophet O." is obviously a scribal error). (2) The prophet who secured fm. Pekah release of the prisoners of Judah (2 Ch. 28.[9ff.]). At his appeal 200,000 captives of Judah and Jerusalem are said to have been set free, fed, clothed, and anointed, and sent to Jericho, the city of palm trees.

OFFENCE. Where in EV. it trs. Heb. Ḥēṭ' (Ec. 10.[4]), and Gr. hamartia and paraptōma (2 Cor. 11.[7]; Rm. 4.[25], &c.), O. means SIN. Where it stands for Heb. mikshōl (1 S. 25.[31]; Is. 8.[14]), and Gr. proskomma (Rm. 14.[20]), proskopē (2 Cor. 6.[3]), and skandalon (Mw. 16.[23]), it means "stumbling-block"—anything in the way wh. mt. cause one to stumble, and so figuratively, anything that hinders faith, acceptance of, and submission to Christ (Mw. 18.[7]; Rm. 16.[17]; Gal. 5.[11], &c.).

OFFERING (when alone, represents either minḥāh, qorbān, or terūmāh), general term for SACRIFICE, which see.

OFFICER, a term wh. represents several Heb. words. (1) Nātzab, meaning "one appointed," used of those who carried on the work of administration under Solomon. (2) Sārīṣ, "a eunuch": this term is generally applied to court officials, who usually were eunuchs, hence the word is most frequently rendered so; in Est. it is always tr. "chamberlain." (3) Derivatives fm. pāqad, "to oversee": these are used in various relations, as those over the detachments fm. each tribe in the punitive expedition against Midian (Nu. 31.[48]); those appointed by Pharaoh over Egypt in the plentiful years (Gn. 41.[34]). (4) Shōṭēr, originally a "scribe," then an "inspector": those appointed by the children of Isr. in Egypt over against the "taskmasters," occupying very much the position of village "sheikh" in the present time (Ex. 5.[6], &c.). (5) In the NT. it represents the Gr. hupēretēs, originally meaning "under-rower," i.e. "a common sailor"; in this connection the word has very much the connotation of "police officer"; O. as tr. (5) seems to be restricted to the men that carried out the orders of the High Priest (Jn. 7.[32], 18.[12]; Ac. 5.[22]). The Gr. word is used of John Mark in relation to Paul and Barnabas, by Lk. (1.[2]) of the apostles, by Paul of himself (Ac. 26.[16]; 1 Cor. 4.[1]).

OG, k. of BASHAN, who was defeated at EDREI (Dt. 3.[1ff.]). He is described as the sole survivor of the REPHAIM. His "bedstead of iron," shown at Rabbah of Ammon, many think to have been a sarcophagus of basalt (v. 11). This rests upon a supposition for which there is no proof, that as iron is an ingredient in basalt, the Heb. barzel, "iron," may also stand for "basalt." The present writer has seen, east of the Jordan, many sarcophagi of limestone weathered dark, but cannot remember ever having seen one of basalt.

OHAD, one of the sons of Simeon (Gn. 46.[10]; Ex. 6.[15]). The name does not appear in the lists of 1 Ch. 4. and Nu. 26.[14]. Here Syr. has Ohor, as also in Gn. and Ex.

OHEL, according to MT. one of the seven sons of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3.[20]), but the text is uncertain.

OHOLAH, OHOLIBAH, AV. AHOLAH, AHOLIBAH. Ohŏlāh, "her tent," is a symbolic name for Samaria: Ohŏlibāh, "my tent is in her," or possibly equivalent to Ohŏlāh, a symbolic name for Jerusalem (Ek. 23.[4], &c.), sister cities alike fallen into sin. The allusion is to the purpose for which tents were used in certain idolatrous rites. According to the allegory here wrought out, the two sisters are married to Jehovah: but, tempted by the strength and splendour of Assyria and Babylon, they have proved unfaithful. The alliances formed with great heathen powers were always the objects of prophetic denunciation, as liable to result in the introduction of new forms of idolatry.

Two members of a family are often called by names which differ very slightly: e.g. Muppim and Huppim (Gn. 46.[21]): Hasan and Husein, grandsons of Mohammed.

OHOLIAB, AV. AHOLIAB, son of Ahisamach, an artificer appointed to work with Bezaleel (RV. Bezalel) in making the Tabernacle (Ex. 31.[6], &c.).

OHOLIBAMAH. See AHOLIBAMAH.

OIL means "olive oil" in every case save one where it is mentioned in Scrip. (Est. 2.[12], "oil of myrrh"). The OLIVE grows to perfection in many districts of Palestine, and the making of oil is one of the oldest industries. The berries were beaten from the trees with light rods, and gathered into the olive press. This might be the press used in the making of WINE, in which case prob. the olives were pressed with the feet (Mi. 6.[15]), the oil draining off into the lower trough. Various forms of press or mortar were employed at different times, but in essence the process was always the same. The berries were crushed, and the oil extracted. The finest oil was that which drained off without pressure. When it had settled and purified it was ready for use.

The Talmud (Menach. viii. 8) informs us that the oil of Tekoa was reckoned the best. Large quantities of oil were exported. Among the supplies furnished to Hiram by Solomon were 20,000 baths of oil (2 Ch. 2.[10], &c.). It was applied to many purposes. It played a great part in the preparation of the food of the people, taking largely the place of animal fat (1 K. 17.[12]; Ek. 16.[13]). This led to its prescription as part of certain offerings (Ex. 29.[23]; Lv. 7.[10]; Nu. 6.[15], &c.). For the use of oil as applied to skin and hair, in ceremonies of consecration, as a healing agent, &c., see ANOINTING. "Beaten" oil, i.e. oil made from olives bruised in a mortar, was burned in the lamps (Ex. 25.[6]; Mw. 25.[3], &c.). Pure olive oil was especially valued as causing no soot (Ex. 27.[20]).

Oil, with flour or meal, was prescribed for the following offerings: at the consecration of the priests (Ex. 29.[2, 23], &c.); accompanying the daily sacrifice (Ex. 29.[40]); at the purification of the leper (Lv. 14.[10ff.], &c.), the leper's body being touched at certain points with oil; at the completion of the Nazirite's vow (Nu. 6.[15]); the offering of the princes at the completion of the tabernacle (Nu. 7., passim); at the consecration of the Levites (Nu. 8.[8]); meat-offerings (Lv. 7.[10, 12]). Oil was to be absent from the sin-offering (Lv. 5.[11]) and from the jealousy offering (Nu. 5.[15]). Oil was included among the offerings of first-fruits (Ex. 22.[29], &c.), and tithes also were paid (Dt. 12.[17], &c.). The use of oil was an indication of gladness and plenty; its absence betokened sorrow or humiliation (Jl. 2.[19]; Rv. 6.[6]). Thus we have the fig. "the oil of joy" (Is. 61.[3]).

Great quantities of oil are now used in Palestine in the manufacture of soap. There is still, however, a considerable export trade; and the finest oil for the imperial table in Constantinople is furnished by the olive groves of Galilee.

The "oil of myrrh" (Est. 2.[12]) is the juice exuded through slits made in the bark of the Balsamodendron myrrha.

OIL TREE (Heb. 'ētz shemen, "tree of oil" or "fat") wd. well describe the OLIVE. The oleaster (Eleagnus angustifolia) with wh. some wd. ident. it, as found in Pal. to-day, is only a shrub, yielding no wood that cd. be used as in 1 K. 6.[23, 31-33]; Is. 41.[19]. But in Ne. 8.[15] it is distinguished fm. the olive. This leaves doubt as to the tree intended. The oleaster, with its thin foliage and thorny branches, its berries yielding small quantities of a kind of balsam, hardly justifies the name "tree of oil."

OINTMENT was compounded of oil and various sweet-smelling materials (Ex. 30.[25], &c.), or of fragrant substances, themselves of an oily nature (Mk. 14.[3], &c.); see ANOINTING. Ointments of pungent perfume are greatly prized by Orientals still. They are largely used for the hair, and also for softening the skin when affected by the heat. The odour of perspiration is also thus counteracted.

OLD MAN, a phrase used by St. Paul for the unregenerate nature, with its affections and desires unpurified (Eph. 4.[22]; Col. 3.[9]).

OLD TESTAMENT. See SCRIPTURES.

OLIVE. The O. has abounded in Pal. fm. ancient times (Ex. 23.[11]; Dt. 6.[11], 28.[40], &c.). The land of Asher was specially rich in olives (Dt. 33.[24]). The gnarled stem and silver sheen of the foliage greet the eye in many an upland vale, where the O. grove is one of the most characteristic features. The tree is of slow growth, and its cultivation marks times of peace and comparative security. It grows best in soil not too moist, requires no irrigation, and loves the sun and shelter fm. the winds. When a sucker of wild O. reaches a height of about 6 ft., and a thickness of a man's wrist, it is cut down to the stem and grafted with a twig of good olive. In favourable conditions it begins to bear in 10 to 14 years, the crop improving rapidly after the 14th. A tree fm. 30 to 40 years old may yield in one season fm. 12 to 20 gallons of oil. It bears heavily, however, only in alternate years. When fully ripe, the berries are of a dark purple hue. Often they are gathered earlier, to secure a finer quality of oil. The green berries are frequently bruised and preserved in strong salt brine, in earthen jars. The like is done, but not on so large a scale, with the ripe fruit. Bread and olives form a main part of the people's food.

The berries are beaten off the tree with long palm branches, stripped of leaves. They are usually crushed for oil in a circular stone basin, or hollow cut in the rock, by means of a heavy millstone. The oil drains off into a large vat. By further pressing the crushed olives an inferior quality of oil is got (see OIL). The wood of the O. takes a very high polish, and ornamental O.-wood is a leading industry in Jrs.

The O. appears frequently in the figurative language of Scrip. (Ps. 52.[8]; Jr. 11.[16]; Zc. 4.[3]; Rm. 11.[17], &c.). It may be said, apropos of the last text cited, that the grafting of a wild O. branch on a good O. tree, to rejuvenate it when old and exhausted, is quite unknown in Palestine. A statement affirming this practice made by Prof. Fischer (Der Oelbaum, p. 9), on what seemed to him good authority, misled Sir W. M. Ramsay (Expositor, 1905, pp. 16ff., 152ff.). Recent investigations have shown Prof. Fischer, as he says in a letter to the present writer, that the practice referred to is "now unknown in Pal." The conclusions of Sir William's article fall to be revised in the light of this fact. Further, Sir William's argument to prove that the wild O. is the oleaster (see OIL TREE) does not seem quite convincing. The only "wild O." known in Pal. to-day is the ungrafted tree. May not agrielaios have meant for St. Paul just what zaitūneh barrīyeh means for the mod. Arab? The Arabic version so renders the name.

OLIVE TREE IN SHARON

The opinion of some, that the O. came originally fm. Africa, may find support in the name sometimes applied by the Arabs to the wild O.—zaitūn el-Ḥabash, "O. of Abyssinia."

OLIVES, MT. OF. The mount "wh. is before Jrs. on the E." was called the Mt. of O. (Zc. 14.^{4}; Lk. 19.^{29}, 21.^{37}) or Olivet (Ac. 1.^{12}), evidently because this part of the range on the E. horizon of Jrs. was planted with olives. The name might have been applied to the whole southern part of the range, beginning with the mod. 'Aqabet eṣ-Ṣûwân, wh. really forms a distinct unit, with three tops. But tradition confines it, perhaps rightly, to the central part, just opposite the Sanctuary of Jrs., the summit of wh. consists of a small plain, 2641 ft. high, rising eastward to a height of 2664.8 ft. An old road, "the ascent of the olives" (2 S. 15.^{30}, Heb.), led first to the "top where God was worshipped" (ib. v. 32) and thence to "the way of the olive that is in the wilderness" (ib. v. 23, corrected text), wh. was one of the ways then used in going to the nearest ford of Jordan. Gr. tradition placed the scene of Christ's ascension at a spot on the summit, over against the Temple, where a heap of ruins now forms a fourth top to the mountain. In Ac. 1.^{12}, however, only Mount Olivet is mentioned, and Lk. 24.^{50} seems purposely vague, indicating simply the direction towards Bethany. To the height (2649 ft.) at the northern extremity of the plateau, later tradition gave the name of Galilee, in order to explain the apparent disagreement between Mw. 28.$^{10, 16}$ and Ac. 1.^{4}.

The S. end of the mountain, with a summit of about 2611 ft., was called "the rock of the columbarium," wh. in Heb. wd. be tzūr hash-shōbak (BJ. V. xii. 2). The nucleus of the mod. "tombs of the prophets" may have been a real dove-house; or these tombs may have been so called because of the great number of loculi.

Idolatrous high places were built by Solomon "on the right hand of the Mount of Corruption" (2 K. 23.^{13}), opposite Jrs. "Mount of Corruption" (Heb. har ham-mashḥîth) seems to be only a perversion of "Mount of Anointing" (Heb. har ham-mishḥa), the later Jewish name of the Mt. of Olives. The high places were on the right hand, that is S. of the Mt. of O., prob. on the hill opposite the city of David, now called bâṭen el-hawa (2411 ft.).

For the scene of Christ's agony and betrayal at the W. foot of the mt., see GETHSEMANE. BETHPHAGE and BETHANY stood on the eastern slope.

DALMAN.

OLYMPAS, a Christian at Rome saluted by St. Paul (Rm. 16.^{15}), perhaps of the household of Philologus. He was said to have been one of the seventy whom Jesus sent out (Lk. 10.$^{1, 17}$), and to have been martyred in Rome.

OMAR, son of Eliphaz the eldest son of Esau, a "duke" or phylarch of Edom (Gn. 36.$^{11, 15}$; 1 Ch. 1.^{36}).

OMEGA, the last letter of the Greek alphabet (see ALPHA): it is used instead of tau, the last letter of the Heb. alphabet, in the phrase "Alpha and Omega" (Rv. 1.^{8}, &c.).

OMER (Heb. 'omer, Ex. 16.^{16}), the tenth part of an ephah, not to be confounded with homer, wh. is ten ephahs (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES).

OMRI. (1) "Captain of the host" to Elah, the last monarch of the dynasty of Jeroboam the son of Nebat. He was present with the army at Gibbethon when Zimri slew the king at Tirzah and assumed the reins of government. The army could not tolerate Zimri the regicide, and elected Omri to the throne, who swiftly marched to Tirzah, where Zimri, seeing the hopelessness of his position, committed suicide. A faction led by one Tibni and his brother Joram (LXX) proved more formidable than that of Zimri. The struggle of four years was at last ended by the defeat and slaughter of Tibni. Although the palace had been burned by Zimri, Omri remained for a time in TIRZAH. Both statesmanship and military insight were shown in his choice of a site for his new capital—the hill of SAMARIA, at once strong, central, and beautiful (1 K. 16.$^{1ff.}$). Unsuccessful in his struggle with Damascus, he ceded certain cities to the Syrians, and granted them special privileges in Samaria (20.^{34}). Seeking doubtless to strengthen his position, he formed alliance with the royal house of Tyre, his son Ahab marrying the Tyrian princess Jezebel. A tree was thus planted from which bitter fruit was destined to fall. He so thoroughly subdued Moab that not till the time of Mesha could it make any headway against Israel (2 K. 3.$^{4ff.}$; Moabite Stone, lines 4ff.). From the time of Shalmaneser II. to that of Sargon (B.C. 854–720) Israel appears in the Assyrian inscriptions as "the land of the house of Omri," probably indicating that under Omri the Assyrians first came into contact with Israel. Of Omri's reign of twelve years little is recorded. He is said to have done "evil in the sight of the Lord"; but when he died and was buried in the city he had founded (1 K. 16.^{28}) he seems to have left the kingdom quiet and prosperous to his son Ahab. (2) A Benjamite, son of Becher (1 Ch. 7.^{8}). (3) A Judahite, descendant of Pharez (1 Ch. 9.^{4}). (4) Prince of Issachar in the time of David (1 Ch. 26.^{18}).

ON. (1) Son of Peleth, a descendant of REUBEN, apparently associated with DATHAN and ABIRAM in their rebellion against MOSES (Nu. 16.^{1}).

The complete disappearance of On in the whole subsequent narrative gives plausibility to the suggestion of Graf that there is a corruption of the text here, and we shd. read Bnê Pallu (Gn. 46.^{9}; Ex. 6.^{14}), instead of ben Peleth, thus making the two conspirators descendants of Pallu, the son of Reuben; only one does not understand how 'On came into the passage. In Nu. 26.$^{8, 9}$ we learn that Eliab, the father of Dathan and Abiram, was the son of Pallu.

(2) A city of Lower Egypt where Potiphera, the father-in-law of JOSEPH, was priest (Gn. 41.$^{45, 50}$, 46.^{20}). In Ezekiel (30.^{17}) there is mention of a city with the same name consonantally but vowelled Aven, presumably the same; the earlier form is the more correct, as the name of the city in Egyptian was Annu. It was also called Pe-Ra, "the house of Ra" (the sun), hence Jeremiah calls it (43.[13]) "Beth Shemesh." In all the passages mentioned the LXX trs. Heliopolis. It was one of the most ancient of Egyptian cities; it was prominent in the days of Herodotus, and had been much more so. The priests connected with the Temple there were famous even in the days of the builder of the Great Pyramid. Usertasen of the 12th dynasty rebuilt to a great extent and adorned the great Temple of Ra there. His tall obelisk of red granite still testifies to the splendour of that shrine, at the door of wh. it stood, but there is little else to show it. On lies about seven miles to the N. of Cairo.

On (Heliopolis): Obelisk

ONAM. (1) Son of Shobal son of Seir (Gn. 36.[23]; 1 Ch. 1.[40]), the name-father of a Horite clan. (2) A son of Jerahmeel by his wife Atarah (1 Ch. 2.[26, 28]).

ONAN, son of Judah by his Canaanite wife, the daughter of Shua (Gn. 38.[4]). On the death of Er, his elder brother, it fell to him to marry his brother's childless widow, and so rescue his name from oblivion. His evasion of the consequences of this marriage seems to have been regarded as tantamount to the murder of his brother. The thing was evil in the sight of the Lord and He slew him (v. 10).

ONESIMUS, a slave who had run away fm. Philemon his master in Colosse, and drifted, like all runaways, naturally to Rome to hide himself in its multitude. The fact that St. Paul in his epistle to his master says, "If he hath wronged thee or oweth thee aught, put that on mine account," appears to imply that when he had run away he had taken money of his master's with him. In Rome he had been brought into contact with Paul, and by him was led to the knowledge of Christ. After he had become a convert he evidently had devoted himself to the service of the apostle, so as to gain his heart; he says of him, "Him that is mine own bowels." The apostle, playing upon the name, calls him "profitable both to thee and to me." He could be of the utmost benefit to the apostle, prisoner as he was. Altho' anxious to retain him, St. Paul feels it only just to Philemon to send O. back with the epistle. Of his subsequent history after his return to his master even tradition has nothing clear to say. That his master received and forgave is certain, for otherwise the letter wd. not have been preserved; very probably he afterwards manumitted him. The apostle in the epistle to the Colossians assumes that he will be received as a brother (Col. 4.[9]). It has been maintained that it was to Cæsarea, not to Rome, that O. betook himself. Communication was easy with Rome fm. Ephesus, the nearest port; it wd. be difficult with Cæsarea. In Rome he wd. be certain to fall in with fellow-countrymen fm. Phrygia; had he gone to the relatively small town of Cæsarea he probably wd. have found himself the only one of his nation in the city. For all wh. reasons we confess our adherence to the traditional view. There is no justification for v. Manen's assertion that the O. of Col. 4.[9] is another.

ONESIPHORUS, a Christian of Ephesus who, when Paul was there, had ministered to him (2 Tm. 1.[18]), and when he came to Rome, presumably on some private business, he sought the apostle out and found him in chains (1.[17]). This was probably during ST. PAUL's second imprisonment, when the policy of Rome toward the Christians had become definitely persecuting. O. had searched through all the loathsome prisons of the city till he found St. Paul, not now regarded as an appellant with rights to certain privileges, but as a despised criminal. When he had found him he had visited the apostle often, and refreshed him with his sympathy (1.[16]). Fm. the fact that S. Paul salutes his house but never himself it has been deduced that he had died, not improbably at Rome. This conclusion seems to make the first clause of v. 18 a prayer for the dead, but not necessarily so, as the pronoun may be trd. "it" as well as "him." To us the prayer seems a loving wish rather than a distinct prayer.

ONION (Heb. betzel = Arb. baṣal) is the common vegetable of that name (Nu. 11.[5]), wh. grows plentifully in the E., and is much used for food, both raw and cooked. It is interesting to note Hasselquist's opinion of the onions of Egypt (Travels, 290): "Whoever has tasted onions in Egypt must allow that none can be had better in any other part in the universe. Here they are sweet; in other countries they are nauseous and strong. . . . They eat them roasted, cut into four pieces, with some bits of roasted meat which the Turks in Egypt call kebab; and with this dish they are so delighted that I have heard them wish they might enjoy it in Paradise."

ONO, a city fortified by Shamed, a Benjamite, near Lod (1 Ch. 8.[12]), occupied after the Exile (Ez. 2.[33], &c.). It is prob. = Kefr Anā, to the NW. of Ludd (Lydda). Here his enemies tried in vain to induce Nehemiah to meet them for conference.

ONYCHA. The word is from the Greek onyx, "a claw," "talon," or "finger nail." It translates the Heb. shĕḥēleth, an ingredient of the holy incense (Ex. 30.[34]). It denotes the operculum, or closing flap of certain molluscs of the genus strombus. When burned it yields a pungent perfume. In Sr. 24.[15] Wisdom is made to say, "I yielded a pleasant odour like the best myrrh, as galbanum, and onyx, and sweet storax, and as the fumes of frankincense in the Tabernacle," where "onyx" probably denotes the same material. Something of the kind is employed still for purposes of fumigation.

ONYX (Heb. shōham), a precious stone that cannot now be identified with certainty, as neither the VV. nor cognate languages afford much light. It was regarded as of value: it is called "the precious onyx" (Jb. 28.[16]); it is one of the jewels of the king of Tyre (Ek. 28.[13]). It was suitable for engraving, and hence was on the shoulders of the High Priest, and had engraved on it the names of the "children of Israel" (Ex. 28.[9-12]); it was also the middle stone of the fourth row on the High Priest's breastplate (Ex. 28.[20]). So far as that is concerned the "onyx" wd. suit. RVm. has BERYL.

OPHEL. See JERUSALEM.

OPHIR, son of Joktan (Gn. 10.[29]; 1 Ch. 1.[23]), named with Sheba and Havilah, and dwelling with his brethren towards the East, i.e. in Arabia. The district of Ophir doubtless took its name from the tribe. It is spoken of as furnishing gold and other articles of commerce fetched by the ships of Solomon (1 K. 9.[28]). It attracted the attention of Jehoshaphat, whose attempt to renew the old commercial relations ended in disaster to his merchant fleet (1 K. 22.[48]). Having regard to the merchandise associated with Ophir, and the time occupied by the double voyage, eighteen months each way, some have sought it in India, others in Africa, e.g. in Mashonaland.

The association of O. with an Arabian tribe points to some locality in Arabia. It was noted for its gold (Jb. 22.[24], 28.[16]; Ps. 45.[9]; Is. 13.[12]), "gold of Ophir" being apparently a synonym for the finest gold. If it were a great market and emporium, merchandise of many lands would be found in its stores. It need not, therefore, be sought in a land which produced peacocks, &c. These would naturally be imported for sale. The statement of time occupied in the voyage shows that it required three sailing seasons.

No place on the W. or SW. of Arabia fulfils the conditions. Traffic with these quarters would in any case be carried on by means of caravans. The mention of Ophir between Sheba and Havilah points to some district in the SE. of the peninsula. In the Elamite cuneiform inscriptions the region lying between Susa and the Persian Gulf is called Apirra; a name that obtained from the tenth to the eighth cent. B.C. (Hommel, Geschichte Bab.-Asyr., p. 720). It is impossible to fix any definite locality: but this is a gold-bearing district—a fact which was known to the Phœnicians—and some place on the shore of the Persian Gulf, or of the Gulf of Omaun, would meet all the requirements. With the leisurely speed of ancient vessels, and the time spent at ports of call, and in avoiding the monsoons, the three years occupied are easily accounted for.

OPHNI, a town in the territory of Benjamin (Jo. 18.[24]), unidentified. The mod. Jifneh, the Gophna of the rabbis, about three miles NW. of Bethel, has been suggested. The position might suit, but the change from עפני to Jifneh is a difficulty.

OPHRA. (1) A town in the territory of Benjamin, mentioned between Parah and Chephar-ammoni (Jg. 18.[23]). From Michmash a marauding band of Philistines went out by the road to Ophra and the land of Shual. One band went westward by way of Beth-horon; another eastward, towards Zeboim. As the south road was blocked by the Israelites the first band must have gone northward (1 S. 13.[17]). With this agrees the identification of OEJ. with a village five Rm. miles to the E. of Bethel, apparently the mod. eṭ-Ṭaiyibeh. It is prob. ident. with Ephron (2 Ch. 13.[19]). (2) A town in Manasseh, the home of Gideon (Jg. 6.[11], 9.[5], &c.), belonging to the clan of Abiezer (17.[2]). It seems to have been near the plain of Jezreel (6.[33ff.]; cp. 8.[18]), but no satisfactory identification has been suggested. (3) The head of a clan of Judah (1 Ch. 4.[14]).

ORACLE (Heb. debīr), the innermost part of the Temple (1 K. 6.[5]). This meaning is due to a false derivation fm. dābar, " to speak " : the LXX transliterate dabir, wh. shows that the meaning of the word was not generally known when that tr. was made. It wd. seem to be connected with Arb. daber, " behind " ; the Tg. gives beth kaphari, " the place of atonement " ; Psh. beth qudsha, " the holy place." Jerome introduced oraculum. There were, however, no responses given fm. the Holy of Holies, so " oracle " was a misnomer. In NT. it stands for the Greek logion, " a Divine response." It is used of the giving of the law at Sinai (Ac. 7.[38]), of the OT. Scriptures (Rm. 3.[2]), and of the doctrines of the Gospel (He. 5.[12]; 1 P. 4.[11]).

ORATOR. (1) The AV. tr. of Heb. laḥash, lit. " a whispering," " charming " (Is. 3.[3]), used of the charming of serpents (Ec. 10.[11]). RV. is prob. correct in rendering " enchanter." (2) The title given to the advocate of St. Paul's enemies before Felix (Ac. 24.[1]). St. Paul was on trial as a Roman citizen: the forms of Roman law were observed, and probably the Latin language was employed. An " orator," familiar with the procedure of a Roman tribunal, and able rightly to present their case, was a necessity for the Jews. Men so qualified found occupation in many of the Roman provincial towns.

ORCHARD. The Heb. pardēṣ is a loan-word from the Persian, denoting " enclosure," " park," or " pleasure garden." In Mi. 2.[8] AV. trs. " forest," RV. " park." The presence of fruit trees in Ec. 2.[5] and SS. 4.[13] makes " orchard " a quite satisfactory rendering. See Garden.

ORDINATION. See Laying On of Hands.

OREB AND ZEEB, the two " princes " of the Midianites, distinguished by their title as inferior to the two " kings " Zebah and Zalmunnah (Jg. 7.[25], &c.). Fleeing from the rout of the Eastern hordes in the hollow of Jezreel, they were interrupted at the Jordan by the Ephraimites, and there put to death. The places where they fell were thenceforth called " the rock of Oreb " and " the winepress of Zeeb." Their heads were carried to Gideon. The scene E. of the Jordan cannot now be identified. Their names, signifying " raven " and " wolf," correspond with those borne by many Arabian chiefs to-day.

OREN, son of Jerahmeel, grandson of Hezron, son of Judah (1 Ch. 2.[25]).

ORGAN (Heb. 'ūgāb, 'uggāb, fm. 'āgab, " to blow," Gn. 4.[20], &c.), " a flute " or " pandean pipe " (see Music). Our organ was not invented till the Middle Ages.

ORION (Heb. keṣīl, " giant "). This term is used in three passages of the EV. to denote a constellation (Jb. 9.[9], 38.[31]; Am. 5.[8]); the plural is translated " constellations " in Is. 13.[10]. The LXX in Jb. 38.[31] and in Is. 13.[10] has " Orion," evidently having the singular in the second passage ; in Jb. 9.[9] the rendering is " Hesperus," the " morning star," while in the passage in Amos the reading before the Greek translators has been totally different. The Tg. in the first three cases renders nefila " giant," and in the fourth (Am. 5.[8]) transfers the word. In the Job passages the Psh. has gabbara, " the hero." All these renderings point to a myth of a giant chained in the sky ; this certainly is associated with the constellation Orion, the three stars that form the " belt of O." being regarded as the chains by wh. he is fastened, hence the phrase in Jb. 38.[31], " loose the bands of Orion." Semitic fancy had pointed out Nimrod as the rebellious warrior so punished. Some Jewish commentators have suggested, not a constellation, but the single star Canopus, the most prominent in the southern constellation Argo ; as we saw in one case, the LXX took it as meaning the " morning star." On the whole the AV. rendering is preferable to any other, all the more that Kasil was one of the Babylonian names for Orion.

ORNAMENTS. Orientals have always been extremely fond of gaudy coloured dress and glittering ornaments. In this respect the Hebrews were like their neighbours. The various articles of adornment are treated more fully under their own names. Here we take a more general view.

In ancient Babylon, Egypt, and Palestine the signet ring seems to have been designed quite as much for ornament as for use. The art of cutting precious stones and setting them for this purpose was already old in the days of the patriarchs. The Hebrew custom was to string the signet ring on a cord and wear it round the neck (Gn. 38.[18]). This is a custom still largely followed in the East. The Egyptians wore the signet ring upon the finger, and this practice is also found later among the Hebrews (Jr. 22.[24]).

Ear-rings of silver and gold were worn universally by women, and by children of both sexes (Ex. 32.[2]). It is not certain that Hebrew men wore them, but the presumption is that they did. It was the practice of the Midianites (Jg. 8.[24ff.]), and Pliny maintains that it was quite general among Orientals. It is prevalent still among the Arabian tribesmen ; and the Arabian women attach great value to their ear-rings.

The Hebrew women were fond of nose-rings (Gn. 24.^{22}; Is. 3.^{21}, &c.). This taste is shared to the full by the Arab women. Often their nose-rings are so large that they hang down over the mouth. It is said that the Arabs love to kiss their wives through the ring. Their fingers also are frequently loaded with rings of various designs.

During the period of the later monarchy the women indulged in great extravagance in the matter of ornaments. Ankle chains were worn which tinkled musically as they walked, preserving at the same time an equal and stately step. Bracelets, anklets, chains for the neck, head-tires, perfume bottles, amulets, golden crescents, &c., were worn. The list given in Is. 3.$^{16ff.}$ contains the names of many articles which it is now impossible to identify, all indicative of the luxury of the times.

Recent excavations have shown that in the Neolithic age strings of shells were worn. It is interesting to note that these are favourite ornaments still. Enormous numbers of ornaments, in endless variety of form, have been found in the course of digging in Egypt and Palestine. Especially important are the finds of Prof. Sellin at Tell Ta'annek, and Mr. Macalister at Gezer.

Pearls were greatly prized in ancient times, and although not now the most precious of jewels, they are still very popular. A common ornament in mod. Pal. is a string of coins, worn on the head-dress or round the neck. Among the poorer people "flash" coins are often used for this purpose; and other ornaments of baser metals and glass are worn.

ORNAN. See ARAUNAH.

OSSIFRAGE

From Wood's "Bible Animals" by permission of Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

ORPAH, a Moabitess who married one of Naomi's sons. Along with Ruth, her sister-in-law, she accompanied Naomi so far on her return to Bethlehem: but at Naomi's entreaty she returned to "her own people, and unto her god" (Ru. 1.^{4}, &c.). Orpah's return maintained the ancestral connection with Moab, and may explain why David took his parents there to be out of Saul's way (1 S. 22.$^{3f.}$).

OSPREY (Heb. 'azniyyah, Lv. 11.^{13}; Dt. 14.^{12}), a bird of the hawk tribe declared to be unclean. It seems probable enough that the bird intended is our O.; it is sometimes called the fishing eagle; it does not dive for its prey, but catches them when they come to the surface of the water. It is about two feet long, and the span of its wings as much as five. The LXX agrees with this identification as it renders haliaetos. The English name is a modification of OSSIFRAGE.

OSSIFRAGE (Heb. pereṣ, Lv. 11.^{13}; Dt. 14.^{12}), a bird, probably, fm. it being mentioned along with the eagle and the OSPREY, of the hawk or eagle class. The Heb. name pereṣ, "the breaker," agrees with the English name O., "the bone-breaker," hence Wood (Bible Animals) decides that the bird intended is the "lammergeier," wh. has the characteristic that it breaks the bones of its prey by dropping them from a height; it kills the tortoise thus despite its hard shell. Its length is about four feet and the stretch of its wings about ten. The LXX renders gups, "vulture."

OSTRICH, Heb. yā'ēn (La. 4.^{3}), bath-hayya'ănāh (Lv. 11.^{16}, &c.), RV. "ostrich," AV. "owl"; notzāh, RV. "feathers"; rĕnānīm, RV. "ostriches," AV. "peacocks" (Jb. 39.^{13}, &c.). Ḥăṣīdāh (Jb. 39.^{13}), AV. "ostrich," is prop. "stork" (RV.). In Lamentations (4.^{3}) Jeremiah says, "The daughter of my people has become cruel like the ostriches of the wilderness," referring to the way the O., making a mere depression in the sand, lays its eggs, depending largely on the sun's heat for the development of the chick. The description in Job (39.$^{13-18}$) brings out many of the characteristics of the O., though the deduction of stupidity ascribed to the O. may be regarded as unwarranted; if it does not fight for its young it endeavours by clever ruses to lead the hunter away fm. its nest. A supposed proof of folly, always flying to the windward, is really an evidence of wisdom, as its sense of smell is so keen that it is soon aware of any enemy in that direction. The O. is declared unclean (Lv. 11.^{16}; Dt. 14.^{15}) under the name in AV. of OWL; both eggs and flesh are used by the Arabs. It only barely can now be regarded as a native of Palestine, as it is occasionally seen in the Belqā to the SE. of Moab, but it was plentiful in earlier days.

Ostriches in Captivity

OTHNI, son of Shemaiah, grandson of Obed-edom, who, with his brothers, as a mighty man of valour ruled over the house of his father; they were "able men in strength for the service" of the tabernacle in the time of David (1 Ch. 26.[7]).

OTHNIEL, who took Kirjath-sepher, and received Achsah, dr. of Caleb, as his w. (Jo. 15.[16f.]; Jg. 1.[12f.]), may have been, according to the language of these passages, either the br. or the nephew of Caleb. But while Caleb is described as a "Kenezite," he is consistently called "son of Jephunneh" (Nu. 13.[6], &c.). It seems therefore more natural to take Kenez, not as fr. of Caleb and O., but as younger br. of Caleb, and fr. of O. This fully accounts for O. so long surviving Caleb. He was the first of "the Judges," delivering Isr. fm. Cushan-rishathaim, and holding his position for 40 yrs. (Jg. 3.[8ff.]).

OUCHES (Heb. mishbĕtzōth). The English word has suffered a change; it ought to be "nouch," but the n was confused with the final letter of the indefinite article. They appear to have been settings in filigree-work to hold the onyx stones on wh. were engraved the names of the tribes of Israel, and wh. the High Priest wore on his shoulders. Josephus says that they served as clasps to fasten the straps of the Breastplate to the shoulders of the High Priest (Ant. III. vii. 5). In LXX they are called aspiiskas, "rosettes."

Egyptian Oven

OVEN (Heb. tannūr = Arb. tannūr; Gr. klibanos; Ex. 8.[3], &c.; Mw. 6.[30], &c.). This is often a hole dug in the ground, with sides smoothly plastered. Fire is placed in the bottom: when it is sufficiently heated, the bread, in thin sheets, is stuck on the smooth sides, and baking is swiftly done. Sometimes the O. is built of clay, and is movable.

OWL. There are five Heb. words so rendered in A.V; but one, bath-hayya'ănāh, really means Ostrich; another, yanshūph, is trd. by RVm. "bittern," and by the LXX "ibis," though fm. its association with desolation it really means some species of O. A third, kōs, seems to be another species of O., although Bochart (Hierozo, iii. 17) inclines to think it may be the Pelican. A fourth, qippōz, occurs only in Is. 34.[15], and is rendered by RV. "arrow snake"; but as Post (HDB.) remarks, the nest-making and incubation there ascribed to this creature, while it suits a bird, does not suit a snake. The LXX, following a different reading, trs. "hedgehog." It probably is also an O. The fifth, līlīth, really means a "night monster" (see Lilith). The O. is common in Palestine, and is looked upon as of evil omen.

Owl

OX (Heb. bāqār, "one of a herd of cattle"; shūr, "an ox" proper, so also 'eleph). As Isr. was an agricultural people the O. was an animal of the utmost importance; the O. drew the plough; it trod the corn in threshing; it drew the cart that conveyed the sheaves to the threshing-floor; its flesh was used for feasting. It was the great symbol of wealth, consequently it was frequently used for sacrifices (Lv. 1.[2-9], 3.[1-5], 4.[3, 15], &c.). The law took note of oxen—notwithstanding Paul's disclaimer; they were to share in the Sabbath rest, they were not to be muzzled when treading out the corn. The O. of one's neighbour was presumed to be an article of property specially liable to be coveted, hence in the Tenth Commandment it has a place. Helpfulness to neighbours was to be exhibited in helping the ox of the neighbour that had fallen (Dt. 22.[4]). If an enemy's ox was seen going astray he was to be brought back (Ex. 23.[4]). It exhibits the merciful consideration that formed so marked a characteristic of the Jewish law that it was forbidden to yoke an ox and an ass together in ploughing on account of the strain on the weaker animal; the modern Arab has no qualms in yoking an ass and a camel together. Oxen are frequently depicted on the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments.

OZEM. (1) Brother of David, the sixth of Jesse's sons (1 Ch. 2.[15]). His name never occurs again. (2) Son of Jerahmeel, a chief in the clan of Hezron (1 Ch. 2.[25]).

P

PAARAI (2 S. 23.[35]), written NAARAI (which see) in 1 Ch. 9.[37].

INTERIOR OF ASSYRIAN PALACE (RESTORED)

PADAN-ARAM, RV. PADDAN-ARAM (Gn. 25.[20], &c.), denotes the region otherwise known as Aram-Naharaim, called in Greek MESOPOTAMIA. It seems to signify "field of Aram," padanu in Assyrian meaning a measure of land (cp. Arb. fiddān = what may be ploughed by a yoke of oxen). The name may have denoted more particularly the district near the Euphrates as distinguished from the more mountainous tracts to the N. and NE. In this region settled the kindred of Abraham, with the descendants of whom alone it was thought fitting for the heirs of the promises to intermarry. From Beersheba Abraham sent his steward to bring thence a wife for Isaac. It was on the pretext of finding a wife among the family relations that Jacob departed to Padan-aram. It was in the fields of this country that his skill and patience were so severely tried.

PADDLE is EV. translation of Heb. yātēd in Dt. 23.[13], where obviously some digging implement is intended. Probably "spade" gives the best mod. sense. The same Heb. word is used for tent-peg (Jg. 4.[21f.], &c.) and for the peg on which things are hung (Ek. 15.[9], &c.).

PADON, the ancestor of a family of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[44]; Ne. 7.[47]). In 1 Es. 5.[29] the name is given as "Phaleas."

PAGIEL, son of Ocran, head of the tribe of Asher at the Exodus (Nu. 1.[13], 2.[27], &c.).

PAHATH-MOAB. The word as it stands seems to mean "governor of Moab." It is the name of a Jewish clan consisting of two divisions, sons of Jeshua and sons of Joab, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[6]; Ne. 7.[11]). A further contingent came up with Ezra (8.[4]). Some of their number incurred displeasure by marrying foreign wives (10.[30]). They were represented among the builders of the wall (Ne. 3.[11]). The head of the clan was one of those who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[14]). The name is singular: no satisfactory account of it has been suggested. It may be due to some corruption of the text.

PAI, the royal city of Hadad, or Hadar (1 Ch.

11.[30]), the last named of the kings of Edom (Gn. 36.[39]). In this last passage the city is called "Pau."

PAINFUL, PAINFULNESS. In Ps. 73.[16] "painful" trs. the Heb. 'āmāl, "labour" or "trouble." In 2 Cor. 11.[27] "painfulness" represents the Greek mochthos, "labour" or "toil."

PAINT. The Hebrews seem to have had little sense of the distinction of colours, and the art of painting was hardly developed among them. The forms portrayed upon the wall of which Ezekiel speaks (8.[10], 23.[14]) were prob. cut with some tool and filled in with vermilion. The ceilings were sometimes painted with vermilion, as, to this day in the East, they are often tricked out in gaudy colours (Jr. 22.[14]). The use of antimony to paint lines round the eyes, thus adding to their apparent size and lustre, is a habit of ancient standing in Pal. (2 K. 9.[30]; Jr. 4.[30]; Ek. 23.[40]).

PALACE (Heb. 'armōn, "lofty place"; bīrāh, "fortress"; hēkāl, "temple": Gr. basileion, "king's house"; aulē, "court"). Among nomadic tribes the sheikh's tent is the largest; according to Griffiths (HDB.) and other Egyptologists Pharaoh means primarily "the big house." A palace is a great house inhabited by a king. The principal remains that have come down to us fm. ancient Egp. and Asyr. are palaces. As the king was in many cases the national High Priest, included in the palace was a Temple. Solomon's P. was in close proximity to the Temple, and formed one group with it. As beams were of limited length, and arches, although known, were but little used, pillars were necessitated, if apartments of sufficiently spacious size were to be constructed. Palaces seem generally to have been of not more than two stories. In NT. the P. was "a court," as an Eastern dwelling was mainly a court with rooms opening off it (Mw. 26.[58]). In Php. 1.[13] the word "palace" represents PRÆTORIUM.

PALAL, son of Uzai, who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Ne. 3.[25]).

PALANQUIN (RV.). See LITTER.

PALESTINE (Arb. Filistīna). The name is derived from that of the strong and enterprising people who were so long a thorn in the side of Israel, the Philistines. Although the name as applied to the whole country dates only from Greek times, none the less is its persistence an impressive testimony to the influence wielded by that people in the day of their power.

It is "the least of all lands." Its total area both east and west of Jordan comprises not more than about 10,000 square miles. Western Palestine stretches from the river Liṭāny in the north to a somewhat uncertain line drawn from Wādy el-'Arīsh to the south end of the Dead Sea, a distance of over 140 miles, its average breadth being about 40 miles. The western boundary is, of course, the Great Sea. The land beyond Jordan marches on the east with the Syrian desert. Western Palestine consists mainly of a line of limestone mountains, which form a continuation southward of the great Lebanon range. The slopes to westward are gradual, and between the base of the mountains and the sea runs a fertile plain, widening to the south, and broken only by the promontories at the Ladder of Tyre and Mt. Carmel. On the east the mountains sink steeply into the depths of the Jordan valley. This valley is, again, the continuation southward of the great hollow known in ancient times as Cœle Syria, between the Lebanon and Antilebanon ranges. It is as if a gigantic ploughshare had been driven in at the roots of Hermon, going deeper as it was drawn southward until it reached the Dead Sea, finally issuing on the sea coast at 'Aqaba. Thus we have the mighty furrow cutting off from the eastern plateau the long ridge, which is thrown up on the west in the form of the Central Range. The skirts of Great Hermon flow out to the south in the undulating heights of el-Jaulān. To the east and south-east they fall into the great plain which rolls away to the base of the mountain of Bashan, Jebel ed-Druze, the high basaltic dyke protecting the fruitful fields of the Ḥaurān against encroachment by the desert sands. The range terminates at a point almost due east of the south end of tho Sea of Galilee. With nothing to oppose its progress in the south, the desert has pushed westward until stopped by the hills on the eastern border of Gilead and Moab. Between the desert on the east, therefore, and the lip of the Jordan valley on the west, the richly diversified land of Gilead and Moab stretches from the Yarmuk in the north to Wādy el-Aḥsā, to the SE. of the Dead Sea.

GORGE OF THE LITÂNY

(1) Geology.—In the early Tertiary period Palestine appears to have been covered by a layer of nummulitic limestone. The shrinkage of the earth caused this to fold, thus forming the deep wrinkle of the Jordan valley, now known as El-Ghōr, "the hollow," par excellence. In later geologic times this was deepened by the erosive and corrosive action of successive floods. This erosion eventually carried away all the nummulitic limestone from the top of the ridge, laying bare the cretaceous strata beneath. Deep wadies were cut in the limestone plateau, leaving mountains between that tell by their height the strength of this erosive force, and the length of the time it was in action.

Contemporaneously with this process another was going on. When, in the early Tertiary period, the above-mentioned shrinkage of the earth occurred, the sea flowed into the depression, so that the Gulf of 'Aqaba reached up to the base of Hermon. Later, another shrinkage took place, prob. accompanied by a tremendous volcanic outburst in el-Lejā' and el-Jaulān, which fissured the limestone in many places, and at many more overflowed it with streams of lava that have hardened into black basalt. In the W. the volcanic forces were not so manifest. An outburst near the Horns of Ḥaṭṭin, flowing down to Tiberias, was checked by the sea. At the same time a land-rise took place to the S. of Edom, which cut off the branch of the sea to the N. This mass of water, presenting a wide surface to the action of the sun, gradually contracted by evaporation until it concentrated all the saline elements in the deepest part of the great chasm, the Sea of Salt, the Dead Sea.

It wd. seem that the original wrinkling of the earth's crust had left a subsidiary depression where the plain of Esdraelon is now, and that the waters of both seas washed across it, beating on the one side upon the precipitous cliffs of Carmel, and on the other upon the smooth sides of Gilboa.

Beneath the cretaceous strata there is the Nubian sandstone; but this is never exposed north of the Dead Sea. Immediately below the surface soil in many parts of Pal. there is a stratum of hard, indurated breccia, composed of limestone detritus bound together by dissolved lime. This general prevalence of limestone produced notable effects in the hist. of Pal. Limestone corrodes under the influence of water, leading to the formation of large caves. The softness of the rock suggests the enlargement of these to any extent required. Caves formed a refuge for the distressed and discontented in every age of Israel's hist. The kings defeated by Joshua took refuge in the cave of Makkedah. David hid in the cave of Adullam. The caves of Galilee became the strongholds of the Zealots, who were called "robbers" and ruthlessly slaughtered by the youthful Herod. Another result was the practice of cave sepulture. Recent volumes of the PEFQ. afford abundant illustration of ancient cave-burial. Many of the rock-cut tombs wh. abound in Pal. were certainly adaptations of caves. The tomb of Lazarus was "a cave." The rounded limestone hills were specially fitted for the culture of the vine, so characteristic a feature of Israel's life.

It is a singular fact that in Heb. Lit. there is no evidence that the Israelites ever observed geologic phenomena, altho' many of them are very arresting. The black cliffs of basalt intruding into the weathered light grey of the limestone; the raised beaches in the floor of the Jordan valley; and, above all, the numerous and striking fossil ammonites, a foot and more across, seem to have had no interest for them.

(2) Geography. (a) The Coast.—The coast line is fairly regular, sweeping southward, with a slight inclination to the west. Broken rocks, especially in the Phœnician district, alternate with stretches of sand and gravel. There is no bay or estuary that could afford safe anchorage for larger shipping. It has grown by deposits of Nile mud and sand brought northward by the sea currents, and the detritus carried down from the inland heights by native streams. At Tyre and Sidon rocky islets and reefs off the coast made possible the construction of capacious harbours: but these were always in the hands of the Phœnicians. The remains to be seen at Acre, Athlit, Cæsarea, Gaza, &c., show that artificial harbours were at one time built, providing accommodation for vessels of considerable burden. But they were exposed to the full force of the billows from the Great Sea, and could be maintained only by constant vigilance, and at great expense. The reefs at Jaffa (JOPPA) have always been a source of peril.

(b) The Coast Plain.—Palestine included the S. end of the Phœnician plain, the narrow strip of exceedingly fertile land between the mountain and the sea, from the Liṭāny to the Ladder of Tyre. This part, however, although allotted to Israel, was never possessed by them. South of Ras en-Naqūrah the hills recede fm. the shore, leaving the plain of Acre, which, varying from 2½ to 5 miles in breadth, runs southward to the base of Carmel. Much of the surface is marshy; but where the soil is under cultivation it yields richly. The gardens in the neighbourhood of Acre and Haifa are noteworthy. It connects with the plain of Esdraelon to the east by means of the gorge of the KISHON (see ACCHO). Cut across by the range of Carmel, the plain is resumed immediately to the south (see SHARON). As it runs southward it gradually increases in breadth to about 20 miles. From Jaffa to Wādy el-'Arīsh it forms the territory known as Philistia, including the great and famous Philistine cities which are dealt with in separate articles. Sand cliffs and dunes, often extending a considerable distance inland, stand all along the sea front. They tend to block the mouths of the rivers, producing marshes along their banks. They also threaten danger to cultivated land, which it is often difficult to avert. Many places which richly rewarded the industry of the ancients have been overwhelmed by sand-drift from the shore.

(c) The Shephelah.—Between the mountain of Judah and the coast plain, forming a district which does not properly belong to either, is a line of low hills, uniformly referred to in Heb. as "the Shephelah." AV. renders it variously "vale," "valley," "low plains," &c.: RV. always "lowland" (see SHEPHELAH).

(d) The Central Range.—The river Liṭāny drains the southern half of el-Biqā' (Cœle Syria). Ten miles NW. of Banias it turns abruptly to the W. and flowing, a foaming torrent, in the bottom of a tremendous gorge which cuts sheer through the mass of the mountain, it issues on the shore of the Mediterranean five miles north of Tyre. The breezy uplands to the south of this gorge, with richly varied scenery, woodland, hill, spacious valley and deep glen, formed the province of Upper Galilee in the time of Josephus. About five miles NW. of Safed the hills culminate in Jebel Jermuk, the highest mountain in Palestine proper, the summit being c. 4000 ft. above sea level. Its eastern slopes dip steeply towards Meirōn, sinking into Wādy Leimūn, a chasm running north and south, which splits the country in two. The range of which Jermuk is a member runs east and west, forming the S. boundary of the province. The eastern heights overhang the Jordan valley, and sink in rough, rocky slopes to the northern shore of the Sea of Galilee. The Lower province is more broken in character than the Upper. But the soil in the valleys is very rich, being in large part decomposed lava. The peasants are industrious and fairly prosperous, cultivating the olive, the vine, &c., and growing good crops of grain. Many of the hills are covered with bushes, with here and there a stretch of forest. In the heart of the hills lies the plain of Asochis (Arb. el-Baṭṭauf), almost due west from Tiberias, into which from the east juts the ridge of Jebel Ṭor'ān, Jebel Kaukab being a prominent feature of the landscape to the NW. The hills rise to the south, surrounding the hollow in wh. lies the town of Nazareth, and then drop almost precipitously on the northern edge of the plain of Esdraelon. From Qurūn Ḥaṭṭīn—the traditional Mount of Beatitudes—and Mount Tabor, the land steps down eastward in a series of broad arable terraces, making a final plunge of about 2000 ft. to the shore of the Sea of Galilee. The plain of Esdraelon was included in the province of Lower Galilee. It forms the only important break in the continuity of the mountain chain. It seems as if a gigantic mass had been torn from the central range and hurled over to the north-west, where it forms the dark, wooded ridge of Mount Carmel, leaving as fragments along the edge of the Jordan valley, Tabor, Little Hermon, and Gilboa. The plain forms roughly a triangle, the base stretching from Jenīn (En-gannim) to Mount Carmel, with the apex at Mount Tabor. The floor is covered deep with volcanic mould of extraordinary fertility. It is drained by the Kishon, "that ancient river," in its deep bed pursuing its tortuous way to Carmel and the sea. Its fruitfulness attracted the Arab hordes from the East, while its open breadths formed the theatre of many decisive battles in the long history of Pal. Its approaches were guarded by a chain of fortresses on the south, the chief of which was Megiddo, now el-Lejjūn, in the SW., and by Jezreel (mod. Zer'īn) on the east: these two in turn giving their name to the plain (see JEZREEL). A belt of low hills running SE. and NW. severs Esdraelon from Sharon, rising in the NW. to the wooded heights of CARMEL, and terminating in the promontory on the seashore. On the southern edge of Esdraelon (Arb. Merj ibn 'Amr) begins the region of Mount Ephraim, later known as the province of Samaria. It is divided into two portions, dissimilar in character, by Wādy esh-Sha'īr, which cuts across from the coast plain to the pass at Nāblus, and Wādy el-Ifjim, which runs down thence to the Jordan valley. The northern part consists mainly of scattered hills, with more continuous ridges breaking down eastward. These gather themselves to throw off the mass of Mount Gilboa, which runs northward along the edge of the Ghōr, and then bends westward, sinking into the plain at Zer'in. There are many rich valleys among these uplands, the most important break being the plain of Dothan, to the SW. of Jenīn, across which passes the ancient caravan road from Mt. Gilead and the East to Egypt. The hills are for the most part bare, or covered with stunted bushes: but the valleys between, watered by many springs, tempt the industry of the peasants by their great fertility. Luxuriant orchards and olive groves alternate with vegetable gardens, and, in the season, with breadths of waving grain. To this division belongs Mt. EBAL, the most prominent mountain in Central Palestine. It forms the northern guardian of the pass, in the throat of which lies Nāblus, the mod. representative of the ancient SHECHEM. Streams of "living water" from the springs near Nāblus, flowing down Wādy esh-Sha'īr, "the valley of barley," create a veritable "paradise." Five miles to the NW. lies the hill of Samaria, the capital of Omri and of Herod, with its encircling mountains and charming outlook over Sharon to the sea, more "beautiful for situation," perhaps, than any city of Palestine.

South of the pass at Nāblus rises Mt. Gerizim, steep and forbidding, associated for millenniums with the sacred rites of the Samaritans. Its northern summit overhangs the well of Jacob, and from its eastern base rolls out the plain of Makhna. The scattered hills disappear as the range consolidates, to pass southward with a fairly regular skyline through Benjamin and Judah. The southern boundary of the province was not constant. A natural dividing line ran from Nahr el-'Aujeh, north of Jaffa, along Wādy Deir Ballūṭ, reaching the watershed by Wādy el-Jīb, and passing down south-eastward by Wādy Sāmieh and Wādy el-'Aujeh to the Jordan. The boundary in the days of the double monarchy, however, seems to have been the valley of Ajalon, which runs from the plain by way of the Beth-horons to the watershed, and the wadies Suweinīt and el-Qelt, issuing in the Jordan valley at Jericho, Bethel thus falling within the Northern Kingdom. Neby Samwīl, possibly the ancient MIZPAH, c. five miles NW. of Jerusalem, is the most prominent height on the uplands of Benjamin. Anathoth, the town of Jeremiah, lies c. 2½ miles to the NE. of the city, on the edge of the desert. Jerusalem itself is situated to the east of the watershed, guarded on the east by the rampart of Olivet, wh. rises beyond the brook Kidron (see JERUSALEM). The rolling surface of the plateau is for the most part pasture land, but in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem it is of extraordinary fertility. In this district, on hills that are now bare and stony, there are many traces of ancient vine culture. This is still a prosperous industry in the valleys around Hebron: Here the mountain of Judah reaches its greatest height, the higher summits commanding a view of the wilderness and the Jordan valley. The range then gradually sinks through the Negeb, the country assigned to Simeon, towards Beersheba. Beyond the uncertain boundary the high limestone plateau, et-Tih, "the wandering," runs away to the south, forming with the central range a link connecting the mountains of Lebanon with the peaks of Sinai. The eastern slopes of the mountain of Judah are known in OT. as Midbar Yehūdāh, "desert steppe," or "wilderness of Judah." It is indeed a savage, forbidding wilderness. In the spring-time it is covered by a scanty herbage which soon disappears. The bare cliffs of its eastern edge, broken by tremendous gorges and deep clefts, frown darkly over the Dead Sea, and the lower Jordan valley.

SHECHEM AND MOUNT GERIZIM, FROM THE NORTH-WEST

The watershed of the range is much nearer the Jordan than the sea, about two-thirds of the land lying to the west of it. The level of the Ghōr is far below that of the coast plain. The descent seaward is therefore gradual, down long, dwindling slopes: that to the E. is steep, often precipitous. The alluvium lies deep in the bottom of the western vales, and in these great hollows field and orchard yield richly in response to the peasants' toil. To the east the rocky sides of the mountain are laid bare. The storms of winter keep them peeled. They are shattered by earthquakes and scarred by torrent-beds, and by the jagged edges of the great ravines worn deep into the mountain by the cataracts of winter rain.

Along the ridge of the mountain ran the great highway from north to south, connected with the coast land and the east by branches down the valleys; and on this line stood the great centres of population, and the main strongholds of the land: Nazareth, Samaria, Shechem, Shiloh, Bethel, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Hebron.

(e) The Jordan Valley.—This valley forms a depression with which there is nothing to compare on the surface of the globe. It is, as has been stated above, a continuation of the hollow of Cœle Syria in the north, and it extends to the Gulf of 'Aqaba in the south. From the charming and fruitful district of the JORDAN springs, south-west of Great Hermon, with the sites of old DAN and CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, we pass quickly to the great swamps of el-Ḥūleh, which occupy a large part of the floor of the valley. The highlands of Upper Galilee drop steeply on the edge of the valley to the west. On the east the slopes rise more gradually to the volcanic hills of the Jaulān. To the S. of el-Ḥūleh there are considerable breadths of excellent pastoral and agricultural land, largely cultivated to-day by two colonies of Jews. Soon, however, the mountains on either side advance to the river banks. Down the rocky bottom of the gorge thus formed the foaming waters descend to the swampy plain of el-Baṭeiḥah, through which it winds in a sluggish stream to the SEA OF GALILEE. A strip of plain runs round the north and north-west coast of the sea, in which were the cities of CAPERNAUM, BETHSAIDA OF GALILEE, and MAGDALA (see also GENNESARET). The site of old Tiberias was near that of the mod. town on the western shore. In the mountain wall that rises high both east and west of the sea, gaps are made by the great wadies that drain the neighbouring uplands. Away to the south-east, on a lofty site beyond the gorge of the Yarmuk, lie the ruins of ancient GADARA.

South of the Sea of Galilee the valley bears more strictly the name of el-Ghōr. Hemmed in by the mountains on either side, it varies considerably in breadth, with a steady fall to the south. Within the Ghōr a second valley has been hollowed out by the Jordan (ez-Zōr), in the bottom of which the river flows in its winding bed (see JORDAN). The Zōr is filled with luxuriant vegetation, brushwood, poplars, tamarisks, &c., and forms a favourite haunt of wild boar and other animals. From Wādy el-'Ashsheh, c. 11 miles S. of the Sea of Galilee, the mountain wall to the west recedes from the river, forming the plain of Beisān, into which falls Nahr Jalūd from the plain of Jezreel. It is well watered and fruitful, and is still to some extent cultivated. Wādy el-Māliḥ forms its southern boundary. From this point the plain west of the river is much narrower than that on the east. Here the west bank of the Zōr presents an unlovely aspect, a series of unsightly bare mounds, surrounded by a network of deep winding chasms. Wādy Fār'a opens into the Ghōr in a wide, fruitful, and well-watered plain called Qarāwā el-Mas'ūdī, to the S. of which the striking peak, Qarn Ṣarṭabeh, thrusts itself abruptly into the valley. From here southward the floor of the valley is desert. There are a few small oases near the mountains on either side of the river, breaking the monotony. The most important is that of JERICHO, which is watered by streams from Wādy el-Qelt, 'Ain es-Sulṭān, &c. Here grow the Egyptian balsam, the tamarisk, the acacia, &c. The palms of old time have disappeared. The vine and the banana are cultivated; and the crops of grain and vegetables raised with little toil prove the amazing fruitfulness of the soil. The palm is still found at 'Ain es-Suweimeh, at the NE. corner of the Dead Sea. The surface of this sea is about 1300 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. It is shut in on the west by the highlands of the Judæan wilderness, and on the east by the western cliffs of the lofty Moabite plateau (see SALT SEA). Beyond the salt marshes to the south (see SIDDIM, VALE OF) a line of white cliffs crosses the valley from NW. to SE., marking the S. boundary of el-Ghōr. From this point to the Gulf of 'Aqaba the valley is known as the ARABAH.

It has already been said that the Jordan valley is the bed of an ancient sea (Geology, above). The general facts may be stated here. The changes of the early Tertiary period left a great lake, formed of the imprisoned waters of the ocean, stretching from the roots of Hermon in the north to the highest level of the Arabah in the south. This exposed a wide surface to the rays of the sun, and evaporation proceeded at a rate greater than the supplies from rainfall and springs could counteract. In the course of ages, therefore, the sea gradually shrank, leaving first, in the northern reaches, the marshes and lake of el-Ḥūleh, and then the larger basin of the Sea of Galilee. Finally, after ages more, the salt waters were confined to the limits of the Dead Sea. There, evaporation on the one hand, and rainfall and springs on the other, being fairly balanced, they have remained within historic time. Traces of this old-world sea and the process of shrinkage are found in successive beaches, at various levels above the present. Three are quite distinctly to be seen, one a little above the level of the lake, a second 30 ft., and another 100 ft. above it. There are also the beds of grey marl, deposited by the sea, worn into mounds and terraces by the action of water, found in many parts of the valley. At the south end of the Dead Sea again there is the deposit of salt—the salt cliffs known as Jebel Usdum, "Mountain of Sodom." The desert, in which we noted the oases, consists of the salt mud of the old sea bottom.

(f) Eastern Palestine.—This division of the land lies east of the Jordan, and stretches between the valley on the west and the desert on the east, from Mount Hermon and his eastern outrunners on the north to Wādy el-Aḥsā in the south. This region is cut in two by the tremendous gorge of the Yarmuk, which enters the Jordan to the SE. of the Sea of Galilee. The two districts thus severed are entirely dissimilar in character. That of the north was in far-off times the theatre of appalling volcanic phenomena, which not only left their impress upon its physical features but largely determined the course of its history. In the NW. part of this district, running southward from Bāniās, is a series of conical hills, extinct volcanoes all, known by the name of Telul el-Hīsh, "forest hills." Between and around these hills are strewn in confusion great lava blocks. A few oaks here and there are all that remain of the ancient forest. With the spring a fine crop of grass grows where the ground is not covered with stones. The springs are numerous, and far on in summer the present writer has seen the flocks of the Bedouin rejoicing in the fresh and plentiful pasture.

Away to the SE. a remarkable dyke of basalt is formed by a group of volcanic mountains, known now as Jebel ed-Druze, formerly Jebel Ḥaurān, and in ancient times "the mountain of BASHAN." The highest point, Tell el-Qēnā, approaches 6000 ft. The western slopes are well wooded, the oak being prominent still. Springs are also plentiful, and the lower reaches are industriously cultivated by the Druzes, who have given the mountain its modern name. The splendid fortress of Salkhad crowns the ridge to the south, and such ruins as those of 'Ormān, Hebrān, Suweideh, Qanawāt, and Shahba tell of a numerous and prosperous population in ancient days. From the craters in the NW. of the mountain a terrific lava stream flowed out to form el-Lejā', which is described in the article on TRACHONITIS. To the west of the mountain lies the plateau of en-Nuqrah, "the hollow." It is covered deep with reddish-brown mould of decomposed lava, and forms the richest grain-growing district in Syria (see HAURĀN). The city of BOZRAH stands on the SE. edge of this plain, and is united by the old Roman road with Der'ah in the west. S. of Der'ah runs the low range of ez-Zumleh, cutting off from en-Nuqrah the plain eṣ-Ṣuweit, the SW. part of this district. To the east of el-Lejā' lies the fruitful breadth of el-Baṭaniyeh, where the rich soil is so loose that the harvest is gathered by pulling the grain out of the earth. Diret et-Tulūl is an outburst of lava similar to el-Lejā', somewhat larger in extent and wilder and more forbidding in character. These basaltic ramparts on the east guard the rich lands to the west against encroachment by the desert sands. Southward from en-Nuqrah stretches the desert-steppe of Ḥamād.

South of the Yarmuk the basalt disappears, save in the neighbourhood of Gadara. The prevailing formation is white limestone. This continues through the whole length of what bears the general name of Mount Gilead to Wādy Ḥesbān in the south. Beyond this wady, in the high plateau of Moab, the volcanic rocks reappear, and, along with the original white limestone, there crops up the red sandstone characteristic of the mountains of Edom.

North of the cleft of Nahr ez-Zerqā the district is now called 'Ajlūn. Immediately south of the Yarmuk, the rolling surface of the plateau at no point rises to a great height. S. of Wādy Tibneh we enter the district known as Jebel 'Ajlūn, which culminates in Jebel Ḥakārt, not far from Jerash. In general the level is higher here towards the east than further north. The great strength of Qal'at er-Rabaḍ, which some would identify with Ramoth Gilead, occupies a height north of Wādy 'Ajlūn, dominating a wide area.

In fruitfulness the land of 'Ajlūn cannot compare with the volcanic soil of the Ḥaurān: but in many respects it is the most attractive region of Palestine. It is rich in forests, wh. the modern inhabitants have done little to injure. Many of the hills are clothed to their summits with waving green. The terebinth, the carob, the almond, and the olive abound. Evidence of ancient vine-culture is also found: the rock-hewn presses perhaps served for the making of both oil and wine. In the deep wadies which cut through the country the sound of running water is heard all through the summer; and the flush of oleander in season lends a touch of pleasing colour.

South of Wādy ez-Zerqā (see JABBOK) the levels rise considerably. The range of Jebel Jil'ād runs southward, culminating in Jebel Ōsha', about 3600 ft. high, three miles NW. of es-Salṭ. To the south and south-east many of the mountains reach a height of over 3000 ft. To the NE. of this district lies the remarkable plain el-Buqei'a, an ancient sea-basin the waters of which found outlet by Wādy ez-Zerqā. It is good land, and in part cultivated now. The mountains are more rocky than those north of ez-Zerqā, but are also in great part covered with shady woods. These, however, are suffering seriously at the hands of Circassian colonists and others. Vineyards are here found on the slopes. This industry is followed with great success by the natives of es-Salṭ. As the grapes may not be used for wine they are made into raisins, in which a brisk trade is carried on.

The northern part of the plateau of Moab stretches from Wādy Ḥesbān to Wādy el-Mōjib. It rises gradually towards the east, where a range of low limestone hills mark it off from the desert. The western edge of the plateau sinks steeply to the shore of the Dead Sea, torn as it is by many deep gorges worn by the winter torrents from the uplands. The undulating surface of the plateau has an average height of about 2600 ft. To the west there are several outstanding hills, the most famous of which is Jebel Neba (see NEBO), the summit of which commands a view of extraordinary extent, variety, and interest over the Jordan valley and Western Pal. South of Wādy Zerqā Ma'īn rises the lofty mass of Jebel 'Aṭṭārūs. Nearer the western edge, surrounded by deep gorges, is the hill Mkaur, the site of the stronghold of Machærus, nearly 3700 ft. above the Dead Sea. South of Wādy el-Mōjib the monotony of the plateau is broken by the hill called Jebel Shiḥān, about 2800 ft. high. Southward the land rises, and the hill on which the ancient fortress of Kerak lies, guarded on every side by deep ravines, is not less than 3370 ft. high. Still higher is the plateau southward before it sinks swiftly into Wādy el-Aḥsā, beyond which the ascents of the Edom range begin.

The rich soil of these spacious uplands is in part under cultivation, bearing fine crops of grain. The bulk of it, however, especially towards the east, is used for pasture. A few scattered terebinths serve only to emphasise the absence of trees. To the south of Wādy Kerak the springs are numerous, and in the limestone rock many cisterns are found, constructed to capture and preserve the overflow from the plentiful rains which fertilise the lofty plains. The steep slopes and cliffs to the west are for the most part quite bare, but luxuriant vegetation often covers the deep floor and openings of the great gorges that, in aspects both picturesque and awful, break down upon the shore.

(3) Streams.—Of the wadies and winter torrent beds that furrow the mountains both east and west of Jordan no account need be attempted here. Certain great valleys collect the waters from numerous tributary hollows, and carry them down to the sea or to the Jordan. All the streams that enter the sea have branches far up among the hills. By far the greatest number of these dry up entirely during the drought of summer. We may note here the perennial streams; that is, those that depend for their continuance on springs at some part of their course. In the Philistine plain we have Nahr Sukreir, which forms the opening for a system of wadies coming down from the district of Hebron; and Nahr Rubīn, wh. takes the water from Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār and its affluents near Jerusalem. Into Nahr el-'Aujeh, to the north of Jaffa, flow the waters from the vale of Ajalon, Wādy Deir Ballūṭ and Wādy Kānah, draining all the slopes west of the watershed, from Michmash to the south of Gerizim. Strong springs in the plain near Antipatris preserve the current all the year. Several wadies lose themselves in the marsh land near the shore, to drain which the cutting now known as Nahr el-Falik was made. Here grows the Syrian papyrus. Into Wādy Iskanderūnah, from the district of Shechem and Samaria, flow Wādy esh-Sha'īr, &c. Nahr el-

WATERFALL ON EL-'AUJEH, PLAIN OF SHARON

Mefjir enters the sea two miles south of Cæsarea. Its longest tributary traverses the plain of Dothan. The wadies in the south-eastern part of the Carmel Range fall into Nahr ez-Zerqā, the "Crocodile River" of Pliny. In the sluggish waters of this stream, beset with reeds and tamarisks, it is said the crocodile may still be seen. Several streams coming down from Carmel are lost in the marshes north of ez-Zerqā. These are partially drained by Nahr ed-Difleh. Immediately north of Mount Carmel Nahr el-Muqaṭṭa' flows through the marshes to the sea. It drains the whole of the great plain of Esdraelon and its surrounding hills, the longest arms reaching Jenīn and climbing the slopes of Gilboa. It is joined in the plain of Acre by Wādy el-Melek, which gathers the waters from the plain el-Baṭṭauf and its neighbourhood (see KISHON). Nahr Na'mān, which enters the sea immediately to the south of Acre, receives the waters of Wādy Abillīn and Wādy Halzūn, which drain the north-western district of Lower Galilee. Nahr Mefshūḥ is a smaller stream to the north of Acre, on the banks of which are the finest gardens in the country. We may also mention the copious spring at Ras el-'Ain, fully three miles south of Tyre, which scatters beauty and fruitfulness over the plain. The main wadies coming down westward from the mountains of Upper Galilee are Wādy el-'Ezzīyeh, c. five miles south of Tyre, and Wādy el-Hubeshīyeh, c. one mile north of that city. Much of the water of this province drains northward into the Liṭāny (Nahr el-Qāsimīyeh).

For the head waters of the Jordan and its main tributaries see JORDAN. A short stream of brackish water enters the Sea of Galilee from the fountains at eṭ-Ṭābgha. Several wadies cross the plain of Gennesaret: Wādy 'Amūd draining the hollow between Safed and the Jermuk range, Wādy er-Rubadīyeh from the district SE. of Rāmeh, and Wādy el-Hamām coming down from Ḥaṭṭīn through the tremendous gorge behind el-Mejdel. There is also the stream from 'Ain el-Mudawwerah on the western edge of the plain. Immediately south of the lake Wādy Fejjās comes down from the uplands west of the sea: then come Wādy el-Bīreh from the hollow between Tabor and Little Hermon, and Nahr Jalūd at Beisan, the main source of which is 'Ain Jalūd (see HAROD, WELL OF), on the S. edge of the plain of Jezreel. The next considerable stream is Wādy el-Jōzeleh, by which Wādy Fārah, draining the district north-east and east of Shechem, falls into the Jordan. Wādy el-Qelt also brings down a considerable volume of water, gathered from the wadies and springs to the NE. of Jerusalem. The wadies about Jerusalem find their outlet to the Dead Sea by Wādy en-Nār, which cuts a deep, winding path through the wilderness. The spring of sweet, warm water at 'Ain Jidy (En-gedi) should be mentioned, and here also the water collected by the wadies from the uplands east of Hebron enters the sea.

On the east of Jordan a number of streams come from the Jaulān uplands, entering the Sea of Galilee through the plain el-Baṭeiḥah. Wādy Samak and Wādy Fīq descend from the east, opening on the shore of the sea. The first great tributary of the Jordan is the Yarmuk (Sharī'at el-Manādireh), which gathers the waters from the eastern Jaulān, the whole of the Haurān as far as the slopes of Jebel ed-Druze, and the northern part of Mount Gilead. At their confluence below the Sea of Galilee it carries a volume of water almost equal to that of the Jordan. Of the smaller wadies to the south the more important are Wādy Yābis and Wādy 'Ajlūn, which drain the central part of Jebel 'Ajlūn. Then comes Wādy ez-Zerqā, which, rising in the neighbourhood of 'Ammān (RABBATH AMMON), flows northward and eastward, touching the desert at Ras Zerqā—whence possibly its name: then it turns again to the north, and finally westward, pursuing a tortuous course in the bottom of a great ravine, joining the Jordan at ed-Dāmieh (see JABBOK). Wādy Nimrīn and Wādy Ḥesbān are the chief outlets for the waters of southern Gilead. Of the great wadies that break down from the plateau of Moab upon the E. shore of the Dead Sea, we need mention only Wādy Zerqā Mā'īn, with the ruins of Hammām ez-Zerqā, the ancient Callirrhoë; Wādy el-Mōjib, the ancient ARNON, which with its confluents drains a wide region; Wādy el-Kerak, which enters the bay north of el-Lisān; and Wādy el-Aḥsā, the southern boundary of the province, which reaches the Dead Sea at the south-east corner.

(4) Roads.—Palestine has been described as a bridge, with the Mediterranean on the one hand and the sea of sand on the other, over which, in the ancient world, all communication between north and south had to pass. The great military highway, followed by the armies of Egypt and those from the Euphrates valley, through the long ages of their ever-renewed struggle for supremacy, ran along the coast plain, round the eastern end of the Carmel range, by the pass of Megiddo into the plain of Esdraelon, then westward and along the coast once more to the north. The detour by Megiddo avoided the narrow passage at the promontory of Carmel, which might be defended by a handful of resolute men. Other difficulties had to be overcome. The making of the road round the rocky faces of the headlands forming the Ladder of Tyre involved no mean engineering skill. The like is true of the part at the Dog River (Nahr el-Kelb), north of Beyrout, where inscriptions hewn in the rock commemorate the passing of armaments in different ages. From Damascus, itself the port for "ships of the desert" arriving from the Euphrates valley by way of Palmyra, a great road led to the SW. over the Jaulān. It crossed the Jordan south of the Waters of Merom, where later a bridge (Jisr Benāt Ya'qūb) was built, and proceeded by way of Khān Jubb Yosif to the N. shore of the Sea of Galilee. Here it was joined by a road from the east wh. crossed the Jordan at its mouth; then bifurcating, one branch proceeded westward to the sea at Acre, the other ascended by Wādy el-Ḥamām and passed southward by way of Khān et-Tujjār ("Inn of the Merchants") and the eastern flanks of Tabor and Little Hermon to the plain of Esdraelon. Here it was joined by the caravan route from Gilead and the East, which crossed at the fords of Jordan and came up the S. edge of the vale of Jezreel. Again a branch ran westward to the sea: the main road, crossing the S.E. bay of Esdraelon, passed by way of the plain of Dothan to the coast plain, where it united with the great north road to Egypt. The roads running north and south were confined to the plain or to the watershed of the mountains. The deep wadies that cut the lower slopes were, for beasts of burden, either difficult or impossible to cross. Hence, as we have seen, the main centres of population were gathered along the line of the watershed, on the road running from Jenīn to Shechem, Jerusalem and Hebron, passing thence through the Negeb to Beersheba. Here branches run out to Gaza in the west, and eastward to Arabia and 'Aqaba: another ran southward to Sinai, while the desert path, "the way to Shur," led across the wilderness to Egypt. A road from Edom swept round the south end of the Dead Sea and climbed the mountains to Hebron. Several roads approach the towns on the watershed from the Dead Sea shore—one from Masada, one from 'Ain Jidy, and one from 'Ain Feshkhah. Further north three roads go up from Jericho. One enters the mountains to the SW., joins the road from 'Ain Feshkhah, crosses Wādy en-Nār a little to the north of Mar Saba, throws out a branch to Bethlehem, and proceeds north-west to Jerusalem. The second strikes westward up the southern edge of Wādy el-

Road in Modern Palestine

Qelt. It is a steep and tortuous path, affording many glimpses into the shuddering depths of the gorge. It has been from of old the great pilgrim way, and has been the scene of many tragedies. The third climbs the mountain to the north of Wādy el-Qelt, goes round by Michmash, and on to Bethel.

From the coast plain the Judæan uplands may be reached by a series of valleys that pierce the high wall of the western edge of the plateau; the main openings being by Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār, up which the railway runs to Jerusalem; Wādy 'Aly, which is followed by the carriage road; and the vale of Ajalon by way of the Beth-horons, along which the tides of battle have so often rolled. All, however, are easy of defence. They are steep and crooked, with precipitous sides, now with shingly bottom and anon strewn with gigantic blocks of stone, with passages where a few men might successfully oppose an army.

Mount Ephraim lay much more open to approach, and need not be dealt with in such detail. The main roads led from Jaffa up Wādy Kāna, and from Cæsarea along Wādy esh-Sha'īr. These roads united at Shechem, and, running through the pass, continued eastward to the fords of the Jordan at ed-Dāmieh, forming in ancient times, as now, the chief means of communication between the east and the west. A road on either side of the Jordan, in the valley, enabled travellers between north and south to escape the difficulties of the long mountain road. Jews from Galilee also, who wished to avoid Samaritan territory in their journeys to and from Jerusalem, were wont to cross the Jordan at the Sea of Galilee, take their way down the eastern side, and cross again opposite Jericho.

On the east of the Jordan the great gold and frankincense road from Arabia Felix to Damascus must always have followed pretty closely the line of the present pilgrimage route, along which the Damascus-Mecca railway has been constructed. The highway from Edom climbed to the uplands from Wādy el-Aḥṣā, and, keeping well out on the table-land to avoid entanglement in the gorges to the west, it passed to el-Kerak, and northward, crossing the Arnon at Aroer, to Madeba. Thence a branch ran down to the fords of Jordan and Jericho. The road bent north-eastward to 'Ammān. From this point a road crossed the country to es-Salṭ and down to the ford at ed-Dāmieh. The north roads from 'Ammān and es-Salṭ united before crossing the Jabbok, and proceeded by way of Jerash and Ṣūf, to the north of which a branch went NE. to join the pilgrimage road to the south of el-Muzeirīb. Another went NW. to Gadara on the south lip of the Yarmuk. From es-Salṭ a road runs to the NW. into the Jordan valley and along the east bank to the Sea of Galilee. These are the main roads to-day, and probably they follow the ancient tracks. This was true of the Roman roads connecting the great cities of the Decapolis. The Romans were the great road-builders of ancient days, and their work has borne the test of time. A very perfect specimen may be seen between Ḍer'ah and Bozrah. The modern track usually runs alongside these ancient highways. The muleteers and camel-drivers avoid the hard pavement, which they think beats up the feet of their animals, taking it only in winter, when the rains have made the paths difficult.

In pre-Roman times the roads for the most part were probably not unlike the modern tracks. Built roads were not necessary for the transport of chariots designed for use in battle. The Heb. word mĕṣillāh (EV. "highway"), however, frequently occurs, meaning lit. something "heaped up." This seems to imply some artificial structure. But although this is applied to roads for common use (Jg. 20.[31], &c.), and also to highways prepared for special occasions (Is. 49.[11], 62.[10], &c.), no example of the work has yet been discovered.

(5) Climate.—Palestine falls within the subtropical zone. The difference between the longest and the shortest day is only four hours. The year falls into two divisions: the season of rain and the season of drought (see SUMMER and WINTER). For many years exact observations of temperature and rainfall have been recorded at different points; e.g. at Jerusalem and Tiberias. The great variations in temperature within 24 hours are noteworthy.

The coast plain is naturally somewhat warmer than the mountains. The annual mean temperature is 70° Fah. Between Port Said and Beyrout, all along the coast, there is not half a degree of difference. The nearness of the sea also prevents the great variations within the 24 hours to be noted in the other districts. Harvest comes on somewhat earlier than in the interior uplands. The rainfall also is less.

On the mountains the annual rainfall is about 20 inches, and the average temperature may be taken at 62°. The variation, however, is very great, as frost and snow are not unknown.

The Ghr, in all respects singular, represents tropical climatic conditions. The high walls of the mountains east and west shut it in, and the sun's rays, pouring down into the great trough, produce a very high temperature. This is increased by reflection of the heat from the steep sides of the valley. In the lower reaches, by Jericho and the Dead Sea, this is especially to be noted. There the temperature can never be much under 80° Fah. even at night, while by day it may exceed 130°. In the northern and shallower part naturally the heat is not so great. But the temperature is never very low. In five years at Tiberias the writer never once saw snow. Some of the natives, however, remembered having seen a slight fringe of ice on the shore. The lowest monthly mean temperature recorded at Tiberias in 1905 was 44° Fah., as compared with 36.7° at Jerusalem in the month of January. The corresponding figures for 1906 were 49.4° and 39° respectively. The highest monthly mean temperature in Tiberias in 1905 was 102.2° as compared with 88.9° in Jerusalem; the former in August, the latter in September. The corresponding figures for 1906 were 99.7° and 85.9° respectively, both in the month of August. The rainfall at Tiberias in 1905 was 20.88 inches in 51 days: at Jerusalem 34.220 inches in 58 days. For 1906, a dry year, the figures are: Tiberias 14.72 inches in 54 days, Jerusalem 28.140 inches in 59 days. In 1907, an average year, the rainfall at Tiberias was distributed as follows:—

January,	rain fell on 11 days—total,	5.04 inches.

Harvest is fully a month earlier in the oases lower down the valley than round the Sea of Galilee.

On the high tableland east of the Jordan the variations of temperature are much greater; the rainfall is heavier, and the heights are frequently covered with snow. The heat of summer is also very great on the confines of the desert. No extended observations have yet been made. While the days are hot the nights are bitterly cold.

The changes of temperature between day and night (Gn. 31.[40]; Jr. 36.[30]) are most violent in summer. The air then is crisp and dry: this counteracts the discomforts, and modifies the injuries such sudden changes are fitted to cause.

For Water Supply see Water: see also art. Wind.

It is maintained by some (e.g. Buhl, GAP. 54f.) that the climate of Palestine has sensibly altered within historic time, the moisture decreasing as the heat increased. The great forests which in old time covered great areas of the country have disappeared. The cedars also which clothed the mountains in the north have gone, with the exception of a few in remote recesses. It is contended that this could not have been brought about by the labour of men, and must be due to the alteration of the climate. The loss of the trees would, of course, accelerate the process. By this climatic change is explained the gradual decay of civilisation in the East (Blankenhorn, quoted by Buhl, GAP. 54f.). Others (e.g. Benzinger, HA. 32) hold that there is no evidence to prove such a change, and that in the conditions of to-day are repeated practically those of the oldest times. It is a climate presenting great contrasts: hot days and cold nights, glowing south winds and biting north winds, torrential rains and burning droughts. It is healthy, nevertheless, and the constitution accustomed to these changes acquires a fine firmness and elasticity. Fever, dysentery, and ophthalmia are the most common troubles, and even in the height of summer their ravages are not excessive. There is no need for complicated garments: a simple shirt serves the peasant by day, and his cloak furnishes both bed and covering by night. The houses are as simple as the dress, built of mud and unhewn stones. No great toil is called for in tilling the soil. As it is "watered from heaven," he is largely spared the work of irrigation. This last kept the people in conscious and immediate relations with Jehovah, whose the land was and in whose hands were the sources of the rain. Plentiful showers at the proper seasons, with their promise of a year of plenty, gladdened their hearts as a sign of Jehovah's favour. The withholding of the rain threatened famine, and was taken as a mark of Jehovah's displeasure.

(6) Flora.—A country where such varied climatic conditions prevail is naturally rich in varieties of plants. We have in the Ghōr tropical vegetation; in the wastes of Judah that which is characteristic of the desert; and in the rest the ordinary flora of the Mediterranean coast lands. The plants mentioned in the Bible are described in articles under their own names. Here only a general outline is given.

Nothing could well seem more dead than the hard-baked earth after the summer drought; but no sooner do the first rains fall and moisten the soil than the land is covered with refreshing green. The winter cold does nothing to arrest this growth. When in the end of February the heat begins to return the land is speedily covered as with a gorgeous carpet, the green being sprinkled with many coloured flowers. Many species of narcissus, crocus, tulip, anemone and ranunculus, with their bright petals, bespangle the fields—the "lilies" of our Saviour's simile, with which even the splendid Solomon could not compare in glory (see Rose). The flowers and the grass which they adorn are very sensitive to the east wind. A few hours of the burning sharqīyeh are enough to lay the whole country-side in mourning. The flanks of the hills are often covered with annual grasses, legumins, and aromatic umbellifers. For the prickly plants that bestud the wilderness see Thorns and Thistles. The ruins that abound in the country are overgrown with nettles and thistles. Canebrakes and reeds are found in the marshes and along the river banks, the papyrus reed being specially plentiful among the bogs of el-Ḥūleh.

Of field produce, wheat and barley are largely grown, the latter being used mainly to feed the horses. Oats and rye have practically disappeared. Spelt, maize, and vetches; lentils, millet, and beans; dill, mint, rue, mustard, and coriander are objects of the husbandman's care. Weeds are plentiful. Of these the worst are the tares, which so closely resemble the wheat among which they grow, and which, if used, produce such painful results. Cucumbers and melons grow to great perfection. Tomatoes, the egg plant, garlic, onions, and other vegetables are common. Tobacco is also cultivated. Flax was grown in ancient times, and perhaps also cotton.

The olive played a great part in the life of old Palestine, and many a valley is still filled with the silver sheen of its foliage. The rule of the Moslems, influenced by the old nomad antagonism to the symbol of the settled life, and by the prohibition of the prophet, has restricted the culture of the vine as compared with the past. The ruined vine terraces on the slopes, and the rock-cut winepresses that abound, are proof enough of this. The vine still flourishes, however, in certain districts, yielding rich crops of grapes. This is true especially of the neighbourhood of Hebron on the west and es-Salṭ on the east of the Jordan. The expressed juice is often made into what the Arabs call dibs, "grape honey," which is probably referred to in some cases by the Heb. name dĕbash, rendered "honey" in EV. There is no more beautiful tree than the pomegranate with its rich red blooms amid the dark green foliage. The fig also, with its sweet aromatic fruit, is a characteristic feature of Palestine. The almond, the carob, the sycamore, the mulberry, the peach, the plum, the quince, the pistachia, are plentiful. Two thorn trees, the nabq and the sidr, bear fruit rather larger than a cherry, dry but wellflavoured. The apple and the pear are also found, together with the apricot. This last is especially numerous in the orchards round Damascus. On the coast plain the orange gardens of Jaffa and Sidon are famous. Here also are the citron, the lemon, and the date palm. The dates of Gaza are highly prized. There is a palm grove north of Carmel. The palm has disappeared from Jericho, the old "city of palms," but is found at En-gedi, and in the oases in the lower Ghor. There are a few trees at points on the sides of Esdraelon, at Tiberias, and also on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea.

Stretches of forest there still are on Carmel, on the hills to the north and on the plain to the south; and especially in Mount Gilead. For the rest, while the bush and brushwood covering great breadths of the hills are probably remains of old-world forests, there is nothing to show that within historic times the conditions have been greatly different. The Heb. ya'ar was practically equivalent to the

ASSYRIANS CUTTING DOWN THE PALM TREES BELONGING TO A CAPTURED CITY

Arb. wa'r, denoting a stony country with bush and undergrowth. The Hebrews had no skill in forestry or in woodwork (1 K. 5.[6]). The sycamore only is singled out as being abundant (1 K. 10.[27]), the timber of which is durable, but otherwise unsuitable for buildings of any pretensions. Dry branches and withered herbs were used as fuel (Is. 27.[11]; Mw. 6.[30]). Several species of oak and pine, the terebinth, the wild pistachia and carob, the plane tree, the strawberry tree, the wild olive, the poplar, the willow, the rock-rose, the storax, the mastic, the henna, the myrtle, the tamarisk, various species of acacia, and the caper-plant are found to-day. Along the river banks, e.g. in the deep gorge of the Jabbok, and especially round the shores of the Sea of Galilee, the oleander blooms in great perfection. In the Ghōr also grows the Populus euphratica, a tropical species of poplar. In ancient times the balsam flourished in the deeper part near Jericho. There the sugar-cane still grows. On the desert steppes the juniper is found, from the roots of which charcoal is made.

(7) Fauna. (a) Domesticated Animals.—Sheep and goats are numerous, as they have always been. The herbage on the hills furnishes their food. The sheep are of the fat-tailed species. The goats are dark brown in colour, with long, drooping ears. The rough cloth for tents is made of their hair. While that of the sheep is preferred, the flesh of both sheep and goats is largely eaten in Palestine to-day. Goat's milk is used everywhere. The native oxen are small, but of considerable strength. From of old they have been employed mainly in ploughing. They are now seldom slaughtered for food. The buffalo is also found, chiefly in the upper Jordan valley. The ass, ridden by princes in the olden times, is now almost confined to the humbler classes; being used also as a beast of burden. The white ass, however, is often ridden by the well-to-do. The horse is the favourite animal for the highway. Marvellously sure-footed and excellent climbers the little Syrian horses are, on the stony and mountainous tracks of the country. Arab horses of pure blood are very greatly prized. The mule is also used largely for riding, and as a beast of burden; not, however, among the Arabs, who share the Jewish dislike for hybrids. The camel is indispensable for desert journeys, and is largely used for the transport of heavy burdens. The rearing of camels is the special care of the Arabs. The number of camels he possesses is the measure of a man's importance among them. For months every year camels' milk furnishes the chief subsistence of many tribes. The hair is made into cloth by the women, finer than that of goat's hair. The Arabs also are fond of camel's flesh. This was forbidden to the Israelites. Both Jews and Moslems hold the swine unclean; but it is reared in some of the Christian villages. The swineherds mentioned in the Gospel no doubt belonged to the Greek population of Eastern Palestine. Of the dog, as used in the chase, there is no mention in Scripture. It has always been valued by the shepherd (Jb. 30.[1]). Crowds of ownerless dogs haunt the streets of Eastern cities, and perform the useful function of public scavengers, consuming the garbage thrown out, which otherwise must become a source of disease. They are held in great despite, and "son of a dog" is one of the most common phrases of contempt. There is no mention of poultry in the OT. They seem to have been introduced after the Exile. They appear in the NT. as well known, and they are found everywhere in Palestine to-day. Various species of doves have been tamed in Pal. from ancient times.

(b) Wild Animals.—The lion, which in ancient times haunted the jungle of the Jordan, and wrought havoc in the surrounding hills, has entirely disappeared. The leopard is still found in the Ghōr, and in the valleys east of the Jordan. At rare intervals one bolder than the rest may visit the flocks in Galilee. The wild cat is seen on the eastern plateau. The main haunt of the brown bear now is Mount Hermon. Wolves are occasionally seen in the more remote districts west of the Jordan, but more frequently in the east, and in the Lebanon uplands. The jackals are without number: issuing from cave and ruin at nightfall, they and the hyenas make the hours of darkness hideous with their howlings. Foxes too are plentiful. The wild boar finds a home among the luxuriant growth and canebrakes in the bottom of the wadies. The present writer once saw a string of over twenty, in the early morning, crossing the marsh land of el-Hûleh. The wild ass, swift of foot and shy of habit, is now seldom seen. The graceful gazelle and antelope abound: the fallow deer also, and the mountain-goat, are still objects of the chase. The latter is found in the mountains of Edom, and among the gorges and cliffs around the Dead Sea. The hare, the jerboa, mice of various species, the squirrel, the weasel, the hedgehog, the porcupine, and the singular animal, somewhat resembling the rabbit, the rock-badger, have all their homes in different parts of the country. Swarms of bats are found in the ruins and in the roofs of the great caves in the hills.

(c) Birds.—Singing birds in Palestine are few: the chief being the Palestine nightingale. But if songsters are few the feathered tribes are numerous. The Heb. tzippōr may have been a general term denoting small birds like the sparrow. Among the well-known birds we may mention the eagle, various species of vulture, hawk, raven, and owl; the red-legged partridge, multitudinous wild doves, larks, and quails. Among the marshes we find the pelican, the bittern, and the stork. The cormorant and many species of ducks find a livelihood in the lakes and streams, and the bright plumage of the kingfisher flashes among the greenery along the Jordan. Enormous flocks of birds of passage, wild geese, flamingoes, &c., often settle for a little on the Sea of Galilee.

(d) Reptiles.—There are many species of lizards. Frogs abound in the marshes, where also the turtle is found. The tortoise is frequent. Snakes both innocuous and poisonous are numerous, some of the python species attaining a great size. There are also dangerous water-snakes. In Nahr ez-Zerqā, to the south of Carmel, the crocodile may sometimes be seen. Some have thought they had seen it also in the lower reaches of the Kishon.

(e) Insects.—The insect life of Palestine is extensive and varied. We may mention the scorpion; many species of spiders; flies innumerable, the mosquito and sandfly being especially troublesome; the hornet, the wasp, and the wild bee. This last still builds its nest in the clefts of the rock, or in the slopes among the underwood. The Arabs are experts in the art of securing the honey, and it is one of the most common, as it is the most delicious, of the desert delicacies. The flocks and the bees still conspire to make Palestine in a true sense "a land flowing with milk and honey." Fleas are ubiquitous, but their favourite resorts are the mud villages of the fellahîn. Locusts are the most feared of all the insect tribes. The destruction they work when they come in clouds from the desert was only too well known to the Israelites of old (Lv. 11.[21f.]; Jl. 1.[4], &c.). The locust is still prepared and preserved for food—only, however, by the poorest of the people.

(f) Fishes.—The Sea of Galilee is rich in fishes, some species being found elsewhere only in the Nile and other tropical waters. As in ancient times, the fish form an important part of the diet of the people within reach of the lake (Mw. 7.[9f.], 14.[16f.]; Jn. 21.[13]). The fish of this sea seem to be meant in Ho. 4.[3]. In the Jordan, and in the waters of Lake Hûleh also, the fishermen to-day ply their task. Many species of fish are found in the tributaries of the Jordan. Along the Mediterranean coast many fishermen pursue their calling, especially in the district of Tyre and Sidon.

(8) Minerals.—From what has been said under Geology above, it will be understood that Palestine is a country of no great mineral wealth. Iron is not found within the country, but the Israelites seem to have known the methods of smelting (Dt. 4.[20]; 1 K. 8.[51], &c.). From the oldest times, in Wâdy et-Teim, W. of Mt. Hermon, and in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, bitumen and oil have been obtained. In antiquity pitch was used as mortar in building (Gn. 11.[3]). It was also employed to make watertight canoes and small boats of wickerwork (Ex. 2.[3]). By the Egyptians it was put to certain purposes in connection with embalming. After earthquakes large masses are often found floating in the Dead Sea. Sulphur in lumps the size of a nut is found on the north-west shore of the Dead Sea, and also in the neighbourhood of Machærus (BJ. VII. vi. 3). Salt was obtained by the Israelites from the Dead Sea, which was called by them the "Salt Sea." It is seen in the form of whitish crystals on the shores of the sea. It is also got in the bed of the pools whence the Dead Sea water has evaporated. Rock-salt is furnished by the salt mountain Jebel Usdum, at the south end of the sea (Ek. 47.[11]; Zp. 2.[9]; Gn. 19.[26]; Ws. 10.[7]). Of great value was the clay-marl of the Jordan valley. With this, mixed with straw, bricks were made (Gn. 11.[3]; Ex. 1.[14]; Ek. 4.[1]). It was used for all kinds of pottery (Is. 29.[16], 45.[9], &c.). It also furnished the moulds for the castings required for the Temple (1 K. 7.[46]).

(9) Influence of Position, Physical Features, and Conditions.—Palestine was in the centre of the ancient world. The great military roads, the highways of commerce and culture, ran through her valleys and across her plains. The chief rivals for empire, in the north and in the south, could strike at one another only over this country. It was therefore inevitable that it should become an apple of discord between Egypt and the monarchies on the Euphrates. Its possession was for them a point of vital importance. This applied mainly to the plains through which the highways passed, and of these Israel never obtained a secure hold. But while these might be for the time in the hands of Canaanites, Philistines, Phœnicians, Egyptians, or Assyrians, the uplands of Central Palestine, the main theatre of Israel's life, were largely isolated from the great world in the heart of which they lay. In a measure this holds for the Northern Kingdom, but it is especially true of the mountain of Judah. Samaria, as we have seen, lies more open to approach from without, and her wide valleys, like the great Wādy esh-sha'īr, are less easy of defence. She was thus more exposed to the influence of surrounding peoples, entered readily into relations with them, and played a greater part in international affairs. Judah, on the other hand, high and remote, connected with the north by a single road, and that full of difficulty and peril for an invading force, approached from east and west by narrow and steep defiles, where one in defence might be equal to a hundred in attack, and from the south by exhausting paths through desert tracts, was able to maintain her apartness, while yet sufficiently near to be aware of all that was transpiring in the world beyond. From her mountain heights she could view in safety the glittering streams of armaments rolling over the plains far below, and the long caravans of the merchantmen. She possessed little that could excite the avarice of the conqueror: even if she were captured her spoils would not balance the loss and damage she could so easily inflict upon her assailants. The conquest of the mountain was a task at once so perilous and so profitless that none would undertake it save of necessity. The effects of this isolation are marked in the character and history of her people. "Like her annual harvests, the historical forces of Judæa have always ripened a little later than those of Samaria. She had no part in Israel's earliest struggles for unity and freedom—indeed in the record of these she is named only as a traitor *—nor did the beginnings either of the kinghood or of prophecy spring from her. Yet the gifts which her older sister's more open hands were the first to catch, and lose, were by her redeemed, nourished, and consummated. For this more slow and stubborn function Judæa was prepared by her isolated and unattractive position, which kept her for a longer time than her sister out of the world's regard, and, when the world came, enabled her to offer a more hardy defence. Hence, too, sprang the defects of her virtues—her selfishness, provincialism, and bigotry. With a few exceptions, due to the genius of some of her sons, who were inspired beyond all other Israelites, Judæa's character and history may be summed up in a sentence. At all times in which the powers of spiritual initiative or expansion were needed, she was lacking, and so in the end came her shame. But when the times required concentration, indifference to the world, loyalty to the past, and passionate patriotism, then Judæa took the lead, or stood alone in Israel, and these virtues even rendered brilliant the hopeless, insane struggles of her end. . . . From the day when the land was taken in pledge by the dust of the patriarchs, till the remnant of the garrison of Jerusalem slaughtered themselves out at Masada, rather than fall into Roman hands, or till at Bether the very last revolt was crushed by Hadrian, Judæa was the birthplace, the stronghold, the sepulchre of God's people" (HGHL.[1] 259f.).

* Deborah's song does not mention Judah. It was the men of Judah who betrayed Samson to the Philistines.

The cutting up of the country by natural divisions explains its occupation by so many different peoples. We must think of the Canaanites whom Israel conquered as distinct tribes, each holding a separate and definite part of the land. After the great schism under Rehoboam, the territories of Judah and Samaria, as we have seen, formed their boundaries along certain well-marked lines. The great cleft of the Jordan valley only too well brought about what at first the eastern tribes feared. It divided them from their brethren on the west, and they were the first that were finally lost to the commonwealth of Israel. In all periods of history the inhabitants of this land have been split up into separate communities, and the bitterness of their mutual antagonism seems to have been proportioned to the need for unity, and the sinking of tribal differences, in presence of the threatening world-powers. The history of Israel shows how difficult it was, in this country, to establish and maintain a commonwealth under one central authority.

The political divisions in NT. times were marked off by natural boundaries. Galilee included all between the Liṭāny and the S. edge of the plain of Esdraelon. Samaria lay between this and the boundary about two hours south of Shechem. Its eastern border was the Jordan to Wādy Fār'ah, N. of Qarn Sarṭabeh. The Talmud draws its western boundary through Antipatris. Judæa lay to the south of this, extending on the west to the Mediterranean, on the east to the Jordan and the Dead Sea, and on the south to the desert of Arabia Petræa. Peræa, "the land beyond" Jordan, comprised the district of the Decapolis reaching to the Yarmuk (with cities in other districts—see DECAPOLIS); Gaulonitis, on the E. of the Sea of Galilee, stretched as far as Hermon; Batanæa probably corresponded to en Nuqrah; Trachonitis, the mod. el-Lejā'; Auranitis, the region of Jebel ed-Druze; and Ituræa, or the Ituræan country, wh. lay prob. somewhere to the NE. of the Sea of Galilee.

Palestine is a land of many and violent contrasts: lofty mountain and deep valley, burning desert and fruitful plain, the snow of Hermon and the torrid heat of the Dead Sea, hot day and cold night, the deluge of winter and the drought of summer. Life meant a perpetual accommodation to sudden changes. The constitution, adaptable and tough, developed under those conditions by the ancestors of the Hebrew race, and bequeathed by them to their children, in some measure explains the persistence of the Jewish people, in such widely diverse circumstances, in every part of the world to-day.

There is no country where, within such small compass, the like varieties of climatic and geographical conditions are found. Practically all conditions under which men live on the globe are represented here. Character, individual and national, is influenced by environment. This largely determines the order of ideas to which men respond. The great religions of the world have been confined in their operation mainly to lands where natural conditions resemble those of the land of their origin. Their success within these limits is not more striking than their failure when these limits are passed. They appeal to needs grown under special conditions; they are powerless when confronted with a character developed in a diverse environment. This is well illustrated by the triumphs and limitations of Islam. It succeeded in countries where climatic conditions in some degree resembled those of Arabia; but it has knocked in vain at the gateways of the northern nations. The note of asceticism on the one hand, and of extreme license on the other, accord well enough with the melancholy yet passionate temperament developed amid warmth and leisure; but they ring falsely in the ears of men who breathe the invigorating air of the hills, whose moral natures are braced in the wholesome conflict with Nature for the means of life.

This makes evident Divine wisdom in God's choice of Palestine as the scene of His supreme self-manifestation to man. Here we escape, in a degree nowhere else possible, from the limiting influence of special environment. The character grown in these conditions will be responsive to the revelation with the widest range of application. Other religions are addressed largely to what is accidental and local in human character. The revelation that comes to us from Palestine, unhampered by the like conditions, breathing an atmosphere in which are mingled the chill winds of the Arctic north with the hot breath of the torrid south, seeks to reach and satisfy, not what is peculiar to tribes and nations, but what is common to man as man. The truth revealed to Israel in her land of rich diversities makes appeal to the universal heart. Its sphere of influence is co-extensive with the human race.

(10) Pre-Israelite Palestine.—Before the coming of the Canaanites whom Israel dispossessed, the country was occupied by a non-Semitic race. Little is yet known regarding this people and their successors. But by means of excavation and research, information is gradually gathering. The excavations at Tell el-Ḥesy, Gezer, and Taanach, conducted by Dr. Bliss, Mr. Macalister, and Professor Sellin respectively, have been specially fruitful. An excellent survey and summary of the results obtained is given by Dr. Driver in his Schweich Lectures (1908), and, from the point of view of religion, by Mr. Stanley A. Cook in his Religion of Ancient Palestine. Already in the fourth millennium B.C., the dominion of Babylon extended over Palestine. To the pre-Canaanite, non-Semitic inhabitants probably we owe certain survivals from antiquity, the like of which are found also in other countries: (a) The menhir, a great block of stone set upright, tapering towards the top. This corresponds to the Heb. matztzēbah, and was regarded as the dwelling of a deity (see PILLAR). (b) The dolmen, consisting of two or more upright stones on the top of which rests another great block or slab of stone. They may be referred to in some cases where the Heb. mizbēăḥ is used. The purpose of all may not have been the same. Some figured in the ritual of worship; others, as bones found in them suggest, may have been used as graves. Rings of copper wire discovered in a dolmen show that they do not all date from the stone age. (c) The cromlech, a circle of stones, often with menhir or dolmen in the middle. This corresponds to the Heb. Gilgal. Such circles of stones are often to be seen round the graves of the Arabs to-day. Flint implements and weapons have been found in various parts of the country. These people lived in CAVES. Evidence of a large settlement has been found at Gezer. In the disposal of their dead they practised cremation. Survivors of this people may have been the Horites mentioned in Scripture.

The pottery found in the different strata in the course of excavation, points to Canaanite occupation from c. 2000 to 1200 B.C. The Canaanites belonged to the Semitic stock. They are referred to in Scripture as consisting of various nations. The names by which they are known, however, probably denote separate divisions: or, as the names are not consistently applied, they may only be different appellations for the whole people. Thus in the Babylonian records the country is uniformly called "the land of the Amorites" (see CANAANITES, and articles under the various names). How soon Egyptian influence began to be exercised we cannot tell. In the fifteenth cent. B.C. Palestine had become a province of the Egyptian empire, its various divisions being ruled by tributary "kings" or petty chiefs, who were themselves perpetually at strife. For a time the Hittites were the most formidable rivals of Egypt for supremacy in Palestine. Ramses II. distinguished himself in conflict with them. Colonies of Egyptian slaves were settled in Palestine, and many high officials made journeys through the country. Objects found in the excavations prove extensive intercourse between Egypt and Palestine from earlier times. In the records of the 19th and 20th dynasties, great numbers of Syrian products imported into Egypt are mentioned. Obviously the less cultured but susceptible Canaanites must have been greatly influenced by the civilisation of Egypt. Thus we find that Phœnician art closely follows that of Egypt, while the script of the Hittites seems to be moulded upon that of the Egyptian hieroglyphics. In religion, also, we may note the blending of the Osiris legend with that of Adonis at Byblus.

Babylon and Assyria exercised a still greater influence in the development of Syrian civilisation. The Philistine god, Dagon, probably came from Babylon by way of the Canaanites. In the sixteenth cent. B.C. Babylonian measures, weights, and money were in common use. The Tel el-Amarna tablets show that the subject "kings" in Syria, writing to their overlord in Egypt, used the Babylonian language and the cuneiform script. It was inevitable that Babylonian ideas should have a like range and influence.

Canaanite civilisation reached a fairly high state, as we gather from the OT., and also from Egyptian records of that time. They cultivated the fields, and possessed flocks and herds. The mulberry, the fig, the olive, and the vine yielded richly. Great quantities of oil were exported to Egypt. Gardens in the plain of Sharon were much admired for luxuriance and fruitfulness. Ancient oil- and winepresses hewn in the rocks, and water cisterns, are found everywhere. Large districts were also reserved for the nomad life, to which many were still devoted.

The Canaanite fortified towns were numerous and of no great size. They appear to us little more than fenced villages. They were usually situated on "the projecting spur of a range of hills like Gezer, Tell es-Ṣafi, and Megiddo, or on an isolated hill rising up out of the plain, such as Tell el-Ḥesy and Taanach. We can therefore understand how the Canaanite cities, standing thus on eminences, with substantial walls, such as excavation has revealed to us, must have impressed the Israelite invaders: the Hebrew traditions of the Conquest still preserve recollections of the Canaanite cities being 'great' and 'fenced,' i.e. fortified, or—to preserve the Hebrew metaphor—'cut off,' i.e. unapproachable by assailants, impregnable" (Nu. 13.^{28}; Jo. 14.^{12}).

In these cities progress was made in manufactures and in trade, tending to the refinement of life. The colours of the garments worn were more rich and varied than those of Egypt, showing a certain love of display, and dexterity in the art of weaving. Ornaments of silver, gold, precious stones, and costly furniture betoken considerable proficiency in artistic work. Chariots of silver and gold (i.e. overlaid with these metals), brought from Cyprus, figure among the spoil taken from Syria by Tahutmes III. Rings and bars of the precious metals served for money in commerce.

The Philistines and the Hittites were specially distinguished for military skill and prowess. They had regularly organised armies, consisting of infantry, cavalry, and chariots, led by their princes in orderly battle array. The heavy armed soldiers wore a round bronze helmet, coat of chain-mail, greaves, shield, javelin and spear: the light-armed being archers. The iron chariots of the Canaanites filled the Israelites with a natural fear (Jo. 17.^{16}, &c.).

Only the Philistines and the Phœnicians seem to have made any progress in the development of political organisation. At an early time a sort of constitution appears among the Phœnicians; and in Scripture we find the Philistines united in a league of the five chief cities, Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron. For the rest we have a series of small communities who, under their own princes or "kings," zealously defend their independence and resist all attempts at unification. The nobles among them owned the bulk of the land.

The best connected account of the religion of the Canaanites as illustrated by recent discoveries will be found in Mr. Stanley A. Cook's Religion of Ancient Palestine. Along with this should be read Curtiss' Primitive Semitic Religion To-day. Each civil community formed at the same time a religious brotherhood, under protection of their own god, who was the owner (Ba'al) or mistress (Ba'alah) of the place concerned (see Baal, Ashtoreth). Sanctuaries accordingly were numerous, and legends grew up explaining the origin of sacred places, stones, groves, mountains, &c. The Canaanites found a use for the menhirs, the sacred pillars of their predecessors, which persisted even into Israelitish times. The like is probably true of the sacred caves into which, from the rock above, offerings seem to have been sent down either to the dead or to subterranean deities. The knowledge gathered from excavations is thus summarised by Dr. Driver:—

"We find high places at Tell el-Ḥesy, Gezer, Taanach, and Megiddo, with the sacred standing stones, and sometimes rock altars beside them: of rock altars, also, traces apparently exist in other parts of Palestine as well. The standing stones are found in Israelite as well as Canaanite times, as indeed would naturally be expected from the Old Testament itself. Underneath the high place at Gezer have been found memorials of the grim rites performed in honour of the numen loci—the bones of children which had been sacrificed, and sometimes burned, and then deposited in jars. These jar-buried infants have also been found at Tell el-Mutesellim and at Taanach. Instances after B.C. 1200 are, however, rare. When this practice was given up, the mere lamp and bowl seems to have been adopted as a symbolical substitute. Somewhat later, also, we find instances of foundation sacrifices, or human sacrifices offered at the foundation of a house or other building, to secure the welfare of its future inhabitants. We may add to the instances already mentioned the skeleton of a child found in a large jar just a yard under the great altar-stone in the residence of Ishtar-washur. Numerous figures of Ashtoreth or Astarte were also found, though these are rarer in Israelite than in Canaanite times. Professor Sellin mentions, as illustrating current popular superstitions, the discovery at Taanach of a small jar containing sixty-six animal ankle bones, fashioned into the shape of beans, to be used presumably as lots for ascertaining the will of a deity, many serpents' heads for use in incantations, two serpent-like bronze knives, and golden crescents (cp. Jg. 8.[26]) intended as amulets to ward off the evil eye" (Schweich Lectures, 88).

For the coming of the Israelites and the subsequent history see ISRAEL.

(11) Population.—No reliable statistics are available for the population of modern Palestine. But it appears that in its ruined state, after centuries of oppression, there cannot be much over three million inhabitants in the whole of Syria, i.e. Palestine, with Mt. Lebanon and Northern Syria; which means that the population of Palestine must be considerably under a million, probably from 600,000 to 700,000. Difficulty has been felt as to the figures given in the OT., from which an estimate of the population in ancient times may be made. Take, for example, the 1,300,000 warriors mentioned in 2 S. 24.[9]. If Israel numbered so many men of war the population could hardly be less than 5,000,000. This would mean about 500 to the square mile, the area being about 10,000 square miles. It is said that Palestine could never have supported anything like so large a population. It must be admitted that the numbers seem very large. The population of England works out at over 550 per square mile: but this includes the great cities and industrial centres such as were not found in Palestine.

On the other hand, we must bear in mind the extraordinary fertility of the soil of Palestine, and the extent to which it was cultivated in ancient times. Many a bare hillside to-day bears marks of careful toil in far-off days. The produce of field, garden, and orchard to-day must be multiplied many times to make the amount available in ancient times for the support of the people. We must further remember that there is no comparison between what is necessary to sustain life in our climate and what a man can live well on in Palestine. A brave and strong manhood is often supported there on the simplest diet; and other expenses, clothing, &c., are reduced to a minimum. That the population of ancient times far exceeded that of our day may be taken as certain; but without data more complete and reliable than we now possess any attempt at an exact estimate is futile.

Lit.: G. A. Smith's Historical Geography of the Holy Land is indispensable. Thomson's The Land and the Book is invaluable for its exact delineation of scenery and its account of the peoples, and their manners and customs. Baedeker's Guide Book to Palestine and Syria is of great value. There is practically no limit to the literature on Palestine. PALLU, son of Reuben, father of Eliab, whose descendants are called Palluites (Gn. 46.[9], AV. "Phallu"; Ex. 6.[14]; Nu. 26.[5, 8]; 1 Ch. 5.[3]). In Nu. 16.[1] prob. "Pallu" should be read for "Peleth"—so Josephus.

PALMER-WORM (Jl. 1.[4], 2.[25]; Am. 4.[9]). Some have thought that the Heb. gāzām denotes a particular species of destructive locust. There is no doubt that the caterpillar is meant. See LOCUST.

PALM TREE (Heb. tāmār, Gr. phoinix). The date P., Phœnix dactylifera, is found in groves, esp. along the seaboard of Pal. Once it must have been more abundant, as it gave its name to Phœnicia as well as to Phœnix in the island of Crete. Also on Jewish and Phœnician coins, it figures as a symbol of the land. It favours sandy soil, with abundant moisture, and a pretty warm temperature. On this latter act. it is not frequent on the higher land. Formerly it flourished in the Jordan valley, and Jericho was known as the city of P. trees (Dt. 34.[3], &c.). It is still found wild fm. the Sea of Gal. to the Dead Sea, stunted and fruitless. Many oases in the desert are made attractive by palms (Ex. 15.[27], &c.). The P. raises its head of graceful fronds to a height of 50 to 100 ft., and is one of the most beautiful features of the landscape. The female tree is carefully fertilised with pollen fm. the male. The great bunches of dates are valued, esp. among the desert Arabs, the fruit being very nutritious. The dates of Gaza are held in high repute.

The stem is of little use as timber. The fibrous material of the outer covering and the fronds is used for string, and also in wicker work. The fronds ("P. branches") figure in the feasts (Lv. 23.[40]; Ne. 8.[15]). They were carried as symbols of victory (1 M. 13.[51]; cp. Jn. 12.[13]; Rv. 7.[9]). The P. appears as a carved architectural ornament (1 K. 6.[29], &c.; Ek. 41.[18], &c.). It early appealed to the poet's eye (Ps. 92.[12]). TAMAR was a woman's name. The Arab sees in the P. the symbol of the fairest of the desert's drs. So too the anct. song—

PALM TREE IN DESERT

"How fair and how pleasant art thou,
O love, for delights!
This thy stature is like to a palm tree."

(SS. 7.[6f.])

PALTI. (1) The man who represented Benjamin among the spies (Nu. 13.[9]). (2) The Benjamite to whom Saul gave David's wife Michal (1 S. 25.[44], AV. Phalti). He was the son of Laish of Gallim. Under whatever circumstances this marriage was brought about, it is evident that he contracted a great affection for his wife. When David claimed her, Palti's grief was genuine and pathetic. It may be that David sent for her in the thought that the presence of Michal, his predecessor's daughter, in his harem would lend some air of legitimacy to his position. Little account would be taken of Palti's feelings in the matter. In 2 S. 3.[15] the name is given as Paltiel.

PALTIEL. (1) Son of Azzan, and prince of the tribe of Issachar (Nu. 34.[26]). He was the representative of the tribe at the division of the land. (2) See (2) of preceding article.

PALTITE, one belonging to Beth-pelet, a town in the south of Judah (Jo. 15.[27]; Ne. 11.[26]). The only Paltite known to fame was Helez, one of David's mighty men, who in the seventh month commanded a division of 24,000 men in David's army (2 S. 23.[26]; 1 Ch. 11.[27], 27.[10]). In the last two passages he is called the "Pelonite," probably in error.

PAMPHYLIA lay on the S. coast of Asia Minor, with Cilicia on the east and Lycia to the west. The flat land between Mount Taurus and the sea is very fertile, but it has always been the home of malaria. The resources of P. do not seem to have equalled those of the contiguous districts. In the Persian war Pamphylia sent only 30 ships, while Cilicia sent 100 and Lycia 92 (Herod. vii. 91f.). Under the Romans Pamphylia was a province, including Lycia on the west and Pisidia in the uplands to the north. This, however, was arranged in A.D. 74. The names are kept distinct in the NT. In Pamphylia St. Paul first touched the soil of Asia Minor as an apostle and preacher. He came hither with Barnabas and John Mark from Cyprus, sailing up the river Cestrus for five miles to PERGA; there the party was deserted by John Mark (Ac. 13.[13]). Returning from their journey into the interior, Paul and Barnabas preached in Perga (Ac. 14.[24f.]) and finally left Pamphylia by its chief seaport, Attalia. Once again in later years St. Paul sighted the land as he sailed past (Ac. 27.[5]). Dorian settlers may early have found their way to Pamphylia, and one of their tribes, the Pamphyli, probably gave its name to the district. The Asiatic element, however, always predominated in the district. The chief native town was Perga, and there the Asiatic goddess, "Artemis of Perga," received divine honours. There were Jewish colonies in the district (1 M. 15.[23]; Ac. 2.[10]). Possibly also they had a synagogue at Perga.

St. Paul evidently did not preach in Pamphylia on the occasion of his first visit. Some have thought this may have been owing to the pain of parting with John Mark. Sir W. M. Ramsay suggests that here he may have been attacked by the prevalent malaria, which produces very distressing effects—prostration and weakness, with a tendency to recur. The remedy for this is to get the patient off to the hills as soon as possible. This seems to have been the course followed in the case of St. Paul. This humiliating and painful sickness Prof. Ramsay would identify with St. Paul's "thorn in the flesh" (St. Paul the Traveller, 89ff.). The work done here subsequently does not seem to have been greatly fruitful. No church of Pamphylia appears in the list of 1 P. 1.[1].

PAN. (1) Ḥăbittīm (1 Ch. 9.[31]). Oxf. Heb. Lex. takes these to be "some kind of flat cakes or bread wafers." (2) Kiyyōr, a pot for cooking (1 S. 2.[14]). It is also used of a basin of bronze for washing (Ex. 30.[18]; 1 K. 7.[30], &c.), and of the platform on which king Solomon stood and kneeled (2 Ch. 6.[13]). This last may have been round or bowl-like in shape. (3) Maḥăbath, "a flat iron plate, pan, or griddle for baking" (Lv. 2.[5], &c.). (4) Masrēth, a pan or dish, perhaps originally dough-pan or kneading-trough (2 S. 13.[9]). (5) Sīr, a capacious pot of bronze, in which flesh was boiled (Ex. 27.[3]; 2 K. 4.[38], &c.). It is used for "washing-pot" in Ps. 60.[8]. (6) Pārūr is a small earthenware pot (Nu. 11.[8]). (7) Tzēlāḥāh, a cooking-pot (2 Ch. 35.[13]).

PANNAG (Ek. 27.[17]) is RV. transliteration of the Heb. word. AV. takes it as a place name; RV. as an article of commerce, suggesting in the margin, "perhaps a kind of confection." Cornill would amend the text so as to read "wax," Cheyne would make it read "grape-syrup." There is no certain clue to its meaning.

PAPER (Gr. chartes, 2 Jn.[12]), the inner bark of the papyrus. See WRITING.

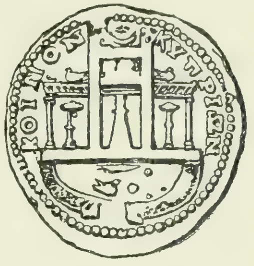
PAPHOS, a city in Cyprus, situated at the west end of the island, reached by St. Paul and Barnabas on the first missionary journey, no doubt by the road which connected it with Salamis, which stood at the eastern end (Ac. 13.[6-13]). At Old Paphos, mod. Kuklia, about a mile from the sea, was the temple of Venus, or Aphrodite, who was said to have risen from the sea near by (Homer, Od. viii. 362). The goddess was represented by a conical stone. New Paphos, mod. Baffo, about seven miles to the north-west, was the chief town and harbour, and the residence of the Roman governor. The road between these two towns was often the scene of profligate processions (Strabo, xiv. 683). At New Paphos the apostles met SERGIUS PAULUS the proconsul, who is described as "a man of understanding," and here the sorcerer ELYMAS, who opposed them, was put to confusion, blindness falling on him at the word of St. Paul. The proconsul seems to have been favourably impressed. He is the first of the great Roman officials named in the records as hearing the Gospel. Probably a church was founded as a result of this preaching. From Paphos the missionaries sailed to Perga in Pamphylia.



COIN OF PAPHOS

PARABLE (Heb. māshāl; Gr. parabolē). In OT. the word really means a proverb (1 S. 10.[12]; Pr. 26.[7]), a saying (Mi. 2.[4]), a prolonged speech (Nu. 23.[7]; Jb. 27.[1]).

Jerome in the Vlg. has called the book of Proverbs Liber Proverbiorum, but he entitles his com. In Parabolas.

In NT. in which alone parables occur in the sense in wh. we usually employ the term, they are restricted to the Synoptics; only on the lips of our Lord do we find the "earthly story with a heavenly meaning." A parable resembles a "fable" in this, that it is a symbolical narrative; but in the fable the lower animals, and even inanimate objects, are introduced as talking; hence what is so often spoken of as "Jotham's P." was really a "fable." Further, in the "fable" there is no spiritual meaning: it enjoins prudence, &c., for this world. The parables of our Lord were always narratives of what might easily take place, if they had not occurred, as seems in some cases probable; moreover, there was always the spiritual meaning. Unlike an "allegory," the narrative is short, involving explicitly only one aspect of the truth to be conveyed.

It is at least possible that the parables were not delivered in the crisp shape in wh. they have descended to us, but, as in Jn. 10., the various features were evolved by the interruptions of the multitude. The 13th of Mw. cd. not have occupied the time it did unless either there were many more spoken then than are recorded, or the narrative was evolved stage by stage in presence of His auditors. In the first case it is difficult to understand how the interest of the multitude cd. be sustained by a series of disconnected, short narratives.

The first recorded P. is that of "the Two Builders" (Mw. 7.[24-27]). Then we have "the parabolic discourse" (Mw. 13.), in wh., supplemented fm. Mk. 4.[26-28], and with parables indicated in Mw. 13.[52], we have nine parables; these exhibit the historic evolution of the Kingdom of Heaven. The purpose of this discourse was to encourage His disciples in the work of evangelising the world by showing them that despite all obstacles the Gospel will cover the whole earth. There follow parables wh. refer to duties: "the Lost Sheep," "the Unmerciful Servant," "the Two Sons," "the Labourers in the Vineyard." After this we reach the parables of judgment in chapters 21., 22., and 25. The parables in Luke are mainly directed to life: "the Two Debtors," "the Good Samaritan," "the Friend at Midnight," "the Rich Fool," "the Unprofitable Servants," "the Unjust Judge," and "the Pharisee and the Publican" show this. In Lk. 15. and 16. we have a group of related parables: "the Lost Sheep" (also given in Mw.), "the Lost Piece of Silver," "the Prodigal Son," "the Unjust Steward," "the Rich Man and Lazarus." There are two other parables in Lk. wh. represent the class so prominent in Mw., parables of judgment: "the Great Supper" and "the Pounds."

Classification.—No classification is more than partially accurate, as each P. has many references: thus while the immediate lesson of "the Good Samaritan" is brotherly kindness, yet it also points to Christ as the "brother born for adversity": while the P. of "the Labourers in the Vineyard" teaches the reward awaiting all God's people, it also shows how absurd is a captious, envious spirit, and further shows that it is never too late to enter the Kingdom of Heaven, even tho' it shd. be the eleventh hour.

Interpretation of the P.—In older days there was a tendency to find spiritual meanings in every casual feature of a P.: thus the "two pence" in the P. of "the Good Samaritan" were held to represent the two Sacraments. On the other hand, now the tendency is to maintain that only the one central truth was taught. It is impossible to lay down any rules; every intelligent exegete will be careful to guard against sloth on the one side, wh. wd. discard every difficulty as drapery, and fancifulness on the other, wh. wd. magnify the minute into the important.

The Reason of Parable.—It is very generally maintained that our Lord taught in parables in order to illuminate the truths He was teaching, and make them more easily understood. While this may apply to certain parables, e.g. "the Good Samaritan," yet this is not the purpose our Lord Himself assigns for His practice. It was that they might not be understood im'mediately. Had the multitude understood fully and at once the teaching of His parables they wd. have been repelled, it so ran counter to all that they had been previously taught. Those, however, who retained these tales in their memory and meditated on them wd. find the parabolic husk dissolve and reach the kernel. The truth was gradually, and thus more effectively, assimilated. Books on the parables are too numerous to mention, but Arnot, Bruce, Dods, Greswell, Lisco, Trench, may be named.

PARACLETE. See Spirit, The Holy.

PARADISE, Παράδεισος, פַּרְדֵּס (SS. 4.[13]; Ec. 2.[5]; Ne. 2.[8]), Zend pairidaêza, Sansk. paradeça, borrowed by Heb. and Greek from Old Persian, where it signified a royal pleasure-park, enclosed by walls, planted with trees, and stocked with game. Hence the name is applied in English to the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2.), wh. was similarly planted with trees, like the gardens of the Babylonian houses, not with flowers or vegetables. It had been planted by Yahveh Elohim "eastward" in the land of Eden, and to it was brought the first man to tend and protect it from trespassers (Gn. 2.[8, 15]). Numberless conjectures have been made as to its situation. It has been placed in Armenia (chiefly because of the resemblance of the names Pison and Phasis), in the neighbourhood of Damascus, in Southern Arabia, on the Pamir plateau (identified also with the Harâ-Berezaiti of the Avesta and the Indian Uttara-Kuru), at Udyâna in Northern India, in Media Rhagiana, and even at the North Pole. The cuneiform inscriptions, however, have now settled the question in favour of Babylonia.

Babylonia was called by its primitive Sumerian inhabitants Edin, "the plain," wh. the Semites borrowed as Edinu. It was watered by the Nâr Marrati, or "Salt River," a continuation to the north of the Persian Gulf, into wh. the Euphrates, Tigris, and other rivers flowed thro' separate mouths. As the Nâr Marrati encircled the world, like the Greek Ocean, the mouths were also "heads," up wh. the tide flowed and at times inundated the plain. The plain itself owed its fertility to the "inundation" (Babylonian êdu, whence the Heb. אֵד, translated "mist," Gn. 2.[6]) of the Euphrates and Tigris. The Tigris was called Idiqna by the Sumerians, Idiqlat by the Semites, Heb. Hiddekhel; and the city of Assur, from wh. Assyria took its name, was built on its west bank. The Gihon, wh. compassed the land of Kush, i.e. the Kassites, seems to be the Gikhan of the inscriptions, while Pison is the Bab. Pisannu, "a water-conduit," and probably meant the canal wh. watered the "sandy" desert of Havilah west of the Euphrates. Havilah corresponds with the Bab. Tilmun and Melukhkha, "the onyx stone" (shohem) being the sâmu or "blue-stone," and "bdellium" (b'dôlakh) the budulkhu of the Babylonians. The tree of life is often represented on Assyro-Babylonian monuments guarded by two winged figures; the tree of knowledge answers to the oracle-tree of Ea, wh. was a special object of reverence to several of the early Babylonian kings. This oracle-tree (giskin) was planted at Eridu, under the protection of Ea, the god of wisdom and culture. Eridu, "the good city," was the primeval port of Babylonia, tho' now more than 100 miles from the sea in consequence of the silting up of the coast, and an old poem describes the oracle-tree as growing in its sanctuary "between the mouths of the rivers on either side." It is noticeable that Ea was associated with the serpent, wh. is coupled with the tree on a monument from N. Syria, now in the Louvre, as well as on a Babylonian seal. The cherubim are the Babylonian Kirubi, guardian spirits set at the entrance to a building or enclosure to keep off trespassers, whether earthly or spiritual. The flaming sword has its parallel in the symbol of more than one Babylonian deity, and in the rock-sanctuary of Boghaz Keui, the Hittite capital, where the art has been borrowed from Babylonia, a dagger with its point in the ground is sculptured at the entrance to the inner shrine.

In the Apocalyptic literature wh. grew up among the Jews after the Maccabean period, Paradise becomes the place to wh. the souls of the righteous are transported. In the Book of Enoch it is still regarded, however, as being on the earth, tho' there was also a belief that it had been created before the earth. In the Slavonic Enoch it is identified with the third heaven. But this is probably derived from 2 Cor. 12.[2-4], where St. Paul seems to identify the two. The Paradise promised by our Lord to the penitent thief (Lk. 23.[43]) is generally held to be an intermediate state of happiness where the soul will remain until the Day of Judgment, rather than the Sheol to wh. Christ descended. Such, at any rate, would probably have been the meaning attached to the word by the ordinary Jew in our Lord's time. And such certainly appears to be its meaning in Rv. 2.[7].

PARAH, a city in the territory of Benjamin (Jo. 18.[23]) named with Avim and Ophrah. It is prob. ident. with the mod. Fārah, on Wādy Fārah, a southern tributary of Wādy Suweinīt, about three miles NE. of Anathoth.

PARAN. Comparison of the passages where it is named shows that the wilderness of Paran was a wide district, including the wilderness of Zin, with Kadesh (Nu. 13.[21], 20.[1], 27.[14]; cp. 13.[26], 33.[36]) and the stations Taberah, Kibroth-hattaavah, and Mazeroth (Nu. 10.[12], &c.). It lay, therefore, along the western edge of the Arabah, probably extending from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of 'Aqaba. This corresponds with the high desert plateau of et-Tīh. It furnished a refuge for Hagar and her son Ishmael when cast out by Abraham (Gn. 21.[21]). For a time also David, fleeing from Saul, found refuge here (1 S. 25.[1]). Ēl-pārān, "the oak or terebinth of Paran" (Gn. 14.[6]), should probably be identified with Elath, on the Gulf of 'Aqaba. Paran of Dt. 33.[2]; Hb. 3.[3], associated with Seir, may have been in this district, and quite possibly may correspond to the Paran of 1 K. 11.[18]. This Palmer (Desert of the Exodus, 510) would identify with Jebel Maqrah, c. 29 miles S. of 'Ain Qadīs. Paran in Dt. 1.[1] may possibly refer to some place in Moab; but if so it cannot now be identified.

PARBAR was probably an open hall or colonnade on the west side of the Temple where six of the Levite guard were placed; four without "at the causeway," and two within (1 Ch. 26.[18]). Oxf. Heb. Lex. takes it to be the same word as parvārīm in 2 K. 23.[11] (following Gesenius). It is supposed to be a Persian word compounded of par, "light," and the termination bār, which means "possessing," and so it came to apply to an open portico or colonnade, into which the sunlight has free access. In later Hebrew parwār is often used for "suburbs," the houses there built by the well-to-do being open and airy. We are not surprised to meet with a Persian word in the late book of Chronicles. Its appearance in 2 K. 23.[11] may be due to the hand of a later scribe.

PARCHED CORN is wheat roasted in the ear. Maize is also often roasted on the stalk, and, so parched, is greatly relished (Lv. 23.[14], &c.). The grain chosen for this operation is not quite ripe. A fire of dry grass and other vegetable débris plentiful at that time of year is made. The grain is tied in small bundles and held over the flames. In the process of roasting the outer integuments are consumed. When sufficiently cooked the grain is rubbed out in the hands and eaten. The present writer has often shared in the meal thus prepared, and found it very agreeable.

PARCHMENT, the prepared skin of an animal (see WRITING). PAUL'S "parchments" (2 Tm. 4.[13]) were prob. copies of the Jewish Scriptures. The art of preparing the skin for writing is said to have been perfected in PERGAMOS, from which city the name is derived.

PARENTS. See FAMILY.

PARLOUR represents three Heb. words: (1) 'ălīyāh, "a roof chamber" (Jg. 3.[20]); (2) lishkāh, "a guest chamber" (1 S. 9.[22]); (3) ḥeder, "a chamber" (1 Ch. 28.[11]). The first was a small chamber of slight material erected on the corner of the roof, used on account of its coolness for sleeping in. The second was a public dining-room connected with a high place, used on occasion of sacrifice. The third was a chamber for retirement.

PARMASHTA, the seventh of Haman's ten sons, whom the Jews in Shushan put to death (Est. 9.[9]).

PARMENAS is the sixth name on the list of "the seven" who were set apart to attend to the distribution of the alms of the Church to the poor and to the widows (Ac. 6.[5]). He does not again appear in Scripture. According to tradition he suffered martyrdom at Philippi in the reign of Trajan. Along with Prochorus he is commemorated on July 28th in the calendar of the Byzantine Church.

PARNACH, a man of Zebulun, father of Elzaphan the prince of the tribe (Nu. 34.[25]).

PAROSH, the ancestor of a family who to the number of 2172 returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon. Later, 150 men under Zechariah came back with Ezra (Ez. 2.[3]; Ne. 7.[8]; Ez. 8.[3]). Several of them married foreign wives (Ez. 10.[25]). They took part in building the wall (Ne. 3.[25]) and were represented in sealing the covenant (Ne. 10.[14]).

PAROUSIA (Gr. parousia, "Presence," also "Coming," as that which leads to the Presence) is the word used by our Lord and His apostles for His Advent or Coming in glory at the end of the age to complete the Kdm. of God. Other terms are "Apocalypse" or "Revelation," and "Day of Christ" or "That Day." The words of Jesus on this subject form an important part of His teaching.

I. Parallels to His Teaching.—(1) In the OT., wh. He came to fulfil. The prophets have a vivid expectation of the Day of the Lord, when J". will come to judge the heathen and the impenitent in Isr., to deliver the faithful, and set up His Kdm. on earth (Am. 5.[18]; Is. 13.[6]; Jl. 2.[1f.]; Zp. 3.[8]). This is spoken of as the Coming of J". Himself (Pss. 50.[3ff.], 96.[13], 98.[9]), and as the Advent of the Messiah (Ml. 3.[1ff.]). It is to be ushered in by notable "signs" (Is. 13., 14.; Jl. 3.[15f.]). See esp. Dn. 7.[13ff.], RV., where "one like unto a son of man" is described as coming with the clouds of heaven to receive dominion over all nations.

(2) About the time of our Lord the Jews were filled with a fresh expectation of the Messiah and of the great world-crisis as connected with His Advent. This finds expression in the Jewish Apocalyptic literature, e.g. Baruch, 4 Ezra, and notably the Book of Enoch (ch. 48ff.), where the Son of Man appears in His glory as the righteous Judge of men (cf. Mw. 25.[31-45]). Certainly the resemblance is remarkable. We cannot, however, believe that Jesus simply borrowed the current ideas of His time: if He laid hold of them because in their measure they were true, yet He moulded them to serve the ends of His own larger truth.

II. What Jesus Taught.—(A) In the Synoptic Gospels. (a) In sending out the Twelve He said, "Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of Man be come" (Mw. 10.[23]), and after the Great Confession by Peter, "There be some standing here wh. shall not taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in His kdm." (Mw. 16.[28]; cf. Mk. 9.[1]; Lk. 9.[27]), telling also (Mw. 16.[27]) of His coming in glory with the angels as Supreme Judge. A similar strain appears in the chief passages, wh. are also the most difficult, viz. Mw. 24. (and 25.); Mk. 13.; Lk. 21. In some verses He speaks of the destruction of Jrs.; in others, of His Coming at the end of the age. He had previously predicted the fall of the Temple, and after describing various "signs" of His Coming, He said, "This generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled" (Mw. 24.[34]; Mk. 13.[30]; Lk. 21.[32]), to wh. Mw. and Mk. (but not Luke) add, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but My Father" (Mk., "neither the Son, but the Father"). Mw. and Mk. also include the saying, "This gospel of the kdm. shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come," a work wh. was not overtaken before the destruction of Jrs. (A.D. 70). Perhaps the phrase in Lk. (21.[24]), "Until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," corrsps. to this. We cannot reach a clear and consistent interpretation of these discourses. It is clear, however, that Jesus predicted the destruction of Jrs. by the Rms., and, taking His whole teaching, we can hardly avoid the conclusion that He also foretold a P. to complete the Kdm. (b) Further, His words to Caiaphas (Mw. 26.[64]), "Hereafter (i.e. from henceforth) shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven," are taken to indicate His Coming as a great sptl. world-process, His power and triumph repeatedly displayed in the crises of hist., e.g. not only the destruction of Jrs., but also the Reformation, the Revivals of the 18th cent., the French Revolution. (c) His counsels in view of the P. are very explicit. He enjoins watchfulness, sobriety, and faithfulness (Mw. 24.[45-51], 25.[1-30]; Mk. 13.[32-37]; Lk. 12.[35-48], 21.[34-36]).

(B) In the fourth Gospel. Here the Coming of Jesus for final judgment is spoken of (5.[25-29]), but is much less prominent. This Gospel brings out those parts of His teaching in wh. emphasis is laid on present judgment (3.[18], RV.), and on resurrection and eternal life as present possessions (11.[25f.], 3.[36]). It omits altogether the discourses of Mw. 24., &c., and their place is taken by His discourse on His Coming by His Resurrection (14.[18], 16.[16]) and by the Holy Spirit (14.[23], cf. 16.[7]).

III. The Parousia in Acts, the Epistles, Revelation.—With the early Christians, including the apostles, the P., as the great event ushering in the kdm. of glory, was a leading article of their creed and an obj. of eager and joyful anticipation (Ac. 1.[11], 3.[19-21]; 1 Cor. 1.[7f.]; 2 Th. 1.[10]). Then wd. be revealed the eternal kdm. of their Lord (2 P. 1.[11]; cf. 2 Tm. 4.[18]), the heavenly Jrs. (Rv. 21.[2ff.]; He. 12.[22]), and the glory of Christ (1 P. 4.[13]), with whom His followers wd. be manifested (Col. 3.[4]), seeing Him and made like Him (1 Jn. 3.[2]). It wd. be for them the day of salvation (1 P. 1.[7-9]; cf. He. 9.[28]), redemption (Eph. 4.[30]), visitation (1 P. 2.[12]), and entire renewal (Php. 3.[20f.]; 1 Th. 5.[23]); of deliverance for the whole creation (Ro. 8.[21f.]), and yet of judgment for the ungodly (2 Th. 1.[7-9]; 2 Cor. 5.[10]). As to the time of the P., the early Christians expected it very soon (Rm. 13.[11]; Php. 4.[5]; Js. 5.[8]; Rv. 22.[7]): Paul expected he wd. live to see it (1 Th. 4.[15]; 1 Cor. 15.[51f.]), while he gave warning that the "man of sin" must first be revealed (2 Th. 2.[1-12]). In 2 Cor. 5.[1ff.] he speaks of the state intervening between death and the P.: some therefore think he had come to believe the P. was not so near.

In Rv. 2.[5, 16], 3.[3, 11], Christ tells the churches that He is coming to sift and purify them. In ch. 19. His Coming is described in warlike imagery, and in ch. 20. He is said to be coming both to reign and to judge. His saints rise and reign with Him for 1000 years, and only then do the genl. resurrection and the final judgment take place. Many fanciful expectations arising fm. this and other chaps. have been set aside by the decisive pronouncements of hist., and questions of interpretation still fascinate and divide Christian men.

In conclusion, while there are many things we cannot clear up, yet (1) the Coming of Christ by the Spirit is of the first immediate importance; (2) His Coming in the crises of His Church and of human affairs (Mw. 26.[64]) is a very impressive lesson fm. hist. as well as fm. the NT.; (3) we cannot explain away the P. at the end of the age (1 Cor. 4.[5], 11.[26]), the crown and climax of those previous Comings; and (4) the tenor of the NT. is such as to lay emphasis on the truth that He comes to individual men at death (Lk. 12.[20]; Jn. 14.[3]). See ESCHATOLOGY, REVELATION.

PARSHANDATHA, the eldest of Haman's ten sons, whom the Jews put to death in Shushan (Est. 9.[7]).

PARTHIA, PARTHIANS (Ac. 2.[9]). Parthia was an empire conterminous with that of Rome, but mainly E. of the Euphrates. The original P. was a territory to the SE. of the Caspian, separated fm. it by the province Hyrcania, with wh. it shared the mountains that formed their mutual boundary. It was a fertile strip lying between the foot of these mountains and the salt desert. The inhabitants seem to have been congeners of the nomadic Scythians, but had adopted a settled life. They were with difficulty subdued and added to the Persian empire by Darius Hystaspis; they are mentioned by Herodotus as forming part of the army with wh. his son Xerxes invaded Greece; along with the Chorasmians they were under the command of Artabazus, the son of Pharnaces (Herod. vii. 66). The Parthians seem to have been quiet, contented subjects of Persia during the whole period of her dominance. When, after the battle of Arbela, the empire of SW. Asia passed into the hands of Alexander the Great, the Parthians submitted to the conqueror without objection. When Alexander died the Parthians made no attempt to throw off the Macedonian yoke; after the battle of Ipsus they peaceably accepted the rule of Seleucus Nicator. The strife of the Seleucids with the Lagids of Egypt for the possession of Cœle Syria was taken advantage of by Diodotus, the satrap of Bactria, to set up as king on his own account. As Antiochus Theos took no steps to recover the lost province, roused by a Bactrian named Arsaces, the Parthians revolted and made Arsaces king. In the Bactrian kingdom Greek influence prevailed, but in Parthia the native influence was predominant. This revolt took place in the year B.C. 250. Arsaces was succeeded after a short reign by his brother Tiridates, who assumed as throne-name that of Arsaces II.; all his successors followed this example, and assumed the name Arsaces. He consolidated the kingdom founded by his brother, and added provinces to it. That for wh. P. owed him most was his defeat of the attempt at reconquest made by Seleucus Callinicus, by which he secured the independence of P. fm. Syrian domination (B.C. 237). His successor, Artabanus, invaded and conquered Media; but Antiochus III. was not one to sit tamely under this: he turned on his adversaries, and inflicted defeat after defeat on Artabanus. Still he was forced by circumstances to make peace and leave P. independent. While he carried his arms into India his rear was defended by his allies in P. and Bactria, although they were not subjects. They were what are now called "buffer states" between Syria and the nomads. After two unimportant reigns, in B.C. 174 Mithridates succeeded to the throne, and further consolidated the Parthian empire; during his long reign he arranged the government of the kingdom. Antiochus Sidetes was the last of the Seleucids who made a serious attempt to subdue P.; at first he was successful, but, taking him by surprise, Phraates II. defeated him in a battle in wh. Sidetes fell. Mithridates the Great was the first of the Arsacides to come in contact with Rome through Sulla. Both Rome and P. feared the power of Mithridates of Pontus, and Sulla put down Tigranes, the Armenian ally of the Pontic king. After this there is a period when the history of P. is very obscure. In the reign of Orodes (c. B.C. 60) P. again becomes prominent. In the first Triumvirate Crassus was assigned the E. as his province; and he came with the avowed intention of conquering P. and securing much plunder fm. it. He not only delayed operations for a year, wh. he devoted to plundering the subject allies of Rome, among the rest the Jews, but also approached the Parthian territory by a line wh. was most favourable to their numerous cavalry, and difficult for an army composed, like the Roman, mainly of infantry. His campaign ended in utter disaster at Carrhæ; Crassus himself was killed, and the greater part of his army either killed or made prisoners. Cassius led the remains of the Roman army into Syria. Emboldened by this disaster, the Jews, but they alone, made an abortive insurrection against the Romans in revenge for the way in wh. Crassus had pillaged the Temple, but the attempt to follow their initial success under Pacorus was defeated by Cassius. During the civil war wh. followed P. remained quiet but observant; Pompey seems to have had some negotiations with Orodes, king of Parthia, but these were resultless. The assassination of Cæsar and the second civil war, followed by the overthrow of the republicans at Philippi, resulted in the over-running of Syria and Asia Minor again by Parthians under Pacorus, the son of Orodes, and a renegade Roman, Labienus. After little more than a year they were hurled back by Antony's lieutenant, Ventidius, till Pacorus was slain in battle, and Antigonus, whom he had set on the Jewish throne, was taken prisoner and executed by Antony's orders at the instigation of Herod. The success of his lieutenant led Antony to undertake direct operations against P. After, however, an initial success, he was compelled to retreat with the loss of nearly the third of his troops. After this the contests with Rome were mainly about the possession of the suzerainty of Armenia, varied by disturbances within P., wh. were fostered by Rome. The Jews formed a numerous class in the population. Most of them were probably the descendants of Nebuchadnezzar's captives who had not taken advantage of Cyrus' permission to return, nor joined with Ezra's company. They were favoured by the Parthians as affording a balance to the numerous Greeks, who were less than lukewarm subjects of a barbarian power. An act of violence done by an unpopular Jewish governor roused the populace, especially the Greeks, to an assault on the Jews wh. resulted in a general massacre. The conflict with Rome went on, accompanied by anarchy within, frequent rebellions, and much cruelty; though ever and anon enlivened by the rising of some irregularly vigorous monarch. At length P. as an imperial power fell before a revolt of the Persians under Artaxerxes the Sassanid in A.D. 227, after having existed close upon half a millennium. Like most Turanians, the Parthians never amalgamated with the conquered races; in this resembling the Turks, who are still aliens even among their co-religionists in Turkey. Like them, they appear to have been incapable of anything like real culture. Neither in art nor literature have the Parthians left any noteworthy remains. In religion they were Zoroastrians, tho' the worship of Mithra was combined with purer doctrines; also a worship of the sun and planets seems to have been affected by them. This religious syncretism led them to tolerate the Jews; fm. the Rabbinic schools set up in Babylon, in Nahardea, in Sura, and in Pumareditha, under the rule of Parthians, in after days sprang the Babylonian Talmud. Christianity was early spread in P.; if Babylon in 1 P. 5.[13] is to be taken literally, Peter may have spread the Gospel there, though tradition assigns that province to Thomas. The western capital of P., Ctesiphon, on the E. bank of the Tigris, had in it many Christians, who were under the superintendence of a bishop, whose see included that city and the Greek city of Seleuceia. They were numerous enough to be persecuted under the Sassanids, but they seem to have lived undisturbed by Government under the rule of the Parthian Arsacids.

THE PARTRIDGE
From Wood's 'Bible Animals,' by permission of Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

PARTRIDGE. The rock partridge, Coccabis chukar, is found in great numbers all over Palestine, both east and west of Jordan. It abounds on the hills round the Sea of Galilee, and nowhere is it more plentiful than in el-Lejā', TRACHONITIS. It is a red-legged bird, with beautiful markings, and is an object of eager pursuit by the huntsman, its flesh being greatly prized for the table. Another species, the sand partridge, Ammoperdix Heyii, is probably referred to under the name of qōrē' in 1 S. 26.[20] and Jr. 17.[11]. In the deserts of Southern Palestine it is especially abundant. It often escapes notice owing to its brown colour, so closely resembling that of its environment. It is often pursued by the huntsmen until, utterly fatigued, it is easily approached and knocked over with a stick. Even so, it seemed, was Saul endeavouring to run David to earth.

In Jr. 17.[11] there may possibly be a reference to an old Oriental belief that the partridge was accustomed to steal the eggs of its congeners and hatch them; but that the young birds speedily deserted their false parent. "As the partridge that sitteth on eggs which she hath not laid (RVm.), so is he that getteth riches, and not by right; in the midst of his days they shall leave him, and at his end he shall be a fool."

In Sr. 11.[30] there is an allusion to a practice still common in Palestine, that of attracting the partridges by means of a decoy bird in a cage.

PARVAIM, a place or region whence gold was brought for the adornment of Solomon's Temple (2 Ch. 3.[6]). It may be identified with Farwa in el-Yemen (Sprenger, Alte Geog. Arabiens, 54f.), in which case it may be the source of the "gold of Sheba"; another possible identification is with Sāq el-Farwain in NE. Arabia (Glazer, Skizze, ii. 347).

PASACH, one of the chiefs of the tribe of Asher, son of Japhlet (1 Ch. 7.[33]).

PAS-DAMMIM. This is the form in which EPHES-DAMMIM (1 S. 17.[1]) appears in 1 Ch. 11.[13].

PASEAH. (1) A Judahite, son of Eshton, a descendant of Caleb (1 Ch. 4.[12]). (2) Father of Jehoiada (RV. Joiada), one of those who repaired the old gate (Ne. 3.[6]). (3) The ancestor of a family of Nethinim, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[49]; Ne. 7.[51], AV. "Phaseah").

PASHUR, RV. PASHHUR. (1) Son of Malchijah, an opponent of Jeremiah (Jr. 21.[1], 38.[1ff.]). He appears in 1 Ch. 9.[12] and Ne. 11.[12]. He acted as Zedekiah's messenger to Jeremiah several times. When Pharaoh Hophra's advance relieved for a space the city from the siege by the Babylonians, and the spirits of the people were raised, he was so incensed at Jeremiah's discouraging prophecies that he joined with others in begging the king to have him put to death as a traitor. This Zedekiah would not do; but they cast the prophet into a dungeon where he came near to perishing. Nothing further is known of Pashhur. (2) Son of Immer, a priest who held a high position in the Temple (Jr. 20.[1]). He also was bitterly opposed to Jeremiah in the reign of Jehoiakim. Because Jeremiah prophesied evil of Jerusalem, P. had him beaten and put in the stocks by the gate of Benjamin, where he left him all night. For this the prophet told him that his name had been called by the Lord, not Pashhur (which may prob. mean "peace") but Magor-missabib, "terror on every side," and proceeded to utter a terrific curse upon him. He should also be ca ried to Babylon, and die and be buried there (Jr. 20.[1ff.]) (3) The father of Gedaliah (Jr. 38.[1]). (4) The ancestor of a priestly family (Ez. 2.[38], 10.[22]; Ne. 7.[41], 11.[12]). (5) A priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ne. 10.[3]).

PASSAGE (Heb. ma'ăbār, ma'bārāh) may be either a ford across a river (Jo. 22.[11], &c.) or a mountain pass, e.g. that at Michmash (1 S. 13.[23], &c.). In Jr. 22.[20] we shd. read with RV. "Abarim," lit. "the parts across," the name of a range of mountains east of the Dead Sea.

PASSION is used definitely of the sufferings of Christ (Ac. 1.[3]). In Ac. 14.[15]; Js. 5.[17], the word has the meaning of feelings or emotions.

PASSOVER, FEAST OF THE; FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD. In origin the Passover was probably a very ancient feast. It may have formed part of the common ritual inheritance of the Semites. Falling in the spring of the year, it was associated with the offering of the firstlings of the flocks and herds in sacrifice. The Feast of Unleavened Bread, with which it is joined, had perhaps a similar history. It fell in the same season, when the first-fruits of the earth were also presented as offerings. Neither the shedding of the blood of the animals offered, nor the eating of unleavened bread, need be regarded as originating in ritual prescription. The animals must be killed for food; and no doubt in early times men often preferred to eat unleavened bread, as they do to this day in the East. This is true especially when the fresh grain is gathered, in the beginning of harvest. In the institution of the Passover, and the Feast of Unleavened Bread, a new significance is attached to old observances. They are no longer to be taken as merely agricultural and pastoral festivals, but are definitely linked in memory with great historical events. They still hold their place among the festivals marking the progress of the seasons, but now receive a monumental or commemorative value.

Possibly the ancient feast is referred to in Ex. 3.[18], &c., where pilgrimage is implied as part of its proper observance. In Ex. 12.[1ff.] we first meet specific directions, where, altho' the Passover is not named, it is clearly intended. "This month" is that of the Deliverance from Egypt. It is to be the first of months of the year for Israel. They are instructed to choose a lamb for each household on the 10th day of the month. Two small households, being neighbours, might join in one lamb, which might be from the sheep or from the goats, a male of the first year, without blemish. On the evening of the 14th day the lamb was to be slain, and its blood sprinkled on the door-posts and lintel of the house where it was to be eaten. It was to be roasted and eaten the same night, with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, nothing being left till the morning; whatever was over was to be burned with fire. They were to eat in haste, with loins girt, feet shod, and staff in hand. The blood on door-posts and lintel was to secure their safety when the plague of God was abroad in Egypt. The Feast was thenceforth to be an annual memorial.

Connected with this is the Feast of Unleavened

Bread, which, beginning on the 14th, is to last for seven days, during which no leaven is to be found in their houses under penalty of being cut off from among their people. This applies also to strangers sojourning with them.

In vv. 21[ff.] more particular instructions are given. The blood is to be caught in a basin and sprinkled with a bunch of hyssop. No one is to go out till morning; and the explanation to be given to children who inquire as to the meaning of the Feast is specified. Haste in leaving Egypt is given as the reason for the bread being unleavened (cp. chap. 13.[6ff.]). A servant or foreigner might take part in the Feast on condition of being circumcised. None of the flesh of the lamb might be carried out of the house, nor might a bone of it be broken.*

The Feast of Unleavened Bread is one of the three occasions on which all males are to appear before the Lord God (23.[14ff.]), and there is evidently an allusion to the Passover ritual in v. 18 (cp. 34.[23ff.]).

In Lv. 23.[5ff.] the Passover is fixed for the 14th day of the first month, the Feast of Unleavened Bread beginning on the 15th and lasting for seven days. A sheaf of the first-fruits is to be brought to the priest, who, on the morrow after the Sabbath, is to wave it before the Lord. That same day a he-lamb of the first year, without blemish, with appropriate meal and drink offerings, is to be made a burnt-offering unto the Lord. Only then might they eat bread, parched corn, or fresh ears of the new harvest.

A year after the Deliverance from Egypt, in the first month of the year, the Passover was observed in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu. 9.[1ff.]). There certain men who were "unclean by the dead body of a man," having been in contact with it for the necessary purpose of burial, were unable thus to observe the Passover at the appointed time. To them, and to such as were on a far journey, permission was given to celebrate the Feast a month later. In Nu. 28.[16] the Passover is noted as falling on the 14th day of the first month, the Feast of Unleavened Bread beginning on the 15th (v. 17), the first and seventh days of that feast being "holy convocations," on which no servile work might be done. Each day of the feast, besides the "continual burnt-offering and the drink-offering thereof," two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, without blemish, were to be offered as a burnt-offering, with their appropriate accompaniments of meal and oil; and one he-goat for a sin-offering.

In Dt. 16.[1ff.] the Passover is directed to be kept in the month of Abib (i.e. "fresh young ears of barley"), and it is explicitly characterised as a memorial of the Deliverance from Egypt. No leavened bread is to be eaten with it, and the Feast of Unleavened Bread is to last six days, leading up to the solemn assembly of the seventh day. Provisions are here added prohibiting the keeping of the Passover in private houses, and appointing the place for its observance by all. "Thou mayest not sacrifice the Passover within any of thy gates which the Lord thy God giveth thee, but at the place which the Lord thy God shall choose to cause His name to dwell in." The roasting and eating are to be completed there, and only thereafter, "in the morning," they may return to their dwellings. The Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread are treated as one. The offerings also are apparently blended, as the Passover is sacrificed "of the flock and the herd." While it is marked as a memorial feast, it takes its place definitely as the first of the annual series of agricultural festivals.

In Jo. 5.[10f.] is recorded the celebration of the Passover at Gilgal after the crossing of the Jordan. There is no further reference to the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread till the days of the kings. In the course of his reforming work Hezekiah ordered the observance of the Passover. It could not be kept at the appointed time because a sufficient number of priests had not sanctified themselves. It had therefore to be postponed to the second month. Intimation was made throughout the land, and the people called to the Passover at Jerusalem. The men of the northern tribes, on the whole, laughed the messengers to scorn, but some humbled themselves and came. Of these a number had not sanctified themselves. For these the Levites killed the sacrifices, and they were permitted, despite their uncleanness, to eat the Passover. The Feast of Unleavened Bread was observed "with great gladness." In the fulness of their hearts they extended this feast other seven days, the king and the nobles making munificent gifts of animals for the sacrifices (2 Ch. 30.). Under Manasseh, probably, things reverted to the order which prevailed before Hezekiah. This continued during the early years of his son Josiah; but after the book of the law was found in the Temple Josiah ordained that the Passover should be kept "as it is written in the book of the covenant" (2 K. 23.[21]; 2 Ch. 35.[1ff.]). It is added, "Surely there was not kept such a Passover from the days of the judges that judged Israel," from which we may infer that many of the observances prescribed in the law had fallen into abeyance. The Passover was kept and the Feast of Unleavened Bread was observed with great joy by the captives who had returned from Babylon, and had kept themselves from "the filthiness of the heathen of the land" (Ez. 6.[19ff.]).

The Passover as described in Ek. 45.[21ff.] differs in important respects from that of earlier days. It is identified with the Feast of Unleavened Bread, as a "feast of seven days," on which unleavened bread is eaten. On the first day the prince furnishes a bullock as a sin-offering for himself and all the people; and on each of the seven days, for burnt-offering, seven bullocks, seven rams without blemish, and a he-goat as a sin-offering, with their proper proportion of meal and oil. The atoning aspect of the sacrifices is especially emphasised. There is no other certain reference to these feasts in the OT.

* "There is so much that is unique about the Paschal ritual that we are tempted to think that the law of Ex. 12.[46], 'Neither shall ye break a bone thereof,' may be a prohibition of some usage descended from the rule given by Nilus, that the bones as well as the flesh must be consumed." —RS.[2], 345 n.

We may assume with practical certainty that the Passover was observed by the Jews during the Captivity. After the breach with the SAMARITANS, and the establishment of the rival temple on Mount Gerizim, there was a twofold observance of the feast, one in Jerusalem and one on the mountain beside Shechem. This last has continued to this day. The present writer has witnessed the scene. The whole Samaritan community moves to the place of sacrifice on the summit of Gerizim. There the rites are performed with careful reference to the directions contained in Exodus. This celebration on the mountain was interrupted for about forty years, during the last cent., by the Moslem authorities, and the feast had to be observed in their own quarter of the city. The right to resort to the ancient sanctuary of their people on Mt. Gerizim for this purpose was restored through the influence of Mr. Finn, then British Consul in Jerusalem. In earlier times a second Passover was celebrated in the following month, for any who were unable to take part in the first; but this has now been long discontinued.

After the Exile the Jews gradually introduced modifications in the observance of the Passover, and in the time of Christ the practice seems to have been as follows: The last month of the old year (Adar) was devoted to preparatory purifications, &c., a point being made of whiting the sepulchres, so that no one might contract uncleanness by contact with them unawares. There is no evidence that the lamb was now chosen on the 7th day of Abib as formerly. On the 13th day of the month, at evening, a thorough search was made in the house for leaven. After a certain hour before noon on the 14th, nothing leavened might be eaten. All work, with slight exceptions, ceased at noon. The hour of the daily sacrifice was put forward to leave time for the Passover ritual. The lamb was slain "between the evenings," i.e. about sunset. A liberal interpretation was given to Ex. 12.[4], and companies of from 10 to 20 were formed, without regard to contiguity of residence. Persons chosen from each company took the lamb—of the first year, and more than eight days old—to the Temple and slew it in presence of the priests, who caught the blood in gold and silver bowls, and threw it at the base of the altar. The lamb was laid on staves resting on the shoulders of two men, flayed and cleansed by the priests, and the parts which were to be burned on the altar removed and prepared for burning. While this was being done the Levites chanted the hallel (Pss. 113.–118.). The lamb was then taken to the place selected by the company, and roasted whole, on a spit of pomegranate wood, which exuded no sap. No bone of the lamb was to be broken, and special care was taken that it should touch nothing—not even the side of the oven. If it touched anything, the part which had been in contact was cut off. For the supper, which must be completed before midnight, the other materials necessary were four cups of red wine for each member of the company; the ḥarōṣeth, a compound of nuts, raisins, apples, almonds, &c.—not obligatory but usual; the bitter herbs, which were to be dipped once in salt water or vinegar and once in the ḥarōṣeth; and the ununleavened cakes. The following order was observed in the feast: (a) A blessing was spoken over the first cup of wine, and the wine was drunk. (b) Bitter herbs were placed on the table, and part eaten. (c) The unleavened cakes were handed round. (d) The lamb was placed before the head of the household and the second cup of wine was filled. (e) One, usually the youngest present, asked what the meaning of the feast might be, and an explanation was given by the father. (f) The first part of the hallel was sung (Pss. 113., 114.). (g) The lamb was eaten. (h) The third cup of wine was drunk, and, after a brief interval, the fourth. (i) The second part of the hallel was sung (Pss. 115.–118.). Sometimes a fifth cup of wine was drunk, when the great hallel was sung (Pss. 120.–138.). This ended the feast proper, but dessert might follow.

The bitter herbs might be water-cress, pepper-cress, endive, &c. They were easily obtained, and from of old they have been largely eaten in Egypt and in the East generally. In the feast they came to symbolise the bitterness of Egyptian bondage. In the ḥarōṣeth the fruit was bruised and mixed. It was symbolic of the clay in which the children of Israel had toiled in Egypt, and was required to be thick. In connection with this feast the ḥagīga is mentioned. This was a freewill peace-offering, taken from flock or herd, male or female, but without blemish. It was taken to the door of the sanctuary, where the offerer laid his hand on its head and slew it. The priest sprinkled its blood on the altar, and burned the fat and kidneys. Certain parts were given to the priests, and the rest might be eaten by the offerer and his guests. It had, however, to be consumed on that day or the day following; whatever remained till the third day was burned.

A second, or, as the Talmud calls it, "little" Passover, was held a month later, for the benefit of any who might be prevented from taking part in the first. It differed from the first in that it lasted only one day: the hallel was required to be sung only when the lamb was slaughtered; and it does not appear that the same care was exercised to remove all leaven from the house (see Edersheim, The Temple and its Service, passim).

While in ancient days the Passover was eaten standing, with loins girt, feet shod, and staff in hand, as if ready for a journey, in later times the finest holiday attire was worn, and the feast was eaten reclining at table, signifying, as the rabbis said, that God had given to His people the promised rest.

We have seen that in its origin the Passover is very ancient. It is the one feast instituted before the Exodus. It is associated with a demand for permission to make a sacrifice which involved a pilgrimage. This may have been the offering of the first-born; and some have thought that the smiting of the first-born of the Egyptians may have been the punishment inflicted by God because the permission was refused. The offerings of firstlings and of first-fruits, falling naturally at the same season of the year, go back to high antiquity (cp. the story of Cain and Abel). The Passover cannot, however, be described as the continuation of any particular festival. It might almost be called a summary of the sacrificial ritual, embodying such features as the sprinkling of the blood, which marks the atoning sacrifice—the sin-offering; the roasting of the flesh, as in the burnt-offering; and the eating of the flesh by the offerer, which is characteristic of the peace-offering. Coincidence in date no doubt led to its amalgamation with the Feast of Unleavened Bread. This was observed when the sickle was first put into the barley crop—the earliest of the cereals—when in their eagerness to taste the fruit of the new year, men did not wait for the process of leavening. The Passover was no doubt a solemn feast, with elements of sombreness; but the Feast of Unleavened Bread was a joyful festival, the first of the series including the Feast of Weeks and the Feast of Tabernacles, which marked the progress of the agricultural year.

PATARA, an important Lycian seaport, situated about sixty stadia SE. of the mouth of the river

Coin of Patara

Xanthus. A convenient place of call for vessels engaged in trade between the Levant and the West, with a rich valley behind it, Patara was probably a prosperous place in ancient times. It was noted for its devotion to the worship of Apollo, and here was a famous oracle (Horace Od. III. iv. 64). It developed a considerable commerce in the third cent. B.C., when Ptolemy Philadelphus extended the city and called it by the name of his queen, Arsinoe. The name lasted only as long as the Egyptian supremacy. Patara was touched by St. Paul, who came from the island of Rhodes, which lies to the west. Here he found a ship "crossing over unto Phœnicia." The direct course to Tyre was possible because of the prevailing west winds (Ac. 21.[1f.]). The ancient site is marked by the mod. village Gelemish. There are considerable ruins, notably of a theatre, baths, and a triple arch, which was one of the gates of the city. The harbour is now blocked up with sand.

PATHROS, PATHRUSIM. In Is. 11.[11] it is said that the Lord will recover the remnant of His people "from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush (Ethiopia)." This points to a position between Egypt (Mitzraim) and Ethiopia. Jr. 44.[1] places it south of Noph, i.e. Memphis: while in v. 15 it is distinguished from "Egypt"; so also in Ek. 29.^{14}, 30.^{14}. It represents the Egyptian pteres, "south land," and denotes Southern, i.e. Upper Egypt, stretching from the neighbourhood of Memphis to Syene; Mitzraim ("Egypt"), applied to Lower Egypt, comprising the Delta and the valley as far south as Memphis. The prophets were thus aware of the old political division of the land. Upper Egypt was but little known to the outside world, but Jews were probably found there from very early times. Recently discovered papyri furnish abundant proof of a strong Jewish colony being settled at Syene, in the extreme south, more than half a millennium before the coming of Christ. Pathrusim, the inhabitants of Pathros, are represented as the offspring of Mitzraim (Gn. 10.^{14}; 1 Ch. 1.^{12}).

PATMOS, a bare, rocky island in that part of the Ægean called the Sea of Icaria, one of the Sporades off the coast of Caria, now called Patino. It is about ten miles long and six miles broad, with an exceedingly irregular coast-line. The loftiest hill, Hagios Elias, is over 800 ft. high. In the Middle Ages it was known by the name of Palmosa; but the palms have now disappeared. A narrow isthmus connects the northern and southern parts of the island. Here, on the east side, lay the ancient capital and harbour. Its great antiquity is proved by the cyclopean ruins of the citadel. The modern town lies somewhat to the south, and is dominated by the monastery of St. John, an imposing building, founded in the eleventh century. The cave of the Apocalypse is shown about half way up the hill. Patmos was famous in former times for its library, which has now fallen on evil days. Here, in 1814, was purchased the famous Codex of Plato, dating from the ninth cent., now in the Bodleian. Tradition says that St. John was banished to Patmos in Domitian's 14th year, and returned to Ephesus in A.D. 96 (Eusebius, HE. iii. 18).

PATRIARCH is the name generally applied to the men, of whose lives a record is preserved, before the time of Moses. It is applied more particularly to the great fathers of the Jewish race, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and to the sons of the last. The title is once given to David (Ac. 2.^{29}). By the "patriarchal system" is meant the order of society which grew naturally out of the family before nations with ordered government arose. The "patriarchal dispensation" refers to the fellowship with God vouchsafed to men before the choice of Israel.

PATROBUS, one of the Christians in Rome saluted by St. Paul (Rm. 16.^{14}). Tradition gives him a place among the seventy disciples. He is said to have become bishop of Puteoli, and to have been martyred on Nov. 4 along with Philologus.

PATTERN. Three Heb. words are so trd. (1) Mar'eh, lit. "appearance" (Nu. 8.^{4}). (2) Tabnīth, "a pattern" or "figure" of something to be constructed (Ex. 25.^{9}; 2 K. 16.^{10}, &c.). (3) Tokhnīth, lit. "measurement" or "proportion" (Ek. 43.^{10}). It also stands for three Greek words. (1) Tupos, "model." It is something to be copied (Tt. 2.^{7}, RV. "ensample"). In He. 8.^{5} it is = Heb. tabnīth. (2) Hupodeigma, lit. "copy" (He. 8.^{5}, AV. "example," RV. "copy," 9.^{23}). (3) Hupotupōsis is a sketch or outline (1 Tm. 1.^{16}; 2 Tm. 1.^{13}).

PAU. See Pai.

PAUL, the Latin name of the apostle of the Gentiles; his Heb. name was Saul. He is introduced to us in the bk. of Acts in connection with the martyrdom of Stephen (Ac. 7.^{58}); he is then a member of the Sanhedrin, prominent, though young. Of his earlier life we learn fm. his speeches recorded in Acts that he was a native of Tarsus (Ac. 22.^{3}) but had inherited Roman citizenship (Ac. 22.$^{26-28}$). As a Jew P. belonged to the tribe of Benjamin (Rm. 11.^{1}; Php. 3.^{5}): by religion he was a Pharisee (Ac. 23.^{6}, 26.^{5}). Early in life he had been sent to Jrs. to be educated for the post of rabbi in the school of Gamaliel (Ac. 22.^{3}).

How the ancestor fm. whom P. inherited his Roman citizenship acquired it we have no means of knowing. It is not impossible that P.'s grandfather had been taken by Pompey to Rome as a captive, sold as a slave, and, becoming a freedman, acquired wealth and retired to Tarsus. The tradition recorded by Jerome, that P. belonged to Giscala, must only refer to his grandparents. Jerome's statement is impossible as it stands (Wrede adopts it as true). The date of Paul's birth is uncertain, but Lewin conjectures A.D. 2. The fact that P. passed his early youth in a Gentile university city like Tarsus meant considerable intercourse with Gentiles and some knowledge of Hellenism. Though the Jews for convenience in regard to food collected in certain neighbourhoods, there was nothing like the mediæval Ghetto in the cities of the Roman empire. P. knew something of Greek Literature, as is proved by his quotations. He knew that more than one poet had the phrase, "We are also His offspring" (Ac. 17.^{28}); he can complete the common quotation fm. Epimenides (Tt. 1.^{12}). His stay in Jrs. probably coincided with our Lord's ministry; so P. may have seen Him (2 Cor. 5.^{16}), but, it is needless to say, was not influenced by Him.

After his novitiate P. seems to have risen rapidly into prominence, till he was admitted into the Sanhedrin (Ac. 26.^{10}). The rise of Christianity roused his opposition alike for patriotic and for religious reasons; especially when its consequences were expounded by Stephen. He vehemently aided the efforts of the High Priest to annihilate the sect by persecution. Jerusalem was too narrow a sphere for his zeal: learning that the "sect" had spread to other cities, and that the Judaism of the dispersion was infected by "this way," he importuned the High Priest for letters of authorisation by wh. he wd. be able to carry his work of persecution even into strange cities. Whatever show of hesitancy he mt. present, the High Priest was nothing loath to grant his request. Nearing DAMASCUS, wh. he made his first objective, and whither he went as accredited representative of the High Priest, Jesus met him. A light shone round about him brighter than the noonday sun, and a voice declared: "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest; it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks"—a sentence that indicates that Paul had begun to suspect that Christianity was after all true, and that this fierce persecution was partly to convince himself. Stricken to the earth, stunned and blinded, he had to be led into the city. The Lord who had met him on the way had His servants in Damascus, and when Saul was lying blinded, confounded, wrestling in prayer, sent one of them to open his eyes physically and spiritually. Conversation with ANANIAS deepened the effect of the vision, and P. became a Christian. He departed for a season into ARABIA, most likely to think out what all this meant: he had to reconstruct his beliefs in the light of the new faith. He may have proclaimed Christ even there, but soon returned to preach in Damascus the faith wh. once he destroyed. The Jews, unable to meet in argument the accomplished Jerusalem rabbi, endeavoured to silence him by the easy method of assassination; but the disciples, aware of the plot, let him down over the city wall in a basket. He proceeded to Jrs., where Barnabas, who probably had known him as a youth, received him and introduced him to the apostles, who with the other believers at first shunned and suspected him. In Jrs. his life was again threatened, and he was sent away to his native city Tarsus. Although we have no details we may assume that P. proclaimed his new-found faith among the friends of his boyhood, with no marked success it wd. seem, altho' when he sets out on his second missionary journey he strengthens churches in Cilicia as well as in Syria; these Cilician churches may have owed their origin to his early preaching. Meantime the Gospel had spread to ANTIOCH, and Gentiles were entering the Church. Barnabas was sent fm. Jrs. by the apostles to investigate the matter on the spot. Broad-minded as he was, he saw not only a new sphere for the spread of Christianity, but also an opening for his friend P., so he went to Tarsus to seek him out and bring him to Antioch. Almost at once, it wd. seem, Saul became prominent among the teachers of the new faith. Soon the Mother Church of Gentile Christianity, led by the Divine Spirit, determined to pass on the gift they had received to other Gentiles, and Barnabas and P. were selected to be the messengers of the Church. Fm. Seleucia, the port of Antioch, are to be seen the peaks of CYPRUS, the birthplace of Barnabas. Thither the two friends sailed, accompanied by John Mark, the nephew of Barnabas, and landing at SALAMIS, proceeded fm. city to city, probably along the southern coast to PAPHOS, the residence of the Roman "deputy" (proconsul), SERGIUS PAULUS. Like not a few of the governing class in Rome of that time, Sergius was interested in philosophical, i.e., religious questions; so the two Jews were brought before him. They find their efforts to enlighten the proconsul neutralised by another Jew, ELYMAS "the sorcerer." It wd. seem that Elymas endeavoured by sophistical arguments to hinder the proconsul fm. recognising the truth. P. rebukes him as "full of all subtilty, the child of the devil, the enemy of all righteousness," and emphasises his rebuke by striking him with blindness (Ac. 13.[6-12]). When it is said that "the deputy believed," as there is nothing said of baptism following, we may not regard his belief as more than a recognition that there was "something" in the doctrine of these missionaries more than the magic of the soothsayers. At the same time we must remember that this negative conclusion is based largely on the fact that we have no further notice of Sergius Paulus; he for aught we know may have been one of the founders of the Church in Rome, and death may have taken him ere the apostle reached that city seventeen years after. Even the twelve years that elapsed between Paul's visit to Cyprus and the writing of the Epistle to the Romans may explain why he is not named, if the last chapter be not really addressed to Ephesus. Up to this point the apostle had been called "Saul," after this it is always P. Some have thought that there was a connection between the conversion of Sergius Paulus and the adoption of the Roman name. The probability is that the adoption of the Roman name in preference to the Jewish was the outward and visible sign of P.'s acceptance of the office of "apostle to the Gentiles." There is something grotesquely un-Pauline in the suggestion that, as Metellus fm. his conquest of Crete was called Creticus, so Saul took "Paul" fm. his conversion of Paulus; yet this is the opinion of St. Jerome.

Leaving Paphos, the little band sailed to PERGA, where Mark deserted them. They at once proceeded inland to Antioch in Pisidia. On the Sabbath P. and Barnabas entered the synagogue. An opportunity of speech being given them, P. delivered an address in wh. he proved fm. the prophets that Jesus was not only the Christ of the Jews, but also that He was the Divine Saviour of the world. This doctrine was rejected by the majority of the Jews: a Messiah who had been crucified overturned all their hopes of imperial power through Him—a Messiah who was Saviour of the Gentiles sapped the foundation of their belief in their special privileges: so these missionaries turned to the Gentiles. The Gospel had so much success among them that this led the Jews to stir up "persecution agst. P. and Barnabas." Leaving Antioch they went to Iconium, a city lying E. of Antioch and reckoned as in Phrygia by Xenophon, but by Strabo as in Lycaonia—at this time it formed part of the province of Galatia. There the history of their work in Antioch was repeated, only that the Jews and their rulers wished to excite the mob to stone the apostles; their hatred was thus more deadly. They left then for Lystra, where the cure of an impotent man led the people to imagine that, as in the old legend of Baucis and Philemon, localised so near them, Zeus and Hermes had revisited their land. Full of religious excitement, the Hellenic culture slips away from them; they forget the Greek tongue, and in their ancestral Lycaonian tongue they shout out, "The gods have come down in the likeness of men," and, aided and encouraged by the priest of Zeus, they attempt to offer sacrifice to them. This with difficulty the apostles prevented them doing, declaring, "We also are men of like passions with you" (Ac. 14.[15]), and denounced the worship of the false gods for whom they were mistaken. Under the influence of the Jews fm. Iconium and Antioch the mood of the multitude changed; P. was stoned and dragged out of the city for dead. He revived, however, and along with Barnabas proceeded to Derbe. Long after we find " Gaius of Derbe " one of the apostle's chosen associates (Ac. 20.^{4}); probably he was one of the many men taught by the apostle at this time. After a short but fruitful stay there they retraced their steps, revisiting the churches they had founded, and embarked at Attaleia for the greater Antioch whence they had come.

The cities they had just evangelised, though three of them were in the district of Lycaonia and one in that of PHRYGIA (PISIDIA), were all in the Roman province of GALATIA. Professor Sir Wm. Ramsay contends with great acuteness that these are the churches addressed in the Ep. to the Galatians; but see GALATIA.

This preaching of the Gospel with so much acceptance among the Gentiles caused questionings in the Mother Church in Jrs. Paul and Barnabas were sent to Jrs. from Antioch to report and ask advice. The little Christian communities with the name ekklēsia (church), adopted some of the notions connoted by it in the minds of Hellenic believers. Even in the cases of cities claiming the most absolute independence the opinion of the ekklēsia of the metropolis or " mother city " was always of weight. After a discussion a compromise was agreed to, at the suggestion of James, and this decision was embodied in a letter to the Gentiles who had embraced the faith; the converts were to submit to certain ceremonial restrictions as to food, but were relieved fm. circumcision (Ac. 15.$^{1-30}$).

There has always been a difficulty felt in the presence of "fornication" (a moral delinquency) among the purely ceremonial matters. Bentley's suggestion of πορκεία, " swine's flesh," instead of πορνεία, " fornication," is at least plausible, tho' no MS. authority has been found for it; as we learn fm. 2 M. and 4 M. how very abhorrent to the Jew was the eating of " swine's flesh," for the sake of Christian unity it wd. be as needful to abstain fm. it as fm. " things strangled and fm. blood." At the same time it is not to be denied that the sin referred to was very lightly regarded among the Greeks, and even when they had become converts to Christianity it wd. be difficult for them at once to rise to the loftier morality of Christ, and so they mt. be prone to consider it as merely a law binding on the Jews.

Bearing letters wh. conveyed the apostolic " Irenicon," P. and Barnabas accompanied SILAS and Judas Barsabas to the Church of Antioch, from wh. they had come to Jrs. Peter appears soon to have followed the deputies to Antioch. While at first loyal to the compromise, on the arrival of certain believers fm. Jrs. he Judaised, and led Barnabas to do so likewise. This tergiversation was sternly rebuked in public assembly by P. (Gal. 2.$^{11-14}$). Shortly after this P. proposed to Barnabas that they shd. revisit the churches they had founded. Barnabas was willing to do so, but wished to give his nephew Mark an opportunity of redeeming himself. P. wd. not have him on any account. The friends quarrelled and separated; Barnabas and Mark went to Cyprus; P., accompanied by Silas, went by land, visiting on their way to Galatia the churches in Syria and in Paul's native province of CILICIA. At Lystra P. joined to his company TIMOTHY, son of a Jewess, Eunice, by a Greek father; him P. circumcised in order to forestall the opposition of the Judaisers. Thence he proceeded westward, making known to the Gentile churches the decision of the Mother Church. In some providential way P. was hindered fm. preaching in the Roman province of Asia—in Ephesus, the capital of wh., he was to establish such a flourishing church—till he came to Troas. Here, moved by a vision, he took the momentous decision of carrying the Gospel into Europe.

Joined now by the historian LUKE, the company sailed over the Ægean to Macedonia. After landing at Samothracia they hurried on to Philippi, wh. had the honour to be a Roman colony. There the Jewish community was neither large nor influential, as they do not seem to have had a synagogue but a proseuchē, " a place for prayer," outside the city by the banks of the river. They found an entrance into the hearts of the people largely through the influence of Lydia, a seller of purple. Their progress was arrested not by the Jews but by the owners of a mad girl, whose maunderings were regarded as Divine oracles. Some chord in her disordered brain had been touched by the preaching of Paul, and following him and Silas she declared: " These men are the servants of the Most High God, wh. show unto us the way of salvation." Following Christ's example, Paul wd. have none of such testimony. He commanded the spirit of " Pytho " to come out of her and so healed her madness, and the money gained fm. her soothsaying ceased. Suborned by the proprietors of this slave girl, who urged that the customs enjoined by the apostle were not " lawful for them to observe," as they were Romans, the multitude, excited by this appeal to their pride and their patriotism, rose and haled P. and Silas before the magistrates, who commanded them to be beaten and sent them to prison. It is difficult to understand what it was in the apostle's teaching that wd. afford a plausible ground for accusing him and those with him of teaching unlawful customs. There was a law against foreign religions, but this had long been in abeyance in Rome itself. It probably was an accusation of sorcery against them and of teaching it to their disciples. While they were in the prison an earthquake shook the building; the terrified jailer, to whom the apostles presented the Gospel, declared himself a convert. The magistrates now wished to release their prisoners, but P. claimed his rights as a Roman citizen, and forced an apology fm. them. Having taken good bye of Lydia and the church in her house, P. and those with him took their departure (Ac. 16.$^{11-40}$). Paul always seems to have had a specially endearing relationship to this earliest of European churches. Renan wd. explain this by holding that Paul was married to Lydia, and that she is the "true yokefellow" of Php. 4.[3]. They passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia and hastened on to Thessalonica. Here there was a larger Jewish community, and to them first P. and Silas preached, and through them the Christian missionaries reached the Gentiles; then the history of the work in Iconium was repeated; the Jews roused the people against P. and his companions.

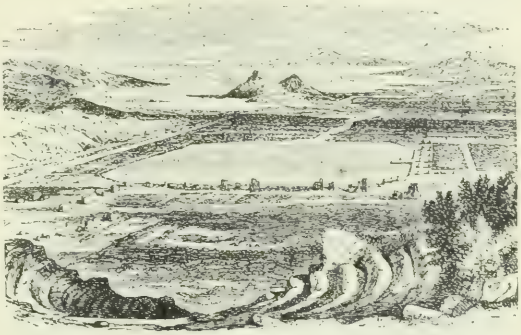
Here in passing may be noted a proof of the minute accuracy of Luke—the magistrates in Thessalonica are called "politarchs," a title proved by inscriptions to be that by wh. they were then known, whereas the magistrates in Philippi are stratēgoi, the received Greek tr. of the Latin decemviri, who were the magistrates in a "colony."

The believers sent P. to Berea, where on a smaller scale the same succession of events occurred (Ac. 17.[1-13]). P. was sent on by sea to ATHENS. There he spent his time while waiting for Silas and Timothy; the former seems to have tarried longer in Berea, and only the latter came on to Athens. In his anxiety for the Thessalonian believers he sends Timothy away to Thessalonica, and is once more left alone (1 Th. 3.[1]). As the Jews do not seem to have had a synagogue in Athens, Paul had not his usual port of entrance into the city's life, so he was for the time a sightseer, and saw an altar to the Unknown God, of wh. there were probably several. Since he cd. not enter into the life of the city by the synagogue, he used the knowledge of the customs of philosophers acquired in Tarsus; and in going through the city he entered into disputes with the representatives of the various philosophic sects. As it was a secluded spot, the philosophers brought P. to the Areopagus to hear what he had to say. Altho' his speech was a model of wise conciliatory advocacy, the Gospel does not seem to have had much success in Athens (Ac. 17.[14-34]). To these philosophers truth was a thing to be argued about, not a thing by wh. a man cd. live, for wh. a man wd. die, as it was to Paul. Without waiting for his friends P. went on to CORINTH. There he made friends with AQUILA, like himself a tentmaker, who with his wife Priscilla had left Rome shortly before, in consequence of the decree of CLAUDIUS expelling all Jews fm. the city. At first it seemed as if P.'s fate wd. pursue him here; first success, then uproar through the envy of the Jews, then expulsion by the civil authorities. But when the Jews brought P. before the judgment-seat of GALLIO the wise refusal of this Roman officer to involve himself in questions of their law gave freedom for the spread of the Gospel (Ac. 18.[1-18]).

In passing, again let us note the accuracy with wh. Luke designates the office of Gallio: he is anthupatos, "proconsul," a title wh. wd. have been correct but a few years earlier; further, there is the naming of the "deputy." A falsarius had no need then to be so careful.

After a ministry of eighteen months, during wh. he wrote the two Epp. to the THESSALONIANS, P. sailed for EPHESUS, where, however, he was unable to stay. He sailed thence to Cæsarea, and fm. there paid a flying visit to Jrs. to salute the Mother Church. P. then returned to Antioch, whence he had set out (Ac. 18.[18-23]). After P. had left Corinth for Jrs., an Alexandrian Jew, APOLLOS, arrived there. His message was really a call to repentance, in accordance with the preaching of John the Baptist, in the hope of a coming Messiah. Instructed "in the way of God more perfectly" by Aquila and Priscilla, he became an eloquent preacher of Christ (Ac. 18.[24-28]). His presence in Corinth afforded a starting-point for those divisions for wh. the Corinthian Church so soon became notorious



SITE OF EPHESUS

(1 Cor. 1.[11-13]). While some were faithful to the apostle fm. whose lips they had received the Gospel, others were charmed by the polished periods of the accomplished Alexandrian. The Judaisers had seduced some to believe that Peter was a truer exponent of Christianity than Paul cd. be, while yet others wd. seem to have restricted themselves to the words of Jesus Himself. P. does not seem to have rested long in Antioch, but to have set out to revisit the churches in Lycaonia and Phrygia, "strengthening the disciples."

That Lycaonia is meant by Γαλατικὴ χώρη is evident fm. the fact that P. is confirming churches already founded; while Lycaonia lies naturally between Antioch and Phrygia. The district of Galatia, as distinct fm. the province, is so far to the north that Phrygia wd. not naturally be visited by one coming fm. Antioch on the way to it, nor by one on the way to Phrygia; but see GALATIA.

Having passed through the eastern portion of Asia Minor, P. arrived in Ephesus to pay the prolonged visit he had already promised. Ephesus was the seat of the Roman government of the province of Asia—all the roads converged on it. It was also a great commercial centre, and moreover the seat of the worship of Diana—a most important strategic position for the conquest of Asia for Christ. There he began his work by bringing certain disciples of John to a profounder knowledge of the Gospel. It is singular to find that the disciples of John had proclaimed his incomplete Gospel so widely: probably Jews who had visited Jerusalem while he fulfilled his ministry had carried away so strong an impression that they conveyed it to others. The first three months of his stay P. reasoned in the synagogue with the Jews, till at length, opposition being stirred up, he separated the believers and assembled them in "the school of one Tyrannus." Lewin thinks that this may have been a rhetorician named by Suidas as an authority. Conybeare and Howson think, whoever he was, he must have been a convert. Alford thinks he probably was a Jew, as scrupulous Jews wd. not be ready to assemble in a heathen lecture-hall. The two years of Paul's occupancy of this lecture-hall were fruitful in converts. Luke says, "All they that dwelt in Asia heard of the Lord Jesus." Probably P. appointed presbyters to carry the message of the Gospel to the other cities of Roman Asia, not impossibly himself occasionally accompanying them. Not unlikely it was at this time that the churches at Colosse, Laodicæa, and Hierapolis, in the valley of the Lycus, wh. had not seen Paul in the flesh (Col. 2.[1]), had been established. Many works of healing were done by P. Some of the cures were accomplished at a distance by means of napkins and aprons. This does not mean that curative power was conveyed in these articles of clothing, for it was Divine power that effected the cure, but these articles gave the contributory faith of the patient something to lay hold of. Even evil spirits were by this means compelled to leave their victims; this raised the emulation of certain Jews, sons of one Sceva, who is called "High Priest," a title that seems to indicate a connection with the Essenes. These exorcists were discomfited by the demoniac on whom they attempted to operate. Ephesus was the home of magic, and the influence of P.'s preaching was shown by many of those who "used curious arts" abandoning these practices and burning their magical books. Probably scepticism as to the power of magical formulæ now so general in civilised countries does not date more than a couple of centuries back, and in the East belief in it is common to this day. Many ancient inscriptions are destroyed in the East lest there shd. be words of power upon them wh. the Franks wd. understand, and so secure hid treasures wh. ought, so they think, to come to true Moslems. The greatest evidence of P.'s success was the complaint of Demetrius, the silversmith, and his fellow-tradesmen, that their trade in "silver shrines for Diana," little models of the great temple, had fallen off. They mask their greed of gain under the face of zeal for religion, and excite the whole multitude of citizens to the idea that the credit of the city is at stake. The mob rush into the theatre without any clear idea of what had taken place. Paul was willing to expose himself in the theatre to address the mob, but not only the members of the Christian community but also the Asiarchs—officials connected with the sacred festivals—entreated him not to do so. The great uproar thus occasioned did not cause P. to leave Ephesus immediately, tho' he did so after a brief interval, as one may deduce fm. the language.

While still in Ephesus messengers came to P. fm. Corinth informing him of the state of the Church there, and asking his advice: this led him to write the 1st Epistle to the CORINTHIANS. Some have thought that during his prolonged stay in Ephesus Paul paid a short visit to Corinth. It is quite true that it was in all probability comparatively easy to pay such a visit, as there wd. likely be constant communication between two such important commercial centres as Corinth and Ephesus, but we have no distinct evidence of such a visit—indeed the tone of the Epp. appears to preclude it. When he left Ephesus P. proceeded to Troas, where he hoped to meet Titus with news of the Corinthian Church, to wh. he had been sent with Paul's epistle. Paul did not find him there as he expected. Full of anxiety, Paul crossed to Macedonia and hastened to Philippi: while waiting there, Titus arrived with good news. In gladness of heart, yet also with some anxiety as to the efforts of the Judaisers, he wrote his 2nd Epistle to Corinth. This epistle shows the conflict with the Judaising Christians in full force; the "Irenikon" of Jrs. seems to have been disregarded by these fiery spirits. P. was collecting funds for the support of "the poor saints" in Jrs. fm. the Gentile churches.

At the present time there is a custom, a survival fm. ancient days, of the Jews of the diaspora sending money for the support of Jews in Palestine; nine-tenths of the Jews now resident in Palestine are supported by the charity of their European brethren. P. in like manner wd. devote the charity of the Gentile Christians to the support of the Christians of Jrs.

In due time he arrived in Corinth, wh. had been his objective fm. the time of his departure fm. Ephesus. We have no details of the events of this short stay in Corinth, but it wd. seem certain that P. then wrote his Epistle to the ROMANS, and probably that also to the GALATIANS, from there. About this time, whether fm. Corinth or on his way to it, P. took the journey into Illyricum to wh. he refers in Rm. 15.[19]. He left Corinth for Macedonia and came again to Philippi, where, by the change of pronoun, we learn that he was joined by Luke, and fm. Philippi sailed to Troas, where he was joined by other disciples who had preceded him thither. While there the incident of Eutychus occurred (Ac. 20.[6-11]). The meeting-place was an upper room, where the disciples were accustomed to meet for the celebration, every Sunday evening, of Holy Communion. The believers crowded in to hear the apostle's exhortations: even the very balconies were filled, and people were sitting on the railings. Paul, full of his great message, prolonged his exhortation, mingled, it may be, with accounts of how the Lord had prospered his work in other places. There were many oil lamps, as Luke informs us, in that upper room, and these wd. help yet more to exhaust the air, already scant enough for the crowd that filled it. The lateness of the hour, the length of the discourse, and the closeness of the atmosphere prove too much for Eutychus, who had been sitting on the railing of the balcony; he falls asleep, falls down on to the paved street, and is taken up dead. Paul hurried down, embraced the lad, and restored him to life. To secure a little longer time with the Christians of Troas Paul allows his friends to depart by ship round Cape Lectum, proposing to join them at Assos, a distance of 20 miles by land, about half the distance of the sea journey. Of the journey from Assos to Jrs. the main incident was Paul's meeting with the elders of Ephesus at Miletus. He had sent word to Ephesus, possibly from Trogyllium, requesting the elders of the Church of that city to take the 30 miles journey to Miletus, for had the ship wh. had probably been freighted by Paul's company sailed up to the harbour of Ephesus, a contrary wind might have delayed him a long time. In his affecting speech one may note his fear lest any one shd. regard him as eager for money. The vice of dishonesty was and is so common among the Levantines that a reputation for incorruptible honesty gave a man immense influence. His declaration that he had "kept nothing back" seems to be a reference to pretended esoteric doctrines wh. the Gnostics of a slightly later day made great use of, alleging that this apostle or that had left a secret Gospel. The Judaisers probably had begun the process by this time; the Essenes, fm. whom the Judaisers appear largely to have been recruited, dealt much in Apocryphal Literature. That wh. caused most sorrow was the conviction the apostle expressed that he wd. never see them or they him again: this, however, is not to be regarded as other than a deduction of human reason in wh. Paul in this instance was mistaken. Having thus taken a solemn farewell of them, as never expecting to see them again, he rejoins the ship. Proceeding on their course past Rhodes and Patara, where they dismiss the little vessel they had hired, they take their passage in a cargo ship; sighting Cyprus, they passed to the S. of it direct to Tyre, whither the ship was bound. There they abode a week. The believers there warned Paul not to go to Jerusalem. Although Paul had none of the fanatic zeal that needlessly rushes into danger, yet here he felt that duty called him to go there whatever the risk to himself. The point wh. led him to recognise it as a duty was the use that mt. have been made by the Judaisers of his failure to go to meet the older apostles. The company with P. found a coasting vessel in wh. they sailed on to Cæsarea, staying a day at Ptolemais on the way. At Cæsarea the company is received with Oriental hospitality by Philip the evangelist; it is noted that he had four daughters who had the gift of prophecy, fm. wh. we may infer that they also tried to dissuade Paul fm. going to Jrs. While still with Philip, the prophet AGABUS came down fm. Jrs., and, endeavouring to emphasise the advice Paul had received fm. so many quarters, in expressive symbol foretold the treatment that awaited him at the hands of the Jews. The dangers before him did not dissuade P. fm. his purpose; so he and his companions proceeded to Jrs. and there lodged with Mnason, a Cyprian Jew (Ac. 21.[1-16]); but see MNASON.

When he reached Jrs., P. informed the assembled elders of the Church of the results of his ministry among the Gentiles. The Senate, as we may call them, of the mother republic of Christendom expressed their joy in the result of Paul's preaching, but warned him of the state of matters in Jrs. It is to be noted that these warnings contemplated only the action of the Judaisers, not the Jews as a nation. It was suggested to him that in order to conciliate the Judaisers he shd. pay the expenses of certain Jewish Christians who had taken on them Nazirite vows. This, however, occasioned the crisis it was intended to avert. Certain Jews of Asia Minor, seeing P. in the Temple, and having seen him in the city with Trophimus, an Ephesian, raised the cry that he had profaned the Holy Place. At once a tumult was excited, and P. wd. certainly have been slain had not CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, the commander of the Roman garrison, descended into the Temple court and delivered him. Fm. the stairs of the Castle Antonia P. was allowed to address the multitude. As he spoke in Hebrew (Aramaic) they listened attentively until he spoke of his mission to the Gentiles; then uproar arose afresh. Lysias, unable to understand the meaning of all this, determined to examine P. by scourging. P., however, claimed his right as a Roman citizen, and was saved the pain and ignominy, tho' still retained in custody. Lysias sent P. before the Sanhedrin that he might learn the cause of the Jewish enmity. Paul had hardly begun his defence when Ananias the High Priest commanded to smite Paul on the mouth, prompting Paul to a bitter retort, all the more bitter for the truth that was in it. For this Paul promptly apologised. There resulted fm. this a state of excited tension, wh. was increased rather than appeased when P., recognising the power of the Pharisees in the assembly, and recalling the enmity between them and the Sadducees, declared, "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection fm. the dead am I called in question this day." Paul asserts his agreement with the Pharisees as against the Sadducees, on the two points regarding which he is called in question, viz., the hope of a Messiah, and the general resurrection of the dead: although he differed from them in identifying Jesus with that Messiah, and in asserting that, after His crucifixion, He had risen from the dead—this was not in question. Paul's life was endangered in the "dissension" which ensued between the parties; and again Lysias had to rescue him from the hands of his countrymen. Now came a diabolical conspiracy on the part of Jewish fanatics—forty of the Jews came under a mutual oath neither to eat nor drink till they had slain P., and got the priestly party readily to assist them in their project by requesting that P. shd. be brought down to them again; but Paul's nephew, finding out their plan, informed his uncle, who in turn informed Claudius Lysias. He now sent him to Cæsarea (as no justice was to be got in Jrs.) to FELIX, along with a letter wh. with fair accuracy records the facts, only he asserts his own action to have been prompted by his knowledge that Paul was a Roman—wh. he did not know till he was about to have Paul scourged. When the High-priestly party went down to Cæsarea they were accompanied by a certain Tertullus, a Roman advocate, who flattered Felix for his activity in putting down robbers—this was meant in the reference to the quietness enjoyed by the Jews—and the worthy deeds wh. had been done by Felix. He accused Paul of being turbulent and causing dispeace and uproar in the city, a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes, and an attempted profaner of the Temple. No proof is offered that these statements are true, so Paul's answer is a triumphant refutation. Felix ought to have dismissed the case, but on the pretence that he must consult Claudius Lysias delayed his decision. Though convinced of P.'s innocence, Felix kept him in prison in the hope that he wd. be bribed to release him. When Felix gave place to a successor, P. was tried anew before FESTUS. When Festus wished to do the Jews a favour and carry him back to Jrs. to be tried again there, and so give them another opportunity of attempting his assassination, P. appealed to Cæsar (see NERO). The arrival of AGRIPPA and his sister gave Festus the opportunity of re-examining P. in order to the preparation of the official report. As Agrippa professed to be a zealous Jew in religion, Paul's defence before him, wh. we have in a very condensed form, runs entirely on Jewish lines. He gives an account of his own conversion and of his life before his conversion—a life that gave emphasis to his conversion. He showed how the Jews endeavoured to kill him time and again. He proceeded then to the argument from the prophets that Jesus was the Christ, wh. we have in the report merely in sketch. At this point Festus, wearied with this excursus into regions of wh. he knew nothing, called out, "Paul, thou art beside thyself; thy much learning hath made thee mad." Paul answered calmly and respectfully the governor's taunt, and appealed directly to Agrippa and his belief in the prophets. His answer is to be taken as a polite acknowledgment of the logical cogency of the arguments, but without the slightest shadow of real belief. "In a little while you will persuade me to be a Christian." Agrippa agreed with Festus that legally Paul should have been set at liberty had he not appealed to Cæsar. P. was then sent to Rome in the charge of JULIUS, centurion of the Augustan cohort.

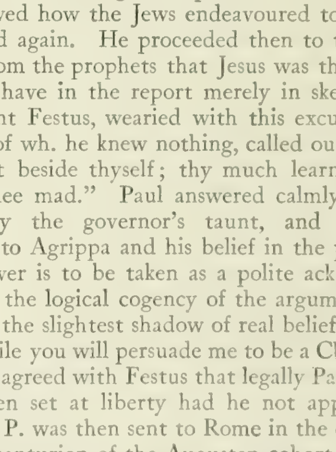
This Julius has been identified by Wieseler with Julius Priscus, Prefect of the Prætorians under Vitellius.



THE TULLIANUM AT ROME (ST. PAUL'S PRISON?)

Fm. Cæsarea the prisoners and their guards sailed in a ship belonging to Adramyttium; they stopped at Sidon, possibly lying by for the night there, and

Paul was allowed to visit his friends in the city—an act of kindness that speaks well for the consideration of Julius. Thence they proceeded under the lee of Cyprus to Myra, where they transhipped into an Alexandrian grain ship. Sailing along the coast to make what progress they might against the prevalent NW. wind, they reached Cnidus; now they were exposed to the full force of the Etesian winds, and therefore they had to yield to the wind and, taking advantage of the various islands, make to the south of CRETE. Coasting along the lee of that island, they passed Salmona and reached Fair Havens. The question was raised whether they shd. winter there. As the harbour of Phenice further to the west was more commodious to winter in, they attempted to gain it, but in the process the vessel was caught in a storm and carried along with much straining of timbers till they were shipwrecked on the island of MALTA. In consequence of his cure of the father of PUBLIUS, "the chief man of the island," P. was treated with special kindness during the three months in wh. the prisoners stayed in the island. Embarking in a vessel that had wintered in Malta, they passed Syracuse and Rhegium to Puteoli. Having landed there, they proceeded to Rome. The Church in Rome had learned of Paul's coming, and certain of them came to meet him at APPII FORUM and THE THREE TAVERNS. Arrived in Rome, the prisoners were delivered into the hand of the Prefect of the Prætorians. Paul's imprisonment appears at this time to have been light so far as imprisonment in Rome ever was light. His stay lasted for more than two years, as we learn fm. the conclusion of the bk. of Acts. During this period P. wrote the Epp. to the EPHESIANS, PHILIPPIANS, and COLOSSIANS, with the private letter to PHILEMON. As to Paul's subsequent life we have to depend on tradition.

Somewhat in defiance of logic, Weinel maintains that the writer of Acts assumes the death of P. at the end of the "two whole years"; it is more reasonable to argue that Luke had a third treatise in his mind, and expected to have material for it in P.'s subsequent life.

The unanimous assertion of ecclesiastical tradition is that P. was released fm. this imprisonment and proceeded to Spain (Clem. Rom., 1 Cor. 5.; Mur. Fr. p. 10*b*. lines 7f.). If we receive the Pastoral Epp. as genuine, P. must have revisited Asia Minor and Greece; he probably preached the Gospel also in Crete. He seems to have suffered martyrdom in the year A.D. 69; the place of his martyrdom is generally assumed to be Rome, but this cannot be definitely deduced fm. Clem. Rom., 1 Cor. 5.

STRAITS OF MESSINA, HARBOUR OF SYRACUSE

The Learning of St. Paul.—This falls naturally into two divisions in accordance with the two sources of his education—Tarsus, the seat of the Greek university; and Jerusalem, the seat of all Jewish learning—(1) Classical Learning and (2) Rabbinic Learning. (1) Classical. It has been regarded as a commonplace that the apostle Paul had no knowledge of Greek Literature. We must, however, bear in mind that the letters and speeches of the apostle wh. have come down to us were all directed to one purpose—the proof of Christ's claims to be the Messiah promised to the Fathers and the exposition of what these claims meant, with exhortations to the fulfilment of moral duties and advice as to the management of ecclesiastical affairs. In dealing with such topics he had no opportunity to display his knowledge of Homer or of the Tragedians—if he had any. Howard Staunton was distinguished as a Shakespearian scholar and still more distinguished as a chess player; but one might peruse the Chess Praxis from title-page to Finis and never find an allusion to Shakespeare. Should it be said that these two spheres are further apart than are Paul's theology and the Homeric poems, tho' personally we doubt this, we can form an estimate by comparing the number of quotations from Gr. Lit. in the writings of St. Paul with those from English Lit. in similar writings among ourselves. If we take a volume of Newman's plain and parochial sermons—and St. Paul's epistles are really sermons—we may find not a single quotation from an English poet. If we turn to Vinet's Sermons (Discours) we find not a single quotation fm. a French dramatist or poet. That there should be few quotations from Gr. Lit. in such compositions as Paul's epistles is no evidence of ignorance of it. It is objected that the three quotations are trite and were in common speech. The quotation from Aratus on Areopagus is the earliest in point of date—Tou gar kai genos esmen, "For we are also His offspring." Paul, however, knows that this sentiment is not to be found in any one poet: he says, "As certain of your own poets have said." To know that a sentence like this was also in Cleanthes implies an acquaintance with Greek literature somewhat intimate. The next is the quotation fm. Menander, 1 Cor. 15.[33]: Phtheirousin ēthē chrēsta homiliai kakai, "Evil communications corrupt good manners." It has been argued by Dean Farrar that any one who was at all acquainted with Greek Literature wd. have made the elision between chrēsta and homiliai, and read chrēsth' homiliai. Yet Sir William Ramsay lately, in quoting Homer, Il. i. 5, left out the δ', wh. rendered its scansion impossible, and did so because it suited his argument. It may be noted Paul's quotations are always arguments. The last is in Titus 1.[12]: "The Cretians are alway liars, evil beasts, slow bellies." Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται κακὰ θηρία γαστέρες ἀργαί. It is true that the first three words are common; he, however, completes the hexameter, wh. wd. seem to indicate a knowledge of the source. It seems that while these quotations do not necessarily imply an intimate or extensive knowledge of Greek Literature, yet they do imply something more than the mere acquaintance with them as "tags" such as might be picked up in conversation. The schools of rhetoric were the places in wh. Literature was taught, so far as such a thing was taught at all in ancient days, and there seem to be traces that Paul had received some culture of that kind. Altho' one may not go so far as Dean Farrar in seeing proofs of St. Paul's mastery of the rhetorician's art, yet the way that his style differs toto cœlo from the rabbinic style as exhibited in the Talmud, and the way it agrees on the whole with Greek methods, is evidence that his knowledge of Greek was more than merely conversational. But Greek learning meant then a knowledge of Greek philosophy. No one can read his speech on Mars' Hill without seeing the influence of Stoicism on St. Paul. We have not only the quotation from the Stoic poets but it is saturated with Stoic thought: that racial distinctions are nothing, that all are dependent on God for everything, are thoroughly Stoical notions. We find Stoical nomenclature in the epistles—the use of pneuma as Divine: thus, "the Lord is that Spirit (to pneuma), and where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty" (2 Cor. 3.[17]). Then there is the idea that everything shall be burned up and try the works of men (1 Cor. 3.[13]). The Stoical doctrine was that the world wh. had sprung fm. God through fire was to return to Him again through the same agency. The absoluteness of fate, of God's foreordination as St. Paul puts it, wh. is one of his ruling thoughts, is also one of the ruling thoughts of the Stoics. There is the further idea that as everything proceeds from God all shall return to Him: "From Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things" (Ro. 11.[36]) We do not mean that St. Paul was a Stoic, but he had become, during his youth in the birth-province of Zeno, acquainted with the philosophy of the Stoics, and used it in setting forth the doctrines of the Gospel.

(2) His stay in Jerusalem and his education at the feet of Gamaliel made him acquainted with the subtleties of rabbinic learning. At the same time we must bear in mind that we have no records of Judaism till more than a century after Paul's head fell beneath the stroke of the Roman executioner. Still the process that culminated in the Talmud was begun. Gamaliel, his master, alike from the account of his attitude to Christianity, as we have it in Scripture and the traditional notices of him, was a man of wider culture than the majority of the Sanhedrin, still he wd. teach him rabbinic methods. Some of the most marked instances of Paul's application of rabbinic methods are to be found in the Epistle to the Galatians. Such are his arguments from the singular, "seed," being used, not the plural (Gal. 3.[16]); and from the allegory of Hagar and Ishmael, and Sarah and Isaac (Gal. 4.[21ff.]). Most striking of all is the identification of Hagar with Sinai by a recondite piece of Gematria. One of its methods is to neglect the tens and hundreds (Jw. En. v. 589b): thus א, י, and ק are all equal, as also ב, כ, and ר and ג, ל, and ש; on this scheme ה = 5, ג = 3, ר = 2, in all 10; ס = 5, נ = 4, י = 1, in all 10. We may say that this is trifling, but it was addressed to those who had preferred such trifling to the simple Gospel. His constant reference to Scripture in confirmation of every point in his argument is after the best method of the Talmudists. Paul's reference to the "rock wh. followed them" (1 Cor. 10.[4]) alludes to a rabbinic interpretation in the Targums of Jerusalem and of Pseudo-Jonathan in Numbers 21.[17]. Tho' we have no distinct evidence in the condensed account of his defence before Agrippa, we may assume that he wd. resort to rabbinic arguments to one who prided himself on his knowledge of legal questions. Moreover, only on the assumption of this cd. the impatient burst of Festus about Paul's learning having made him mad be explained. Another direction in wh. evidences of Pauline learning might be sought is in the writings of Philo and the Apocrypha; in both these may be seen what may be sources of sentiment and phrases in Paul. The full investigation of these wd. take us too far afield for a short article like the present. We must refer to the articles on Philo and Wisdom for a fuller discussion of these questions. Did we know the literature, both Jew and Gentile, of the period, we wd. be in a better position to estimate the learning of St. Paul.

Theology of P.—The function of our Lord was not to preach Christianity, but to atone for the world's sin. As a teacher His efforts were directed to prepare the way for the doctrines concerning Himself. He came nearer affirming definite doctrines in His interpretations of the parables, yet even in His farewell discourse there were many things that He could not make known to His disciples because they cd. not bear them then. He had to sap gradually, in the minds of His followers, the power of the Judaism they had been taught, in order that they might be ready to realise the meaning of His life, death, and resurrection. The mind of P., trained in Tarsus and Jrs., was used of the Spirit to translate facts into philosophy, the life of Christ into Christian theology. Paul's interpretation of the meaning of his Lord's work was accepted by the early Church, as may be seen in 1st Peter, the Johannine writings, and Epistle to the Hebrews. It is difficult to formulate Pauline theology because we have to cull it, not fm. treatises, but fm. occasional letters wh. only contained what bore on the question at issue. We can only attempt to sketch the system of P. in its central ideas.

To P. as a Jew, righteousness, with its converse, sin, is of primary import; this at first was purely external, but the Tenth Commandment led him to recognise the spirituality of the demands of the law (Rm. 7.[7]). Over against this is his Christology. On the one hand, his conflicts with Stephen wd. force him to be aware of the claims of Jesus, and the justification of these claims by His deeds; on the other, acquaintance with the bk. of Enoch wd. prepare him to admit the "Son of Man" as a superangelic being. The crucifixion of Jesus was the "stumbling-block" wh. hindered him fm. recognising Jesus as the Christ. When Jesus met him on the way to Damascus he was forced to acknowledge His Messiahship; with this the problem assumed a new shape. The question now was, "Why had the Messiah died?" This led P. to the idea of the atonement: "the wages of sin is death," but He had no sin. Guided by this, P. was led to look on His death as substitutionary. Death was wide as the race, therefore sin must also be universal; if so, the origin of sin must be found in the origin of the race; "in Adam all died." Jesus is the second Adam in whom "all are made alive" (1 Cor. 15.[22]): the result of the physical union to the first Adam is counterbalanced by spiritual union to Christ (1 Cor. 6.[17]). All, however, do not benefit by the life-giving power of Christ's death: only those who believe. This has two aspects: from the human side, faith is the consent of the will to God; but fm. the Divine side, it is "God that worketh in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure" (Php. 2.[13]). Those who believe are to be received into glory at the coming of the Lord (1 Th. 4.[15ff.]). With this is closely connected the Last Judgment and the Resurrection (Ac. 17.[31]; 1 Tm. 4.[16]). P. did not look forward to the salvation of individuals only, and that in the present life; he also contemplated a regenerated society on the earth. The Church, the assembly of believers, was the new Israel. Fm. the old covenant he drew the idea of the conjugal symbol for the relation of the Church to her Lord (Eph. 5.[32]). The Church was to be a self-sufficing republic, not going before civil tribunals (1 Cor. 6.[1-6]). The psychology by wh. P. explained conversion and the consciousness of sin after it, as also inspiration and prophecy, and the explanation he gives of the rise of Church orders, are worthy of study.

Paul's "Thorn in the Flesh."—When the apostle gives an account of a glorious vision in wh. he was caught up to the third heaven, he adds, "Lest I should be exalted above measure by the abundance of the revelations there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me." On this subject much has been written, but nothing authoritative can be reached. There have been those that regard it as having been the opposition of false teachers or some one special teacher. Chrysostom considers this thorn in the flesh Hymenæus, &c. Against this is the fact that the vision with wh. this trial was associated occurred fourteen years before he wrote this 2nd Ep. to the Corinthians, when he can only have begun his work of teacher: he wd. not be the mark for opposition wh. he became later. One idea that may be dismissed at once is that it is a temptation to unbelief—the thorn is something bodily. Moreover, unbelief cd. scarcely be associated with these wonderful visions. Another idea, favoured largely by the monkish commentators, is that it was temptations to sensuality. But besides that he never wd. have ceased to pray against this, sarx, "flesh," has not so markedly this reference in the apostle's writings. It must be some affliction of a bodily kind that is meant; what it was cannot be absolutely determined. From the prevalence of ophthalmia in the East and the weakened sight it leaves very generally, it has been thought to be some disease of the eyes. Only the phrase, "a thorn in the flesh," seems to imply lancinating pain. Tradition assigns severe headache as the thorn in the flesh—a neuralgic headache recurring frequently wd. hamper his work very much. Epilepsy has also been mentioned, but its tendency is to weaken the mind if frequent, and if infrequent not so important a hindrance as this appears to have been. It was some painful chronic disease that hindered his work, and further, had some connection with his visions.

Lit.: The Pauline Lit. is very extensive. Of lives of St. Paul there are four in English: Conybeare and Howson, Lewin, Farrar, Baring-Gould. Baur and Weinel in German, and Renan in French are worth looking into. There are numerous works on Pauline doctrine.

PAULUS, SERGIUS, proconsul (Gr. anthupatos, AV. "deputy") of Cyprus when St. Paul and Barnabas visited the island (Ac. 13.[7]). It is a note of St. Luke's accuracy that he gives the proper title to the governor. Cyprus had been an imperial province governed by a "proprætor," but was restored to the senate by Augustus, and was thenceforth governed by a "proconsul." A Sergius Paulus, quoted by Pliny as an authority for information referring to Cyprus, may have been the proconsul. Cesnola (Cyprus, 425) records an inscription, dating probably from A.D. 55, in which allusion is made to a revision of the senate by means of assessors in the proconsulship of Paulus. A coin has also been found in Cyprus with the inscription, "in the time of Paulus, proconsul"; the reference in each case is probably to the official whom the apostles met at Paphos. An intelligent man, he was interested, as many of the best minds of his time were, in occult Oriental studies, and had in his train one Elymas—prob. the Gr. form of Arabic 'ālim, "wise man"—a magus. He proved the liberality of his mind by the readiness with which he heard the Gospel. The attempt of Elymas to distract him from it ended in disaster for the magus; and the proconsul, "when he saw what was done, believed." This is the first recorded instance of one of the great Roman provincial officers hearing the Gospel. We may doubt if Sergius Paulus ever definitely joined the Christians, as there is no note of his baptism. One of his eminence could hardly have escaped further mention, had he taken the final step.

PAVEMENT (Heb. martzepheth, ritzpāh [cp. Arb. raṣaf, "to set in order, as stones in a building"], Gr. lithostrōton). Floors of mosaic were found in the chief apartments of palaces and temples, the courts, and sometimes the streets, being paved with blocks of marble, &c. (2 K. 16.[17]; 2 Ch. 7.[3]; Est. 1.[6]; Ek. 40.[17], &c.). See GABBATHA.

PAVEMENT-SLAB (KOYUNJIK)

PAVILION. Of the Heb. words so rendered: (1) Sōk is lit. "covert," or "lair." It is used of the "covert" of the lion (Jr. 25.[38]; Ps. 10.[9] RV., 76.[2] EV. "tabernacle"; Jehovah being conceived fig. as a lion). In Ps. 27.[5], where EV. tr. "pavilion," we should possibly read ṣukkāh, "his booth," instead of ṣukkōh, "his lair." (2) Ṣukkāh is used once of the thicket or covert of lions (Jb. 38.[40]). It is frequently rendered BOOTH (which see). The clouds are conceived as forming an enclosure or "pavilion" for J". (2 S. 22.[12]; Ps. 18.[11], &c.). (3) Shaphrūr, a word of doubtful meaning. In Jr. 43.[10] EV. tr. "royal pavilion," RVm. "glittering." It probably means "brightly coloured canopy," or "carpet." (4) Qubbāh (Nu. 25.[8]; AV. "tent," RV. "pavilion," RVm. "alcove") is a large vaulted tent.

PEACE-OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

PEACOCKS. (1) Peacocks (Heb. tūkkīyyīm) were among the curiosities brought home by the navy of Solomon (1 K. 10.[22]; 2 Ch. 9.[21]). In 1 K. 10.[22] LXX gives "carved stones," and in 2 Ch. 9.[21] it omits the word altogether. But as the word seems to be cognate to toku, the Tamil name for peacock, there is no reasonable doubt that the rendering in EV. is correct. (2) Rĕnānīm in Jb. 39.[13], AV. trs. "peacocks," RV. correctly, "ostriches." Diod. Sic. (ii. 53) says that there were peacocks in Babylonia.

PEARL, a secretion of the pearl-oyster Avicula margaritifera. In AV. it trs. the Heb. word gābīsh (Jb. 28.[18]), which is properly "crystal"; so RV. Dar in Est. 1.[6] should be trd. "mother-of-pearl"; cp. Arabic durrah, "pearl." In NT. pearl (Gr. margaritēs) is the symbol of what is precious (Mw. 7.[6], 13.[45]); of beauty, in the gates of the New Jerusalem (Rv. 21.[21]). The use of pearls for ornament is also referred to in 1 Tm. 2.[9]; Rv. 17.[4]. Among the most ancient and productive pearl fisheries are those in the Persian Gulf, whence many "goodly pearls" were brought by the merchantmen to Palestine. The pearl was to the ancients what the diamond is to us: as Pliny says, "Pearls hold the chief and highest place of all precious things." He also tells of two famous pearls possessed by Cleopatra, each valued at £80,000 of our money. "The romantic theory current in ancient times respecting the origin of pearls served to enhance their fitness to body forth the things of the kingdom. It was believed that the pearl was formed by the dew of heaven entering into the shell wherein it was found, the quality and form of the pearl depending on the purity of the dew, the state of the atmosphere, and even the hour of the day at the time of its conception" (Bruce, The Parabolic Teaching of Christ, 71f.; see also Greswell, Expos. of the Parables, ii. 220ff.).

PEDAHEL, son of Ammihud, prince of the tribe of Naphtali: one of those chosen to preside at the distribution of the land west of the Jordan (Nu. 34.[28]).

PEDAHZUR, father of Gamaliel, chief of the tribe of Manasseh at the time of the Exodus (Nu. 1.[10], 2.[20], 7.[54, 59], 10.[23]).

PEDAIAH ("J". has redeemed"). (1) Father of Zebudah the mother of Jehoiakim, a native of Rumah, a place not identified (2 K. 23.[36]). (2) Brother of Shealtiel, and described as father of Zerubbabel in 1 Ch. 3.[17ff.] Zerubbabel is usually called son of Shealtiel. (3) Father of Joel, prince of the half tribe of Manasseh west of Jordan, in David's time (1 Ch. 27.[20]). (4) Son of Parosh, i.e. belonging to the family of Parosh, who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Ne. 3.[25]). (5) One, possibly a priest, who stood on Ezra's left at the reading of the law (Ne. 8.[4]). (6) Ancestor of Sallu, of the tribe of Benjamin (Ne. 11.[7]). (7) A Levite appointed by Nehemiah among those in charge of the treasury (Ne. 13.[13]).

PEEP (Is. 8.[19], 10.[14]). The verb tzāphaph means "to cheep," not "to chirp" (RV.). It suggests complaining feebleness.

PEKAH, son of Ramalia, was a captain in the guard of Pekahiah. His name is a shortened form of that of his master ("J". hath opened"). He was probably of humble origin (Is. 7.[4]). He formed a conspiracy, in which he was joined by "fifty men of the Gileadites," slew Pekahiah in the castle of the king's house at Samaria, and took possession of the throne (2 K. 15.[25]). He was the eighteenth in order, and the second last of the kings of Israel. A reign of twenty years is assigned to him (v. 27), but there must be some error (see CHRONOLOGY). No motive is stated for the crime committed. Probably it was disapproval of the Assyrian alliance which was so costly to Israel (vv. 19ff.), the annual tribute being a drain on her resources which must have seemed intolerable to an ardent patriot. Having secured his position, Pekah formed a league with Rezin, king of Damascus, evidently in the hope that their united forces might form an effective bulwark against the Assyrians. It is probable that they sought the co-operation of Jotham, king of Judah, but in vain. On his death an attempt was made to compel his weak son and successor, Ahaz, to join the league. It was their purpose, if he should prove obstinate, to dethrone him, and put the son of Tabeal in his place (Is. 7.[6]). Rezin attacked the possessions of Judah in the SE., capturing Elath, while Pekah marched against Jerusalem (2 K. 16.[5ff.]; Is. 7.[1ff.]). The war was conducted with terrible ferocity: so much is evident, even if allowance is made for exaggeration in the statements of the chronicler (2 Ch. 28.[5ff.]). The captives of Judah whom Pekah carried away he was persuaded by the prophet ODED to set at liberty. His success against Jerusalem drove Ahaz to ask for help from Assyria (2 K. 16.[7ff.]). This brought swift destruction upon the allies. Tiglath-pileser (B.C. 733) broke the power of Damascus, slaying Rezin (2 K. 16.[9ff.]), and reduced the land of Israel as far as the Sea of Galilee, taking the inhabitants captive (2 K. 15.[29]). Tiglath-pileser claims in his record (Shrader, Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek, ii. 30) to have taken the whole territory of Beth Omri, turning it into an Assyrian province. Pekah therefore became his vassal, and powerless to do further injury to Judah. Tiglath-pileser, indeed, asserts that he slew Pekah. This need not mean more than that Hoshea, the son of Elah, was his agent in conspiring against and slaying the king. For reward he was made tributary king in place of Pekah. He is described as having done "that which was evil." Hosea presents a dark picture of social and religious decay in his time (Ho. 4.[6, 7]).

PEKAHIAH (the longer form of Pekah), son and successor of Menahem on the throne of Israel. He was the seventeenth monarch of the Northern Kingdom. During his reign of two years (see CHRONOLOGY) Samaria was subject to Assyria, paying heavy tribute. The absence of Tiglath-pileser in the north probably suggested the possibility of revolt to the more ardent spirits. If Pekahiah discouraged the rising, this may explain why he was assassinated and put out of the way by PEKAH and his associates. He also "did evil in the sight of the Lord" (2 K. 15.[23ff.]).

PEKOD. The two passages in which Pekod is named (Jr. 50.[21]; Ek. 23.[23]) possibly refer to a district of Babylonia. A people called Puqūdu, "dwelling near the mouth of the Uknu river," are mentioned in the inscriptions (Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek, ii. 84f.; Sargon's Annals, lines 222, &c.). They were a thorn in the side of the Assyrian rulers of Lower Babylonia. Piqūdū is also the name of a city in Babylonia (Pinches, Records of the Past, xi. 92).

PELAIAH. (1) Son of Elioenai, a descendant of David (1 Ch. 3.[24]). (2) One of the Levites who helped Ezra in expounding the law (Ne. 8.[7]), and who also was among those who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[10]).

PELALIAH, son of Amzi, from whom was descended Adaiah, who was a priest in Jerusalem after the return from exile (Ne. 11.[12]).

PELATIAH. (1) Son of Hananiah the son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3.[21]). (2) A leader of the Simeonite marauders who, in Hezekiah's time, raided Mount Seir, driving out the Amalekites (1 Ch. 4.[42]). (3) One of those who sealed the covenant (Ne. 10.[22]). (4) Son of Benaiah, a "prince of the people" who, in the record of Ezekiel's vision and prophecy, is said to have fallen down suddenly and died on hearing the utterance of the prophet (Ek. 11.[1, 13]).

PELEG ("division," "water-course," Gn. 10.[25], &c.; Lk. 3.[35] AV. "Phalec"), son of Eber, brother of Joktan, in whose days "the earth was divided." This probably refers to the division of the people (11.[1ff.]). Kiepert (Lehrbuch der alt. Geog. 155) and others find the name in Phaliga, at the confluence of the Chaboras and the Euphrates.

PELET. (1) Son of Jahdai (1 Ch. 2.[47]). (2) Son of Azmaveth, one of David's mighty men, a Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch. 12.[3]).

PELETH. (1) In Nu. 16.[1] we should read PALLU. (2) Son of Jonathan, a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch. 2.[33]).

PELETHITES. See CHERETHITES.

PELICAN. The Heb. name קָאַת is supposed to be derived from קוא, "to vomit" (Gesenius), from the pelican's habit of regurgitating its food. But the translation is doubtful. In Lv. 11.[18]; Dt. 14.[17], it is an unclean bird. In Is. 34.[11] and Zp. 2.[14] (AV. "cormorant") it is represented as frequenting ruins, while in Ps. 102.[6] it appears as haunting the desert. One would not naturally seek the pelican among the waste places of Edom (Is. 34.[11]) nor in the wilderness (Ps. 102.[6]). In the last case midbar, while it does not necessarily mean " the desert " in our sense of the word, does as a rule denote dry places. Possibly, however, it may be extended to cover the uninhabited and untilled land of the marshes, where certainly the pelican is at home. There is also nothing incongruous in placing it among the flats and marshes of ancient Nineveh (Zp. 2.[14]).

Two species of pelican are common in Palestine: the Pelicanus onocrotalus, the white pelican, and the P. crispus, the Dalmatian pelican. They are both great birds, as much as 6 ft. in length and 12 ft. in the spread of their wings. Favourite haunts of the pelican are the marshes of el-Baṭeiḥa', at the NE. of the Sea of Galilee, and those of el-Hūleh in the upper Jordan valley. Tristram thinks that the allusion in Ps. 102.[6] is to the melancholy aspect of the pelican, when, after gorging itself, it will sit " for hours or even days with its bill resting on its breast."

PELONITE. Two of David's heroes are so called (1 Ch. 11.[27, 36]). See Paltite.

PENDANT appears only in RV. as translation of nĕṭīphoth (Jg. 8.[26]; Is. 3.[19]). The word corresponds to the Arabic naṭafah, " a small pearl " in an ear-ring. In the former case it refers to Midianite ornaments (AV. " collars "), and in the latter to some pieces of female jewellery. In both cases probably ear-rings are meant.

PENIEL or PENUEL, a place east of the Jordan, close to the Jabbok, the scene of Jacob's night-long wrestling (Gn. 32.[24ff.]). The name, meaning " face of God," is there explained as given because Jacob said, " I have seen God face to face." It has been suggested that the name may have applied originally to some prominent cliff, the outline of which resembled a face. Thus the name Theou prosōpon, " face of God," was attached to a projecting rock south of Tripolis on the Phœnician seaboard. It appears to have been a position of some strength, with a tower (Jg. 8.[17]) guarding the passage of the Jabbok. It was fortified by Jeroboam I. (1 K. 12.[25]). It was some distance from the Jordan and from Succoth (Jg. 8.[8], &c.). Merrill's identification with Telūl edh-Dhahab, " two hills with remains of ancient fortifications on the S. of the Jabbok, ten miles E. of Jordan " (East of the Jordan, 390ff.), is rendered impossible by the impassable nature of the river banks in that neighbourhood. No satisfactory suggestion has yet been made.

PENKNIFE (Heb. ta'ar haṣ-ṣōphēr, "knife of the scribe "). The name occurs only in Jr. 36.[23], but it is and must always have been a familiar object in the East. It is the small knife with which the reed, which is used as a pen, is cut to the necessary shape, and with which it is mended when required.

PENNINAH, wife of Elkanah, who, altho' blessed with children, was jealous of her husband's love for his childless wife Hannah, and " provoked her sore " (1 S. 1.[2], &c.).

PENTATEUCH, a word of Greek origin, is the name given to the five bks. wh. stand first in the canon of the OT. It simply means five-fold bk., fm. the fact that, fm. earliest time, these bks. have been handed down as a composite whole, but it is not descriptive of the contents. " The five books of Moses," as they are sometimes designated, is an attempt at description; but it is apt to be, and has been, misleading. Four of the five bks. relate to the time of Moses, and are occupied with events in wh. he was the central figure; at certain points also it is recorded of him that he wrote certain things contained in the bks.; and it is easy to understand, therefore, how they came to be so closely associated with his name. By Jewish writers the collection is called " The Torah," i.e. the Law, or the Law of Moses. This name, again, though more precisely descriptive, seeing that laws of various kinds given by his hand are found in most of the bks., is quite inadequate, for there is a continuous line of hist. running through the bks., in the course of wh. the occasions on wh. the laws were given are outstanding episodes.

It is this stream of hist. that gives unity to the five bks., and furnishes the key to their composition and collection. For, if we leave out of consideration for a moment the questions as to when and by whom the several bks. were written, and look at them as they lie before us, we shall perceive that we have here not a bare chronicle or recital of events, nor an attempt at a clearly articulated and systematic code of laws, but a hist. written fm. a definite point of view. It is an account of God's choice and guidance of a special people for a special purpose. Fm. the theological point of view, there is the unfolding of a Divine plan ; fm. the literary point of view, there is the exhibition of the stages of that development, regarded fm. a situation in wh. the plan was recognised and more or less fully manifested. So far as the orderly march of events toward a final goal is concerned the whole might have proceeded fm. one mind and have been written by one hand. Fm. beginning to end the Divine element is kept in view: it is God's dealing with men, and not the dealing of men and nations, that is prominent. Even the personal and domestic affairs of individuals are related in their religious aspects ; and persons or peoples who do not come within the scope of the Divine plan wh. is being worked out are dismissed with bare mention or left entirely out of account.

The first bk. starts " in the beginning " with " God," and God in hist. is the thought throughout. At the close of the five bks. the tribes of Isr., whose election and preparation have been kept in view fm. the first, are on the point of taking possession of the promised land, in fulfilment of the Divine purpose. The individual bks., wh. in the Heb. Bible are simply designated by a significant word or words with wh. each bk. opens, mark the notable stages of the historical progress. The bk. of Genesis, " in the beginning," goes back to the very origin of all things, the creation of heaven and earth, the making of man in the image of God, and the entrance of sin into the world. It then traces the rise of nations and their dispersion on the earth, represented, however, not as matters of blind natural impulse, but as controlled and guided by an Almighty and Holy Power, who rewards the good and punishes the evil, eliminating for a purpose an elect people to be the instrument of its execution. Stage by stage the outlook is narrowed and interest is concentrated, till, in the person of Abraham, a culmination is reached ; and then, in him and his descendants, the prospect opens out again into the hist. of a chosen nation. At the close of the bk. we see the twelve fathers fm. whom grew the twelve tribes migrating into Egp., though still regarding Pal. as their promised land ; and the curtain falls on an unfinished story wh. the attention is strained to hear completed.

The bk. of Exodus begins by enumerating " the names " of the heads of tribes that went down to Egp. There, after a space without record, the people is seen greatly multiplied but greatly oppressed and put to hard bondage. When their case was at the worst, Moses, prepared for his task by his early training at the court of Pharaoh, by his sojourn in Midian, and by assurance of Divine help, appears before the king demanding the liberation of his people. By signs and wonders he gives proof of his mission, and finally the Exodus takes place, the people on the other side of the Red Sea sing songs of thanksgiving, while the Egyptian host is overwhelmed in the waters. Then begins the narrative of the forty years' wandering in the wilderness, the thread of wh. runs through the remaining portion of the Pnt. In Exodus the interest is mostly concentrated on the momentous transactions in the neighbourhood of Mount Sinai, the impressive giving of the Law and solemnisation of the Covenant, the provision for the orderly worship at the Tabernacle, and the regulation of corporate national life. The book of Leviticus is almost entirely made up of laws for ritual service, the right performance of sacrifice, the duties and privileges of the priestly caste, instructions for the right performance of their duties, and so forth ; through all wh., however, runs a thread of narrative binding the bk. into the unity of the Pnt. The bk. of Numbers contains a narrative, fragmentary and partial, of the remaining period of sojourn " in the wilderness," with wh., again, are incorporated sundry additional laws, more or less anticipatory of the residence in the promised land. Finally, the bk. of Deuteronomy, covering a very limited space of time, is chiefly made up of " Words " or addresses delivered by Moses at the close of the wilderness period, with immediate refce. to the occupation of the country, and summing up and expounding the Law under wh. their national life was to be constituted, emphasising most particularly their covenant relation to their national God, and warning them agst. the contamination of heathen idolatry, with assurance of blessing if they remained faithful, and denunciation of curse if they should fall away. The whole closes with a brief but sublime account of the death of Moses after wistfully gazing upon the land wh. he was not to enter.

Now, when we approach the question of the authorship and composition of the bks. of the Pnt., there are some things wh. strike us as remarkable. In the first place, the bks. do not say fm. whose hand they have come, nor fm. what source or sources the author or authors received their information. In the bk. of Genesis there is no hint of authorship nor even mention of writing. In the three bks. that follow, in wh. the personality of Moses is prominent, there are certain things wh. he is said to have written " in a bk.," i.e. committed to writing " for a memorial " ; and the bk. of Dt., speaking of Moses in the third person, says that he wrote the law contained therein and gave it into the hands of the priests. But all this is very different fm. saying that the whole Pnt. in its finished form came fm. his hand. Then, in a hist. extending over so long a period, the materials must have been derived fm. various sources and vouched for by different authorities ; but there is no citation of such sources or appeal to authorities such as we find, for example, in the bk.

of Kings. Yet a very cursory examination of the literary features of the composite work is sufficient to show that, though the materials are put together so as to give a fairly continuous account, they must have been drawn fm. various quarters, and presumably have been written by various hands. Again, the impartiality with wh. the hist. is related, without palliation of the faults of prominent characters or glorification of their virtues, the manifest desire of the writers not to obtrude themselves, and the constant aim to exhibit the Divine leading and guiding of the chosen people, warrant the conclusion that the things related were matters of common kge., things most surely believed—that, in short, these bks. are the deposit of the national tradition.

Unfortunately we do not possess any precise information as to the time at wh. literary composition began to be practised by the Hebrews, or even in what manner the practice of writing originated among them. In the Pnt. after the bk. of Genesis it is mentioned as a matter of course that " writing in a bk." was well known. Moreover, within comparatively recent times, our information in regard to the literary attainments of the ancient East has been materially extended. We know now that, at the date assigned to Abraham, a high condition of civilisation, with no mean literary achievement, prevailed in the lands from wh. he is represented as migrating. We know also that, in Pal. itself, at the date of the Exodus, an extensive correspondence was carried on in the script of the distant East with the highly cultured court of Egp. ; all which shows how rash was the assertion that used to be made, that the period of Moses was too early for such literary work as is ascribed to him. Whether, therefore, what we call the national traditions embodied in the Pnt. were handed on partly in writing, or, if transmitted orally, when they were for the first time committed to writing, we do not positively know. The answer to such questions—if they can be answered—must be given on the grounds of a literary examination of the documents themselves, a line of reasoning wh. cannot be so conclusive as positive historical testimony, esp. in a case like the present, where it is evident that the literary processes of the original writers were so different from our modern methods, and when the line of reasoning must inevitably be affected by the mental attitude of the investigator. When literary study of a systematic kind came to be engaged on the OT. bks., the Pnt. naturally attracted particular attention, and the criticism of the Pnt. has given rise to a long-continued and still unfinished literature of most voluminous bulk. Within the compass of the present article it must suffice to indicate the chief steps of the critical process.

The first step in the systematic disentanglement of " sources " was taken in 1753 by Astruc, a French physician. Accepting the book of Genesis, to wh. he confined his attention, as the work of Moses, he put forth his " Conjectures " as to the sources wh. Moses must have employed in its compilation. He distinguished, along with some minor sources, two main elements in the bk., in one of wh. the Divine name Jehovah was employed, while the name Elohim was used in the other. Succeeding critics, following that line of inquiry, and applying it to the other books of the Pnt., have endeavoured more closely to distinguish the sources, to note their characteristics, and to determine their relation to one another, and how they have been brought together into their present form. It was found, e.g., that the varying use of the Divine name was not confined to Genesis, but was carried out in the succeeding bks. Subsequently it was perceived that, in the parts employing the name Elohim, there were to be distinguished two very different elements, one concerning itself predominantly with ritual ordinances, the other chiefly historical, and, apart fm. the use of the Divine name, resembling more closely the portions using the name Jehovah. Further, the book of Dt. had characteristics of its own wh. showed that it must be regarded separately. The problem was : where to place in hist. the composition of these different elements, and how to explain their combination. Were they entirely independent compositions, wh. had a separate existence before coming together ? Or, were they supplementary one of another ; and if so, wh. was the fundamental, and was the supplementer an early or the final redactor ? In the course of the inquiry, various designations were applied by various writers to the component parts, indicative of the char. of the composition or the order of their appearance.

The designations wh. are now current are as follows : J. denotes the historical portions using the name Jehovah, E. the historical parts using the name Elohim ; and, as these two sources are often so closely interwoven as to be inseparable, the combination is denoted by JE. The priestly and ritualistic portions are denoted by P. or PC. (i.e. Priests' Code) ; D. denotes the writer of Dt., and R. stands for Redactor. A closer scrutiny, however, of these main sources has led to the conclusion that we have not in them so many complete and independent productions, composed once for all as we now have them, but that they passed through editorial hands and are themselves more or less composite, and that they have been put together, not end to end, so to speak, but superimposed, layer upon layer, till the Pnt. reached its present form. The order of this literary process was as follows :—

Two independent and almost contemporaneous narratives, J. and E., were combined together, J. belonging probably to the Southern or Judæan kdm., and E. to the Ephraimite kdm. of the Ten Tribes. Before they came together each of these sources had gone through several editions; and, of course, their combination was effected by an editorial hand. Then, some two centuries later, the bk. of Dt. was composed as an independent work; and this, at a later time, probably in the Exile, was joined to the existing JE., not without considerable editorial redaction. Finally, in the exilic period, the priestly PC. was composed, and formed the upper layer or embracing framework, completing the present Pnt. This arrangement of the component parts is based by the critics, not so much on a comparison of the merely linguistic features of the parts as early or late, as on an examination of the subject-matter, and particularly on a comparison of the various legal elements of the bks. with one another, and with the various stages of the hist. There are, it is averred, three different deposits or Codes of Law, one embodied in JE., the so-called book of the Covenant (Ex. 21.–23.), the Code of Dt., and the Code of PC. These differ, particularly in regard to the place of sacrificial worship; for, whereas the Code of JE. permits such worship at any place, the Code of Dt. restricts it to a central Sanctuary, and PC. takes it for granted that centralised worship has been the law fm. the beginning. The three Codes, therefore, translated into practice, wd. show a natural development fm. the simpler to the more complex. Now, when we turn to the hist., it is pointed out that the practice followed precisely the same course. In early times the patriarchs, and even after the occupation of the land the religious guides of the people, are found building altars and offering sacrifices at various places throughout the country; at the time of the reformation of Josiah the high places were put down and worship was concentrated at the Temple at Jrs.; and, finally, on the return fm. the Exile, when the Temple was rebuilt, it became and remained the sole centre of an elaborate service, under an organised hierarchy. Accordingly, it is concluded, this is the order in wh. the three Codes of laws were promulgated, the order also in wh. the literary "sources" in wh. they are embedded were composed. Fm. a comparison of JE. with the earliest written prophecies of Amos and Hosea it is inferred that JE. dates fm. a short time before these prophets, say about the middle of the eighth cent. B.C.; D. is taken to have been composed in the early years of king Josiah or in the preceding reign, and to have been written for the purpose of exhibiting what the Law shd. be, and of bringing about the reformation of B.C. 622; while PC., composed in the Exile or about the time of the return fm. it, puts down in the form of a Code what had been the accumulating practice at the Temple before the Exile, representing it as the ancient legislation of Moses in the wilderness.

Such has been the main course of Pentateuch criticism, and such are the main conclusions, wh. are claimed to be firmly grounded and unassailable. The final outcome is so revolutionary of long-accepted beliefs, and so inconsistent with the manifest view of those fm. whose hands the bks. have come, that ordinary minds, not accustomed to minute critical processes, are excusable if they hesitate to accept the conclusions, while advocates of the view who also believe in the Divine revelation of the OT. strive to assure their readers that there is nothing in it inconsistent with devout Christian faith, by explaining as best they can those features of the theory that seem to be in conflict with the statements of the sacred writers. And, when all is said and done, it would appear, fm. the tone of apologetic on the one hand and of uncomfortable perplexity on the other, that the end is not yet. The objectionable or vulnerable points of the critical view suggest themselves to any thinking reader. It minimises the work of Moses to such an extent that sufficient explanation is not left of the high estimation in wh. he was held and the importance ascribed to him in connection with the legislative system, by ascribing the laws to a process of gradual growth and stereotyping of custom instead of positive enactment. The mere discovery of different "sources" in these bks. is not in itself disconcerting; and minor discrepancies, or repetitions, or variant accounts, wd. only be what we shd. expect in the circumstances. But, in default of direct historical information as to how these "sources" were manipulated, and in what way the accounts were preserved, it is hazardous to base theories on literary features or historical indications wh. may be, and have been, regarded differently by different minds at different times. In particular, the literary skill implied in the assumed "complicated literary processes extending over a long period" seems incompatible with the simple habit of the sources themselves, or else wd. imply an antecedent literary activity of a much earlier time than critics make allowance for.

Then, the accounts given of the introduction of the Codes of D. and PC. are open to the grave objection that they declare the Biblical accounts of these transactions to be unhistorical. One could easily understand how a Code, originally given in brief compass, shd. in course of time be modified or enlarged. So cd. one understand how a prophet or a number of prophetic men about the time of Josiah might set themselves to draw up a scheme of what they regarded as the fundamental obligatory Law. But this is a very different thing fm. putting forward a Code, with all the circumstantial details of its original promulgation by Moses, and containing not a few elements wh. had no application in the time of Josiah. According to the account in the bk. of Kings, wh. is relied on as proving the promulgation of the Code at that time, there was no doubt in the mind of any one then that the Law-Book came fm.

Moses; that is to say, it was by that time the general opinion that Moses was the great legislator. There was, therefore, no need to resort to the elaborate and sustained fiction of describing in minutest detail of Dt. the publication of the Law by Moses. Prophetic men, when they had a message to deliver, gave it in the name of the Lord, and did not even appeal to one another. So, in regard to the Code of PC., nothing is more natural to suppose than that, in the course of practice, the details of ritual, provision for the priests, and so forth, shd. undergo modification as time went on. And one can understand how the priests, to provide for the services of the post-exilic Temple, wd. gather up the regulations for worship as they had been observed in the first Temple. Nay, it is not difficult to suppose that a praxis wh. reached back to a time beyond memory shd. be ascribed to Moses the first legislator. But it is a very different thing to set down in minute detail the circumstances under wh. the various enactments were made by Moses, and to describe most punctiliously the arrangements and construction of a Tabernacle wh. never in fact existed. If the alleged late writers who thus wrote believed what they were writing, then we must postulate a very considerable time for such a belief to grow, and some good ground for its growth: if they did not believe what they wrote, we are confronted by a very uncomfortable conclusion as to the general credibility of the Biblical writers. And for the ordinary Bible reader this is where the importance of the discussion lies. To such it is a matter of minor importance how the bks. were written, or when, or fm. what sources; but he desires to know whether the account is substantially true, and he wd. fain be assured that the writers of these bks. are dealing honestly and in good faith; or if they are misstating or overstating the facts, he desires an explanation of this wh. shall be consistent with a belief in their honesty.

In the nature of the case, we have no materials outside the Bible to enable us to verify the internal hist. of Isr., and it is confessed that fm. the sources themselves the theory of the critics cannot be substantiated. It is only when the different Codes are compared with the post-Mosaic hist.—a hist. of a much later date—that the theory is said to be proved. But, granting even that the course of the hist. of the worship was such as is asserted, it is doubtful how far the hist. of ceremonial worship is a safe line on wh. to construct the hist. of the religion. It wd. certainly be a very unsafe line to follow in the case of the Christian or the Mohammedan religion. Moreover, all the great religions wh. have made a permanent mark in the world's hist. exhibit, not a gradual and painful struggle upwards fm. the crudest elements, but, on the contrary, a falling away fm. a high starting-point, with a struggle to maintain a higher level, precisely such as the writers of the OT. represent to have been the case in Isr.

Though the internal hist. of Isr. is only to be learned fm. the OT. bks., the progress of archæological discovery and research of recent yrs. has greatly extended the horizon of our kge., and enabled us better to understand the place of the Hebrews among the nations, and to appreciate their national traditions regarding themselves. We know now that the Eastern lands fm. wh. the Biblical writers represent Abraham to have come were at that time and before it the seat of a highly developed civilisation, the influence of wh. extended as far west as Canaan; we know also that elaborate codification of law, and law ascribed to a Divine source, was achieved at that early time; and also that a purer religion and a higher conception of deity than that of the later Assyrian Empire prevailed. Then, the various nations with wh. the Hebrews claim kindred are known to be races of the same stock; and the credibility of the account of the servitude in Egp. is confirmed by the consideration that peoples of antiquity are never in the habit of describing themselves as descended fm. slaves. Indeed, the whole account wh. the Hebrews give of themselves is so unlike the exaggerated and mythical accounts of other peoples of antiquity that it stands unique and bears the stamp of truth. No doubt, the form in wh. the hist. is cast, and esp. the accounts of primeval time given in Genesis, are of such a nature that we may be able only to gain a dim vision of the actual historical movements recorded. But, as our view becomes more and more widened, these traditions become clearer, and are found to correspond in a remarkable degree with the facts brought to light by archæology. Even the assumption of the sacred writers that there was a kge. of the true God long before Abraham, fm. wh. the nations had fallen away, is strangely confirmed by the most recent researches into the religion of Babylonia.

It is ever and above all to be remembered that the evident object of the sacred writers was not to set down these accounts of ancient time to satisfy curiosity or to magnify their nation, but to represent God's dealings with mankind, and esp. with Isr. as the instrument of His purpose. The early writers, who were able so clearly to discern that plan, and so consistently to exhibit the unfolding of it, must have had a special insight to enable them so to do. In short, the Pentateuch contains a record of the Divine Revelation, written by men who wrote as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.

James Robertson.

PENTECOST is the (Greek) NT. name of the feast known in the OT. as the Feast of Harvest, the Feast of Weeks, and the Day of First-fruits. It fell on the "fiftieth" day after that on which a wave-offering of a sheaf of barley was made, during the Feast of Unleavened Bread. This last was generally made on the 16th of Nisan; so that Pentecost fell on the 6th of Sivan.

The feast is first mentioned as the " feast of harvest " in Ex. 23.[16], as one of the occasions when all males must appear before the Lord—i.e. a feast involving pilgrimage—to present an offering of " the first-fruits of thy labours, which thou sowest in the field." It appears as " the feast of weeks, even of the first-fruits of the wheat harvest " in Ex. 34.[22]. In Nu. 28.[26ff.] it is " the day of the first-fruits," identified with the " feast of weeks," on which " a new meal-offering " was offered to the Lord. It was marked as " an holy convocation," on which no servile work might be done, and directions are given for offering " a burnt-offering for a sweet savour unto the Lord " : two young bullocks, one ram, and seven he-lambs of the first year, with their meal-offering, fine flour mingled with oil in their proper proportions; and one he-goat to make atonement. The animals were to be without blemish, and the offerings described were to be made over and above the daily burnt-offering and meal-offering.

In Dt. 16.[9ff.] further directions are given. The feast is fixed by counting seven weeks " from the time thou beginnest to put the sickle to the standing corn." In keeping the feast an essential feature was the bringing of a freewill-offering, as an expression of gratitude. This gift was to be proportioned to the blessing which the offerer had received, i.e. the prosperity he had enjoyed. The celebration of this feast was also open to the son, daughter, man-servant and maid-servant, to the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow. And here it is directed to be celebrated " in the place which the Lord thy God shall choose to cause His name to dwell there." With this feast also is associated the memory of escape from Egyptian bondage.

This is the feast referred to, although not named, in Lv. 23.[15ff.], when a new meal-offering was to be made: two leavened loaves of fine flour as first-fruits were to be waved before the altar. Along with the bread for a burnt-offering were to be offered seven lambs of the first year without blemish, one young bullock and two rams, with their meal- and drink-offerings; one he-goat for a sin-offering, and two he-lambs of the first year for a peace-offering. The bread and the lambs were to be waved for a wave-offering before the Lord, and were then set apart for the priest. It was to be a holy convocation, on which no servile work might be done.

It is probable also that this feast is intended in the direction given in Dt. 26.[1-11]. The offerer is to take the first-fruits in a basket to the appointed sanctuary. His address to the priest is prescribed (v. 3); and when the priest has taken the offering and placed it before the Lord, the form of thanksgiving and confession to be used is set down. Special acknowledgment is made of the deliverance from Egypt and the gift of the good land. Again it is made clear that in the joy of this festival all are free to take part.

The celebration of the feast, without any details, is referred to in 2 Ch. 8.[13].

That this was an agricultural feast is beyond doubt. It coincided with the close of the wheat harvest. As barley is the earliest, so wheat is the latest of the cereals in Palestine. The Feast of Unleavened Bread and the Feast of Weeks therefore fell at the beginning and the end respectively of the year's harvest. This was naturally a period of great joy; and the presentation of first-fruits and freewill-offerings appropriately symbolised the gratitude of the people to the Giver of all good.

There was some difference of opinion as to the day from which the " week of weeks " was to be reckoned. Lv. 23.[15] makes it " the morrow after the Sabbath," the day when the sheaf of the wave-offering was brought. " The Sabbath " here is evidently the first day of the feast, which was " an holy convocation " (v. 7), so that " the morrow " would be the 16th day of the month; and, as stated above, the Feast of Pentecost would fall on the 6th of the month following. Some thought the reference was to the ordinary Sabbath, as one Sabbath must fall within the seven days of the Feast of Unleavened Bread. But if this Sabbath fell on the 21st of Nisan, the wave-offering could not be brought into the days of the feast. The former view was prevalent in later times.

There is nothing to support the rabbinical suggestion that this feast commemorates the giving of the law at Sinai, fifty days after the deliverance from Egypt.

As distinguished from the feasts at the beginning of the harvest and at the end of the vintage, the Feast of Pentecost lasted only a single day.

In NT. times, if we may judge from the multitudes present in Jerusalem for its celebration, this feast was very popular among the Jews. It is associated with an event of supreme importance for the Church of Christ. In obedience to the Master's direction, the little company of believers continued in Jerusalem, waiting the fulfilment of His promise. On the morning of this feast they were all together in one place. " Suddenly there came from heaven a sound as of the rushing of a mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them tongues parting asunder, like as of fire; and it sat upon each one of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance " (Ac. 2.[1-4]). On this day was given the first manifestation of the Spirit's power in the conversion of about 3000 souls, by means of St.

Peter's sermon. To this day, with such associations, a new significance was attached for Christians. It was the day when the first-fruits of the spiritual harvest were rendered. Before the end of the second century it had taken its place as a Christian joyful festival. Perhaps this association lent intensity to the desire of St. Paul to reach Jerusalem in time for this feast (Ac. 20.[16]). It was in a true sense the birthday of the Church. The season between Easter and Pentecost, analogous to the fifty days of the old law, became the common time for the baptism of converts (Tertullian, De Bapt. c. 19).

PEOPLE. In AV. it is sometimes impossible for the English reader to say whether " people " applies to the children of Israel or to other nations. To obviate this difficulty RV. uses " peoples " for the heathen, and the sing. " people " for Israel. " People of the land " is used of the heathen inhabitants of Palestine in patriarchal times (Gn. 23.[7], &c.). It is used also of the " rank and file " of the population, as distinguished from nobles and rulers (2 K. 11.[14], &c.). In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah it denoted the mixed people who had increased in the country during the Captivity, from whom these rulers found it exceedingly difficult to keep their own people apart (Ez. 9.[1], &c. ; Ne. 9.[24], &c.). In later times 'am hā'āretz, " people of the land," came to be a technical phrase descriptive of those who were either ignorant of, or who neglected to obey, the law. It was used, as it is to this day, individually as well as collectively. It expresses great contempt (Jn. 7.[49]). It was permissible even to rend an 'am hā'āretz like a fish.

PEOR. (1) A mountain E. of Jordan, looking down upon the desert, to which Balak took Balaam (Nu. 23.[28]). OEJ. places it on the way between Livias and Heshbon. Buhl (GAP. 123) suggests Jebel el-Mushaqqar, with ruins of an ancient town, between Wādy A'yūn Mūsa and Wādy Ḥesbān. (2) A town in Judah (Jo. 15.[59], LXX), probably now represented by Khirbet Fāghūr, to the S. of Bethlehem. (3) Peor stands for Baal Peor in Nu. 25.[18], 31.[16] ; Jo. 22.[17].

PERÆA, THE, is not mentioned by this name in Scrip. Josephus so names the district which in NT. and rabbinical literature is spoken of as " the land beyond Jordan." It stretched, he says, from Pella to Machærus, and from the Jordan to Philadelphia, the mod. 'Ammān (BJ. III. iii. 3). The description may be merely general. The natural boundary in the north would be the great gorge of the Yarmuk. But the land along the S. bank of the Yarmuk may have belonged to Gadara, one of the cities of the Decapolis. Josephus says that Gadara was the capital of Peræa. Such a position could hardly be held by a member of the league of ten cities. The probability is that by Gadara he meant not the great and famous city on the Yarmuk, but that which is represented by the mod. Jedūr in the neighbourhood of es-Salṭ (Guthe, KB. s.v. ; Buhl, GAP. 255). This would throw the north boundary of the Jewish province into the district of Pella. The natural border in the south was the Arnon. It forms a high table-land, falling steeply on the west into the Jordan valley, and more gradually into the Syrian desert on the east. For fuller description of this picturesque and fruitful province see Gad, Gilead, Palestine. Arab. writers speak highly of its fertility, and also of its cold.

Jews in small numbers were found in the Peræa, until for safety they were removed by Judas (1 M. 5.[45]). But they could not long resist its attractions. The whole district passed under the sway of Alexander Jannæus. It had varied fortunes as between the Romans and the Herodian family. Finally it was added definitely to the Roman dominions by Placidus.

The rabbis placed the Peræa on a level with Judæa and Galilee as a province of the land of Israel. Jews coming from Galilee to the feasts at Jerusalem, wishing to avoid the risks of passing through Samaria, might cross the Jordan a little way below the Sea of Galilee, journey down the eastern side, and cross again opposite Jericho, keeping within Jewish territory all the way. Within Peræan territory, probably, Jesus was baptized ; and here He spent some of the most peaceful and happy days of His life (Mw. 19.[1], &c.). Here He found safety from the homicidal fury of the Jews ; and here He was found by the messenger of the bereaved sisters at Bethany. Part of the country is under cultivation by villagers, but especially by Circassian colonists. Great tracts are used for grazing purposes.

PERAZIM is mentioned only once (Is. 28.[21]). The reference is probably to Baal-perazim, where David defeated the Philistines (2 S. 5.[20]). Conder places it on the ridge above 'Ain Fāris, to the NE. of Adullam.

PERESH, a son of Machir, by Maachah (1 Ch. 7.[16]).

PEREZ (AV. Pharez, " rupture," or " breach," Gn. 38.[29]) was the son of Judah by his daughter-in-law Tamar, and twin brother of Zarah. He was the ancestor of the clan called Perezites. Prolific seed is the blessing most coveted by the Oriental heart. From the blessing pronounced upon Boaz by the elders of Israel, " Let thy house be like the house of Perez " (Ru. 4.[12]), we may infer that the clan was numerous. The sons of Perez were Hezron and Hamul (Gn. 46.[12]). His family, in the descendants of Hezron, through his son Ram, attained great distinction, David and his house no doubt, in the eyes of Israel, forming its chief glory. Of this family, also, according to the flesh, Jesus Christ came (Mw. 1.[3] ; Lk. 3.[33]).

PEREZ-UZZAH, the spot so named by David, because here the Lord brake out upon UZZAH (2 S. 6.[8]; 1 Ch. 13.[11]). Josephus seems to have known the place, and says that "the place where he (Uzzah) died, is even now called 'the cleaving of Uzzah.'" No trace of it is now to be found.

PERFUME, PERFUMER. Orientals have always been extremely fond of sweet and pungent odours. Apart from the mere pleasure they afford, perfumes have been used in the way of self-defence, against the offensive odours generated by the heat of the climate. Considerable trade was done in importing spices from Arabia, and use was made of native aromatic plants. Sometimes a twig of a sweet-smelling plant or flower was carried in the hand. This is still a prevalent custom. The materials were sometimes ground to powder and used for fumigation (SS. 3.[6]), or the perfume was extracted and mingled with oil for application to the person (Jn. 12.[3]). Ladies were accustomed to carry perfume-boxes (Is. 3.[20], RV.). INCENSE and perfumed OINTMENT were used in the Temple service. The clothes (Ps. 45.[8]; SS. 4.[11]) and beds (Pr. 7.[17]) were perfumed. Perfume plays a considerable part in the reception of honoured guests (Dn. 2.[46]; cp. Lane, Mod. Egp. ii. 14). "Pillars of smoke" were thrown around the king as he rode out in his palanquin (SS. 3.[6]), perfumed with frankincense and myrrh, and all the powders of the merchant. Perfumes were used in preparing the dead for burial (2 Ch. 16.[14]; cp. Jn. 12.[7]). The preparation of fragrant substances to gratify the sense of smell has been practised from old time (Ex. 30.[35]; Pr. 7.[17], 27.[9]; SS. 3.[6], &c.). "Apothecaries" in AV. should always be read "perfumers"—so also "confectioners." For particular perfumes see articles under their own names.

PERGA, a city of PAMPHYLIA lying over seven miles inland, between the rivers Cestrus and Cataractes. Nothing is known of Perga before the second cent. B.C., but the walls probably date from the third cent. B.C. Its coins range from the second cent. B.C. to A.D. 276. It was noted in antiquity for its devotion to the goddess Artemis, whose worship resembled that of the Ephesian Diana. A great temple of Artemis occupied rising ground outside the city, and probably was to the inhabitants what that of Diana was to the Ephesians. The goddess and her temple are represented on the coins. It may be assumed that the right of asylum attached to the temple. Perga lay about five miles from the Cestrus, but probably possessed a harbour on the river, which is navigable to a point opposite the city.

To this city came St. Paul with his companions from Cyprus on their first missionary journey. There John Mark parted with them and returned home. The others do not seem to have tarried long, and there is no indication that they preached in Perga before continuing their journey inland. It may be questioned if this was their original purpose (see PAMPHYLIA). It is probable that there was here a Jewish community, with a synagogue; and to these St. Paul would naturally first address himself when, on his return, he preached in Perga. There is, however, nothing to show that his efforts here met with any success (Ac. 13.[13], 14.[25]). At a later time Perga was the seat of a metropolitan bishopric, dividing with Side the authority over the province of Pamphylia.

The site is now called Murtana, c. 12 miles NE. of Attalia. It is situated on the plateau which lies between the rivers. To the south of the Acropolis there are extensive ruins, theatre, stadium, churches, &c. Towards the SE. of the Acropolis is a platform with the bases of six granite columns. Some have thought these might be the remains of the Temple of Artemis; others, however, are of opinion that they are too rude for a place in such a splendid building as that must have been.

PERGAMOS, RV. PERGAMUM, a famous city of Mysia, situated about four miles N. of the river Caicus and fifteen miles from the sea. Smaller craft were able to ascend the river thus far. Two small tributaries flow into the Caicus from the north; the Selinus, and, further east, the Cetius. Between these streams rises a great rock, dominating the whole valley. Tradition says that here was witnessed the birth of Zeus. A place of enormous strength, this rock was occupied from very early times. In it, as a sacred place, treasure may have been deposited. The sanctuary, however humble, is in the East a safe place for valuables. Perhaps on this account king Lysimachus here entrusted 6000 talents of his treasure to the care of Philetærus. His confidence was ill placed. Philetærus used the treasure for his own purposes; with the help of Seleucus, king of Syria, he founded a kingdom and asserted his independence. He reigned from B.C. 284–263, and was succeeded by his nephew Attalus. The Attalid dynasty continued till B.C. 133, when Attalus III. died, leaving his kingdom to the Romans, stipulating that Pergamos should be maintained as a self-governing city. It thus became the capital of the Roman province, which at first was not coterminous with the former kingdom, Phrygia Magna being given to king Mithridates of Pontus; but in B.C. 320 Phrygia also was attached to the new province, which the Romans called Asia.

Situated far inland, upon no great trade route, with a river navigable only by small vessels, Pergamos was in many respects at a disadvantage compared with such a city as Ephesus. But she held her position as the seat of provincial government and a great religious centre.

The art of preparing skins to receive writing is said to have been perfected in Pergamos, and from this city the name parchment is derived.

To Pergamos was addressed the third of the letters to the churches of Asia (Rv. 2.[12ff.]). The "sharp two-edged sword" probably alludes to the symbol of Roman authority, the short cut-and-thrust sword of the Romans as distinguished from the single-edged weapon of the East. In days of persecution, Christians would be taken to the capital of the province for trial; so we may regard the martyrdom of Antipas as merely a typical instance. When Rome had ranged itself definitely against Christianity, and martyrs' blood had flowed freely, "Satan's throne" (v. 13 RV.) not inaptly describes the chief provincial seat of the State religion—the worship of the emperor; two imperial temples being found there. There may also be an allusion to the Oriental nature-worship, especially the cults of Dionysus and Asclepius, which also flourished there. Here also there was special temptation to Christians to shield themselves from danger by outward conformity in the matters of heathen ritual, since an idol was "nothing in the world," and no value could be attached to its worship. Those who were thus ensnared may be meant by "some that hold the teaching of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication." For white stone see STONE.

The later city crept down the hill and spread to the south-west, across the Selinus, where the town of Bergama now stands. It was adorned with many splendid public buildings, the Acropolis being on the rock (see Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches, 281ff.).

PERIDA, ancestor of a family of "Solomon's servants" who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ne. 7.[57]).

PERIZZITE. There are no available data for a certain identification of this people. They were found, along with the Canaanites, in Palestine in the days of Abraham (Gn. 13.[7]), and are named along with the Rephaim (15.[20]). They were among the peoples to be driven out by Israel (Dt. 20.[17], &c.). Remnants of them were left in the land (1 K. 9.[20]), and were a cause of trouble even after the return from Babylon (Ez. 9.[1]).

Their distinction from the Canaanites, and association with the Rephaim, some have thought, point to their belonging to the pre-Semitic inhabitants of Palestine, knowledge regarding whom is slowly gathering by means of excavation. Others regard the name as connected with pĕrāzī, "villager," and suggest that they may have been a Canaanite tribe, like the fellahīn of the present day, cultivating the soil and dwelling in "villages," i.e. in unwalled towns in the country. This seems, on the whole, the more likely suggestion (Gesenius, Heb.-Chal. Lex. s.v.; Moore, Judges, p. 17).

PERSIA, PERSIANS (פָּרַס, פָּרְסִים, Πέρσαι, Ne. 12.[22]; Est. 1.[3]; Dn. 8.[20]; first mentioned in Ek. 27.[10], if the reading is right) were names originally confined to Persis (now Fars), between Carmania and Susiana on the E. and W., and Media and the Persian Gulf on the N. and S. Under Teispes (in B.C. 600) the old Elamite kingdom of Anzan was conquered by the Persians, and Susiana, with its capital Susa, thus came to be included in Persian territory; the conquests of Cyrus at a later date founded the Persian empire, wh. comprised the whole of Western Asia, and of wh. the modern Persia is a fragment. Persis, or Persia proper, was flat and sultry near the sea-coast, elevated and bracing in the centre, and mountainous and wintry in the north. Its chief city was Persepolis or Istakhr (Chehil Minar), 35 miles NE. of Shiraz, still remarkable for its ruined palaces. In the cliff of Naksh-i-Rustem, in the neighbourhood, are the chambered tombs of Darius I. and his successors. Northward, on the Cyrus, was Pasargadæ, generally identified with Murghâb, the burial-place of Cyrus, whose tomb, with the inscription, "I am Cyrus, the king, the Achæmenian," is still pointed out there. The identification, however, is not absolutely certain, and the Cyrus of the inscription may possibly be Cyrus the Younger. Westward, on the road to Babylonia, is the sacred rock of Behistun, on wh. Darius inscribed the record of his achievements.

The Persians were Aryans, and spoke a language closely allied to Sanskrit and the Zend of Bactriana. They belonged to the same race as the Aryan Medes, and had made their way into Persis at a comparatively late date under the leadership of Achæmenes (Hakhamánish). One of his descendants, Teispes (Chaishpaish), made himself master of a part of Elam after the destruction of the Elamite kingdom by the Assyrians shortly before the fall of Assyria itself. His descendants—Cyrus I., Cambyses I., and Cyrus II.—accordingly called themselves kings of Anzan or Elymais. Cyrus (Kurush) II. rebelled against his suzerain Astyages (Istuvegu) of Ecbatana, whose army revolted against him and delivered him up to Cyrus. Ecbatana was taken and Media incorporated into the Persian kingdom (B.C. 549). Shortly afterwards Cyrus assumed the title of king of Persia, and overthrew Crœsus of Lydia, adding Asia Minor to his territory (B.C. 546?). Nabonidos of Babylon now found it needful to secure himself against his dangerous neighbour, who had already extended his dominions to the east and north. But in B.C. 538, encouraged by a revolt in southern Babylonia, Cyrus marched against Nabonidos, who was overthrown in a battle at Opis in the month of June. A few days later Babylon surrendered, and Cyrus was proclaimed king of Babylonia. His son

Cambyses (Kambujiya) II. succeeded to the unwieldy empire in B.C. 529, and further enlarged it by the conquest of Egypt. But he lingered in Egypt too long, and the crown was seized by the Magian Gomates (Gaumáta), who pretended to be Bardes (Smerdis), the murdered brother of Cambyses (B.C. 521). For seven months the Magian conspirators held the government; then Bardes was assassinated by Darius (Dárayavush), the son of Hystaspes, the great-grandson of Teispes, who was elected king in his place. The empire of Cyrus, however, was already breaking up, its several provinces asserting their claims to independence under local pretenders to royal birth, and it had to be reconquered piece by piece. When the task was accomplished, Darius set about the organisation of his conquests, and the Persian empire was created, with its separate provinces under satraps appointed by the king, and paying a fixed amount of taxation to the imperial treasury. The satrap had the power of life and death, limited by an appeal to the monarch; but in most cases the troops stationed in his satrapy were under a commander of their own. Darius died B.C. 485, while preparing to avenge upon the Greeks the defeat of Marathon, and was succeeded by his inefficient son Xerxes (Khshayârshâ, the Ahasuerus of the OT.), whose reign is chiefly memorable for the disastrous end of his invasion of Greece. Under his son and successor, Artaxerxes I. (Artakhshatrá) Longimanus, the empire steadily declined; his son Xerxes was murdered after a reign of two months (B.C. 425), and the murderer, his half-brother Sogdianus, was himself murdered, after a reign of seven months, by his brother Ochus, who took the name of Darius II. (Nothus: B.C. 424). He was followed (in B.C. 405) by his son Artaxerxes III. (Mnêmôn), who was soon afterwards called upon to confront the rebellion of his brother Cyrus the Younger. The rebel, however, fell in the battle of Cunaxa, and the retreat of his Greek mercenaries has been described by Xenophon. Family troubles hastened the death of the king, whose successor, Ochus, made his way to the throne by murdering the rest of the royal family (B.C. 362). After reconquering the revolted provinces of Egypt and Phœnicia, Ochus was poisoned in B.C. 339, and three years later his son Arses shared his fate. Darius III. Codomannus was then set upon the throne, but in B.C. 334 Alexander of Macedon crossed the Hellespont, and after defeating the Persians at the Granicus and at Issus destroyed both Darius and his empire at Gaugamela, B.C. 331.

The founder of Persian religion was Zoroaster, the Moses of Persia. The older deities, whom the ancestors of the Persians had shared with the Hindus of the Veda, were degraded into demons, while the Sun-god Mitra with his kindred gods became a subordinate divinity or sort of angel. The supreme god and creator of the world was the good being Ahura-mazda (Ormazd); over against him was the principle of evil, Angro-mainyus (Ahriman), who had brought evil into the world. Persian religion was thus a dualism. Fire, the symbol of Ahura-mazda, was accounted sacred; so too were earth and water, and a peculiar sanctity was attached to the dog. Drinking the haôma wine was a sacramental act. As both earth and fire were sacred, the bodies of the dead were not buried or cremated, but left to be stripped of their flesh by birds of prey. This custom, however, seems to have spread from the Mazdean Magians after the age of the Achæmenian kings, who were buried in rock-cut tombs. The Avesta was the sacred book of Persia; it was written in Zend, and purported to be the composition of Zoroaster. In its present form, however, it cannot be older than the Sassanian period, tho' certain portions of it called the Gâthas go back to an earlier age.

PETER, THE FIRST EPISTLE OF. That Peter the apostle was the author of this epistle was universally admitted as early as the end of the second century; it is expressly quoted as his by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian; it was received without question into the Canon at the end of the third century, and not until modern times has the traditional view been disturbed. Even yet the majority of critics hold to it, finding it harder to set aside the strong external evidence than to find a plausible answer to the admittedly weighty objections founded on the book itself. Thus the manifest dependence on Paul's writings, notably on Romans and Ephesians, a thing very unlikely (it is said) in the premier apostle, and especially after conflict, may yet be accounted for by the well-known disposition and character of that apostle; and it is pleasing to think that the two great men met in Rome ("Babylon" almost certainly is so to be understood) before they suffered, and were so entirely reconciled that Peter could make loving use of Paul's thoughts, and Paul's companions could send loving messages in Peter's epistle. The other great objection, that the epistle appears to refer to a period when it was a crime to be a Christian, which was not till the reign of Domitian, when it is almost certain that Peter could not be still alive (tradition says that he suffered in A.D. 66), may be met by the obvious enough suggestion that the saints suffered long before that, ostensibly for some other cause, but really because they were Christians; and there is therefore nothing to hinder us from accepting the date usually assigned to the epistle, about A.D. 64. It may further be pointed out that the suffering in the present case does not appear to have been as yet "unto blood," and it may not have been entirely official in its origin; but it was hard to bear, and therefore the apostle writes to strengthen their faith. He has little thought about style and less about originality. He writes out of the fulness of his heart and of his memory. He quotes Paul and James, as well as the writers of the OT.; but most of all he is saturated with the words of Jesus. It is very significant, and not without evidential value, that there are more of our Lord's words in this short letter than in the whole of Paul's writings. Then in regard to doctrine, the only peculiarity is in the passages about the dead, and the reference is so obscure that we must conclude that he knew his readers to be in possession of a fuller statement, which no doubt was a well-known item of traditional apostolic teaching, although lost to us. Taken by itself and as it stands, the first passage ($3.^{19}$) seems clearly enough to mean that Christ preached to the antediluvian dead, and the second passage ($4.^{6}$) that the preaching was extended somehow to all the dead who died before the Gospel was preached on the earth; but it would be hazardous to go further (as some have proposed), and infer from this as a general doctrine the possibility of redemption after death. The Scriptures elsewhere being silent on the subject, it is wiser to leave the final interpretation of these obscure passages till we have fuller knowledge.

Summary.—$1.^{1,2}$. Salutation.—His readers are Christians in the north-east provinces of Asia Minor, Jews apparently from the mode of address, but most certainly including Gentiles, if these are not in the majority, from the references to their past moral life.

$1.^{3-12}$. The Christian Life, its privileges.—The great salvation devised by God's mercy, and secured by Christ's resurrection, will be revealed in its fulness in the last time, when they shall enter into possession of their inheritance and see their Lord; but even already, such is the power of faith, they can rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory, and that even in the midst of manifold trials, realising that such are sent to purify their faith and prepare them for Christ's coming. This salvation, which remained a mystery in past ages even to the prophets, and is still a mystery to the angels, was announced (and made clear) to them by the high authority of preachers commissioned by the Holy Ghost.

$1.^{13}$–$2.^{10}$. The Christian Life, its distinctive features: hopefulness, diligence, and holiness.—Their eyes must ever be on the horizon looking for their Lord, but they must not neglect their own preparation, they must be holy because He is holy. Let them remember what their redemption cost, their exodus from the bondage of the old life; and let them make diligent use of the Word by which they were begotten into the new life, finding in it milk for their spiritual nourishment—they are as yet but babes in Christ. The foundation only of their faith is laid (it is a sure foundation), and they must build upon it—nay, they themselves are the stones to be built up into a spiritual house. Let them remember their high calling, how they are the true Israel of God, an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, sojourners and pilgrims in this world, strangers in every land, with a heavenly Canaan.

$2.^{11}$–$3.^{13}$. The Christian Life, its duties.—The world has its claim upon them, sojourners though they be; let their life then do credit to their religion. As citizens let them be loyal and obedient, recognising the secular government to be from God; as servants let them be in subjection with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward, remembering the example of their Lord. (That there is no corresponding exhortation to masters may indicate that they were mostly of the humbler class.) Wives who happen to have heathen husbands are still to obey, and their whole life should be such as to win their husbands to Christ. Husbands, on the other hand, are not to despise their wives, but to honour them as the weaker vessel, and, where both are believers, as joint heirs of the grace of life—a suggestive hint for all time. Finally, let them recognise their duty to one another, let them live in peace and love, subduing their revengeful feelings, and so earn the length of days and the security promised to the righteous. But this brings him back to their present sufferings, and he must explain.

$3.^{14}$–4. The Christian Life, its sufferings.—Let them make sure that their suffering is for righteousness sake, not for evil-doing or meddling in other men's matters, but simply and solely because they are living the Christian life in its severe simplicity, refusing to hob-nob and carouse with their former boon companions (let the past suffice for that !) ; let each of them make sure that he is suffering as a Christian, and then let him rejoice. Let him understand and be always ready to answer: (1) That it is not a token of God's anger but of His favour ; to suffer as a Christian is to be a partaker of Christ's sufferings, through which the world is saved. (2) That the suffering is disciplinary ; the gold is refined in this way (and if this is needed for the good what about the wicked ?). (3) That it will only be for a short time ; the Lord is coming. (4) That their souls are in God's keeping ; let them commit themselves to Him (as Jesus did, $2.^{23}$).

$5.^{1-11}$. The Christian Life, its organisation.—Christians are not units but a unity. He has already spoken of them as a nation, a family, a spiritual house ; he will now compare them to a flock, the true sheep of God's pasture, and as such they must have overseers. Christ is the Chief Shepherd, the elders are the under-shepherds, the Word of God is the pasture. Let the elders therefore feed the flock, let them also protect it, and when the Chief Shepherd will come they will get their reward. The flock, on the other hand, must be obedient, willing to be kept, and anxious to be fed ; the younger especially are to be dutiful and submissive ; and as the bond of peace let them all be humble-minded, " for God resisteth the proud but giveth grace to the humble."

$5.^{12-14}$. Farewell greetings and benediction.

D. Ross.

PETER, THE SECOND EPISTLE OF. The Petrine authorship of this epistle has been greatly questioned from the beginning. There is no certain mention of the epistle in the second century, and when it is referred to in the third it is only to have its apostolic origin doubted or denied. It was long in being accepted by the great churches, and how it found its way into the Canon it is impossible to say. At the Reformation, again, it was attacked by Erasmus and Calvin ; and in modern times many leading critics are against it. Not only, they say, is there the want of external authority, which in itself is a grave objection, but there are such additional objections as these : the difference in style from 1 Peter—that so simple, this so artificial and ambitious—and the close resemblance to the Apocalypse of Peter, a work of the second century ; its dependence on Jude (if later—and all the evidence points that way), a thing very unlikely in an apostle, even in Peter ; the many suggestions of a later age, as the presence of antinomian agnosticism as a system; the distance from the Fathers; the reference to Paul's epistles as Scripture. All these, it is contended, lead to the conclusion that the epistle belongs to a later period, probably about the middle of the second century, and was written by a man who (with a high purpose, it may be conceded) impersonated Peter for the sake of authority, and who perhaps was in possession of some of the apostle's writings, or at least was familiar with his specific teaching. At the same time, and in spite of all this, there are still critics of repute who accept the epistle as genuine ; and it is likely that the plain reader of Scripture, thinking only of the substance of the epistle, will still go on believing that he is in contact with a mind which was in contact with Christ in the days of His flesh. The epistle in that case must be placed at the very limit of Peter's life, not earlier than A.D. 65 ; and while the readers are the same as in 1 Peter, the enemy is a new one—immoral heresy, either already present or seen on the horizon.

Summary.—$1.^{1,2}$. Salutation. $1.^{3-11}$. Introductory exhortation to a diligent use of the Divine gifts. God has given in Christ all that is necessary for life and godliness ; let them, then, for their part so use the means of grace, building on the foundation of faith the Christian graces—virtue and knowledge, self-control and endurance, godliness and brotherly love—that they make their calling and election sure and secure an entrance into the eternal kingdom.

$1.^{12-21}$. The importance and certainty of his message.—He writes as a dying man, and he will not fail in his duty, hoping that his words will have weight when he is gone. He is not in any doubt as to the Divine origin of the apostolic teaching. He was an eye-witness of Christ's glory, and heard the voice of God confirming His sonship and making the word of prophecy more sure (RV.) ; which word in respect of Christ's second coming (given, as all Scripture is given, by the Holy Ghost) they have as a lamp till the day-star arise. This leads to the main part of the epistle.

2. Warning against those who wrest the Scriptures to justify their sinful lives.—Such men are sure to come if they have not already arisen, and they will do much harm, but their judgment is sure. God, who spared not angels when they sinned, nor the men before the Flood, and who turned Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes for their wickedness, will not spare these men who follow in their steps ; but He will, as of old, deliver the righteous. Justice cannot fail to overtake such insolent sinners as these ; and then he goes on to describe them, following (or anticipating) the description of Jude, enlarging, generalising, and in parts altering the sense, and finishing up with an unsavoury proverb.

3. Warning against mockers, probably the same class.—These men make light of Christ's coming on the Day of Judgment. They point to the uniformity of nature since the creation, wilfully forgetting that the order was broken once at the Flood because of sinners like themselves, and what happened once will happen again, only the next time the destruction will be by fire. Let them understand that the long delay (since the [apostolic] Fathers fell asleep) is not a sign of slackness on God's part but of His long-suffering, and that He does not reckon time as men do. The day of the Lord will assuredly come, and it will come suddenly, bringing destruction upon the ungodly; but they, the people of God, need have no fear even though the heavens be dissolved and the elements melt with fervent heat. Only, with such a prospect, let them give diligence that they be found without spot and blameless; and in particular let them take care that they be not led astray by those who wrest the Scriptures (including Paul's utterances on the subject) to their own destruction; but let them grow in the grace and knowledge of their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ —to Him be the glory for ever! PETHAHIAH. (1) A priest who was head of the 19th of the priestly courses in the time of David (1 Ch. 24.[16]). (2) A Levite who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[23]). He took a leading part in the service, regulating the devotions of the people when Ezra had concluded the reading of the law (Ne. 9.[5]). (3) Son of Meshezabeel, of the tribe of Judah, who was employed by the Persian king "in all matters affecting the people, to speak to the king concerning them" (Ne. 11.[24]).

PETHOR, whence Balak, king of Moab, brought the prophet Balaam, with intent to curse Israel (Nu. 22.[5]; Dt. 23.[4]), lay "on the river" (Euphrates) in Mesopotamia. It is called Pitru by Shalmaneser II. (KIB. i. 133, 163, 173), who says it is "on the Sagur," i.e. the mod. Sajur. It must therefore have been on the W. bank of the Euphrates, at its confluence with the Sajur, some 60 miles to the NE. of Aleppo.

PETHUEL, father of the prophet Joel (Jl. 1.[1]). It may possibly be a scribal error for Bethuel (cp. LXX).

PHARAOH (פַּרְעֹה, Φαραώ), the title of the Egyptian kings, in Egyptian Per-āa, "(the) Great House," similar to that of the "Sublime Porte." As we speak of the "Mikado" of Japan, the foreigners in and around Egypt spoke of "the Pharaoh"; hence it is only after the Ethiopian conquest of Egypt that the actual names of the Pharaohs are given in the OT. Ten Pharaohs are mentioned there: (1) The Pharaoh of Abraham, who would have been a Hyksos king of Canaanitish origin, and consequently ready to welcome the visitor from Canaan. (2) The Pharaoh of Joseph, who was also a Hyksos king, belonging probably to the third and last Hyksos dynasty (the 17th). Eusebius makes him an Apophis, of whom three are known from the monuments. (3) The Pharaoh of the Oppression, for whom the Israelites built Raamses and Pithom (Ex. 1.[11]). As the excavations of Professor Naville have shown that the builder of Pithom was Ramses II., of the 19th dynasty, we must see in Ramses II. the Pharaoh under whom Moses was born. Ramses II. had a passion for building, and during his long reign of 67 years covered Egypt with his constructions. (4) The Pharaoh of the Exodus, who was the successor of the Pharaoh of the Oppression (Ex. 2.[23]), must have been Meneptah, the son and successor of Ramses II. The "Israelites" (I-s-r-a-l-u) are mentioned on one of his monuments discovered at Thebes by Prof. Petrie. The Exodus would have taken place before the 8th year of his reign, when, as we learn from a letter to the Egyptian government, the land of Goshen had been left without inhabitants. (5) Pharaoh the father of Bithiah (1 Chr. 4.[18]), wh. is possibly the town of southern Palestine called Bethia by the Egyptian king Thothmes III. (Karnak List, 97). Bithia is said to be the wife of Mered, son of Ezra and "the Jewess," who seems to be identical with "Jered, the father of Gedor." (6) The Pharaoh to whom Hadad of Edom fled after the conquest of his country by Joab (1 K. 11.[14-22]). Hadad subsequently married the sister of "Tahpenes the queen," and on the death of David asked leave to return to his own land. (7) Pharaoh the father-in-law of Solomon (1 K. 3.[1]), who must have been the last king of the 21st (Tanite) dynasty, Pasebkhanu II., but can hardly have been identical with the Pharoah of Hadad. Resuming the old claims of Egyptian sovereignty over Canaan, he marched against Gezer, wh. he took from the Canaanites and handed over to his son-in-law in place of a dowry. (8) The Pharaoh on whose help Hezekiah relied in his revolt from Sennacherib (Is. 36.[6]). As the Assyrian invasion of Judah took place in B.C. 701, this would have been Shabatoka of the Ethiopian (25th) dynasty (see Petrie, History of Egypt, iii. p. 296). (9) Pharaoh Necho, the first Pharaoh whose name is given in the OT., Nekau II. Uahem-ab-Ra in Egyptian, the 4th king of the 26th (Saite) dynasty, who reigned B.C. 610–594. He attempted to reopen the canal wh. connected the Nile with the Red Sea, and sent Phœnician ships to circumnavigate Africa. The fall of Assyria allowed him to restore the Egyptian empire in Asia; and in B.C. 608 he invaded Palestine, where Josiah was overthrown and slain at Megiddo (2 K. 23.[29f.]; 2 Ch. 35.[20-24]). Three months later Jehoahaz was deposed and carried to Egypt, Jehoiakim being made king in his place (2 Ch. 36.[3f.]). In B.C. 605, however, the Egyptians were utterly defeated at Carchemish by Nebuchadrezzar (Jr. 46.[1, 2, 6, 10]) and the Asiatic empire of Egypt lost (2 K. 24.[7]). (10) Pharaoh Hophra, Uah-ab-Ra in Egyptian, Apries in Herodotus, the grandson of Nekau II., reigned B.C. 589–570. He is called simply "Pharaoh" in Jr. 37.[5]; Ek. 17.[17]. The alliance of Zedekiah with Egypt, wh. led to his revolt from Nebuchadrezzar, must have been made before the death of Psammetichus II., the father of Hophra, since the siege of Jerusalem began B.C. 590, but the advance of the Egyptian army wh. occasioned the temporary suspension of the siege probably took place after it. Hophra was dethroned and subsequently put to death by one of his generals, Ahmes, thus fulfilling the prophecy of Jr. 44.[30]. A. H. SAYCE.

PHARISEES (Heb. פְּרוּשִׁים, "separated"). We do not meet with the name either in OT. or in the Apcr., but the P. are nothing else than the Assideans (חסידים) of 1 M. 2.[42], 7.[13-17]; 2 M. 14.[6]. The principle of separation, wh. had been introduced by Ezra, became a much more pressing necessity when the Seleucidæ were introducing and enforcing heathen customs, and when many Jews were becoming lax and yielding to free thought, and hence arose the sect and name of the P. They feared that, in the confusion of the times, politics would usurp the place of religion, and so they held against all parties that the Law was Israel's office and only standard of life and government. They did not wish a worldly State, but only a community obedient to the Law, and accordingly they were ready to accept into their party any pious Jew who was faithful to the Law, and, strictly observing the laws of ceremonial purity, separated himself fm. the 'ammē hā-'āretz. They had recognised Alcimus of the house of Aaron as High Priest, but when Jonathan received that office fm. the Syrians they stood aloof, and he in return abolished and punished the observance of the institutions wh. the Pharisees had imposed on the people as received by succession fm. their fathers (Ant. XIII. x. 6). Several of the Maccabean princes tried to prevent an open rupture with their chiefs, but without success. Under Alexander Jannæus they suffered, but in the days of Salome they gained considerable influence, and even seats in the Sanhedrin, while through the appointment of their candidate, Hyrcanus, to the high-priesthood and the removal of Aristobulus, they were, though hostile to the Romans on account of the pollution of the Temple, brought to submission. In Herod's contests for the kdm. they took no part, but the fact that their chiefs, Pollio and Sameas, were instrumental in inducing the people to open the gates of Jerusalem to him, procured them position and honour; nevertheless when the oath of allegiance to Cæsar and Herod was imposed, they declined to take it, and a fine had to be paid instead (Ant. XVII. ii. 4). During his reign their great teachers—Shemaia and Abtalion, Hillel and Shammai—lived, and their influence and the number of their representatives in the Sanhedrin gradually grew. With the advent of the pure Rm. rule (A.D. 6) the Sadducees gained a momentary advantage, but the action of the Zealots brought decline, and henceforward not only the moral influence but the official rule was in the hands of the P.

Starting with the principle that the Law was all in all, and devoting themselves to its study, they soon came to be regarded as excelling all others in their accurate kge. and skilful exposition of it (Jos. Vit. 38; BJ. II. viii. 14), but in applying it to the changed circumstances of their more complicated life they found it insufficient, and so it soon became a part of their teaching that alongside of the written Law there exists an oral law wh. is meant to be its interpreter, giving details of the application of every regulation in the Pnt. on matters ceremonial, doctrinal, and legal (Pirke Aboth, i.). Besides instructions said to have been delivered to Moses on Sinai, it contained (a) opinions of the elders on disputed points; (b) decrees of the prophets and wise men; (c) legal decisions of the ecclesiastical authorities on doubtful questions. Every possible case of conduct in life was brought into contact with the Law through the forced interpretation of some verse. Endless detail was given, regulations for every motion and action, so that men became not only as children, but mere machines. Their religion was mechanical, lifeless, unspiritual. The kernel was buried and died under the heap of dry husks. The Law became a bondage and a burden too heavy to be borne (Mw. 23.[4]), in very truth beggarly elements (Gal. 4.[9]). Nor is this the opinion of the NT. alone. Such of the later Jews as fully appreciated their position designated the P. "a trouble of life," and expected them to be "nothing in the next world."

The P. held with great strictness to the law of tithing, and refused to partake of anything that had not paid tithes (Mw. 23.[23]; Lk. 18.[12]). To them also the regulations regarding clean and unclean were of vital importance, in relation to both eating and touching. These matters necessitated great care in buying and selling. Thus there was brought about the formation of Pharisaic societies, the members of wh. were named ḥăbērīm, and these were trusted by their brother P. The admission of candidates took place in the presence of three members, before whom they had to swear to be true to the laws of the association. For the same reasons they confined themselves in social and marriage relations to their own society.

Josephus, who was himself a P. (Vit. 2), frequently mentions them and their doctrines, but his statements lose something of their value on act. of his fondness for accommodating Jewish ideas to the terms of Greek philosophy. He compares them to the Stoics, prob. having in mind their indiffce. to wealth and luxury and their ascribing all things to fate. This latter point he modifies elsewhere, saying that "the Pharisees, while they have determined that all things are done by fate, do not take away the freedom of men acting as they think fit; since their notion is that it hath pleased God to make a temperament, whereby what He wills is done, but so that the will of man can act virtuoosly or viciously" (Ant. XVIII. i. 3; B.J. II. viii. 14). In connection with their belief in a future life they are prominent in the NT., and this article of faith is also mentioned by Josephus: "They believe that souls have an immortal vigour in them, and that under the earth there will be rewards or punishments accdg. as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life, and the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again" (Ant. XVIII. i. 2). Elsewhere he says that they believed in the transmigration of souls: "They say that souls are incorruptible, and that the souls of good men are only removed into other bodies" (BJ. II. viii. 14; cf. Mw. 14.[2]; Jn. 9.[2]). From the NT. we should judge that they believed in the resurrection in the Christian sense. Our Lord does not mention the future life as anything new, and He takes for granted that they are right in their thoughts concerning it (Mw. 22.[30]; Mk. 12.[25]; Lk. 20.[34-36]). In the Mishna the phrase so often met with, "the world to come," is a clear expression of Christian truth. On the other hand the idea of transmigration may have been held by individuals even in the first century, as it became and still is a doctrine of Judaism.

The P. were said to be friendly to one another, and to be moved by a desire for the exercise of concord and regard for the public. They were not apt to be severe in punishing, and sought to make relg. the moving principle in the life of the people. They insisted on education in divine things, and one of the leaders gave utterance to this saying, "Secure thyself a teacher, procure a companion, and judge every man fm. the best side;" while another said, "Love work, hate lordship, and be not in the confidence of the rulers." The multitude was on their side, and they had the guidance of the people in religious matters (BJ. II. viii. 14; Ant. XIII. x. 6; Aboth, i.). But though ruling and guiding them, they were wont to despise those who knew not the Law (Jn. 7.[49]), and whom they named the 'ammē hā-'āretz (people of the land). This name was given to such as did not repeat the Shema' prayer, who did not wear phylacteries or Tzitzith, and who did not teach their sons the law, i.e. all those who did not study and observe the various details of rabbinical teaching. Among many other expressions of contempt for such we read, "the garments of an 'am hā-'āretz are as defiling as articles trodden under foot by a man who has an issue" (Chulin, 35[a]).

An interesting illustration of the extent of Pharisaic hypocrisy, and an ample justification of the woes our Lord pronounced upon them, may be seen in several passages of the Tlm., where they are divided into seven, wh. may be named and described as follows: (1) The Shechemite P., who, like the people of Shechem, obeys not fm. precept but fm. expediency and self-interest. (2) The stumbling P., who in his humility will not lift his feet fm. the ground, and so goes stumbling along. (3) The bleeding P., who shuts his eyes in his modest desire not to see a woman, and so is always striking himself agst. the wall. (4) The painted P., who is so holy that he fears to touch any one lest he be contaminated. (5) The dutiful P., who says, "tell me of another duty that I may do it." (6) The trembling P., who is actuated by motives of fear alone. (7) The P. fm. love, who serves his heavenly Father fm. motives of love. Of all these we can only regard the last class as truly good and pious men; and if we accept the Jewish proportion of good to bad, we must count that in Gospel days Pal. contained but several hundred such, of wh. class we may regard Nicodemus, Gamaliel, and Saul as examples, each in his own way.

The P. were the one sect that sought to make converts fm. beyond the pale of Judaism. In this they were very energetic (Mw. 23.[15]), and they were successful in gaining some very distinguished proselytes (Ant. XX. ii. 3). We read of conversions being very common in Galilee, esp. in the tribe of Issachar to the S. of Nazareth, and there our Lord's disciples may have seen and learned something of their methods of persuasion. The freedom of the synagogue system, and the facilities there afforded (Lk. 4.[16]; Ac. 17.[2]) for the expression of new thoughts, doubtless helped them, as it did the early Gospel preachers, and prob. the fact that the P. had led the way in preaching assisted in paving the way for the spread of Christianity. WM. M. CHRISTIE.

PHARPAR, one of the "rivers of Damascus" preferred by Naaman the Syrian to the Jordan (2 K. 5.[12]; see ABANA). Identifications have been suggested with the stream from 'Ain Fījeh, and with one or other of the canals from the Barada. There is a local tradition which identifies Abana and Pharpar with the canals Nahr Bainās, or Abaniās, and Nahr Taurā. This is probably reflected in the Arabic version, which renders Pharpar by Taurā. There is nothing to support this identification in the Arab geographers; and the canals are, after all, only branches of the one river. Wādy Barbar, which comes down from the E. slope of Hermon, entering the plain of Damascus at the SW., perhaps retains a reminiscence of the old name. Save in winter, however, it is hardly a stream to attract the eye. It seems more likely that Naaman alluded to the adjacent river el-A'waj, which carries quite a volume of water, flowing along the southern edge of the plain to the desert lakes (HGHL.[1] 642; Baedeker, Pal. and Syr.[3] 268, 312). At the nearest point it is distant six miles from the gate of Damascus, Bawwābet Ullah: some have thought, therefore, that it is too far away to be called a "river of Damascus."

But Naaman probably thought of the term as covering the rich plain so closely associated with the city. And we find the Arabic writer Dimashki (c. A.D. 1300) actually describing el-A'waj as a river of Damascus.

PHICHOL, RV. PHICOL, captain of the host of the Philistine king Abimelech of Gerar. He accompanied his master when the covenant was made with Abraham at Beer-sheba (Gn. 21.[22ff.]), and also when the covenant was made with Isaac (26.[26]).

PHILADELPHIA (Rv. 3.[7]), a city in Lydia, was founded by Attalus II. king of Pergamos (B.C. 159–138). It was situated in the vale of the Cogamis, a tributary of the Hermus, on rising ground to the S. of the river, and north of Mt. Tmolus. It was on the edge of the "Burnt Land," the Katakekaumenē, which lies to the north and north-east of Philadelphia. The name is due to the evidence on all hands of tremendous volcanic activity in comparatively recent times. The volcanic detritus lends the charm of extraordinary fertility to the slopes and glens. Vines grew with great luxuriance, and the country was celebrated for the excellence of its wines. The position of Philadelphia fitted it to be, as was designed, a centre of Hellenistic influence in the whole region. Standing on the great road from Smyrna and the sea to Phrygia and the East, it enjoyed profitable trade relations with the cities on the inland plateau, the edges of which looked down upon it on three sides. The merchants in Philadelphia would arrange for the transit to Smyrna of the rich vintages of the surrounding country. Its prosperous trade was sufficient to attract a colony of Jews (Rv. 3.[9]). The district was liable to disturbance from earthquake. When the city had suffered from such a catastrophe in A.D. 17, the emperor Tiberius helped to restore it, giving it the name of Neokaisareia; and it enjoyed the high honour of the neokorate, i.e. it was made warden of the temple consecrated to the worship of the emperor.

When and by whom the Church was founded in Philadelphia there is nothing to show; but a position of such consequence, holding open a door of approach to a wide and important region, could not long be neglected by the early missionaries. In the letter addressed to this Church (Rv. 3.[7ff.]) there is no word of rebuke or reproach. Possibly the "little power" may mean that it was still in its infancy as a Church; the "open door" may refer to the opportunities its position afforded. It is commended for its fidelity; and so far, at least, it had not suffered from the "trial" of persecution. The Jews had evidently succumbed to the temptations that beset them there; but a hopeful view is taken of their future. The people, accustomed to flee to the open country at the rumour of earthquake, and who after such a disaster would come back slowly to the shattered buildings of city and temple, could appreciate the promised reward to faithfulness: "I will make him a pillar in the sanctuary of my God, and he shall go out thence no more."

Philadelphia played a considerable part in later history, and after a heroic resistance passed finally into the hands of the Turks in the last quarter of the fourteenth century. "In the times when we catch a glimpse of its condition, Philadelphia was living amid ceaseless dangers, of old from earthquakes, and last from Turkish attack. It was always in dread of the last hour of trial, and was always kept from it. It stood like a pillar, the symbol of stability and strength. In the Middle Ages it struggled on, a small and weak city against a nation of warriors, and did not deny the name, but was patient to the end; and there has been written on its history a name that is imperishable, so long as heroic resistance against overwhelming odds, and persevering self-reliance, when deserted by the world, are held in honour and remembered" (Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches, 412). The mod. town, Alasheher, has still a large Christian population.

PHILEMON. The great majority of the Pauline epistles were directed to communities—to churches or groups of churches. Of the thirteen epistles wh. have Paul's name, nine are public in the salutation, addressed to a body of believers, and deal with questions wh. interest them in their corporate capacity as a community. Of the remaining four, three may be regarded as official letters directed to Timothy and Titus to guide them as to the character of the persons to be ordained as deacons and presbyters. That to Philemon is unique in that it is addressed to a personal friend in regard to a purely private matter. As such it is replete with revelations of the character of St. Paul. Many such letters may have been sent fm. St. Paul to other believers who enjoyed the friendship of the great apostle, but this alone has been preserved. Philemon appears to have been a wealthy citizen of Colosse. The name was borne by several persons mentioned in Smith's Dictionary of Classical Biography, most of them having some connection with Asia Minor. As St. Paul at the time this epistle was written had not visited Colosse, it probably was in Ephesus, during the apostle's prolonged stay, that Philemon came under St. Paul's influence. Fm. v. 19 it is clear that P. was a personal convert of the apostle's; more, he seems to have been drawn into close friendship with him. Not impossibly Philemon was resident in Ephesus, so St. Paul wd. have frequent opportunity of becoming acquainted with the various slaves that went to form the familia of his friend. If Philemon had been resident in Ephesus during St. Paul's stay there, it wd. seem that he soon removed to the valley of the Lycus and took up his abode in Colosse. He may, indeed, have conveyed the Gospel of the Kingdom thither. It is possible, however, that when he returned to Colosse he found a Christian community already existing, due possibly to the preaching of Epaphras, whose special salutation is sent to Colosse (Col. 4.[12, 13]). Perhaps the meeting-place was not suitable for all the believers in the city, hence a community met in Philemon's house. After the removal of his household to Colosse he suffered a severe loss. ONESIMUS, a trusted slave, robbed his master and became a fugitive; the natural centre of attraction for fugitives was Rome. There the fugitive had been seen and recognised by the apostle. Converted by his instrumentality, and brought to see his sin and the duty of restitution, the apostle sent him back to Colosse to his master. He wished to intercede with his friend for this runaway. Such, then, was the occasion of this short letter. It begins with a salutation in wh. the apostle conjoins Timothy with himself, though immediately after the salutation the letter is written wholly in the first person singular. It is to be noted as a skilful but covert appeal to the sympathy of his correspondent that Paul calls himself "the prisoner of Christ Jesus." He addressed his letter not only to Philemon but also to Apphia his wife and Archippus his son, who apparently is a presbyter in the church of the neighbouring city of Laodicæa (Col. 4.[17]). The three verses wh. follow contain thanksgiving for the faith of Philemon and the kindliness to wh. it prompted him. The apostle then opens the purpose of his writing, entreating where he had the right to command, appealing by his age and his bonds to the affection of Philemon for the runaway. It is noted that there is a play on the contrast between the unprofitable servant and the profit he had been to Paul himself, and thus, as doing what Philemon wd. have wished done, profitable to Philemon. He declares that he wd. have liked to have retained Onesimus with him, but as he was the slave of Philemon he felt he cd. only use the services of Onesimus with his master's free consent. He refers to the theft in the most delicate terms, offering himself to make good the loss, though at the same time he suggests to Philemon that it wd. be but graceful shd. he forego the debt. It is to be observed that, although St. Paul does not ask for the manumission of Onesimus, by asserting his brotherhood he renders real slavery impossible. There follow salutations fm. Epaphras, who wd. seem to have shared his imprisonment, Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas.

While every one admits the gracefulness and beauty of this epistle, several of the critical school have denied it to be by Paul. Either they have formed a theory of the apostolic times fm. their own inner consciousness and dismiss everything that conflicts with it (Baur), or, having formed a theory of the apostle himself, everything that militates against this is dismissed for the most futile of reasons (v. Manen). Short as it is, this epistle is early guaranteed as Pauline; Marcion admitted it into his canon; it is in the Muratori fragment; it is named as Pauline by Tertullian and quoted by Origen. To forge such a letter wd. serve no purpose; there is no dogma or practice impugned at the time when we first know of its existence wh. it defends. If it were intended to be a manifesto against slavery its purpose wd. have been much more clearly displayed. Some who have admitted the Pauline authorship have differed fm. the general opinion that it was written fm. Rome, and held it was written during Paul's imprisonment in Cæsarea. That question is discussed under COLOSSIANS and ONESIMUS. As to the place it occupies among the Epp. of the first imprisonment, one thing is certain, it is closely connected with Colossians, and that with Ephesians: the probability seems to be that the Epistle to the Philippians was later, but not by much (see Bernard, HDB.).

PHILETUS. See HYMENÆUS.

PHILIP. (1) The husband of Herodias (Mw. 14.[3]) and (2) the Tetrarch (Lk. 3.[1]) are treated under HERODIAN FAMILY. (3) The apostle, a native of Bethsaida of Galilee, apparently among the number who were attracted by the preaching of John the Baptist, and one of the first followers of Jesus (Jn. 1.[43f.], 12.[21]). Like Andrew, he also, on making the great discovery, brought another, Nathaniel, to Jesus. He seems to have been of an eminently practical turn. He did not argue with Nathaniel, altho' on the point raised argument might have been used with effect: he simply invited him to come and see for himself what would make all argument needless (Jn. 1.[46]). It may have been Philip's business to see that the company was sufficiently supplied with food. At any rate, when Jesus asked him as to means for feeding the multitude he had already thought the matter out, and was prepared with an estimate of the cost (Jn. 6.[5f.]). Philip and Andrew—it is a striking coincidence that both bore Greek names—introduced the inquiring Greeks to Jesus (Jn. 12.[20ff.]). He does not seem, however, to have been swift of spiritual perception. Andrew said, "We have found the Messiah" (1.[41]). Philip's perceptions required to be sharpened by a personal summons from Jesus (v. 43). An ancient tradition identifies Philip with the man who would have postponed obedience to the call of Jesus, asking that he might be allowed to go and bury his father (Lk. 9.[59], &c.). His request on the last evening Jesus spent with His disciples points in the same direction. It shows, indeed, the impression which Jesus had made upon those who were nearest Him, that one who sat with Him familiarly at table should take it as a matter of course that He could do this tremendous thing—show them the Father. But it also reveals the distance Philip had to travel before rising to the true spiritual apprehension of the teaching of Jesus. Of his work as an apostle after the resurrection there is no scriptural record. According to Polycrates (Euseb. HE. iii. 32), he laboured and died in Hierapolis; and mention is made of his three distinguished daughters—not to be confounded with the daughters of Philip the Evangelist. Of the apostolic band only Peter and Philip are reported to have had children. Various traditions represent him as visiting at an earlier time Lydia, Asia, Athens (where he founded a church), Parthia, Gaul, and Scythia. There is similar contradiction in the accounts of his death. Some represent it as natural, at the age of eighty-seven: others as martyrdom, without agreement as to the method.

(4) The evangelist, one of the seven chosen to relieve the twelve of the burden of attending to the distribution (Ac. 6.). Of his origin we know nothing. The bearer of a Greek name, he may have been a Hellenist: if so, his election would be specially acceptable to the widows who had complained. He was in any case a man of wide outlook and liberal sympathies. The scriptural record of his work is confined to the eighth chapter of the Acts. Driven from Jerusalem by the persecution in which Stephen suffered, he preached in Samaria with remarkable success, thus taking the first definite step in the way of proclaiming the Gospel to a non-Jewish people. Thence he was sent to guide the Ethiopian eunuch to the truth. We may believe that the introduction of this high officer of queen Candace into the Church was fraught with happy consequences for his country and people. Then from Ashdod Philip passed on a preaching tour to Cæsarea. Here he resided with his four daughters, who were gifted with prophetic powers. He had the joy and privilege of entertaining St. Paul and his company (Ac. 21.[8ff.]). Possibly then St. Luke may have learned from him many details regarding the first days of the Church in Jerusalem. From the traditions we may gather that he settled later in Asia Minor; but he is confused by them with the apostle. To this confusion no doubt is due the belief that he had settled at Hierapolis. The likelihood is that he laboured and died in Tralles.

PHILIPPI, the mod. Filibedjek, lay a few miles inland from the port of Neapolis, on the lower eastern slopes of Mount Pangæus. An older town, Krenides, stood on the same site, the name being drawn from the springs near by which feed the great marshes to the south. Gold mines in the mountain had been worked in old time by the Thasians, who had a settlement here. This source of wealth attracted the attention of Philip, king of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great. He seized the mines and refounded the city, which he strongly fortified, and called it after himself, Philippi. It served a double purpose as a fortress, guarding that part of Macedonia from the Thracians, while it also secured him in possession of the mines. It was situated on the great Egnatian road which connected the Ægean with the Adriatic—the main highway for the commerce of east and west: a circumstance very favourable for the trade of Philippi. With the victory of Æmilius Paullus (B.C. 168) it passed under the control of Rome. The policy of the conquerors was to destroy the unity of Macedonia. It was cut up into four districts, and as far as possible intercourse between them was prevented. Intermarriage was prohibited, and a man could not hold property in more than one district. The province of Macedonia was constituted in 146. Here in B.C. 42 Brutus and Cassius were overthrown by Antony and Octavian, and in honour of the victory it was constituted a Roman military colony, possessing the Jus Italicum. A further contingent was settled here eleven years later, after the defeat of Antony at Actium, and the city was honoured by the title Augusta. The jurisdiction of the city was independent of that of the provincial governor. The constitution was copied from that of Rome. It was a city belonging to "the first" rank in Macedonia (Ac. 16.[12]). This was the first thoroughly Roman centre in which the apostle Paul preached the Gospel. The Church may have been in existence, and if so was probably the earliest of all European churches. That at Philippi was the first founded in Europe by St. Paul. The Jews apparently were not numerous, and were content with only a proseuchē, a place of prayer by the river-side, where the apostle spoke to such as would listen. The conversion of Lydia opened her house to the missionaries. An unfortunate demoniac girl, possibly a slave, "possessed by a spirit of divination" (see Python), was used by her inhuman masters for purposes of soothsaying, by which they made great gain, among the superstitious people. With the demoniac's keen perception, illustrated once and again in the Gospel story, she recognised the missionaries as "servants of the Most High God." The apostle, "sore troubled" by the outcry she made, healed her. This roused the wrath of her masters, who saw the means of their enrichment thus taken away. St. Paul was to meet this same spirit in another form at Ephesus (Ac. 19.). These men rushed upon the apostles, and persuaded the mob to assist them in dragging Paul and Silas before the magistrates. There the proceedings were clearly tumultuary. No opportunity was given to the accused of rebutting the charges made against them, nor of declaring their Roman citizenship, which would have protected them from indignity. They were roughly stripped, scourged, put fast in stocks, and thrust into the inner prison. There, cramped and bleeding as they were, they raised their song of praise, which, through the gloom and stillness of the night, the prisoners heard. The terror of the midnight earthquake, the release of the prisoners, the conversion of the trembling jailor, the alarm and humble entreaties of the two supreme magistrates, when they realised that they were responsible for a grave breach of the law in having permitted Roman citizens to be beaten and dishonoured, without trial and condemnation, and finally the departure of the preachers, are described with simple directness, and lend to the city of Philippi an interest for all time.

Coin of Philippi

St. Paul maintained a close and affectionate relationship with the Church he founded here (Php. 4.[15]; 2 Cor. 11.[8f.]). This is manifest in the letter he wrote to the Philippians (see next article). When Paul and Silas left after the tumult it is possible that Luke was placed in charge of the infant Church for a time. It is probable that St. Paul visited the city at least twice in subsequent years, once on his journey through Macedonia to Greece, as well as on his return (Ac. 20.[1f., 6]). There is an allusion also to a visit paid to Macedonia in 1 Tm. 1.[3]. He would hardly be in the province without going to Philippi.

Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, visited Philippi on his way to meet his death in Rome for the Gospel's sake. He was most kindly entreated by the Christians here. The bishops of Philippi figure in the Church councils during the early centuries, down to that of Chalcedon (A.D. 451).

PHILIPPIANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. "From thence to Philippi, which is a city of Macedonia, the first in the district, a Roman colony." Such is the description of Philippi given by Luke (Ac. 15.[12]). It is brief, yet it gives a vivid account of the city, its character, and its history. The name recalls the fact that Philippi was named after the king of Macedonia, who had discovered the importance of the site, and had so extended the ancient Krenides that it became a new city. It really commanded the surrounding district, a district rich in the potentialities of wealth. In the year B.C. 42, Augustus, after he had defeated Brutus and Cassius, founded a settlement for Italian soldiers, constituted it a Roman colony, and conferred on it the Jus Italicum. The privileges thus conferred were numerous and weighty. It gave the colony the right of self-government, subject only to the emperor, immunity from some taxes, and the right of property in the soil. A colony with such privileges and with such a tradition were justly proud of their Roman citizenship, and very jealous of their rights and dignities. It was to a city with such a history and with such privileges that Paul came on his first European mission, and in it he made a considerable stay. The city had been a Roman colony for the greater part of a century. It occupied a commanding situation on the Via Egnatia, the great Roman road which led from east to west. Into it had flowed representatives of all the neighbouring population. Bishop Lightfoot points out how varied were the interests and the people contained in Luke's account of Paul's work at Philippi. The woman of Thyatira, the slave, the Roman jailor, are representative of many peoples, and all of them came under the influence of the apostle.

It is not necessary to dwell on the vivid and graphic account of Paul's work at Philippi. Paul and his company had gone, in the first place, in search of the synagogue, but found only a place in the open air where prayer was wont to be made. It would appear, therefore, that the Jews were not numerous or influential in Philippi. But Paul found his opportunity at the place of prayer, and Lydia, having been greatly impressed by him and his message, constrained him to abide in her house. The incident of the slave led to the arrest, torture, and imprisonment of Paul and Silas. It is noteworthy that the charge against them is aggravated by the accusation that they are Jews, proving incidentally that the Jews were not highly esteemed in the Philippian community. Their imprisonment is speedily followed by their release and departure. It is likely that Luke was left behind to carry on the work which Paul had begun, and which he had to leave so suddenly.

Paul's first visit to Philippi had ended amid the storm of persecution. His intercourse with the Church at Philippi seems to have been frequent, and his relations with them were most affectionate and intimate. From Acts 19.[22] we find Paul "sent into Macedonia two of them that ministered unto him, Timothy and Erastus." When he appealed to the Macedonian churches to help the poor saints at Jerusalem, we may be sure that he did not omit an appeal to the Philippian Church. As Philippi lay on the way between Achaia and Asia, it may be safely inferred that Paul's messengers, from Corinth or from Ephesus, while he resided in those cities would break their journey at Philippi, and bear the greetings of the apostle to the Church or of the Church to the apostle. About the year 57 Paul revisited the European churches. From Acts 20. we find that he visited Philippi both in his westward journey and on his return to Troas. "We sailed away from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread" (Ac. 20.[6]). From allusions in various epistles, and from the Acts, we find that the intercourse between the apostle and his first European Church was very frequent. We should then expect in his epistle many references which remain to us somewhat obscure, but which would be vivid, rich in many reminiscences to the Church at Philippi. During the period of ten years, more or less, that had elapsed between Paul's first visit to Philippi and the date of the epistle, many things had happened to the apostle, and also to the Church. There had been sufferings and persecutions for him and them. But the most cherished of these memories would be those which had revealed to Paul and to the Church what they had been to each other. To Paul the Church had been "his joy and crown." What he had been to them, their constant devotion to him, their frequent ministering to his necessities, and their response to his call for liberality abundantly show. It is one of the most characteristic of the Pauline writings. It reveals the courtesy, the innate kindliness of the man. It shows him at the time when the strain is relaxed, and when he can allow the gladness and the warmth of affection to have free scope. He has no fault to find with the Church—their devotion to himself personally had aroused his warmest gratitude. While throughout we can feel the undertone of suffering, and hear the underlying note of anxiety, yet the dominant note is that of joy, gratitude, and hope. "Rejoice, and again I say, Rejoice."

It is scarcely possible to understand the position of some critics who can find no trace of personal feeling in this epistle, and who think that it affords no fresh note of insight into the character of Paul. More than any other of his writings this epistle has the note of personality. He writes in it as he feels, allows himself to speak as the mood of the moment dictates, and in every verse of it we can feel the weight of the remembrances of the Church, of his work among them, and of his frequent intercourse with them.

The epistle itself is not systematic, it is not doctrinal, it is not corrective; it is reminiscent, it is anticipative, it is in a word characteristically personal. At what time in the Roman captivity it was written it is scarcely possible to say. Some place it early, and make it the earliest of the captivity letters; others make it late. The evidence is not overwhelming either way, and our space forbids an examination of the evidence. We may take for granted that the epistle was written from Rome. The evidence for this conclusion seems to be decisive, and critical opinion has tended with increasing weight to this conclusion.

Thus we may picture the apostle in his place of captivity at Rome, in the midst of his many cares and burdens, suddenly aroused and touched by the coming of Epaphroditus, bearing with him the gift of the Philippian Church, and their grateful greetings to their father in Christ. One would like to have been present at the meeting between these two: one would like to have heard the rapid interchange of question and answer as Paul asked the Philippian messenger of the welfare of the Church, of this and that person in the Church, of the work in Philippi and in the neighbourhood. We may be sure that many questions would be asked and answered, and that for the apostle there would be an uplifting of heart which would find utterance in the epistle, which love constrained him speedily to write. He recognises the closeness of the ties which had bound them together, ever since he had laboured among them, and with them endured hardship for Jesus' sake. He had allowed them to minister frequently to his need, and had placed himself under obligation to them. So in his letter he gives expression to personal feeling in an unwonted way. He writes not to correct errors of doctrine, nor to condemn irregularities of conduct. He writes to relieve the strain of personal feeling, of emotional gratitude which oppresses him. After the brief salutation, in which there is a recognition not only of the saints, but also of the bishops and deacons at Philippi, he, under the strain of feeling, becomes reminiscent of the past, and gives thanks for all that the Church had been in life and conduct, and for all that they had been to himself. They are too tender, too touching to be summarised. He passes on to tell them of his present circumstances, of the progress of the Gospel in Rome, of the zeal of friends and the rivalry of foes, of his own hopes and fears. From the description of these personal matters he suddenly rises to an exalted strain of thought and feeling, for he has named the name of Christ, and, as always, so on this special occasion, the name of Christ arouses him to a loftier expression of devotion. "To me to live is Christ, to die is gain." Yet even here he is practical, and turns the thought towards the edification of the Philippians and of himself. "To you it hath been granted in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him but also to suffer for His sake." The naming of the name of Christ leads him on to think of Christ, and to set forth the great example set by Him to His people. Their service ought to be Christ-like; their love to one another, their forbearance with one another ought to be Christ-like. So he writes, from this point of view, the great christological passage, on which we do not dwell. Practical exhortations follow, and then he passes on to speak of his hope of speedy release, of his intention of sending Timothy to them, of the recent illness and return of Epaphroditus. It would almost seem as if the epistle was about to end. "Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord." But, after saying that writing to them was not irksome to him, he suddenly enters on a new subject. We may conjecture regarding the occasion of this new departure, but certainty is not attainable. We may suppose with Lightfoot that at this stage he was interrupted, that he was informed of some fresh attempt of the Judaisers in the metropolis to thwart and annoy him. At all events he is prompted to enlarge his letter, so we have this section descriptive of his past, of his present, and of his future. It is a revelation of character, of his unyielding hope, of the constant spring of freshness of feeling which continued to characterise the apostle even when he became Paul the aged. The digression ends: he resumes the strain of practical exhortation. Let them always rejoice, let them have freedom from care, let them follow and pursue the highest and the best aims. One more note of personal gratitude, one more blessing on them for their thoughtful care, and the epistle ends with the benediction, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." Surely a letter written by one of the most gentle, courteous, and loving of men, full of personal feeling, of loving-kindness, and of tenderness, which perhaps, more than any other epistle, reveals the humanity of the apostle. JAMES IVERACH.

PHILISTINES, THE, an immigrant people who occupied the coast lands of Palestine fm. the boundary of Egp. to that of Phœnicia. Of their origin there are two accounts; in Gn. 10.[13, 14] it is said "Mizraim begat . . . Casluhim (out of whom came Philistim) and Caphtorim"; this wd. imply that their origin was fm. Egypt. Amos has another account: "Saith the Lord, Have I not brought up . . . the Philistines fm. CAPHTOR?" (Am. 9.[7]). Caphtor may represent the Egyptian kafta or kaftr, "Asia Minor"; the balance of opinion seems to identify Caphtor with Crete. The usage of LXX is to tr. P. by allophylloi, "strangers," i.e. immigrants. They are quite established in the land when ABRAHAM and ISAAC are sojourning in it. JACOB does not appear to have had any dealings with them. In patriarchal times the P. seem to have attained a fair amount of civilisation; it is to be noted that the hereditary name of the king is Semitic (Gn. 21.[32], 26.[1]). When Isr. came out of Egp. they were not led into Canaan the shorter way because that wd. involve them in a conflict with the P., a conflict for wh. these freshly emancipated slaves were not ready. The P. appear in the Egyptian records as Parasati; in the Assyrian as Palastu. When JOSHUA entered Pal. the five leading cities formed a league, in wh. sometimes one city, sometimes another, had the hegemony. Each city was ruled over by a "lord" (seren—a word wh. occurs in 1 K. 7.[30] and is tr. RV. "axles"): they are called princes (sarim) in 1 S. 29.[4]. This constitution is referred to in Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. Latterly they seem to have been ruled over by a k., whose authority was limited by that of the "lords." During the period of the Judges the P. oppressed Isr.; latterly the Israelites seem to have acquiesced in the rule of the P., as may be seen by Judah's request to Samson to surrender and the reason assigned for it, "Knowest thou not that the P. are rulers over us?" (Jg. 15.[11]). SAMSON'S exploits were more fitted to irritate the P. than to weaken them. The disastrous battle of Aphek, in wh. the sons of Eli were killed and the ark captured, took the spirit out of Isr., and they were subdued under the P. The plagues that fell upon the P. led to the speedy return of the ark, and SAMUEL led the people to the victory at Ebenezer (1 S. 13.[19-22]). SAUL'S reign was one continuous warfare agst. the P. In the earlier portion of his reign SAUL'S position seems to have been like that of Bruce in Scotland, only able to maintain himself with a small band of followers round him, and keep up the spirit of the people by assaults on the garrisons wh. the P. had all over the land S. of the plain of Jezreel. The subjection of Israel to the P. must have been absolute when they submitted to being without any smith. N. of that plain Phœnician influence was dominant. After the battle of Michmash (1 S. 14.[4-46]) the P. lost their hold on Israel. The next important battle was that of EPHES-DAMMIM, within the immediate territory of GATH (1 S. 17.[1-52]). In it Goliath of Gath was their champion and was slain by David. After their defeat in that battle the P. were restricted to their own land, and only made forays into the land of Isr. (1 S. 23.[27]). They prob. maintained their hold on the great plain, and the battle of GILBOA was fought for its retention. Before that battle David appeared with the Philistine army as the vassal of Achish (1 S. 29.[2]): he had Ziklag as the vassal of the Philistines. After the death of Saul, David appears, as king in Hebron, to be still the vassal of the P. The murder of Ishbosheth and David's elevation to the throne over Isr. led to war with the Philistines (possibly they thought their vassal was become too powerful when all Isr. had made him king), in wh. they were, after some desperately fought battles, effectually subdued. This state of vassalage continued during the reign of SOLOMON. At the division of the kingdom the P. regained their independence, but were never able to assume a paramountcy over even Judah, and were occasionally tributary (2 Ch. 17.[11]). They prob. regarded themselves as vassals of Egp. Sargon conquered them (Is. 20.[1]), and put vassal kings in their various cities. Under the Persians the P. seem to have adopted the Hellenic city constitution. Under the Macedonian rule this Hellenisation became complete, as seen by their coins. Dagon was their principal deity; it formerly was assumed that Dagon was a fish-god, but this seems doubtful now. Dr. Sayce thinks that he was god of agriculture, and that the worship was introduced fm. Asyr. He had temples both in Gaza (Jg. 16.[23]) and Ashdod (1 S. 5.[2]). However, there seem to have been other deities also worshipped, as the armour of Saul was placed in the temple of Ashtaroth (1 S. 31.[10]), and Baalzebub is called the god of Ekron (2 K. 1.[2]). It is to be observed that Achish is represented as swearing to David by Jehovah (1 S. 29.[6]): probably this was an accommodation.

PHILOLOGUS, a Christian in Rome saluted by St. Paul (Rm. 16.[15]). He may have been a slave or a freedman, among whom this name was not uncommon. Tradition makes him one of the seventy, and at a later time, bishop of Sinope. Possibly he was a member of the imperial household. The name has been found in the Columbarium of "the freedmen of Livia Augusta."

PHILOSOPHY. Although the schools of Plato and Aristotle still met in the Academy and the Lyceum at the time of Paul's visit to Athens, the only followers of P. whom he encountered were the Stoics and the Epicureans. The only thinkers who influenced thought at the time and for a century after belonged to one or other of these sects. But in common usage P. had got a wider meaning. Philo speaks of the Hebrew religion and the Mosaic law as "the P. of the Fathers," or "the Jewish P.," and Jos. identifies the three Jewish sects with the Epicureans, Stoics, and Pythagoreans of the Greeks. Lightfoot (Com. on Col. pp. 71–111) thinks the P. referred to by the apostle Paul was a variety of Essenism (Waiters for the Redemption): he, like all commentators, warns his readers agst. regarding St. Paul's words (Col. 2.[8]) as a condemnation of all P. The revived Platonism of Plotinus affected Christianity strongly, and conditioned the form of orthodox doctrine. It may be taken as a continuation of the Stoical idea of P. when monasticism was looked upon as P. The doctrines of Aristotle became predominant in the Middle Ages. Further particulars are to be found in the many histories of philosophy.

PHINEHAS, s. of Eleazar, grandson of Aaron (Ex. 6.[25]). In the matter of Baal-peor, when Zimri, prince of the Simeonites, ostentatiously went aside with Cozbi, dr. of Zur (Nu. 25.[6-15]), P. slew them both; in consequence of this he was promised that the priesthood shd. be in his family. For a time the High-priesthood was in the line of Ithamar, fm. the days of Eli to the deposition of Abiathar (1 K. 2.[26, 27]), when, in Zadok, the line of P. again became High Priests.

It is Critical opinion that the genealogy in 1 Ch. 6.[1-15] is unhistorical, but there is no variation in the LXX or the Psh.—the reason Bishop Ryle assumes as precluding the likelihood of interpolation in Ne. 12., although there are in that place signs of confusion wh. are absent in 1 Ch. 6. White in HDB. asserts that the statement in 1 Ch. 24.[3, 6] is unhistorical, because Jonathan, not Ahimelech, was the s. of Abiathar (1 K. 1.[42]), as if a man might not have two sons. The fact is the same blunder occurs here as in 2 S. 8.[17], where, as here, we have Ahimelech the s. of Abiathar instead of Abiathar the s. of Ahimelech.

P. accompanied the expedition agst. Midian (Nu. 31.[6]). He was sent, along with ten of the princes, to expostulate with the two tribes and a half in regard to the altar of Ed. When Isr. make their expedition agst. Gibeah (Jo. 22.[13]), P. is the High Priest (Jg. 20.[28]).

PHLEGON, another of the Roman Christians who are named only in the greetings of St. Paul (Rm. 16.[14]). He figures in tradition as bishop of Marathon. The Greek Church commemorates him on the 8th of April, on which day he is said to have been martyred.

PHŒBE, who carried the Epistle to the Romans from Corinth to Rome, is described as "deaconess of the church that is at Cenchreæ" (Rm. 16.[1]). The term does not necessarily imply that she held an official position. She may only have distinguished herself in the service, or ministry, she rendered to the Church. The manner of her mention shows that she was a person of influence who merited respect and assistance from the brotherhood in whatever task she had in hand. As a "succourer" of himself she had won the apostle's gratitude.

PHŒNICIANS, THE, are the Canaanites of the OT. who dwelt on the sea-coast and in the Jordan valley (Nu. 13.[29]), tho' the classical writers confine the name Phœnicia to the coast from Myriandus on the Gulf of Antioch in the north to Dor (Tantûra) and Jaffa in the south. The name is of uncertain origin, but has been connected with the Fenkhu of the Egyptian inscriptions, who seem to have occupied the same district, as well as with the Greek φοίνιος, "ruddy." Agênôr, the eponym of the Phœnicians, is probably a Greek corruption of Khna, i.e. Canaan, written Kinakhkhi in the Tel el-Amarna texts. The Phœnicians were Semites, and their language was practically the same as Hebrew, wh. is called "the language of Canaan" in Is. 19.[18]. According to their own traditions they had come from the Persian Gulf (Hdt. i. 1, vii. 89) where the islands of Tyros (Tylos) and Arados were held to be the motherlands of Tyre and Arvad (Strab. xvi. p. 1090). Pompeius Trogus (Justin. xviii. 3, 2–3) brought them from "the Syrian (v.l. Assyrian) lake" in consequence of an earthquake. The chief cities of Phœnicia were Arvad (Ruâd), whose fleet is already mentioned in the Tel el-Amarna tablets; Gebal or Byblos (Jebail), the seat of the governor of Phœnicia in the Tel el-Amarna period, and of the worship of the goddess Baaltis; Berytus (Beyrout), past wh. ran the military road to the north, and, above all, Sidon (Saida, "Fishing-town"), the "first-born" of Canaan (Gn. 10.[15]), and Tyre (Ṣûr, "the Rock"), built on an island at a short distance from the mainland. To the south was Akku or Accho (Acre), whose importance belongs to post-Biblical times.

According to Herodotus (ii. 44) the Temple of Melkarth at Tyre was built c. B.C. 2750. Canaan was at the time dependent on Babylonia, "the land of the Amorites," as it was called, having been made a province of the Babylonian empire by Sargon of Akkad (B.C. 3800), and the Babylonian rule enforced there whenever the Babylonian kings were strong enough to do so. Khammu-rabi (Amraphel) and his successors were kings of "the land of the Amorites" as well as of Babylonia, and Babylonian culture was thus introduced into the West, including the cuneiform script and literature, and the theology and cosmology of Babylonia. After the conquest of Babylonia by the Kassites (B.C. 1780) and the rise of the 18th Egyptian dynasty (B.C. 1580) Canaan became a province of Egypt (brother of Mizraim, Gn. 10.[6]), native governors and "kings" under Egyptian control being set over its cities. Tyre was already renowned for its wealth. With the decay of the Egyptian empire (B.C. 1380) the Phœnician states recovered their independence, and were able to devote themselves to foreign trade. The sterile hills at their back and the advance of the Israelites forced them to the sea, and the murex of the Mediterranean coasts yielded them the purple dye wh. poured wealth into their coffers and led on to other branches of trade. Factories wh. developed into colonies were planted in various localities, and the fall of the sea-power of the Kretan princes opened the way to the western Mediterranean. Phœnician ships sailed as far as the Straits of Gibraltar, if not farther, and eventually carried back to the East the tin of Spain and Britain. Under Hiram I., the son of Abibal and contemporary of David and Solomon, Tyre became the leading Phœnician state; its fortifications were strengthened and the temples of Melkarth and Ashtoreth rebuilt. Cedar from the Lebanon was sent to his ally Solomon for the royal buildings at Jerusalem, as well as pilots and sailors for the trading vessels built by the Jewish king in the Gulf of Aqaba. Phœnician workmen were employed in the construction and decoration of the Jewish Temple, the plan of wh. resembled that of a Phœnician sanctuary, like the two pillars in the temple porch (1 K. 7.[21]) analogues of wh. stood in the temple of Melkarth at Tyre (Hdt. ii. 44). Hiram's sixth successor was Eth-baal I., the priest of Ashtoreth, who gained the throne by murder, and whose daughter Jezebel was married to Ahab. As he is called "king of the Sidonians" in 1 K. 16.[31], Sidon must at this time have been under the rule of Tyre. We find both cities paying tribute to the Assyrian king, Assur-nazir-pal, in B.C. 870. Half a century later, in the seventh year of Pygmalion (Pumai-yaton), Carthage is said to have been founded (B.C. 826 or 813). Under Hiram II. and Metenna (Matgenus) Tyre was made tributary to Tiglath-pileser IV. of Assyria, Metenna paying him as much as 150 talents of gold (about £400,000). The next Tyrian king, Elulæus, revolted, and was attacked by Shalmaneser IV., who besieged Tyre, but in vain. Elulæus, called king of Sidon by the Assyrians, was again attacked by Sennacherib in his campaign against Hezekiah (B.C. 701); the Tyrian king fled to Cyprus, but Tyre remained untaken, tho' an Assyrian nominee, Eth-baal, was made king of Sidon, and Arvad and Gebal submitted to the Assyrian invader. In B.C. 678 Sidon rebelled, but was razed to the ground by Esar-haddon, and a new Sidon built in its place. Seven years later Baal I. of Tyre was detected plotting with Taharka of Egypt; he was, however, pardoned, as he was again some years afterwards by Assur-bani-pal for a similar offence. Tyre had profited by the destruction of Sidon, and in B.C. 587 the wealthy city was besieged by Nebuchadrezzar. In B.C. 574 its king Eth-baal II. surrendered, and Baal II. was appointed in his place. Baal was accused of tyranny; in B.C. 564, accordingly, royalty was abolished, and the government handed over to suffetes or "judges." But they, too, were soon abolished, and monarchy was re-established. Under Azelmie, B.C. 332, Tyre was taken and burnt by Alexander the Great, who had connected the island-city with the mainland by a mole 60 yds. wide and ¼ mile long. Sidon had already been ruined in B.C. 351 after a revolt from the Persians, and Straton of Arvad surrendered without resistance to the Greeks.

Phœnician religion was a personified nature-worship. The supreme god was Baal, "the Lord," who revealed himself in the sun. But the forms of Baal—the Baalim of Jg. 2.[11]; 1 S. 7.[4]—were multitudinous. Every city and high place had its local Baal, and there were, as well, Baalim of the mountains and rivers. By the side of Baal stood his female counterpart, Baaltis of Gebal. But the female element in nature was usually adored under the name of Ashtoreth (originally the Babylonian Istar) or of Ashêrah (also of Babylonian origin), who was symbolised by a cone of stone or the stump of a tree. The local Ashtaroth (Jg. 2.[13]; 1 S. 7.[4]) were as numerous as the Baalim. Among the latter must be included the Kabiri, together with such special forms of the deity as Moloch or Melkarth ("King of the City"), the supreme Baal of Tyre. Nature is cruel as well as beneficent, and the Baalim and Ashtaroth accordingly demanded the sacrifice of what was best and dearest. The first-born was burnt or otherwise put to death in honour of Baal, and prostitution was practised in the name of Ashtoreth. In later times, however, the sacrificial tariffs of Carthage and Marseilles show that the human sacrifice was replaced by an animal (איל, wh. was probably the ram). A meal-offering was prescribed as well as the sacrifice. The temples were served by a hierarchy of priests, and contained altars and (like the temples of Babylonia) " seas " for purification. Some of them also contained stones or " bethels," consecrated with oil and believed to be habitations of the deity. These were survivals from a primitive period before the introduction of Babylonian culture. To the latter was due the conception of Baal as a divine king of human form who was married and had children like the human king, while angel-messengers carried his commands to earth. From Babylonia, moreover, came the cult of Tammuz or Adonis, wh. was localised at Gebal, where the women mourned the untimely death of the god, slain by the heats of summer. From the inscription on the sarcophagus of Eshmun-azar, king of Sidon, we learn that the Phœnicians looked forward to a life hereafter among the Rephaim or Shades. Their cosmology, so far as we know it, was borrowed from Babylonia. Their art also was unoriginal, and was a mixture of Egyptian and Babylonian elements. Their gift to the world, however, was the alphabet, wh. was adopted and improved by the Greeks. The origin of the alphabet is still unknown, and its use cannot be traced further back than the Davidic age, when the Tyrian annals, translated into Greek by Menander, began. Before that period the cuneiform script and Assyrian language were employed. The Phœnicians, moreover, were the pioneers of maritime trade as well as of colonisation. They settled in Cyprus (Kittim) at an early date, and worked the gold-mines of Thasos off the coast of Thrace. At a later time colonies were planted by them in Sicily, Sardinia, and Spain, where Gades (Cadiz) is said to have been founded before B.C. 1100, and they had marts at Memphis and (later) at Marseilles. The foundation of their colony, Utica, on the coast of Africa, is placed 287 years before that of Carthage by Aristotle. Of all these colonies Carthage was the most important. It developed a republican government, under " judges " and a senate wh. was itself controlled by a national assembly; but it never ceased to remember that it was bound to its mother-city Tyre by the ties of religion and sentiment.

PHŒNIX, AV. PHENICE. The name is derived from the word for palm tree. This tree was indigenous to the island of Crete. Phœnix was a harbour on the S. coast of the island (see Chart, p. 111). The ship bearing St. Paul was lying in the roads at FAIR HAVENS. Winter was coming on, and it was not thought desirable to stay there if a more protected harbour could be reached. The sailors thought they might venture to sail for Phœnix, where the needed shelter might be found. St. Paul's mind was that they should remain, but, naturally, the sailors had their way. Sailing close in shore, the vessel would be safe from northerly winds, shielded by the mountains. They must have attempted to cross a bit of open sea, where the ship was caught by the north wind or north-east wind, and swept away beyond all their reckoning. This most likely happened to them in the gulf of Messaria, which curves inland to the west of Fair Havens. A point still further west must therefore have been their objective (Ac. 27.[9ff.]). The mod. Lutro is now generally accepted as the place aimed at by the sailors. It is the only place on the S. coast of Crete with an anchorage which would afford safe winter quarters for a vessel as large as that of which they were in charge. This also agrees with the situation indicated by Strabo. He describes Phœnix as a large and prosperous settlement on an isthmus. By isthmus he probably meant the narrowest part of the island, which is just here. The harbour is formed by a narrow isthmus which stretches out to the south, broadening at its extremity. The eastern bay is the most safe and commodious, and is probably the one intended: altho' the name Finika attaches to the bay on the west. The ancient authorities place Phœnix in the neighbourhood of Aradena—the mod. Aradhena, about a mile from Lutro—and Anopolis, the mod. ruin Anapolis, about two miles north of Lutro.

St. Luke's description of the harbour has occasioned some difficulty: AV. " lieth toward the south-west and north-west "; RV. " looking north-east and south-east." This would lead us to expect a harbour opening to the south-west, while that of Lutro opens to the south-east. RV. takes the words as referring to the direction in which the south-west and north-west winds blow. The confusion may be due to some misunderstanding or misreporting of the technical terms then in use among the sailors.

PHRYGIA, the country of the Phrygians, a warlike tribe or group of tribes which in the second millennium B.C. crossed the Hellespont from Western Thrace and settled in Asia Minor. Phrygian territory extended originally from the coast of Troas in the NE. over a large part of the central plateau of Asia Minor, eastwards as far as the river Halys, and southwards to the Pisidian offshoots of the Taurus range. A subsequent invasion of Thracian tribes cut the original Phrygia in two, the Troad or Hellespontine Phrygia (Phr. parva) being separated from the inland territory, which henceforward was called Great Phrygia (Phr. magna). Phrygia was still further curtailed in the third cent. B.C., when its north-eastern portion was allotted by Attalos I. of Pergamos to the Gaulish tribes which had entered Asia Minor some fifty years before. In spite of its narrowing boundaries it was still, however, a country of very considerable extent, and in Roman times it formed a part of the two provinces, Asia and Galatia. The precise locality indicated by "Phrygia" (or "Phrygian territory") in Ac. 16.[6], 18.[23], is disputed (see art. GALATIA). Churches were planted by St. Paul in Galatic Phrygia (Antioch of Pisidia and Iconium) and by disciples of St. Paul (Timothy, Epaphras, and others) in Asian Phrygia. The earliest seat of Christianity in Asian Phrygia was the Lycos valley with its three famous churches of Laodicea, Colossæ, and Hierapolis, and from this centre, reputed to be the scene of the later labours of the apostle John and of Philip (whether the apostle or the deacon is not agreed), the Christian faith spread rapidly over Phrygia to the NE. and found a congenial home, especially in Eumeneia and Apameia. It is extremely probable that Eumeneia became a city almost entirely Christian ("the first Christian city"—Ramsay), and that it was destroyed on that account in the persecution of Diocletian in the beginning of the fourth century. The Christian inscriptions of Phrygia reveal a type of Christian life which was accommodating and conciliatory, so that so far as the externals of life were concerned there was little to distinguish the Christians from their pagan neighbours. When a man became a Christian "he lived in externals much as before; he observed the same laws of politeness in society; his house, his surroundings, continued much the same; he kept up the same family names, and when he died his grave, his tombstone, and his epitaph were in the ordinary style" (Ramsay). Under the Seleucid kings great numbers of Jews were settled in southern Phrygia in the third cent. B.C., and in Ac. 2.[10] Phrygia is mentioned as the home of Jews and proselytes who witnessed the marvel at Pentecost. The Jews of Phrygia were less strict than those of Palestine; Timothy was the uncircumcised son of a Jewess whose husband was a Greek (Ac. 16.[1-3]). The prevalence of this enlightened Judaism was undoubtedly one factor which led to the rapid spread of Christianity in Phrygia. A. F. FINDLAY.

PHUT (Gn. 10.[6]; Ek. 27.[10]), PUT (1 Ch. 1.[8]; Na. 3.[9]). So AV., but RV. has PUT throughout, as also in Jr. 46.[9]; Ek. 30.[5], 38.[5], where AV. has Libyans or Libya. In the ethnico-genealogical tables of Genesis and Chronicles P. is associated with Egypt; he is said to be the son of Ham and the brother of CUSH, MIZRAIM, and CANAAN. In the prophetic passages P. is mentioned as supplying warriors for Tyre (Ek. 27.[10]) along with PERSIA (Pāraṣ, Heb.) and LUD. Along with Ethiopia (Heb. Kūsh), Egypt Heb. Mitzraim), and the LUBIM, P. is the helper of NO-AMON, the capital of Upper Egypt. A further association with Egypt is shown by the fact that in Ezekiel P. is joined with Lud, for in Genesis (10.[13]) Mizraim is said to "beget Ludim." There is considerable question as to the locality of P. Josephus (Ant. I. vi. 2) says that "Phūtes founded (ἔκτισε) Libya, and called the inhabitants Phūtoi after his own name; there is a river in the country of the Moors having this very name." The LXX has Phoud in Genesis and Chronicles, but in the prophets Libues: Jerome follows the LXX in each case. The great strides that Egyptology has made during last century and the present place the problem in a new light, and furnish new possibilities of solution. The transliteration of the LXX into Phoud and their tr. into "Libyans" suggest that P. stands for Phaiat: etymologically it is, however, difficult to account for the ṭ. Punt has been suggested: it was famous in the days of queen Hatasu (Hatshepset), and appears to have been tributary to Egypt during the 18th and 19th dynasties. It is difficult to understand how in the reign of Hophra P. cd. be said to be a helper of NO-AMON; and as difficult to understand Punt supplying mercenaries to Tyre. The utmost that we can be certain about is that P. was an African nation: their employment by the Tyrians wd. rather suggest that they dwelt on the Mediterranean coast, not impossibly west of Cyrene, where the Tyrian colony Carthage flourished.

PHUVAH. See PUAH.

PHYGELUS, AV. PHYGELLUS, mentioned along with Hermogenes as having turned away from St. Paul, along with "all that are in Asia" (2 Tm. 1.[15]). The special mention of these two may mean that their desertion of the apostle took place in Rome. If it were at some moment of trial, when their fidelity would have comforted him, that might furnish a reason for recording their faithlessness.

PHYLACTERIES. The name phylactery (φυλακτήριον) is common in the NT., but is found neither in the OT. nor in Jos. (though he refers to their use Ant. IV. viii. 13). By the Jews they are named תְּפִלִּין (tephillin), "prayer thongs" or "prayer fillets." The wearing of them is based on Ex. 13.[9]; Dt. 6.[8], 11.[18], which passages the majority of Jews understand literally, and only by such interpretation can they be justified. The Karaites do not use them, and declare that these verses are merely a fig. command to remember the Lord, citing as parallels Pr. 3.[3], 6.[21]; SS. 8.[6]. Along with the Mĕzūzāh (door-post sign) and the Tzītzith (fringes) the Jew regards them as making up three signs to remind him continually of his duty to God. As with all other institutions of Judaism, the rabbis sought in their oral law to carry back that of P. in all their detail to Moses. In the Tlm. we read that "square phylacteries were enjoined on Moses as a positive command at Sinai, as also that the parchment on wh. the portions of Scrip. were written shd. be tied with the hair of clean animals; and that the boxes containing them shd. be sewed with the gut of such," and again that "the signs upon the P. were appointed to Moses at Sinai."

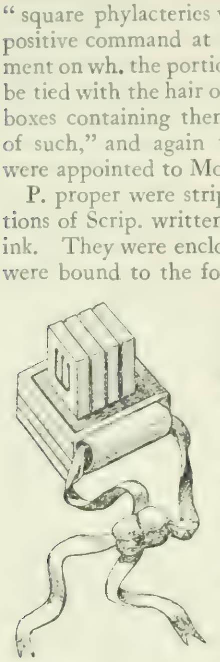
P. proper were strips of parchment, having portions of Scrip. written upon them with a prepared ink. They were enclosed in cases, wh. when in use were bound to the forehead and to the upper left arm by thongs. In the case of that used on the head, the four portions of the Law—Ex. $13.^{2-10,\ 11-16}$; Dt. $6.^{4-9,\ 13-23}$, were written in Heb. on four separate pieces of parchment, rolled up, and enclosed in the four compartments of a box made of calf skin and sewed to a stiff piece of leather. This box was in the form of a cube having an edge of $1\frac{1}{4}$ inches. It had the Heb. letter shin, ש, with three heads on its right side, and a similar letter with four heads on its left side—thus together making up the sacred number seven. The box for the arm was of a similar size and form, but had no letters outside, and only one compartment inside, in wh. was placed one piece of parchment having the same four passages written in four columns of seven lines each. The leather thongs—of one finger breadth—were $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubits long. That on the forehead was placed with its upper edge where the hair commences, and was tied behind the head. The other had a loop through wh. the whole arm was passed, and then encircled by the thong seven times, thus forming two shins corrspdg. to those impressed on the sides of the box for the forehead. The knots by which the P. are bound to the head and the arm form the letters Daleth and Yod, thus in each case completing, with the Shin, the sacred name of Shaddai—the Almighty, but wh. the Jews interpret fm. its initial letters, "The Guardian of the houses of Israel."



PHYLACTERY

The wearing of P. was incumbent on every Jew of over thirteen, at wh. age he became a "son of the Law," and their use was inculcated by precepts and penalties. These sayings of the rabbis are found in the Tlm.: "He that wears P. secures length of days" (proof-text, Is. $38.^{16}$). "A Jew is excommunicated fm. heaven who has no P. on his head and none on his arm." "Israelites who have transgressed by neglecting P. will descend into Gehenna, where they will undergo their judicial sentence for twelve months, after wh. their bodies will be annihilated and their souls will be consumed by a fire, whose cinders a wind will scatter beneath the feet of the righteous." Mourners only, during their period of mourning, were exempted from their use.

They were worn at the times of the morning prayer, at the beginning of wh. each was put on to the repetition of a thanksgiving for their use. On Sabbaths and feast days, except Purim, they were not used. The Pharisees are said to have worn them at all times of the day, and this was also done and is still the practice with pious Jews engaged in the study of the Law, esp. in the holy cities of Palestine, but the common people use them only at prayer.

The making broad of the P. meant the enlarging of the case and the making prominent of the letters upon it (Mw. $23.^{5}$). The parchments themselves were of a fixed size.

There can be little doubt that P. in their origin were intended to be a kind of amulet, or, as Scaliger has suggested, they may have been intended partly to supersede amulets. The word itself really means in Greek a "safeguard" or "protection," while the number seven and the name of God bring them into line with mod. Oriental charms. Origen in the Hexapla used the word P. generally for the amulets of Ek. $13.^{18}$. In the Tlm. too it is said they were meant "to drive away evil spts.," while the Tg. on SS. $8.^{3}$ understands that "they have power to keep off evil demons." Still, on the other hand, we find among other peoples also a mark or sign on the head as a token of allegiance to their deity (Herod. ii. 113).

PHYSICIAN. See DISEASES AND REMEDIES.

PI-BESETH (Ek. $30.^{17}$), a city in Lower Egypt, on the W. bank of the Pelusiac or E. branch of the Nile. It is threatened with destruction in the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar. In hieroglyphic its name is written Bahest or Bast: the syllable Pi is really the article; the Greek name was Bubastis. It probably was a considerable commercial centre under the 18th and 19th dynasties. It is now represented by extensive ruins near the railway station of Zag-a-zig called Tell-Basṭa. It was the seat of the worship of the cat goddess Bast, usually figured as a female with a cat's head. P. was the capital of a nome or district to wh. it gave the name. The 22nd dynasty, the founder of wh. was Sheshonq (Shishak, 1 K. $14.^{25-28}$), is called Bubastite because they made it their capital. Near the ruins there was discovered a quarter of a century ago a cat cemetery fm. wh. ship-loads of cat mummies were exported for manure.

PICTURE. (1) Maskīth (Nu. $33.^{52}$). In this passage RV. trs. "figured stones." They were evidently objects associated with idolatrous worship. In Pr. $25.^{11}$, "apples of gold in pictures of silver," RV. trs. "baskets of silver," giving in the margin "filigree work." (2) Sĕkīyyāh (Is. $2.^{16}$). Here, for "all pleasant pictures," RV. trs. "all pleasant imagery," and gives "watch-towers" in the margin. The meaning of the word is very doubtful.

In Egypt and Babylon painting and sculpture were greatly cultivated. Their development in Israel was barred by the Second Commandment. The Moslems have the same antipathy, especially to representations of the human figure. Their ignorant fanaticism has led at times to the destruction of valuable remains from antiquity, e.g. in the tombs at Marissa. The natural desire for "pictures" is, however, gratified by the Jews in Palestine in a peculiar way. Verses of the Hebrew Scriptures—sometimes a whole book, as e.g. the Psalms—are arranged and printed so as to form a representation of the object desired. The present writer possesses a "picture" of this kind, made for him by a Jewish friend in Tiberias, in which the whole of the book of Psalms is used.

PIETY. This word originally signified reverence for God, for friends, for parents, and for fatherland. It came to describe dutiful conduct, and now is almost restricted to piety towards God. In 1 Tm. 5.[4] (where alone it occurs in EV.) it trs. the Greek eusebein, "to show reverence," and suits the application to the household better than the literal rendering.

PIGEON. See Dove.

PI-HAHIROTH, the last station of the Israelites before they crossed the Red Sea. It is said to be "between Migdol and the Sea over against Baal-zephon" (Ex. 14.[2, 9]; Nu. 33.[7, 8]). The place has not been identified. The fact that Pi means in Heb. "the mouth of," and that ha is the Heb. article, led Hebraists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries to endeavour to find the meaning of the last syllables in Heb. also; finding in Rabbinic that ḥurath meant "a cavity," they extended its meaning, and explained P. as "the mouth of the defiles." Better knowledge has led to seeking for the meaning in Egyptian. Jablonsky thought it represented pi-ahiroth, "the place of sedges." As in Exodus the LXX tr. apenanti epauleos, "before the country house," Dr. Sayce recalled that there was a farm (achu) held by Pharaoh near Thukut (Succoth). Naville identifies it with Pi Qerhet, "the place of the goddess Qerhet"; objections both etymological and geographical are brought against this. P. must meantime be looked upon as unidentified.

PILATE, PONTIUS, governor (Mw. 27.[2], &c.), or, more correctly, procurator (Gr. epitrōpos, Jos. Ant. XX. vi. 2, &c.) of Judæa, A.D. 26–36. The name covered not only Judæa proper, but also Samaria and Idumæa, a district practically coterminous with the kingdom of Archelaus, at whose death, A.D. 6, it became an imperial province. Of Pilate's origin nothing is known. His name may be derived from pileus, the cap worn by manumitted slaves, in which case Pilate may have been a freedman: or it may be derived from Pilum or Pilo. He was responsible for the efficient working of the fiscal arrangements, for order, and good government. He was the chief military and judicial authority in the province, his power in the latter capacity being limited only by the right of Roman citizens to appeal against his judgments to the emperor. His official seat was the palace in Cæsarea; but it was thought expedient that the procurator should be in Jerusalem at the great feasts; and then his residence was in the palace of Herod (see PRÆTORIUM). In accordance with Roman practice, which respected as far as possible the customs, and even the prejudices of subject peoples, the SANHEDRIN continued to exercise many judicial functions. Death sentences, however, had to be ratified by the procurator.

The character of Pilate has been painted in very dark colours. Philo (Leg. ad Caium) represents Agrippa I. in his letter to Caligula describing Pilate as "inflexible, merciless, and obstinate," as guilty of "corruption, violence, robbery, ill-usage," &c. He did indeed outrage Jewish susceptibilities on more than one occasion. Ignoring a well-known rule, he roused deep resentment by introducing Roman standards into Jerusalem, with the images of the emperor (Ant. XVIII. iii. 1, &c.), and again by hanging in the palace at Jerusalem gilded shields inscribed with the emperor's name (Philo, op. cit. 38). On each occasion (on the second by order of the emperor himself) he was obliged to withdraw the obnoxious objects. With his soldiers he quelled a disturbance made because he used certain treasure from the Temple to build aqueducts to Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iii. 2). The incident referred to in Lk. 13.[1] is not otherwise known. An impostor called a gathering of Samaritans at Mt. Gerizim, promising to show them the sacred vessels said to have been hidden there by Moses. Pilate suppressed this movement with violence, and Vitellius, legate of Syria, sent him to Rome to meet accusations made against him in consequence (ib. XVIII. iv. 1). Tiberius died before his arrival, and of Pilate's fate nothing is known with certainty.

That Pilate made mistakes is clear enough; but his long tenure of office is proof in itself that his administration was on the whole reasonable and successful. But for his connection with the trial of Jesus his name might have been forgotten. The Sanhedrin's death-sentence of necessity brought Jesus before the procurator. Convinced of His innocence, Pilate sought to do justice, and to deliver Him out of their hands. His vacillation and weakness probably arose from his desire to avoid another collision with Jewish fanaticism in view of past experience. This was sufficient to overcome superstitious fears awakened by the claim of Jesus (Jn. 19.[7ff.]) and the warning of his wife (Mw. 27.[19]); and a suggestion that favour to one professing to be a king would be treason to Cæsar, finally decided him to take responsibility for a crime which he had vainly sought to prevent.

The legends as to Pilate's end are, as usual, contradictory. He is made to commit suicide (Eusebius, HE. ii. 7; Mors Pilati). The Tiber rejected his body; it was sent to the Rhone, and, finally, to a lake on Mount Pilatus, near Lucerne (Müller, Pontius Pilatus, 82f.). Others make him and his wife repent, a heavenly voice assuring them of pardon.

According to tradition Pilate's wife was called Claudia Procula, or Procla. She is said to have been a Jewish proselyte (Gospel of Nicodemus, 2.), and subsequently to have become a Christian. She had probably heard something of the character and work of Jesus, and to this may be attributed the inspiration of her dream. In the Greek Church she is commemorated as a saint on Oct. 27. It has also been suggested that she may be the Claudia mentioned in 2 Tm. 4.[21].

List of Lit. will be found in Müller, Pontius Pilatus, der fünfte Procurator von Judæa.

PILDASH, son of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gn. 22.[22]).

PILEHA, RV. PILHA, one who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ne. 10.[24]).

PILGRIMAGE (Heb. māgōr, lit. "sojourning") is applied to the space of human life, i.e. the time of sojourning on earth (Gn. 47.[9], &c.).

PILLAR. See Stone.

PILLAR, PLAIN OF THE (Jg. 9.[6]). We must here read with RV. "terebinth of the pillar." For the "pillar" see Stone. The solitary terebinth often marked a sanctuary, the tree in some cases being sacred as well as the pillar.

PILLOW. The Heb. word kĕbīr denotes something twined or interwoven. In 1 S. 19.[13, 16] possibly some sort of quilt or network is intended. Keṣeth, used only in the plural (Ek. 13.[18, 20]), is lit. a band or fillet. In this passage prob. some kind of charm or amulet is meant. In new Heb. the word denotes "cushion" or "bolster." Mĕra'ăshōth (Gn. 28.[11-18]): read here with RV. "under his head." The Greek proskephalaion (Mk. 4.[38]) is the cushion (RV.) stuffed with straw, cotton, &c., used to this day by the rowers, and also placed for passengers in the boats on the Sea of Galilee. The illustration shows the form of "pillow" or head-rest common in the ancient Orient.

Pillows of Alabaster

PINE-TREE. (1) 'Ētz shemen (Ne. 8.[15]); RV. here trs. "wild olive" (see Oil Tree). (2) Tidhār (Is. 41.[19], 60.[13]). There is no satisfactory clue to the tree here intended. The plane, the elm, and the pine have all been suggested, but without convincing reason. Dr. Post (HDB. s.v.) proposes simply to transliterate the word and call it the "tidhar." This appears the wiser course meantime.

PINNACLE, the part of the Temple to which the devil is represented as taking Jesus, and inviting Him to cast Himself down, in order to demonstrate His Divine Sonship (Mw. 4.[5]; Lk. 4.[9]). Some particular point is meant, as the phrase is τὸ πτερύγιον, "the pinnacle," lit. "little wing," which may stand for turret or battlement, or perhaps for a pointed roof. The most probable point would be the SE. corner of the Temple buildings, from the top of which there was a sheer drop of 400 cubits into the valley below (Jos. Ant. XV. xi. 5; XX. ix. 7). According to Eusebius, "the pinnacle" was associated with the martyrdom of St. James, he having been hurled from it into the depths of the vale (HE. ii. 23).

PINON, one of the "dukes" or phylarchs of Edom (Gn. 36.[41]; 1 Ch. 1.[52]), perhaps identical with Punon of Nu. 33.[42f.]

PIPE. See Music.

PIRAM, the Amorite king of Jarmuth, defeated, with his allies, by Joshua in the battle at Gibeon (Jo. 10.[3]). With them he fled for refuge to the cave at Makkedah, whence by Joshua's orders they were brought out and hanged (10.[27]).

PIRATHON, the home and burying-place of Abdon the Pirathonite, one of the minor judges (Jg. 12.[13ff.]); the home also of Benaiah. It was in the territory of Ephraim, possibly in a district formerly held by the Amalekites. It may be the mod. Fer'atā, six miles SW. of Nāblus; or Fer'on, fifteen miles W. of Nāblus.

PISGAH, a mountain on the east of the Jordan, apparently part of the Nebo range. In Dt. 3.[27], &c., it is named as the height from which Moses was permitted to see the land of promise before he died. Elsewhere he is said to have stood on Mt. Nebo (Dt. 32.[49], &c.). Pisgah is perhaps to be identified with the height of Siāghah (see Nebo). Some (e.g. Buhl, GAP. 122; Gray, Numbers, 292) think Pisgah a general name for the range in which the plateau terminates to the W., the "head" or "top of Pisgah" being Mount Nebo. Hither Balak brought Balaam (Nu. 23.[14]). "The field of watchmen" (Tzophīm) points to a place with a wide outlook. The height indicated commands an extensive view, not only over the Arabah and the mountains of Western Palestine, but also over the desert (Nu. 21.[20]). Ashdoth Pisgah (Dt. 3.[17], 4.[49] AV. "springs of P."; Jo. 12.[3]) we should read in each case with RV. "slopes of Pisgah," i.e. the slopes sinking westward.

PISHON, AV. PISON, one of the rivers of Paradise (Gn. 2.[11]). See Eden.

PISIDIA was the name applied to the rough, broken hill country to the west of the Taurus mountains. The freedom-loving people who occupied these wilds were not subdued by the Romans till B.C. 25, when Augustus planted a number of garrison towns throughout the district, with Antioch and Lystra, to which the rank of colony was given, to the north. Pisidia marched with Pamphylia on the south, Lycia on the west, and Phrygia on the north, with a less definite boundary to the east. In St. Paul's time Pisidia was politically included in the province of Galatia. Under Vespasian a large part of the district was attached to Pamphylia. In Ac. 13.[14] for "Antioch of Pisidia" we should read "Pisidian Antioch." That city was not at any time within the boundaries of Pisidia. The epithet "Pisidian" served to distinguish it from other cities bearing the same name. Twice St. Paul passed through Pisidia, once on his way to Antioch from Perga (Ac. 13.[14]), and again on the return journey. Although, as we have seen, the Romans laid a strong hand on the district in B.C. 25, the work of civilisation proceeded slowly. When St. Paul was there the country was in a disturbed condition, and quite possibly the perils of rivers and perils of robbers of which he writes in 2 Cor. 11.[26] may refer to his experiences on these expeditions. He is not said to have preached in Pisidia. But his name, which is found in Kara Baolo (i.e. Paulo), the ruins of Adada, may be due to some ancient belief that he visited this place and perhaps founded the Church there.

PISPAH, son of Jether, or Ithran, of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch. 7.[38]).

PIT is EV. tr. of twelve Heb. and two Greek words. The most common Hebrew word is bōr (Gn. 37.[20], &c.), trd. "cistern" in 2 K. 18.[31], &c., probably its usual meaning. When empty the bōr might be used as a prison (Gn. 40.[15ff.]; Jr. 38.[6], &c.). Bĕ'ēr, from the same root, is the equivalent of the Arabic bī'r, the usual word for "well" (Gn. 16.[14], &c.; Jr. 2.[13] "cistern"; Ps. 55.[23], &c.). Gēb = Arabic jubb, "a hollow with standing water" (2 K. 3.[16]; Jr. 14.[3], &c.). Shaḥath is the hole in which snares are set for wild animals, and so stands for the stratagem of a man's foes (Ps. 7.[15], 57.[6], &c.), and for the grave, into which all men fall at last (Jb. 33.[18ff.], &c.). The Greek bothunos is any trench or hollow in the ground (Mw. 12.[11], 15.[14]; Lk. 6.[39], AV. "ditch," RV. "pit"). Phrear (Lk. 14.[5]; Jn. 4.[11f.]) is the deep shaft of the well, used figuratively in Rv. 9.[1ff.] (see ABYSS). The unguarded mouths of these openings are often a source of considerable danger in the East.

PIT, BOTTOMLESS (Gr. phrear tēs abussou, Rv. 9.[1]). In considering this subject we must remember the emphatic meaning attached in the OT. to both bōr, "a pit," primarily one dug to be a cistern, and shaḥath, "a pit," primarily dug for the capture of a wild animal. In Ps. 28.[1] the Psalmist entreats J". not to be silent to him, lest he "become like them that go down to the pit." So in Ps. 30.[3] the Psalmist thanks J". that He "has brought his soul up fm. the grave; that he shd. not go down to the pit"; in v. 9 of that Ps. "pit" trs. shaḥath. It is said of the murderer, "A man that doeth violence to the blood of any person shall flee to the pit (bōr), let no man stay him." In these cases the "pit" must mean more than merely the "grave" to wh. all mankind are hastening; it has clearly the suggestion of the NT. "gehenna." "The abyss" also has an emphatic meaning; it is used by LXX to tr. tĕhōm in Gn. 1.[2], 7.[11], 8.[2]; Dt. 33.[13]; Jb. 28.[14]; Ps. 104.[6]; Am. 7.[4], &c. In these cases the habitable earth is pictured as an island floating on a mighty abyss of waters. In the passage before us the abyss is one of fire; this island is imagined to be perforated by a pit that goes right down to this measureless ocean of flame. It is, however, closed over, as if by a vast stone such as cover the wells and cisterns in Pal.; this cover is locked. Then the fifth angel sounded and a star fell fm. heaven—an angel—who received "the key of the bottomless pit"; he opened it and "there arose smoke out of the pit as the smoke of a great furnace, and the air was darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit." The picture before the mind of the writer is clearly the eruption of Vesuvius, of wh. he must have heard. This smoke is worse than that of the volcano—it bore only suffocating ashes in its bosom: fm. out of this came locusts, venomous locusts, wh. "had stings in their tails" like scorpions. Ordinary locusts have no king: these have a king—it is "the angel of the bottomless pit" himself, Apollyon, Abaddon, destruction personified. The dimmed, bronze-coloured sky, the faint, sand-laden mist filling the air, so frequent a precursor of a visitation of locusts, may have been in the writer's mind; only worse, as smoke is worse than thin vapour. Whether these locusts symbolise a raid of the Parthian hordes (the description suits in many points; the period, too—five months—is appropriate): or whether the Seer had a vision of a vaster host, of a day distant fm. his by more than half a millennium, bred in the deserts of Arabia, the hosts of Islam: or whether it is the influx of moral and physical evil that John foresaw, we are not in a position to decide. Such is the opening of the bottomless pit and its effects: we next see the closing of it. The 20th chap. of Rv. opens with the account of the descent of an angel having in his hand the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain with wh. the devil is bound; he is shut into the pit, the great cover is rolled back upon the mouth of it and it is sealed, and for a thousand years is Satan bound; then once more is the pit opened, and the great foe of righteousness bursts forth upon the world to ravage it for a little space.

PITCH. The material used to make the Ark watertight was in Heb. called kōpher (Gn. 6.[14]). Ḥēmār was used for cement in the building of Babel (Gn. 11.[3]). It was also employed as a coating of the ark of bulrushes in which Moses was committed to the river (Ex. 2.[3]). Here also zepheth is named, the two words referring probably to the same material in different forms. In Is. 34.[9] the streams are to become zepheth, and the land burning zepheth. There is no doubt that these words all denote bitumen, a substance formed from petroleum "by evaporation and oxidation." It is found abundantly in Mesopotamia. Bitumen wells (Gn. 14.[10], EV. "slime pits") were numerous in the VALE OF SIDDIM. It was called ḥēmār (from the verb ḥāmar, "to boil") because of its bubbling up in liquid or semi-liquid form. It is also found at Ḥasbeiyeh, at the western foot of Hermon. Zepheth corresponds to zift, the Arabic name of bitumen.

PITCHER (Heb. kad, Gn. 24.[15-18]), an earthenware vessel for carrying water. In Palestine women carry them on the head; beginning as little girls with small pitchers, these increase in size till the large jarrah is reached, wh. will contain some four or five gallons. Rebekah seems to have carried her P. on her shoulder, a method followed by Egyptian women sometimes. In the monuments water is represented as carried in a couple of jars suspended fm. a yoke wh. rests on the shoulders, much as water used to be carried by girls in "stoups" in Scotland. The broken fragments of these pitchers, ostraca, were largely used in Egypt to make notes on; many of the Greek and Aramaic inscriptions that have come down to us are written on these.

PITHOM, one of the store cities built by the Israelites for Pharaoh: it is associated with RAAMSES. Herodotus, in his account of the canal of Pharaoh-Necho (ii. 158), mentions that it leaves the Nile above the city of Bubastis, near Patoumos, the Arabian town. This was generally identified with the Pithom of Exodus. The name was considered to be really Pa, "the place of," and Tun. "the god of Truth." This, however, was a mere indication of the region in wh. it might be sought. In the year 1883 M. Naville, recognising that the opinion of scholars was more and more agreeing that Pithom was to be found in the neighbourhood of Tel el-Maskhuta, began excavations. He found the wall of an enclosure round a temple; this wall was very thick, nearly 23 feet across; the space embraced was 55,000 square yards, between 11 and 12 acres. Within this enclosure were found the ruins of the temple, which furnished evidence that it had been erected, not to Tum, but to Atum, the Sun-god. Further investigations in the temple area revealed the ruins of extensive buildings of crude, sun-dried bricks, divided off into rectangular chambers that did not communicate with each other. This proved to be a huge granary such as is so often seen on the wall paintings. This wd. suffice to justify the title "store city." Near by were found ruins of the city. In the Greek inscriptions discovered it was found that the Greek name of the city was Hērōōnpolis. It was independently known that the name of P. had been so altered under the rule of the Ptolemies. In confirmation of this identification it is to be noted that in Gn. 46.[28], where, following the MT., the EV. render, "And he sent Judah before him unto Joseph to 'shew the way before him' (RV.) unto Goshen, and they came into the land of Goshen," the LXX reads, "But he sent Judah before him to Joseph to meet him at Hērōōn polis in the land of Rameses"; when this appears in the Coptic version, wh. was translated fm. the LXX, we find Peithom instead of Hērōōn polis. There a statue of Rameses II. between statues of two forms of the Sun-god, Ra-Harmachis and Atum, indicated a connection between him and the city Pithom wh. is abundantly confirmed by the remains. Although this wd. seem to prove the truth of the common idea that Rameses was the Pharaoh of the Oppression, the unscrupulous way in wh. that monarch assumed to himself the works of his predecessors renders his claim to have founded Pithom anything but certain. A suggestion has been made, wh. is supported by the Greek above quoted, that Raamses, wh. appears as a companion store city, is really the name of the nome or district. Of course Raamses wd. be used by prolepsis, wh. wd. be no more incorrect than to say that Hannibal crossed the Alps into Italy, whereas the portion of what is now called Italy, into wh. he entered fm. the passage of the Alps, was then reckoned Cisalpine Gaul. The place was indicated by the name that wd. be most easily understood by the audience contemplated. The great point gained by this discovery is the determination of the starting-point of the children of Isr. Closely connected with Pithom is Thuku; this with something like certainty can be identified with SUCCOTH (Ex. 12.[37]). The Romans erected a large fortified camp among the ruins of Pithom, and in doing so utilised for their own purposes monuments of antiquity, to the great loss of present-day archæology.

PITHON, grandson of Mephibosheth (Merib-baal), one of the four sons of Micah (1 Ch. 8.[35], 9.[41]).

PLAGUE. See Diseases and Remedies.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT, THE. The ten plagues inflicted upon the Egyptians in order to induce the reluctant Pharaoh to release the Israelites fm. their servitude were all characteristic of the country. (1) The first was the turning of the water of the Nile "into blood," so that the fish died and the water was unfit to drink. (The second version of the account (Ex. 7.[19]), wh. attributes the miracle to Aaron instead of Moses, and makes it include "streams," "rivers," and "ponds" as well as the Nile, is manifestly an interpolation.) Every year at the beginning of the inundation the same phenomenon recurs; the water becomes red as blood, and is for a few days unfit for drinking. In 1904 large quantities of dead fish were afterwards found on the banks. While the water continues red, the Copts are in the habit of drinking water from cisterns or wells. (2) The plague of frogs also recurs every year at the time of the inundation, and so follows closely on the appearance of "the red water." Both plagues are of annual recurrence, and the Egyptian "magicians" therefore had no difficulty in imitating them. (3) The plague of lice is still an ever-present one among the poorer natives, and is worst in the summer months, the period of the inundation. The cleanly habits of the priests and upper classes protected them from it; when, therefore, the "magicians" found themselves covered with lice they recognised in it "the finger" of the Hebrew God. The Heb. word kinnim is translated σκνίφες in LXX; Ex. 8.[18] shows that it cannot mean "mosquitoes." (4) The flies, more especially in the spring, are still an almost intolerable plague, wh. disappears only during the colder winter months. Every Egyptian resident will understand the effect the plague at once had upon the Pharaoh's obstinacy. For the first time a distinction was made between Goshen and the rest of Lower Egypt in the case of it (Ex. 8.[22f.]). The Heb. word, wh. is rendered "dog-flies" in LXX, has no connection with 'ârabh, "to mix." (5) Cattle plague still commits ravages in Egypt in spite of modern quarantine regulations, and the country is but just recovering from an attack wh. practically destroyed all the cattle. (6) Boils are still one of the common diseases of the country. (7) Thunderstorms, accompanied by hail, are infrequent, but when they do occur, especially in Lower Egypt, they are apt to be of exceptional severity, the hail-stones being sometimes as large as pigeons' eggs. The writer of this article has himself seen acres of corn and other crops in the neighbourhood of Cairo destroyed by one of these storms in a single night. However, the damage done by the storm described in Exodus was but partial, since there was still plenty for the locusts to eat (Ex. 10.[5]). The storm would have taken place in the late autumn (Ex. 9.[31f.]). (8) The plague of locusts, wh. is invariably brought by "the east wind," is fortunately not very frequent; since the English occupation of Egypt, there have been only two serious recurrences of it. (9) The plague of darkness was a heightened form of the dust-storms raised by the ḥamasin winds, wh. are common in spring, and wh. produce a "darkness wh. may be felt." (10) The last plague, the death of the first-born, has its parallel in the epidemic of cholera, or, a century ago, of the plague.

It will thus be seen that the ten plagues were all native to Egypt, and are still characteristic of the country. The miraculous element in them consisted in their coming and going at the command of Moses, and their appearance in an intensified form. They must have extended from June or July, when the river turns red, to "the first month" of the Hebrew year, our March. The decisive battle in wh. Meneptah II. overthrew the Libyan and northern invaders who were ravaging the Delta and threatening to destroy Egyptian civilisation took place about April 15, and as it was under cover of the invasion that the Israelites seem to have succeeded in escaping from Egypt (see Exodus), the flight from Goshen would naturally have taken place a few weeks before. The invasion, wh. the Egyptians would have considered the worst of the plagues that had befallen them, is passed over in silence by the Hebrew writer, whose attention is absorbed in the story of the contest between Yahveh of Israel and the deities of Egypt incarnate in the Pharaoh. The account of the plagues, however, shows an intimate acquaintance with Lower Egypt and its peculiarities.

PLAIN. This is the EV. rendering of several Heb. words, which have various shades of meaning. (1) 'Âbēl (Jg. 11.[33]) is "a meadow." It occurs as an element in a number of place-names (see Abel). (2) 'Ēlōn (Gn. 12.[6], &c.). This should always be trd. "oak" or "terebinth" (see Oak). (3) Biq'ah is a wide stretch of level ground between hills (Gn. 11.[2], &c.). It is sometimes rendered "Valley" (which see). It is applied to the plain of Esdraelon (2 Ch. 35.[22], &c., "valley of Megiddo"), and also to the great hollow between the Lebanon ranges (Jo. 11.[17], &c.) where the name persists to this day in the Arabic el-Biqâ'. (4) Kikkār. This is lit. "a round," and so applied to a loaf of bread, from its round shape (1 S. 2.[36], &c.). In Gn. 13.[10], &c., it is used of the floor of the Jordan valley adjoining the Dead Sea. If it is the Heb. kikkār, and not a survival of an ancient name, the meaning of which is lost, it is used in a quite general sense as "circuit," not denoting literal roundness. Certainly the plains north and south of the Dead Sea are in no sense to be so described. In Ne. 12.[28] the word probably indicates the district round Jerusalem. (5) Mīshōr is smooth, level country, as distinguished from rough, mountainous land (Ps. 143.[10], RVm.; Is. 40.[4], RVm.). The land east of the Sea of Galilee, on which Benhadad was defeated, is described as mīshōr (1 K. 20.[23]). The name is applied specifically to the elevated plateau or table-land between the Arnon and Heshbon (Dt. 3.[10], &c.). (6) 'Ărābāh, lit. "desert steppe." It is applied to a desert steppe west of the Dead Sea (in S. Judah), in 1 S. 23.[24], also Ek. 47.[8]; Is. 51.[3], whence the name yām hā-'Ărābāh (Jo. 3.[16])—Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. Wādy hā-'Ărābāh, if the reading is correct (Am. 6.[14]), must be sought on the east of the Dead Sea. As applied to the Jordan valley, see ARABAH. (7) Shĕphēlāh, "lowland," applied specifically to the low hills that run along the western foot of the Judæan mountains, between them and the plain (see SHEPHELAH). It is also used of the low land in the neighbourhood of Dor (Jo. 11.[2]) and of the low land west of Ephraim (v. 16). In NT. the word "plain" occurs only in AV. of Lk. 6.[17], where it trs. the Greek topos pedinos, "a level place" (RV.). Matthew places the scene on a mountain (Mw. 5.[1]) where, naturally, some "level place" would be sought for the convenience of speaker and hearers alike; but hardly what we should call a "plain."

PLAISTER, PLASTER. (1) The art of covering the rough face of wall (Lv. 14.[42f.], &c.) or stones (Dt. 27.[2], &c.) with mortar was practised from ancient times. On the plaster, while still soft, writing might be impressed (Dt. 27.[2f.], &c.). (2) The plaster laid upon the boil of which Hezekiah was dying appears to have been a poultice of figs (Is. 38.[21]; cp. 2 K. 20.[7]).

PLEDGE. The practice of giving loans on pledge—that is, something given by the borrower as security for repayment—is taken for granted by the law. In the code of Ḥammurabi this practiee is assumed to be generally followed, and the relations of debtor and creditor, their mutual obligations, are regulated. So, in the Mosaic law, there is no question of a new institution. The ancient custom is assumed as prevailing, and provisions are introduced to prevent unnecessary hardship in its operation. If the simlāh, the outer garment corresponding to the Arabic 'aba, an outer garment of hair cloth, were taken as a pledge, it had to be returned at sunset (Ex. 22.[26]; Dt. 24.[12]), one of the many uses of this article of clothing being to serve as a covering at night, and poor people often having nothing to take its place. The raiment of a widow might not be taken at all (Dt. 24.[17]). "No man shall take the mill or the upper millstone to pledge: for he taketh a man's life to pledge" (Dt. 24.[6]). The creditor might not enter the debtor's house to select his pledge, but must wait without until it was brought to him (Dt. 24.[10f.]). In Gn. 38.[17] the Heb. word is 'ērābōn, meaning "surety." The phrase "give pledges" (2 K. 18.[23] = Is. 36.[8]) is lit. "exchange pledges" in making a bargain, the "pledge" to be forfeited by the one failing to keep the bargain. In 1 S. 17.[18] the word 'ărubbāh denotes a "token," i.e. something signifying that all was well.

PLEIADES (Heb. kīmāh) appears in Jb. 9.[9], 38.[31]; in Am. 5.[8] AV. trs. "the seven stars," but RV. more consistently renders here also "Pleiades." In all the passages where P. occurs ORION (Kĕsīl) also occurs. From the nearness of these two constellations, if the identification of the one is right, then is the other right also. The Greek myth connects these constellations, regarding the Pleiades as maidens flying fm. the great hunter Orion. It is singular that, though they are always reckoned seven, only six are prominent enough to be visible to ordinary sight: it wd. almost seem as if since the dawn of primitive astronomy some catastrophe had happened by wh. one had been dissipated. The Hebrew name has no reference to the number seven. The root fm. wh. kīmāh comes is not used in Hebrew, but in Arabic kum means "to heap," whence kūmat, "a heap": in Assyrian kimtu means "a family"; either of these terms might have supplied the figure to the mind of the Israelite who first called the group of stars kīmāh. As their rising and setting marked the beginning and end of the period of navigation among the Greeks, it has been suggested that the classic name is derived fm. pleō, "to sail." If "seven" had been the root of the name there wd. have been point in Lockyer's notion that P. wd. more naturally mean Charles's Wain; but the signs of the Zodiac, fm. the fact that it marked the seasons when the different operations of husbandry began, were more studied than any other constellations in the nearer East. The idea that Sirius is meant has really nothing to recommend it.

PLOUGH. The plough used by the peasants in Palestine to-day probably resembles very closely the implement used by the ancients. It is of very simple construction. It consists of the share (sikkah), "a conical, very acuminate shoe of iron, with no flaring portion as in our ploughshares, made hollow to receive the point of the shank (dhakr), wh. is a piece of tough wood, usually oak, about 2 ft. 6 in. long, bent forward below its middle, and sharpened to go into the sikkah; the handle (kâbûsah), a cross-bar of the same tough wood, into which the shank is morticed, and fastened by a wooden pin.

This handle is of a convenient height to be held by the hand of the driver below his waist; the pole (bŭrk), wh. is a hump-backed piece of the same tough wood, morticed at its joint with the shank. To lengthen this out in the proper shape there is attached by a cord to its free extremity the wasl, wh. is a pot-bellied pole with a blunt end deflexed about 6 in. fm. the tip at an angle of about 130 degrees, to get it out of the way of the muzzles of the oxen. Fm. two to three inches behind this angle is morticed into the wasl, at an angle of about 75 degrees, a pin (qoṭrib) about 6 in. long, to receive the ring of the Yoke, and prevent it from slipping" (Dr. G. E. Post in PEFQ. 1891, p. 112). See also Goad.

The plough is usually drawn by oxen; but yokes consisting of an ox and an ass, and even of a camel and an ass, are not uncommon. See Agriculture.

POCHERETH OF ZEBAIM, RV. POCHERETH-HAZZEBAIM, the ancestor of certain of the children of Solomon's servants who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[57]; Ne. 7.[59]). In 1 Es. 5.[34] called "Phacareth."

POETS, POETRY. The most natural beginning for poetry wd. seem to be found in worship. The same feeling wh. led men first to consecrate a set space of ground for the service of deity, and to dignify it with stately buildings, led them to set apart a certain elevated style of speech for the worship of the gods. The sacred dances that accompanied so many of the acts of worship had of necessity a cadenced accompaniment to guide the steps of those engaged. Mere beating of time wd. be monotonous; hence words accompanied the beats, and were measured off in lengths by them in time with the feet of the dancers. The most marked act of worship in primitive times was sacrifice; at such a time the feelings of the worshipper wd. be intensely stirred, and these feelings wd. find expression in praise of him to whom they were offering sacrifice. While pipe and harp accompanied the act of the priest in the sacrifice, words defined the meaning expressed more vaguely in the music. Alike among Jew and Gentile, along with the sacrifice there went a sacrificial feast. When Saul, who had come out in search of his father's asses, is told in Zuph of the sacrifice, he is also told of the feast, as if such a thing were the recognised concomitant of a sacrifice (1 S. 9.[12f.]). At such feasts song was a natural accompaniment; and, if we are to believe Homer, these songs were generally narrative—chanted ballads, in short. But the emotions that usually prompt to verse were themselves regarded as due to the influence of deities; songs of the joy of harvest, war songs and love songs, were alike looked upon as prompted by the god who presided over the emotion. So, too, with the wisdom that expressed itself in the balanced antithesis of proverb or gnomic sentence. Thus we see that all poetry had its origin directly or indirectly in worship. Hebrew poetry, with wh. we have to do here, is no exception; the greater part of the poetry of the Hebrews is devotional—indeed has served as the model of the devotional poetry of all Christian countries.

The Character of Hebrew Poetry.—Besides the books that are recognised as poetic—the Psalms, Job, Lamentations, the Song of Songs, and the gnomic wisdom of the Proverbs—there is Ecclesiastes, with its mixture of prose and verse; there are the Prophets, whose poetry of thought not infrequently bursts the bonds of prose and falls into the free rhythm and cadence of Hebrew verse; besides these there are in the historic books fragments and short compositions that often afford exquisite examples of Hebrew verse. The first thing that strikes one is its predominant lyric character; there are didactic books, but some of these, as Proverbs, while having the forms of verse, can only rarely be regarded as poetic; what of charm they have is more akin to that of wit, than to that produced on the mind by poetry. The Prophets, when they are most poetic, are always lyric, expressing the emotions felt by the individual himself; not describing or narrating; still less arguing; rarely resorting to the dramatic expedient of personification. The lack of narrative or dramatic poetry is a feature that very early strikes the student of Hebrew Literature. Greek Literature begins with the lengthened and elaborate Homeric poems, and next in importance come the Attic dramatists. So it is also with English, French, and German Literature; narrative poetry was the earliest form it assumed. We must, however, in studying Hebrew poetry, always bear in mind that a large part of that poetry has been lost. The reason for the preservation of what has come down to us restricted the kinds of poetry preserved. The Hebrew State existed for its religion; it was merely the expression of that religion in the sphere of politics and history; hence its literature was presented under the same limitations: only what bore on religion was regarded as worthy of preservation. Although no Hebrew epics have been handed down to us, yet two books are referred to as authorities for certain statements, "The Book of Jashar," and "The Book of the Wars of the Lord." The first of these is quoted in Joshua (10.[12-14]): "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon. And the sun stood still and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies." It is quoted again in 2 Samuel (1.[18f.]); fm. this passage it wd. seem that the whole of the lament of David formed part of "The Book of Jashar." Probably, therefore, it gave an account of the principal events in the history of Israel, at least, to the establishment of the kingdom in the Dedication of the Solomonic Temple. Although not named, it is supposed that another quotation fm. the same book is preserved in 1 Kings 8.[12-13]. The passage is evidently a quotation—the two verses cd. be left out without interrupting the sense; a fuller form appears in the LXX, but after v. 53; and there it is said, "Behold, is not this written in the Book of the Song?" As this attribution is unintelligible, it is suggested that we shd. read "Jashar" instead of "Song"; the change only involves the transposition of the first two letters, a transposition wh. is made in the Peshitta of Joshua 10.[13]. From these quotations we learn not only that it was in verse, but also that it included lyrics like David's dirge over Saul and Jonathan. Whether we are to regard this as a composition of David's included by the author of "The Book of Jashar," or as a dirge dramatically composed in David's name, is a question wh. cannot be settled. One wd. be sorry to attribute that beautiful elegy to any other than the "sweet singer of Israel." The other work, "The Book of the Wars of the Lord," is quoted only in Numbers 21.[14, 15]; perhaps also vv. 17, 18, and 27–30. The passages are somewhat difficult to interpret; it is possible there may be some corruption of the text. Much help cannot be got fm. the versions, as the corruption seems to have occurred before the LXX, the earliest of them, was made. In v. 14, instead of "Wherefore it is said in the Book of the Wars of the Lord, 'What He did in the Red Sea and in the brooks of Arnon, and at the stream of the brooks that goeth down to the dwelling of Ar, and lieth upon the border of Moab,'" the LXX has, "Therefore it is written in the book, 'A war of the Lord has set on fire Zōob and all the brooks of Arnon; and He appointed brooks to cause Er to dwell there, and it lies near to the coasts of Moab.'" The differences are too great to be easily explained. It is doubtful whether 27–30 is really part of this book and not of a book of Oracles; yet the style is much the same. The character of "The Book of the Wars of the Lord," and if it is another book, "The Proverbs" also, is like that of "The Book of Jashar"—events narrated by means of lyrics. "The Book of the Wars of the Lord," if different fm. "The Book of Jashar," probably took up an earlier portion of the history. We have a specimen of the kind of thing in "The Song of Deborah" (Jg. 5.). It is a series of lyric outbursts wh. imply a course of events but do not relate them. In 2 Ch. 20. there is a composition wh. has more the characteristics of the ballad or narrative poem; it is elevated prose with verse interspersed: the prose narrative is supplied wh. forms the background to the verse. "The Blessing of Jacob" (Gn. 49.), "The Song of Moses" (Dt. 32.), "The Blessing of Moses" (Dt. 33.). all present the same lyric characteristics. The book of PSALMS not only represents the mass of Heb. poetic Literature, it is more than all the rest of the strictly poetic books put together; it has, moreover, examples of all the approximations wh. Heb. poetry made to other than the lyric form. The 2nd Psalm is dramatic, the 136th represents the lyric narrative, and the 119th represents the gnomic or proverbial. In JOB and the SONG OF SOLOMON we have an approximation to the drama; they are really lyrics dramatically arranged; in Job each interlocutor recites poems, each of the friends follows the others in a fixed, definite order, and between each pair is inserted a poem by Job. The hymn of Wisdom in the 28th chap. is of the nature of an ode, wh. in the Greek drama mt. have been spoken by a chorus; though the Greek chorus has a more direct reference to the action of the play than has the praise of Wisdom in Job. There is more of the dramatic element in the prologue in heaven than elsewhere in the poem. The Song of Songs has more of the movement we expect in a drama, but in it there are no real dialogues any more than in Job: it is a series of lyric love-songs arranged dramatically.

The Forms of Hebrew Poetry.—The first thing to be observed in all poetry is the system of versification. From the relation in wh. poetry stands to music there is necessity for a certain recurrence of features, a certain cyclic movement; and again fm. the connection of music with dancing, these cycles are broken up by beats or accents. Thus in our ordinary octosyllabic verse, we have the couplet marked off by the rhyming syllable; but, further, each line of the couplet has four accented syllables. Among the classic races the place of accent was supplied by quantity; each line was made up of certain groups of syllables called "feet," and named according to the proportion of each found in the given "foot." Attempts have been made to assimilate Hebrew versification to one or other of the methods, but without conspicuous success. It has been maintained that Hebrew verse was essentially dependent on rhyme, fm. the fact that the pronominal suffixes occur with great frequency, that plurals masculine and feminine are formed by syllables with long vowels. As these are always regular, lines have only to end in nouns having the same pronominal suffix, or in nouns of the same gender in the plural, to have the appearance of rhyme. There are, besides, several other grammatical forms that have endings similar to those we have mentioned; thus the terminal syllable of the first pers. sing. pret. of the verb, and that of the const. case of the pl. masc. noun, is the same as the syllable wh. forms the pronominal suffix of the first person sing.; the result is that the number of purely accidental rhymes is very considerable. There are other systems based on the prosody of quantified syllables, and yet others based on accent, that, while having a certain amount of plausibility, yet have to insert such a number of variations and exceptions that they are practically valueless. Many can only be rendered generally valid by a great number of textual emendations, unsupported by anything in the versions. With such freedom of emendation anything cd. be proved. For several centuries Biblical scholars have been occupied with the question of Hebrew poetry. We have also elaborate discussions of the subject by the Rabbins. But, with all the light thrown on the question by the prosody of Arabic and Syriac verse, and by the examples of Babylonian and Assyrian poems that have been handed down on clay tablets, we are still greatly in doubt. That there were lines in Hebrew verse, as in the verse of other languages, is proved by the fact that one form of Hebrew verse was acrostic of the alphabet. These lines are approximately of the same length; it is, however, difficult to fix exactly in what this equality consists. One of the earliest investigators in this field, Bishop Lowth, recognised that the ruling character of the poetry of the Hebrews was parallelism—that is, that a verse in Hebrew poetry consisted of lines in wh. the second either repeated the thought contained in the first, or gave a contrasted thought, or supplied an increment to it. He divided this parallelism as above indicated into three classes: (1) The Synonymous, in wh. the second of the parallel lines repeated the contents of the first in different words, as Ps. 46.[7, 11], "The Lord of Hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge." (2) The Antithetic; in it the second member of the distich represents a thought contrasted with that in the first. This is frequent in Proverbs; e.g. Pr. 11.[23], "The desire of the righteous is only good; the expectation of the wicked is wrath"; or, to take an example fm. the Psalms, "Weeping may endure for a night; but joy cometh in the morning." (3) The Synthetic, that in wh. the second member fills out or continues the idea in the first. An example of this is Ps. 19.[11]: "Moreover by them is Thy servant warned, and in keeping of them is great reward": in this there is neither repetition nor contrast, but the filling out of the idea contained in the first by presenting the advantage of keeping the law of the Lord under another aspect. There is very generally a continuative element in the synonymous class, as it is hardly possible to repeat precisely the same thought in different words. It may be doubted whether there are any absolute synonyms, i.e. words that may in every connection replace each other: the connotation or the usage of one is generally, although perhaps only in a slight degree, different fm. that of the other. In such a case we have to consider the predominant character of the relation. There is frequently an inversion of the parts in the second member—thus monotony is avoided: this elegance, while present in the Heb. original, is sometimes not followed in the EV. An example may be given in wh. the inversion is carried over: thus Ps. 91.[16], "With long life will I satisfy him, and I will shew him my salvation"; here fm. the two verbs being put together the inversion is seen. In some cases, as we have said, this is not carried over; thus in Ps. 97.[11] EV., "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart," the Heb. literally rendered is, "Light is sown for the righteous one, and for those that are upright in heart gladness." This is also an example of another variation in parallelism. Often, instead of repeating in the second member of the parallelism a portion of the first, or devising an equivalent for it, it is simply understood, as Ps. 78.[14], "In the daytime also He led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire": in this second clause "He led them" is understood. It may be noted that in Heb. there is the inversion of parts in the second clause here as in Ps. 97.[11]. Sometimes there is a tristich wh. is formed in various ways—generally one of the members of the distich is split into a distich (Ps. 78.[21]): "Therefore the Lord heard and was wroth; and a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel." Occasionally the third line is a summing up of the two preceding, as, to quote fm. the 78th Psalm already quoted above (v. 49): "He cast upon them the fierceness of His anger; wrath, and indignation, and trouble; a band of angels of evil." Budde (HDB.) has maintained there is an elegiac verse in wh. a long line is followed by a short; however, when we do not find it in Lamentations, save occasionally in chap 3., we may be permitted to doubt its existence as a regularly recognised form of verse. One thing is clear: in Heb. poetry the matter was more important than the form, the thought than the verse; a characteristic wh. has made it possible to translate the Prophets and Psalmists with a minimum loss of meaning.

We have to consider how these lines were linked together into poems. In modern poems, between the line and the poem comes the stanza, but no theory of the many that have been devised seems quite satisfactory. There are several ways in wh. verses succeed each other. One is to repeat as the opening thought of the second verse what had been the closing one of the preceding; this arrangement is found in those Psalms that are called "Songs of Degrees," e.g. Ps. 121.[1, 2]: "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help. My help cometh fm. the Lord, wh. made heaven and earth." Again the second verse may repeat a portion of that wh. precedes, and introduce a change in the other member of the distich; thus in Ps. 118.[8, 9]: "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man. It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes." But the most common way in wh. verses are linked together formally, i.e. irrespective of the sense, is by acrostic. Our acrostics take a name usually, and begin the successive lines of the short poem with the letters that make it up. The Hebrew took only the alphabet, and arranged according to the succession of the letters in it lines wh. presented the general subject of his poem under successive aspects. The most conspicuous example of this is Ps. 119., in wh. each letter begins, not merely each stanza, but each of the eight lines of each stanza; so that there are eight alphabets moving through the Psalm in parallel lines. Another example less conspicuous to the reader of English, because the names of the Heb. letters do not in this case mark the beginning of the stanzas, is Lamentations, chap. 3., in wh. each letter of the alphabet begins three successive lines numbered as verses. There are several of the Psalms wh. have this construction; and Pr. 31.[10-31] forms an alphabet descriptive of the virtuous woman. Another literary device to give unity to a poem and at the same time mark off its divisions is the "refrain." An example of this, in wh. the refrain, "For His mercy endureth for ever," concludes every verse, is Ps. 136.; this refrain also occurs in the first verses of Ps. 118. There are other Psalms in wh. the "refrain" is used, but not with such frequency as in Ps. 136.; thus Pss. 42. and 43., in wh. 42.[5, 11] and 43.[5] are refrain; so too Ps. 46., in wh. vv. 7 and 11 are refrain. In some cases the refrain is imperfect; that is to say, the recurrent phrase is not precisely identical; an instance of this is to be found in Ps. 80., and also in Job 28. Sometimes the "refrain" is not carried through the whole Psalm, as is the case in Ps. 107.; it is also a case where the refrain is modified.

From the large number of musical notes that occur in the Psalms it wd. seem natural to believe that musical necessities played a part in the succession of different parts in a Psalm; therefore that it is lost work to torture brains to find logical connections. It is a feature of the Psalms early noted that, however sadly they may begin, they all but invariably end, if not in joy, at all events in confident faith in God. One of the rules of the Sonata is to end, whatever the beginning or middle may be, joyously. Another characteristic wh. some of the Psalms have in common with the Sonata is that each is made up of three or four parts, wh. follow each other in such a way that one may contrast with that wh. it succeeds. Many of the Psalms have the same feature; thus in the 19th Ps. the first six verses are a description of the heavenly bodies as forming a mighty chorus of praise to the Almighty; the next four are in praise of the Divine law; whereas the last four form an expression of personal experience on the part of the Psalmist. So, too, the 29th Ps.; in it we have first a call to all the deities of the heathen to render praise to JHWH the God of Israel; then there follows the description of the progress of a thunderstorm, wh. is regarded as "the voice of the Lord"; it ends with a doxology, in wh. the features of the storm are utilised to exhibit the glory of JHWH in a more majestic way. A similar succession may be seen in the great thunder-Psalm that forms the third chap. of Habakkuk; it begins with a prayer to God to revive His work; then follows a description of the progress of a thunderstorm, accompanied, as in that described in Ps. 29., by a hurricane, and it ends with a lyrical expression of confidence in God, however adverse circumstances mt. be. The succession in each of these cases is that of feeling, as is always the case with music. In the last example Habakkuk begins fm. depths of longing, almost of despair, before the impending wrath of God; then follows the awe and admiration induced by the tempest; that gives place to confident hope in God. This suits the lyrical character of Hebrew poetry. It is thus clear that only in the most general way can we decide concerning the laws of Hebrew poetry; it was still in the formative stage, before forms had become stereotyped.

POISON stands for two Hebrew words. (1) Ḥēmāh, from yāḥam, "to be hot," signifies "anger" (Dt. 29.[27], &c.); the heat produced by wine (Ho. 7.[5]); and also the venom of poisonous serpents (Dt. 32.[24, 33]; Ps. 58.[4], 140.[3]). It seems to have been used to poison the points of arrows (Jb. 6.[4]). This was a very widespread custom in early times. Pliny speaks of a tribe of Arab pirates who infested the Red Sea, who were armed with poisoned arrows (vi. 34). Sometimes the poisonous juice of certain plants was used for this purpose. The preparation in which the arrow-heads were dipped was called toxicon. It may be taken as evidence of the wide extension of the practice that this word became the name of poison in general. (2) Rōsh, "head," denotes some bitter and poisonous herb; then poison. It is always used figuratively (Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.). It may possibly signify the poppy. Twice it is used of the venom of serpents (Dt. 32.[33]; Jb. 20.[16]). The Greek ios is used figuratively of the mischief wrought by an evil tongue (Rm. 3.[13]; Js. 3.[8]).

The deadly effects of snake poison have always been painfully familiar in Palestine, where venomous serpents are still plentiful. In 2 M. 10.[13] we read that Ptolemeus Macron committed suicide by poisoning himself. The practice of poisoning was common in NT. times among the Romans; but it never seems to have commended itself to the Jews. It is not directly spoken of in Scrip., but there may be an allusion to it in the figure setting forth the protection to be enjoyed by those who believe in the name of Jesus: "They shall take up serpents, and if they shall drink any deadly thing it shall in no wise hurt them" (Mk. 16.[18]).

POLLUX. See Castor.

POMEGRANATES (Heb. rimmōn = Arb. rummān) is the familiar Punica granatum, which grows plentifully in Palestine, both wild and under cultivation (Dt. 8.[8]; Jl. 1.[12], &c.). It is a shrub of ten to fifteen feet high, with dark green foliage, which shows up the scarlet blossoms to perfection. The fruit is shaped like an apple, containing numerous seeds enveloped in a juicy pulp. Some are sweet and rather insipid; others are slightly acid, and are greatly prized. A sort of wine is sometimes made from the fruit (SS. 8.[2]). Pomegranates figure in the ornamentation of the priestly robes (Ex. 28.[33], &c.), and in the carvings in the Temple (1 K. 7.[18], &c.). The beauty of flower and fruit is alluded to in SS.

POMEGRANATE

4.[3, 13], &c. Tannin is extracted from the bark and rind.

POMMEL is AV. tr. of gullāh, lit. "bowl," only in 2 Ch. 4.[12f.] (RV. "bowl"). In 1 K. 7.[41] it is rendered "bowls" in the same connection; where it refers to the bowl- or globe-shaped portion of capitals of the two pillars in the Temple.

POND, POOL. (1) 'Ăgam, a body of water collected in a hollow such as one sees in many parts of Egypt when the inundation subsides. AV. renders "pond" in Ex. 7.[19], 8.[5]; RV. uniformly renders "pool" (Is. 14.[23], &c.). It is to be distinguished from miqweh, a pond into which water is purposely conducted or into which water flows (Gn. 1.[10]; Ex. 7.[19], &c.). (2) Bĕrēkāh. This is properly a tank or reservoir dug or built to store water for irrigation, or to gather water for the supply of towns and cities (2 S. 2.[13], 4.[12]; 2 K. 18.[17], &c.). It corresponds to the Arb. birkeh, which applies also to the large basins in the centre of the courts in Damascus houses. The Greek word is kolumbēthra (Jn. 5.[2], 9.[7]). In Is. 19.[10] we should render with RV. "all they that work for hire shall be grieved in soul."

PONTIUS PILATE. See PILATE.

PONTUS (Gr. πόντος, "sea"). The kingdom of Pontus lay in the NE. of Asia Minor, along the southern shore of the Black Sea. The kingdom was not of ancient standing. Mithridates, a man of great ability, energy, and enterprise, took advantage of the unsettlement prevailing during the years after the death of Alexander the Great to make himself master of a considerable region beyond the Halys, assuming the title of king about B.C. 281. His territory marched on the west with Paphlagonia, on the S. with Cappadocia, and on the E. with Colchis. When conquered by the Romans in B.C. 65, the western part was incorporated in the province of Bithynia-Pontus; the eastern part being continued under native kings. The last of these was Polemon II., to whom Berenice, the great-granddaughter of Herod the Great, was married. The kingdom was finally absorbed by the empire under Nero (A.D. 63), the western part being joined to Galatia, and the eastern to Cappadocia. It is probable that the NT. usage followed the Roman in applying the name Pontus to the province united with Bithynia. From Pontus Jews and proselytes came to the feast at Jerusalem (Ac. 2.[9]). AQUILA is described as a native of Pontus (Ac. 18.[2]). To "sojourners of the dispersion in Pontus," among others, St. Peter addressed his first epistle (1 P. 1.[1]). How, when, and by whom the Gospel was first introduced into Pontus is unknown, but the account given by Pliny in his letter to Trajan (Ep. 96) shows that in his time (A.D. 111–113) Christianity had taken a strong hold of the country. Pliny wished to know how he was to treat the Christians under his jurisdiction, and speaks of men and women of all classes, some of whom had been Christians for about a quarter of a century. Marcion, the famous heresiarch, was a native of Pontus: so also was Aquila, who rendered the OT. into Greek (see Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 196ff.).

POOR. In a purely nomadic or agricultural community the poor are generally few, and poverty does not involve very grievous hardships. But as a more complex social life is developed the poor man becomes the object of commiseration and humanitarian concern. Prosperity is the blessing promised to obedience in OT., and it is clear that on occasions men regarded misfortune and poverty as marks of Divine displeasure. But it was early recognised that living among imperfect men, in a community where obedience to the will of God was far fm. reaching the ideal, one might be overwhelmed by misfortune through no fault of his own. There is therefore no incongruity in the phrase "innocent poor," used by Jeremiah (2.[34]). Under these conditions it could not be assumed that a man was wicked because he was poor. The whole people of Israel belonged to God. The land and all material blessings were His gifts to His people. It could not be right for some to absorb these gifts while "God's poor"—His still, although in poverty—were left to suffer want. Thus a religious value came to be attached to ALMS—gifts made to the poor for love of God.

The law is conceived throughout in a spirit of kindly consideration for the poor (see PLEDGE). For them were to be left the gleanings of field and orchard (Lv. 19.[9f.]; Dt. 24.[19, 21]). They shared the land produce in Sabbatic years (Ex. 23.[11]; Lv. 25.[6]). Usury was forbidden (Lv. 25.[35f.], &c.). No poor man could be held in perpetual bondage (Dt. 15.[12ff.], &c.). Part of the tithes was appointed to the poor (Dt. 14.[28f.], &c.). It was their privilege to share in the entertainments at the Feast of Weeks and at the Feast of Tabernacles (Dt. 16.[11, 14], &c.). Their patrimony could not be permanently alienated (Lv. 25.[25ff.]). In the administration of justice, however, the poor man was to receive no more consideration than the rich. The law was to run with perfect impartiality (Ex. 23.[3]; Lv. 19.[15]).

In NT. the preaching of the Gospel to the poor is one of the signs of the Messianic time (Mw. 11.[5], &c.). The giving of alms to the poor is enjoined and commended (Mw. 19.[21]; Rm. 15.[26]). There is, however, no hint of that glorification of poverty which bulked so largely in later days.

From the Heb. 'ebyōn, "poor," came the name of the Ebionite sect in the early days of Christianity.

POPLAR, Heb. libneh, "white tree" (Gn. 30.[37]), is probably the ordinary white poplar, Populus alba, which is a familiar sight by the water-courses, and also on higher land in the East. It is often planted for shade (Ho. 4.[13]). Post (HDB. s.v.) would identify it with the storax (Arb. lubna), a shrub which sometimes reaches a height of 20 feet.

PORATHA, one of Haman's sons, slain by the Jews at Shushan (Est. 9.[8]).

PORCH. The Heb. 'ūlām occurs only in connection with Solomon's Temple (1 K. 7.[19], &c.), Solomon's Palace (1 K. 7.[8]), and the Temple of Ezekiel's vision (40.[7f.], &c.). The word probably denoted a colonnade, which serves as a forecourt or entrance-hall. In Jg. 3.[23] the word misdĕrōn may denote "a verandah." The meaning is doubtful, but as a derivation of סדר, "to arrange," as in battle order, it suggests a row of pillars supporting a roof. In NT. pulōn, lit. "gateway," is trd. "porch" in Mw. 26.[71] (EV.). Proaulion (Mk. 14.[68]) is "forecourt." A stoa, "porch," or "portico," enclosed the pool of Bethesda (Jn. 5.[2]). The same word is used of Solomon's porch (Jn. 10.[23]; Ac. 3.[11], 5.[12]), a colonnade carrying a roof which ran along the eastern side of the Temple enclosure.

PORCIUS FESTUS. See FESTUS.

PORCUPINE. See BITTERN.

PORT (Ne. 2.[13]) stands for Heb. sha'ar, which in the same verse is translated in the usual way, "gate."

PORTER. In Scripture this word never has the mod. significance, "one who carries burdens." In every case it denotes either "doorkeeper" or "gatekeeper." It occurs often in the books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, of those to whom was entrusted the care of the various gates of the Temple. It is also used of those who keep the gates of a city (2 S. 18.[26]; 2 K. 7.[10, 11]) and the door of a private house (Mk. 13.[34], &c.). This duty might be discharged by a woman (Ac. 12.[13]; cp. Jn. 18.[16f.]). The "porter" of Jn. 10.[3] is the person in charge of the fold where the flock have been gathered for the night. "Doorkeeper" in Ps. 84.[10] is misleading. The phrase is lit. "I had rather lie on the threshold."

POSSESSION. See DISEASES AND REMEDIES, p. 140.

POST. (1) Several Heb. words are so trd., all meaning "doorpost" (1 K. 6.[33], RVm.; Is. 6.[4]; 2 Ch. 3.[7], &c.). Mĕzūzāh (Ex. 12.[7], &c.) was later applied to the little tin case nailed to the doorpost, containing the words of Dt. 6.[4-9], 11.[13-21], written on a slip of parchment. Each one who enters touches the mĕzūzāh with his fingers and raises them to his lips. The doorposts were sprinkled with the blood of the paschal lamb (Ex. 12.[7], &c.). An awl put through a servant's ear at the doorpost marked him for perpetual service (Ex. 21.[6]). In the Orient sacred ideas have always gathered round the entrance to the house (see THRESHOLD). The doorposts of the Temple were of native olive wood (1 K. 6.[33]), not of cedar. (2) "Posts" (Heb. ratzīm, 1 S. 22.[17], "guard," RV., or "runners") were men from whom were drawn the king's messengers, who carried letters and despatches (2 Ch. 30.[6]; Est. 8.[10, 14], RV.; cp. Xenophon, Chyrop. viii. 6, 17; Herodotus, viii. 98). They had the right to command the service of either men or animals in order to expedite their progress. They were noted for their speed (cp. Jb. 9.[25]): "My days are swifter than a post." Posts still cross the desert on swift dromedaries; but the railways will soon make their picturesque figures a thing of the past.

POT is a general term, like PAN, applied to various kinds of vessels. (1) 'Āṣūk (from the verb ṣūk, "to pour in anointing"), a flask for pouring oil (2 K. 4.[2]; the text, however, is doubtful). (2) Gibīa', "a cup" or "bowl" (Jr. 35.[5]) used, e.g., of Joseph's "cup" (Gn. 44.[2], &c.). (3) Dūd, a small pot for cooking purposes (1 S. 2.[14] EV. "kettle," &c.). It is also a receptacle in which things may be carried, e.g. a basket (2 K. 10.[7]; Jr. 24.[22]). (4) Kĕlī (Lv. 6.[28]) is a quite general term, and is best rendered here with RV. "vessel." (5) Sīr is a large brazen pot (see PAN 5). (6) Pārūr = PAN 6. (7) Tzintzeneth, "a jar" (Ex. 16.[33]). (8) Shĕphattāyīm (Ps. 68.[13]) probably means the fireplaces or ash-heaps of the villages or encampments.

In NT. "water-pots" are spoken of at Cana of Galilee (Jn. 2.[6f.]). They were of stone. These large vessels usually contain the water brought in smaller jars from well or spring: they are mostly of earthenware, and are sunk in the ground for the sake of coolness. The "water-pot" of the woman of Samaria was doubtless of the ordinary type of earthenware (Jn. 4.[28]). The "pot" which contained the manna is said to have been of gold (He. 9.[4]). In Mark 7.[4, 8] the xestēs is a wooden vessel, as distinguished from those of brass.

POTIPHAR is described as a "eunuch" of Pharaoh (Gn. 37.[36]). This, however, only means that he was a court official. He was captain of Pharaoh's bodyguard. The phrase may be read "chief of the cooks," or "chief of the slaughterers," "an expression which, so far as one can judge from Syriac and Arabic as well as Hebrew, can only mean slaughterer of cattle. . . . So the bodyguard were also the royal butchers, an occupation not deemed unworthy of warriors in early times" (Robertson Smith, OTJC.[1] 426). To Potiphar Joseph was sold by the merchants. Proving himself faithful, Potiphar made him "overseer over his house." On a false accusation brought against Joseph, Potiphar cast him into prison, which seems to have been in Potiphar's house. Nothing further is known of Potiphar. In an Egyptian story entitled The Two Brothers, written to amuse Sety I., more than a century after Joseph, there is an incident resembling that of Joseph and Potiphar's wife.

POTIPHERAH, "he whom the Sun-god gave." Of this Egyptian name probably Potiphar is a Hebrew contraction. Potipherah was the priest, probably High Priest, of On (Heliopolis); his duties doubtless being connected with the celebrated Temple of the Sun in that city. His daughter ASENATH, by Pharaoh's desire, became the wife of Joseph (Gn. 41.[45], &c.).

POTSHERD. See POTTER.

POTTAGE, a thick broth of vegetables, meat, &c., boiled together. The main ingredient is usually LENTILS (Gn. 25.[29]; 2 K. 4.[38]; Hg. 2.[12]). This is a favourite dish among the people of Palestine; and the present writer can testify to its excellence. A day spent in the open, even if one be not engaged in the excitements of hunting, renders the smell of it particularly appetising. The ordinary method of eating it is to sit round the pot containing the pottage, with the thin, wafer-like bread at hand. From this each in turn tears off a part, doubles it up, dips it in the pottage, and conveys it to the mouth. The red lentil gives a red colour to the pottage (cp. Gn. 25.[30], "Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red"). Among the vegetables used in thickening it (2 K. 4.[39]) was one, possibly a sort of cucumber, which it was possible to mistake for the colocynth found in the lower Jordan valley, which when eaten produces violent pains and purgation.

POTTER (Heb. yōtzēr). Pottery was well known in ancient Egypt (AE. ii. 190ff.), where Israel may have become acquainted with it. During the desert wanderings pottery was too brittle to be of much service: skins, and vessels of wood and metal, would be mainly used. But the potter is early found in Palestine (2 S. 17.[28]). Skins, however, continued to be employed for a variety of purposes, alongside of earthenware, and to the present day they are used largely to contain wine, water, milk, clarified butter, &c.; this especially for safe transit on camel- or mule-back (Gn. 21.[14]; Jg. 4.[19]; 1 S.

16.[20], &c.). In later times the potter is a familiar figure (Ps. 2.[9]; Is. 29.[16], &c.). In the process of manufacture the clay was first of all kneaded with the feet to the proper consistency; then it was shaped on "the wheel," which consisted of an upright wooden axle, the top end of which projected above the work-table. To this was attached a wooden disc, on which the clay was placed. A larger disc was attached to the end below the table, and this the potter turned with his foot. The vessels thus shaped were heated in an oven (Is. 41.[25]; Jr. 18.[3]; Sr. 38.[29ff.]). Oxide of lead ("silver dross") was used for glazing (Pr. 26.[23]; Sr. 38.[30]). The gate of Harsith, i.e. "gate of potsherds" (Jr. 18.[1ff.], 19.[1f.]), which was evidently marked by a heap of broken pottery, was probably near the clay-pits, and may have been a place for the sale of pottery.

God's sovereignty is symbolised by the potter's mastery over the clay (Is. 29.[16]; Rm. 9.[21], &c.). In Zc. 11.[13] we should probably read with RVm. "into the treasury" (el-ha'ōtzēr, Syr.) instead of "unto the potter" (el-hayyōtzār).

The pottery discovered by excavation, &c., has been carefully classified, and such experts as Flinders Petrie, Bliss, and Macalister are able by its means approximately to date the remains where it is found. Interesting discussions of the subject, with abundant illustrations, are found in PEFQ. (index); Petrie's Tell el-Hesy; Bliss's Mound of Many Cities; PEF. Excavations in Palestine, by Bliss, Macalister, and Wünsch.

Startling applications of the knowledge thus obtained have recently been made by Mr. Macalister. Zer'in, on the NW. slope of Gilboa, has been for long unanimously accepted as the site of Jezreel. Mr. Macalister says that the pottery found there proves that the site is not older than Roman times. Jezreel must therefore be sought elsewhere (PEFQ. 1909, July, p. 175). The dispute between Tell Ḥum and Khān Minieh for the honour of representing Capernaum, he claimed some time before to have settled triumphantly in favour of the former (see Capernaum). This sufficiently illustrates the value of bits of broken pottery which to the inexperienced eye seem absolutely useless.

POWER OF THE KEYS, THE. This phrase denotes the authority of the Church in matters of faith and conduct, which rests upon the words of our Lord to St. Peter (Mw. 16.[19]). The figure implies that he who has the keys of the house can admit or exclude whom he will (Is. 22.[22]). It does not indicate a power personal to St. Peter. An essential part of the authority referred to was assigned to the Church, the ekklēsia, the community of believers (Mw. 18.[17f.]). So the Fathers understood it. Augustine distinctly says that "Christ gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven to the Church." It might seem at first sight as if the power thus entrusted to the Church were greater than any human being, or company of human beings, could worthily exercise. "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." And, again, in Jn. 20.[23], "Whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained." What did the terms mean to those who first heard them ?

We have here a reference to the ancient Jewish belief that everything done on earth according to the order of God was at the same time done in heaven. Thus, when, on the Great Day of Atonement, the priest offered two goats, cast lots to determine which should be for Jehovah and which " for Azazel," slaughtered that for Jehovah, and sent that " for Azazel " into the wilderness, precisely the same forms were supposed to be gone through in heaven. The like was true in all matters of ceremonial purity settled by the priests. The man declared unclean and banished from society on earth, had his sentence of exclusion recorded also in heaven.

In the words "binding" and " loosing," again, we have the echo of technical formulas constantly on the lips of Jewish rabbis. In their interpretation of the sacred law, and its application to conduct, whatever they forbade was said to be " bound " ; whatever they allowed was said to be " loosed." The doctors often found themselves in disagreement ; and their disputes were nearly always over things prohibited or permitted, " bound " or " loosed." Thus, as between the great rival schools of Shammai and Hillel, it is said, e.g., regarding the moving of empty vessels on the Sabbath day, even where there is no intention to fill them, " The school of Shammai binds it ; the school of Hillel looseth it." Again, " Rabbi Abha saith, R. Gamaliel Ben Rabbi asked me, ' What if I should go into the market ? ' and I bound it him."

Such was the meaning commonly attached to these words. It is reasonable, therefore, to argue that Jesus intended the men whom he addressed to be the authorised exponents of His will. Before long we find the apostles acting in this capacity, giving decisions of the greatest importance affecting the life of the growing Church. From certain requirements of the old law, binding upon Israel, Gentile believers were set free. On the other hand, eating of things offered to idols, of things strangled, and of blood was " bound " or forbidden to them equally with those who had been born Jews. The Church which preserves purity of faith, which cultivates Christ-like character, which is penetrated and controlled by the spirit of the Master, is always listened to with respect and deference when, through her properly constituted officers, she indicates what it is right and expedient, or otherwise, for Christians to do. In the general acceptance of her judgment, when she exercises discipline, there is full acknowledgment of her authority.

Again, the Church has wielded her power in determining what is essential to the Christian faith. The doctrine of the Trinity, e.g., is nowhere formulated in Scripture ; only after centuries of controversy was the Church able to apprehend the truth, which was declared in several successive councils. In like manner the doctrine of the person of Christ is not defined in the New Testament ; but Christian intelligence, acting on what was revealed, as interpreted in the experience of individual Christians, enabled the Church, after the prolonged Monophysite and Monothelite controversies, to enunciate the doctrine of the Hypostatical Union. It is not pretended that her decisions have banished mystery, but the general assent of the Christian mind and heart sufficiently recognises the wisdom with which she has exercised her authority in matters of faith.

In the light of subsequent experience we may also say that certain legislative and executive functions of what may be called the communal Christian conscience are glanced at in the words of Christ. Two illustrations will make this plain. In the days of the apostles no one thought it wrong to own slaves. With the fuller insight into the mind of Christ which the centuries have brought, the communal Christian conscience has declared that slavery is an outrage. In quite unmistakable language it has decreed, " Thou shalt not hold slaves." The law receives its sanction in the conviction wrought into the thought and feeling of the community, creating an atmosphere in which a man would be ashamed to be known as a slave-holder. Again, time was when persecution for religious opinions was not only thought permissible, it was regarded as the bounden duty of the civil magistrate to use all the power at his command to compel acknowledgment of Christian truth. Force was applied to produce right views, apparently without any qualms of conscience. Let one venture now to adopt this method, and be he prince or priest, he will expose himself to universal reprobation. The communal Christian conscience has spoken. To win adherents to any view it will tolerate only presentation of the truth, reason, and moral suasion. When the Christian consciousness in Church or community thus reflects the mind of Christ, its decisions may truly be said to be registered in heaven.

While in the passages cited from Matthew there is no explicit mention of power to forgive or retain sin, in Jn. 20.[23] Jesus declares that believers possess this authority. Again it is nothing personal to St. Peter. The words spoken apply equally to all members of the fellowship of faith. It is true, indeed, that none can forgive sins but God only. His conditions are that a man repent, and trust the Sinbearer. Apart from these conditions no declaration of man or Church possesses the slightest value. But where there is evidence of true penitence and faith, those who represent the Christian community are entitled, for the relief and comfort of the sinner, to declare that God forgives him.

In point of fact the community in which a man lives does effectively bind his sin upon him, or loose him from it, thus darkening his future or opening a door of hope. There is something in almost every man that tends to realise the expectations formed of him. The common judgment of him may be said to fix the level to which he may rise or descend. If one has gone astray, and men, while not belittling his offence, make him feel that they are willing to forget it—that they believe in him yet, and hope for better things—all that is good in him responds to this subtle and gracious appeal; and it will be strange if their hopes are disappointed. He is in a true sense "loosed" from his sin. But let men refuse forgiveness, keep his sin in remembrance, and give him to feel that no good is to be expected from him; the man is apt to be discouraged and driven to a deeper fellowship of wrong. His sin is bound upon him; under its influence character is fixed and destiny determined. What is loosed or bound on earth is loosed or bound in heaven. It is very significant that in Mw. 18.[17] the words occur in the midst of a lesson on forgiveness, where, in view of the far-reaching effects of judgment once given, every resource is to be exhausted, almost indeed to the imperilling of self-respect, in the effort to bring an offending brother to reason. Only in the very last resort is the sentence to be uttered, on which such tremendous issues may hang.

Jesus was not conferring any new power. He was simply taking a great fact of life and interpreting it. He set its meaning in new and startling light. Whatever others might do, His followers must henceforth exercise this power with a grave sense of responsibility. Any merely sacerdotal interpretation of our Lord's words is beside the mark. The power He spoke of belongs to no individual and to no class. It resides in the democracy of the kingdom of God.

PRÆTORIAN GUARD. See following article.

PRÆTORIUM (Gr. praitōrion, Mk. 15.[16]). The word is elsewhere rendered variously "common hall," "palace," "judgment hall," "Cæsar's court," "Prætorian guard" (Mw. 27.[27]; Jn. 18.[28, 33], 19.[9]; Ac. 23.[35]; Php. 1.[13]; cp. AV., RV., and margins). Originally the prætorium was the headquarters in a Roman camp, including general's tent, camp-altar, &c. The name was then applied to the military council which met there. Subsequently it denoted the official residence of a prætor governing a province. Thus it came to mean any house of more than usual size and splendour, especially that occupied by the emperor when he was away from Rome. Prætorium in the NT. denotes the palace which Herod the Great built in Jerusalem, probably in the west of the city (see JERUSALEM), which was occupied by the Roman procurators when they visited the city (Jos. BJ. II. xiv. 8; xv. 5). Only in Php. 1.[13] it probably means the quarters of the Prætorians, the Imperial Guard in Rome. They enjoyed higher rank and pay than the legions, and were called on for a shorter period of service. They were placed by Tiberius in a fortified camp to the NE. of the city. They exercised a powerful influence, even making and deposing emperors. They were finally broken up by Constantine the Great.

PRAISE has various applications in Scrip. The usual but by no means the only words are: OT., hālal and its derivatives; Hallelujah, "Praise ye JAH," and tehillîm, "praises"; NT., epainos, "praise," and words derived fm. it.

I. Praise of Man by Man.—This is sometimes discouraged as tending to flattery and undue exaltation (Jn. 5.[44], 12.[43]; Ac. 12.[21-23]), while self-praise and self-glorifying are emphatically condemned (Pr. 27.[2]; Dn. 4.[30-37]; 2 Cor. 10.[18]). By a parable Jesus shows that we are not to take credit to ourselves even for extra service (Lk. 17.[7-10]). Yet the P. of magistrates (Rm. 13.[3]; 1 P. 2.[14]) and of good men (Pr. 3.[4, 16, 35], 4.[8], 31.[28-31]) for well-doing is held out as a wholesome stimulus and a laudable obj. of ambition; and Paul readily bestows generous P., even directly on those he has reason to commend (1 Th. 1.[3]; Rm. 16.[1-13]; Php. 4.[14-16]; 2 Tm. 1.[16-18]). Scrip. thus teaches the value of generously appreciating the work and attainments of faithful men.

II. Praise of Man by God.—Explicitly or implicitly this is set forth as the great stimulus to a godly life (Pr. 3.[4]; Mw. 25.[21, 23]; Lk. 19.[17]; Rm. 2.[7, 29]; 2 Cor. 5.[9] (AV.); 1 Cor. 4.[5]; 1 Th. 2.[4]). God recognises His faithful servants (Nu. 12.[7f.]; 2 K. 22.[18ff.]), and Jesus bestows generous P. where due (Mw. 15.[28]; Lk. 7.[9], 22.[28]).

III. Praise of God by His Creatures (see HYMN, MUSIC, PSALMS, WORSHIP), the chief refce. of the word. The P. of God—the setting forth of His excellences, the giving thanks to Him by word and life—is called for as a fitting employment of all His creatures (Dt. 10.[21]; Ps. 33.[1], 92.[1], 147.[1], 148.; Rv. 4.[9-11], 5.[11-14]).

(1) History of Praise. (a) In Jewish Worship.—At first P. wd. be freer, consisting largely of vintage and harvest songs (Am. 5.[23]). The Chronicler tells of the organisation of Temple worship under David and Solomon (1 Ch. 15.[16, 22], 16.[4-36, 41ff.], 25.; 2 Ch. 5.[11ff.]). The Psalter was the great manual of P., at least in the Second Temple (Ez. 3.[10f.]). The "hymn" of Mw. 26.[30] (Mk. 14.[26]) was the latter part of the "Great Hallel" (= Praise-song) appointed for the Passover, viz. Pss. 115.–118. It is not agreed whether or not P. formed part of the synagogue worship. We note with interest how Jesus welcomed the spontaneous P. of the children within the Temple courts (Mw. 21.[15f.]; Ps. 8.[2]), as well as that of His followers (Lk. 19.[37ff.]), to Himself as Messiah. Glory is but His due (Jn. 17.[1, 5]).

(b) In early Christian Worship.—At first of a freer nature, P. ever held a prominent place (Ac. 2.$^{46f.}$; 1 Cor. 14.^{26}; Eph. 5.^{19}; Col. 3.^{16}; Js. 5.^{13}). 1 Tm. 3.^{16} is thought to be the fragment of an early Christian hymn, and Pliny the Younger wrote (A.D. 112) to the Emperor Trajan that the Christians "sing a hymn to Christ as to a God." It is almost certain there were other hymns, now lost.

(2) Materials and Elements of Praise.—Besides the Psalter a number of special "songs" have been preserved, viz. of Moses (Ex. 15.$^{1-21}$; Dt. 32.$^{1-43}$), of the children of Isr. (Nu. 21.$^{17f.}$), Deborah (Jg. 5.), Hannah (1 S. 2.$^{1-10}$), David (2 S. 22., 23.$^{1-7}$; cp. Ps. 18.; 1 Ch. 16.$^{7-36}$; cp. Ps. 96., 105.); of Mary (Lk. 1.$^{46-55}$), Zacharias (Lk. 1.$^{67-79}$), the angels (Lk. 2.$^{13f.}$), Simeon (Lk. 2.$^{28-32}$); and the P. of the redeemed in glory, in wh. creation joins (Rv. 4.$^{9ff.}$, 5.$^{9-14}$, 7.$^{10-12}$, 15.$^{3f.}$, 19.$^{1-7}$). See also Is. 12., 26., 60.^{18}.

Chief Elements of Praise, often found together. (a) P. for the glory of creation and of God's Being and attributes, such as His holiness, righteousness, mercy, and faithfulness (2 Ch. 5.^{13}; Ps. 8., 19., 36., 65., 89., 145.; Rv. 4.^{11}, 15.$^{3f.}$). (b) Thanksgiving for temporal mercies, and for deliverances, personal and national (Ex. 15.^{1}; 1 S. 2.$^{1-10}$; 2 S. 22.; Ps. 46., 105., 106., 136.). (c) P. for the fulfilment of the Messianic promise, and for the great work and blessings of redemption (Ps. 72., 98., 103.; Is. 12., 35.; songs in Lk. 1., 2., 10.$^{20f.}$; Eph. 1.^{12}; 1 P. 2.^{9}; 1 Tm. 3.^{16}; Rv. 5.$^{9-14}$, 7.$^{10-12}$).

(3) Acceptable Praise must be (a) with the whole heart, with the spt. (1 Ch. 15.$^{25-28}$; Ps. 103.$^{1ff.}$, 111.^{1}; 1 Cor. 14.^{15}; Eph. 5.^{19}; Col. 3.^{16}). It is the fitting crown of the religious life, including family relg. (Ps. 118.^{15}), and Cowper truly says—

> "A soul redeem'd demands a life of praise."

(b) With the understanding (Ps. 47.^{7}; 1 Cor. 14.^{15}), "decently and in order" (1 Cor. 14.^{40}). For care and skill bestowed on P. see 1 Ch. 15.$^{16, 22}$, 16.$^{4-6, 41f.}$, 25.; 2 Ch. 5.$^{11ff.}$; Ez. 3.$^{10f.}$

(c) It naturally accompanies generous surrender and sacrifice (1 Ch. 29.$^{6-22}$; Ps. 96.^{8}; Ac. 2.$^{44-47}$; 2 Cor. 8.$^{1-5}$, 9.$^{7-15}$; He. 13.$^{15f.}$).

(d) It is inspired by God (Ps. 51.^{15}, 65.^{1}, "Praise is silent for Thee"), is honouring to Him (Ps. 50.^{23}), and is to be offered through Christ (He. 13.^{15}).

PRAYER (Heb. tephillāh, Gr. proseuchē, and various other words), the word used for any address of man to God, specially indicates supplication or petition, but also includes confession, adoration, praise, thanksgiving, and intercession, and often it appears as mutual converse between God and man.

I. General Questions of Prayer.—In view of Science and the doubts of professing Christian men, we can hardly ignore the question, How far is P. a really effective force? In reply, (a) as Science is bringing to light the operation of unsuspected forces in the physical world, analogy suggests the probability of the operation of untraced forces like P. in the sptl. region; (b) the Laws of Nature are part of God's will, and indicate certain conditions under wh. men should pray: yet events in the material order already appointed to happen, wear a new aspect when, in answer to prayer, they come as gifts of a Father; (c) P. is the utterance of a universal human need, as witnessed by heathenism "seeking after the Lord" (Ps. 65.^{2}; Is. 56.^{7}); (d) the Christian consciousness in all times bears testimony to its value and effects; (e) any doubt raised by present-day conditions of thought as to how it works need not really undermine the solid basis of conviction as to its value if Christian men give themselves up to it with steadfast energy (Ac.

PRAYER: ADORATION (EGYPTIAN)

1.^{14}, 2.$^{1ff.}$; Eph. 6.^{18}; Col. 4.^{2}; Js. 5.^{16}); (f) we have a perennial proof of its place and power in the teaching and example of our Lord.

II. Examples of Prayer.—(1) In OT. In Gn. 4.^{26} occurs the important notice, "Then began men to call upon the name of J″." Other expressions are "beseech" (e.g. Ex. 32.^{11}, lit. "made the face of the Lord pleasant," or "sweet"), "entreat" (Ps. 119.^{58}), "cry" (Ps. 107.^{6}), "ask" (Ps. 21.^{4}). While men prayed chiefly for temporal blessings (Gn. 28.$^{20ff.}$; 2 K. 20.$^{2f.}$; 1 Ch. 4.^{10}), the sptl. strain also appears, esp. in the Psalms (25., 63., 119.). The individual prays for the nation, the nation prays as one man (1 K. 18.$^{36f.}$; Ps. 44.; Is. 63.^{15}–64.^{12}). Some special prayers may be mentioned, e.g. David's (1 Ch. 29.$^{10-19}$), Solomon's (1 K. 8.$^{22ff.}$; 2 Ch. 6.$^{12ff.}$), Hezekiah's (2 K. 19.$^{14ff.}$), and Manasseh's (2 Ch. 33.$^{12f., 18f.}$). The most notable men of P. are Abraham, Jacob (Gn. 32.$^{24ff.}$; Ho. 12.^{4}), Moses, Samuel, Elijah, Job, Jeremiah, Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. They are great intercessors (Gn. 18.$^{23ff.}$; Ex. 8.$^{12, 30}$, 32.$^{11f., 31f.}$, 34.$^{8f.}$; 1 S. 7.$^{5, 9}$, 12.^{23}; 1 K. 17.$^{20f.}$, 18.^{42}; Ps. 99.^{6}; Jr. 15.^{1}), confessing the sins of the nation as their own (Dn. 9.$^{3ff.}$; Ez. 9.$^{5ff.}$; Ne. 1.$^{4ff.}$), carrying on interviews and even arguments with God (Gn. 18.$^{23ff.}$; Ex. 33.$^{11ff.}$; Jb. 10.; Jr. 14., 15.), pleading with persistent appeal, esp. on the plea of God's honour, glory, and chosen purpose (Ex. 32.$^{11-13}$; Jr. 14.$^{7, 21}$; Dn. 9.$^{17, 19}$).

(2) In NT. Even Jesus felt the need of solitary P. (Mk. 1.^{35}, 6.^{46}; Lk. 22.^{39}), seven special occasions being mentioned only by Luke (3.^{21}, 5.^{16}, 6.^{12}, 9.$^{18, 28f.}$, 11.^{1}, 23.$^{34, 46}$), and He prayed with strong emotion (Mk. 7.^{34}; Jn. 12.^{27}; Lk 22.^{44}; He. 5.^{7}). He set the example of grace before meat (Mw. 14.^{19}, and parallels; Mw. 15.^{36}; Mk. 8.^{6}; Lk. 24.^{30}; cp. Ac. 27.^{35}, see also Mw. 26.$^{26f.}$): He prayed in presence of His disciples (Lk. 11.; Jn. 17.^{1}), and of the people (Jn. 11.$^{41f.}$, 12.$^{27f.}$); for His disciples and future believers (Jn. 17.$^{9ff.}$), for an individual disciple (Lk. 22.^{32}), and for His enemies (Lk. 23.^{34}). He continues His intercession in heaven (Rm. 8.^{34}; He. 7.^{25}, 9.^{24}; 1 J. 2.^{1}): in Jn. 16.$^{26f.}$ He does not deny this heavenly intercession, but points to the willingness of the Father Himself.

The early Christians prayed with great earnestness and expectancy, and with one accord (Ac. 1.^{14}, 2.$^{1, 42}$, 4.$^{24ff.}$, 12.^{5}); at times with fasting (Ac. 13.^{3}, 14.^{23}). True prayer marks the dawn of Christian faith (Ac. 9.^{11}). Paul continually prays with and for his converts (Ac. 20.^{36}; 1 Th. 3.$^{10ff.}$; Rm. 1.^{9}; Php. 1.$^{4, 9-11}$; 2 Tm. 1.^{3}), and asks them to pray for him (2 Th. 3.$^{1f.}$; Rm. 15.$^{30-32}$; 2 Cor. 1.^{11}; Eph. 6.^{19}).

III. Modes of Prayer: Lines and Conditions of Efficacious Prayer.—As to Modes. (a) Scrip. sanctions several Postures, viz. standing, the usual one (Gn. 18.^{22}; Mk. 11.^{25}; Lk. 18.$^{11, 13}$), kneeling (1 K. 8.^{54}; Ps. 95.^{6}; Lk. 22.^{41}; Ac. 20.^{36}), prostration (Mw. 26.^{39}; Mk. 14.^{35}; cp. 1 K. 18.^{42}), and (perhaps) sitting (2 S. 7.^{18}). We may notice also the uplifted hands (Ex. 17.$^{11f.}$; Ps. 141.^{2}), with outspread palms, waiting to receive (1 K. 8.^{22}), and the uplifted eyes (Ps. 121.^{1}; Mw. 14.^{19}). (b) Prob. the prayers of the early Church, while largely spontaneous, were also partly liturgical (Ac. 2.^{42}, "the prayers"), and even at the end of free prayers an Amen was uttered by the assembled believers (1 Cor. 14.^{16}; cp. Ne. 8.^{6}). For doxology at the close of prayer see Eph. 3.$^{20f.}$; He. 13.$^{20f.}$; 1 P. 5.$^{10f.}$

Efficacious Prayer.—(1) The true centre of P. is God and His will, not human need. The three most prominent petitions in the Lord's P. are: "Hallowed be Thy name, Thy kdm. come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven," and this note reappears—"For Thine is the kdm., &c." (Mw. 6.^{13}). Cp. the acknowledgment of God's sovereignty and glory in OT. prayers. We are to ask in the name of Christ (Jn. 16.^{26})—a new development—i.e. we are to make Him our Way of approach to the Father by not only asking but also living in accord with His whole spt., the doing of the Father's will (Jn. 14.$^{13f.}$, 15.$^{7, 16}$, 16.$^{23f.}$; 1 J. 3.$^{22ff.}$, 5.$^{14f.}$; cp. He. 10.$^{19ff.}$). Subj. to His will we may ask for temporal blessings (Mw. 6.^{11}, 24.^{20}). Sptl. blessings are accdg. to it (Mw. 7.^{11}; Lk. 11.^{13}; Ac. 8.^{15}; 1 Th. 4.^{3}; 1 Tm. 2.$^{1-4}$). There are limits to P. (2 Th. 3.^{2}; 1 J. 5.^{16}), yet the emphasis lies on its unlimited possibilities (Mk. 9.^{29}; Jn. 14.$^{12-14}$).

(2) A contrite and forgiving spt.—On contrition see Ps. 32.; Zc. 12.$^{10ff.}$; Lk. 18.$^{9-14}$. How clearly Jesus teaches that God can forgive those only who also ask to be delivered from an unforgiving spt. will be seen fm. Mw. 6.$^{12, 14f.}$, 18.$^{21ff.}$; Mk. 11.$^{25f.}$ (cp. 1 Tm. 2.^{8}; Js. 2.^{13}; 1 J. 3.$^{18-23}$).

(3) Unwavering faith.—Jesus looked for faith in those that sought healing (Mw. 9.$^{28f.}$, 15.^{28}. He bids us ask as those that expect to receive fm. a loving Father (Mw. 7.$^{7-11}$; Lk. 11.$^{9-13}$); and in the very act of P. believe that we are already receiving (Mk. 11.^{24}; cp. Jn. 11.$^{41f.}$; Js. 1.$^{5-7}$, 5.$^{16-18}$; 1 K. 18.$^{42-45}$).

(4) Importunity.—The urgent insistence of many OT. prayers is vividly taught by Jesus in the parables of the Friend at Midnight (Lk. 11.$^{5-8}$) and the Importunate Widow (Lk. 18.$^{1-8}$). We are to take no refusal, and the very delay shd. quicken urgency. P. may be repeated for urgency (Mw. 26.^{44}), but mere repetition as a charm is of no value (Mw. 6.$^{7f.}$; cp. 1 Th. 5.^{17}; Eph. 6.^{18}).

(5) Thanksgiving.—The Psalms show that P. and praise are near of kin. In praying for his converts Paul gives thanks for their past progress (1 Th. 1.$^{2ff.}$; Php. 1.$^{3ff.}$), &c. He gave thanks even in a night of trial (Ac. 16.^{25}), and by direct precept he calls for thanksgiving (1 Th. 5.^{18}; Php. 4.^{6}; Eph. 5.^{20}; Col. 3.^{17}). The P. of thanksgiving sanctifies God's gifts (1 Tm. 4.$^{4f.}$).

(6) Intercession is the privilege of all believers. The keynote is in the opening petitions and the doxology of the Lord's P. We have the example of our Lord (Jn. 17.; Lk. 23.^{34}), Stephen (Ac. 7.^{60}), Paul (Eph. 3.$^{14ff.}$, &c.), and the early Church (Ac. 4.$^{24-30}$, 12.^{5}); also the centurion (Lk. 7.$^{1ff.}$), and others. Christians are to pray for their ministers (2 Cor. 1.^{11}; Eph. 6.$^{19f.}$; He. 13.$^{18f.}$), for one another (Eph. 6.^{18}; Js. 5.^{16}), for the increase of preachers, and the work of the Gospel (Mw. 9.$^{37f.}$; 2 Th. 3.$^{1f.}$; Rm. 15.$^{30ff.}$), for those in power, and for all men (1 Tm. 2.$^{1-4}$), including enemies (Mw. 5.$^{44f.}$).

(7) Praying in the Spt.—Cp. (1). It is by being in the Spt. that P. is poss. and effectual (Eph. 6.^{18}; Ju. ^{20}). He helps our infirmities, interprets to us our own needs, and even intercedes for us (Rm. 8.$^{26f.}$).

(8) Social prayer.—Jesus regards the place of worship as a "house of prayer" (Mk. 11.^{17}), and attaches special promises to agreement and association in P. (Mw. 18.$^{19f.}$). These are also suggested by the "us" and "our" of the Lord's P., and examples are furnished fm. the early Church (Ac. 1.[14], 2.[1ff.], 4.[24-30]). When "the Spt. is poured out," this form of P. enters upon a fresh life, and, as in Scrip., P. knows no stint. See LORD'S PRAYER, WORSHIP.

PREACH, PREACHING. The Heb. words are: (1) Bāsar, "to bear tidings" (Ps. 40.[9]; Is. 61.[1]). It may mean to gladden with good tidings as of victory (1 S. 31.[9]; 2 S. 1.[20], &c.) or of the birth of a son (Jr. 20.[15]), or simply to bear tidings which may be evil (1 S. 4.[17]). It also means to herald or proclaim (Is. 40.[9], &c.). (2) Qārā, "to call," "proclaim," "read" (Ne. 6.[7]; Jh. 3.[2]). This word is of very frequent occurrence in Scripture. The essential idea is that of crying or speaking out; so that it passes easily and naturally to mean announcement or proclamation (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.). The NT. words are: (1) Diaggellō, "to announce fully" (Lk. 9.[60]); (2) dialegomai, "to converse" (Ac. 20.[7, 9]); (3) euaggelizō, "to tell good news" (Lk. 3.[18], &c.); (4) kataggellō, "to announce" (Ac. 4.[2], &c.); (5) kērussō, "to proclaim as a herald" (Mw. 3.[1], &c.); (6) laleō, "to talk" (Mk. 2.[2], &c.). The element common to all is that of vivâ voce proclamation of a message. The character of preacher, therefore, attaches to the OT. prophets, whose oracles were probably all spoken before they were committed to writing. This is specially true of Jonah, who went as a missionary to preach righteousness to Nineveh. In the NT. John the Baptist is essentially a preacher. It was his business to announce the coming of Him who was to fulfil the long hope of Israel; and to summon men to repentance. The preaching of Jesus and His followers is quite clearly distinguished from their teaching or instruction. By preaching the coming of the kingdom was announced, and the good news of the Gospel made known. Men were summoned to realise the prevalence of sin and the inevitable consequences if it were persisted in. The necessity for penitence was proclaimed, and the way declared by which the sinner might enter the kingdom of God. It aimed at conversion, while teaching contemplated the "edification of the body of Christ."

In early times there is no mention of preaching in connection with public worship; but in the days of Jesus it seems to have become a regular part of the service of the SYNAGOGUE. Jesus thus found opportunity to preach the great sermon delivered in the Synagogue at Nazareth (Lk. 4.[16ff.]). Other sermons of Jesus are summarised elsewhere, e.g. in Jn. 6.[26ff.], &c. Examples of apostolic preaching are also preserved in the report of Peter's sermon on the Day of Pentecost (Ac. 2.[14ff.]), that of Paul on Mars' Hill (Ac. 17.[22], &c.). These two illustrate the adaptation of the message to the character of the audience addressed.

The worship of the Church was in the beginning modelled on that of the synagogue. Preaching therefore took its place at once as part of the settled order. It was specially the function of the PROPHET, the apostles of course combining this with other functions.

The proclamation of the Gospel remains for ever the chief element of preaching. But in an organised Christian community, for the perfecting of the saints, the exposition of the truth, and the illustration of its bearing on character and conduct, became increasingly important.

PREPARATION (Gr. paraskeuē). On the day before the Sabbath, and that before the Passover or other sacred feast, it was the duty of the Jews to do everything in their power to obviate the necessity for work of any kind on the sacred day. Thus, before the Sabbath begins on the Friday evening, the food that will be required on the Sabbath is cooked, the instruments of ordinary work are laid aside, lamps are trimmed and lit, &c. The day on which these things were done came to be known among the Jews as "the preparation."

PRESBYTER, PRESBYTERY. The presbyter was the ELDER or BISHOP. The presbytery (1 Tm. 4.[14]) was a gathering of the elders, not to be confused with what is called the "Presbytery" in any of our modern churches.

PRIEST. See LEVI.

PRINCE. This term represents fourteen Hebrew and two Aramaic words in the OT., and three Gr. words in the NT. Of the two Aramaic words, one, aḥashdarpĕnaiya (Dn. 3.[2], 6.[1]), is better rendered SATRAP as in RV.; the other, rabrĕbān (Dn. 5.[2]), is trd. by RV. "nobles," and seems equivalent to rabbuti of the monuments. Three of the Heb. words are loan words: rab, of members of Nebuchadnezzar's court (Jr. 39.[13], 41.[1]); ṣāgān (Is. 41.[25]), usually tr. "ruler" (Jr. 51.[23]; Ek. 23.[6]; Ne. 2.[16]), always of foreign, Bab., Asyr., and Persian officials = signīn (Dn. 2.[48]), "governors"; partĕmīm (Dan. 1.[3]), trd. "nobles," RV. In the case of kōhēn (priest) it is trd. P. in Jb. 12.[19], and in 2 S. 8.[18], "chief rulers"; RV. trs. in both cases "priests." Several of the words are poetical: ḥashmannīm, rāzan, nādīb, qātzīn, shālīsh, and nāṣīk, only occur in the poetical books and the prophets. Another word, nāgīd, contains the idea of sovereign as well as prince. Two of the words have a more technical use: nāsī', used of the heads of tribes (Gn. 17.[20]; Nu. 1.[16]; Jo. 9.[15]; 1 Ch. 2.[10]; Ek. 32.[29]). The vast majority of those who formed any given tribe were descendants, not of the sons of Jacob, but of their slaves; only the princely families cd. claim Jacob as their ancestor. After the times of the Judges these princes of the tribes disappear fm. history. The name was revived in the Talmud to denote the alleged academic president of the Sanhedrin. The other, sar, means "high noble," as distinct fm. the king. Singularly enough, it is the word used for king in Asyr. under the form sarru. Presumably these Jewish princes were heads of great clans, and cd. bring numerous warriors into the field. Towards the end of the Southern Kingdom the princes became very prominent, and so powerful as to be able to overrule the king (Jr. 37.[15]). They appear to have formed a senate with whom the king consulted (Jr. 36.[21], 38.[4]).

PRISON. While imprisonment was not a penalty prescribed by law, it was a practice from early times to place men in confinement for various reasons (see Crimes and Penalties, Imprisonment). The penalty was common in Egypt (Gn. 39.[20f.]), and, in later times, also in Israel (Jr. 32.[2f.]; Mw. 5.[25], &c.). Beth haṣ-ṣōhar of Gn. 39.[20], &c., may be "round tower," or "enclosure." The Philistines had a place called beth ha-aṣūrīm (Qri), "house of those who are bound" (Jg. 16.[21]; cp. Jr. 37.[15], beth ha-'eṣūr), in which prisoners were kept at work. A common name for prison is beth kele', "house of restraint" (1 K. 22.[27]; Jr. 37.[4], &c.). Hammahpeketh is "the stocks" (Jr. 20.[2f.], 29.[26]); maṭṭārāh, "place of guarding" (Jr. 32.[2]; Ne. 3.[25], &c.). Other Heb. words signify a place of safe keeping or of supervision. The usual NT. word is phulakē (Mw. 5.[25]; Mk. 6.[17]; Lk. 23.[19], &c.). Desmōtērion also occurs (Mw. 11.[2]; Ac. 5.[21, 23], 16.[26] = phulakē). In the East, to-day, friends of the prisoners are allowed to visit them freely, and are expected to provide them with food, &c. This appears to correspond with ancient practice (Mw. 11.[2], 25.[36], &c.). The "inner prison" (Ac. 16.[24]) was probably a cell under the ordinary place of confinement. For greater security a guard was set before the prison doors (Ac. 12.[6]), who were answerable with their lives for the safe keeping of the prisoners entrusted to their charge (v. 19). Frequently the prisoner was chained to two soldiers, one on each side.

PRIZE. See Games.

PROCHORUS, one of the seven chosen to attend to the "distribution" (Ac. 6.[5]). Nothing further is known of him with certainty. Later traditions make him a companion of the apostle John, and bishop of Nicomedia, to which bishopric he was consecrated by St. Peter. He is said to have been martyred in Antioch or Jerusalem (Lipsius, Apokr. ap.-gesch. i. 355ff.; Magna Bibliotheka Patrum, i. 49ff.).

PROCONSUL, from the Lat. pro consule, "deputy consul," was the name applied in Rome to the officer to whom the insignia and powers of consul were entrusted for a specified district outside the city. As governors of the Provinces, with the growth of the empire, officers of consular or prætorian rank were chosen. From the time of Augustus, the title denoted the governor of a senatorial province. In NT. proconsuls (AV. deputies) appear, at Paphos in the island of Cyprus (Ac. 13.[7], &c.) and at Corinth (Ac. 18.[12]).

PROCURATOR under the Republic in Rome "meant the fully accredited agent of a private citizen." Under the empire the title was given to the stewards of the emperor, and to those who attended to his financial interests in the provinces. Certain regions "before they were administered as actual provinces, were governed as domains by an administrator appointed by the emperor, and personally responsible to him. He also was styled procurator, and in general had a position similar to that of the other governors" (Seyffert, Dict. of Clas. Ant., 519). Judæa was thus governed for a time. The procurators who appear in NT. are Pontius Pilate, Felix, and Festus.

PROFANE applies to what is without the Temple precinct, and open to the approach of all. A profane person (He. 12.[16]) may be described as one whose mind and heart are thoroughfares for wandering thoughts and passions—not sanctuaries.

PROPHET, PROPHECY. As religion is the binding together of God and man, there must not only be the approach of man to God in adoration and worship, but also the approach of God to man, making known His will. Hence in all primitive religions there were always in some form or other priests and prophets. As the Priest was man's ambassador to God, presenting to God his offerings and directing him as to his prayers, so the prophet was the mouthpiece of God, His ambassador to man, informing him what the Divine will was in cases not met by the morality of custom. Some wd. begin the study of prophecy with the incantations, augury, sortilege, &c., of heathen nations, and starting fm.

these wd. trace the evolution of prophecy proper. This assumes without proof that the rites by wh. mankind endeavoured to divine the intentions of Deity were primitive, and not the result of degeneration. Fm. Nu. 24.[1] we learn that BALAAM, in ordinary circumstances, used enchantments as introduction to his spoken prophecy. Balaam, as beyond the pale of Isr., was within the sphere of that degeneration wh. Paul saw working in the splendid heathendoms of Greece and Rome. Our object is to study the prophet in the OT. in the first instance, with the continuance of the office in the NT.

The Terms used to designate the P.—There are three Heb. words for P.: nabi', wh. is derived by Gesenius fm. a root " to boil, to bubble up," wh. wd. represent the P. as a " God-intoxicated man "; there is, however, in Asyr., the root nabu, " to speak to," " name," whence the god NEBO is called " the P. of the gods." This wd. imply the P. to be the speaker of divine oracles. Fm. I S. 9.[9] we learn that there was an earlier name for a P., rō'ēh, " seer," fm. rā'āh, " to see "; fm. this we have mar'āh, " an appearance "; akin to this is ḥōzeh, fm. ḥāzāh, " to see " (EV. tr. " seer "); fm. this comes ḥāzōn, " vision." What the precise distinction between these two words was it is impossible to decide. SAMUEL is called "seer" only in the first of these terms. Another title given to the P. is " Man of God," as the P. fm. Judah that came to denounce JEROBOAM (I K. 13.[1f.]); this expressed the relation in wh. the P. stood to God. The Gr. term wh. we find in the NT. is prophētēs, fm. wh. our English word is derived; it has a double reference, at once " predicter " and " forth-speaker," the foreteller of the future and the declarer of the will of the gods. Fm. all this it wd. seem that to the primary idea of P. prediction was subsidiary. The primary thing was to stand in a close relation to J″., so as to be able to declare His will. The earliest occurrences of the word bear this out; Abimelech is told to ask ABRAHAM to entreat God for him, " for he is a prophet "; when Moses hesitates to go back to Egp. to plead with Pharaoh because of his slowness of speech, he has his br. AARON given to him as his " prophet." At the same time the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of his predictions was to be the test whether the man who claimed to be a prophet was so or not.

The Psychology of Prophecy.—We mean by this the mental process associated with the gift of P. That it was associated with the presentation of vivid pictures to the mind follows not only fm. prophets being called " seers," but also fm. the distinct statement of Nu. 12.[6]: " If there be any P. among you, I the Lord will make Myself known unto him by a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream." There is further not only the fact that the prophecy of Isaiah is called " The vision of Isaiah " (Is. 1.[1]), but also that Jeremiah and Ezekiel describe pictures presented to their imagination (Jr. 24.[2]; Ek. 8.[2]). The attitude of the different prophets to the revelation given is marked. Isaiah does not describe what he sees, but rather gives a lyric accompaniment to the pictures as they rise before his inner eye; his audience are left to guess what he is seeing. Jeremiah thinks more in words than pictures, so the Divine message comes to him in words; when he has a vision, it is symbolical, and the voice of the Lord is given to interpret. Ezekiel's prophecy is essentially written, and his visions are described more fully and interpreted at greater length. Of Balaam (Nu. 24.[2]) it is related how he fell " into a trance having his eyes open," when he saw the vision of God; thus the external phenomena of prophecy simulated catalepsy. Another external resemblance to be noted is between prophecy and madness; when the prophet was sent by ELISHA to anoint JEHU his brother-officers speak of him as a " mad fellow," meshugga' (2 K. 9.[11]); Shemaiah (Jr. 29.[26]) declares " every man that is mad maketh himself a P."; when SAUL in his delirium is raving in his house, it is said he " prophesied." A peculiarity wh. is found accompanying prophecy is the influence of music; Saul is told by Samuel that he will meet a company of prophets with " a psaltery and a tabret, and a pipe and a harp " (I S. 10.[5]); when Elisha in the camp of Isr. and Judah is entreated on account of the army ready to perish with thirst when advancing agst. Moab, he calls for a minstrel to play before him (2 K. 3.[15]; cp. the influence of music over Saul, I S. 16.[16]). There was a physical condition induced by the sound of music wh. was somehow suitable to receive the prophetic revelation. Combining all the notices we have, the phenomena of prophecy appear to have been an overpowering sense of Divine influence, the full meaning of wh. did not reveal itself at once; it mt. be days before its meaning was unveiled; during this time the P. was " searching what and what manner of time the Spirit wh. was in them did signify " (I P. 1.[11]). When the Divine message came to be expressed in words, these would be conditioned by the kge. of the person to whom the revelation had been made, and his intellectual apprehension. Of necessity many of the revelations wd. concern the future, whether absolute or conditional. This mt. take the form of picture or it mt. crystallise in some sharp sentence, but more generally the former; it wd. be a quite independent mental act to discern the precise nature of the event foretold, or the exact order in wh. its various parts succeeded each other. Here the P. mt. be at sea, and end in coming to a wrong conclusion. When the P. found expression his words wd. not be a dry, cold record of the vision, but wd. be all aglow with feeling, and drop naturally into the cadence of verse. Prophetic inspiration had thus a resemblance, if only superficial, to that of the poet; hence the apostle Paul calls Epimenides the Cretan a prophet.

The Prophetic Order.—While fm. a very early period there were prophets, the prophetic order did not become a recognised power in Church and State till the days of Samuel and thereafter. Samuel chose Saul for king before the lot had designated him; when he failed to come up to the prophetic standard, he anointed David his successor. The formation of the Northern Kingdom, and the numerous changes of dynasty that took place in it, all are connected with prophetic interference. Such influence implies an order of persons acting together. In the books of the literary prophets we find many more evidences of the P. being a recognised figure in the constitution of Isr. and Judah; especially by Jeremiah are the prophets denounced as a class parallel with that of the priests, and assisting them in lulling the people into a false security. Connected with Samuel and Saul we find repeated references to prophets as a class, travelling in companies, dwelling together in the "booths" (Naioth) at Ramah, regarded as a set of persons with whom it was astonishing that Saul shd. associate himself. We meet prophetic communities again in connection with Elijah and Elisha. There seems to have been a distinctive dress wh. denoted the P. much as the monks are still distinguished in Roman Catholic countries. A hairy mantle seems to have been their distinctive mark; the false prophets wore "a rough garment to deceive" (Zc. 13.[4]); some other token they appear to have had, for when the P. sent to rebuke Ahab for his unseasonable clemency to Ben-hadad removed the bandage (AV. "ashes," RV. "headband") fm. his face (Heb. "eyes"), the king recognised him as one of the prophets. Some have thought a mark was tattooed on their forehead between their eyes; but such a practice seems to be forbidden in Lv. 19.[28]; as, however, it is placed in connection with "cuttings for the dead," the forbidding may be simply as part of the obsequies. Others have thought of a tonsure: of this there is no sign in Scripture. Had we any suggestion of it in Scrip., we mt. think the prophets had something like the side locks wh. mark off the pious Jew of the present time. Members of the order were called "sons of the prophets," a designation wh. suggests "pupils." The scene in Naioth in Rama (1 S. 19.[20]), "the company of the prophets prophesying and Samuel standing as appointed over them," suggests a school. To imagine that prophecy may be taught seems to contradict the very idea of the thing itself. As, however, there were physical and mental conditions wh. were more fitting for receiving the Divine afflatus, the sons of the prophets might be taught to induce the one and acquire the other. Mental training wd. be necessary to discriminate rightly "what the Spirit did signify." They might for this end be taught the prophecies of earlier seers. The prophets were the principal historians, as we may learn fm. the bk. of Chronicles; all the authorities it appeals to are prophetic. To the P. the history of Isr. was a record of J″.'s dealings with that people. Hence writing, poss. in cuneiform, wd. not unlikely be one of the subjects of instruction. Not improb. our present books of Samuel and Kings were compiled piecemeal in the schools of the prophets; a new record added with each reign, and the whole preserved. The prophetic communities were not monasteries but villages, the dwellings poss. not unlike the wattled booths in wh. the Arabs sometimes stay. They married and had families (2 K. 4.[1-7]). They seem to have lived to some extent fm. gifts (2 K. 4.[42-44]); sometimes they appear to have been reduced to considerable straits, so as to depend for food on the wild herbs wh. mt. be gathered (2 K. 4.[38-41]); they seem to have partaken of a common meal.

The Function of the P.—The Divine purpose in regard to Isr. was that in that people shd. be preserved all that was good in the primitive religious thoughts of mankind. Sacrifice, priesthood, ritual of worship, were all elements of religion that pointed to the future, and therefore such as it was needful to preserve. They were, however, apt to degenerate into mere superstition. When the one God was split up into gods the idea was prone to rise in the mind of the worshipper that by multiplying his offerings he mt. bribe the deity to overlook moral delinquency (so Adeimantus in Plato's Republic, ii. 366); such a view wd. be the ruin of real spirituality. To keep at all events Isr. free fm. this, God inspired the P. The message of every P. was that offerings, however costly, were of no avail to secure the favour of J″., the God of Isr. When Saul returned fm. his campaign agst. the Amalekites, having, instead of obeying the command of God, brought back of the cattle the best for sacrifice, Samuel told him that "to obey was better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" (1 S. 15.[22]). Though David is abundant in his sacrifices, and has been purposing to build a temple to J″., Nathan rebukes him for his sin in the matter of Uriah the Hittite (2 S. 12.[1-13]). So Elijah does not rebuke Ahab so fiercely for his worship of Baal as for taking the vineyard of Naboth, whom Jezebel his wife had caused to be judicially murdered. When we come to the literary prophets we find this made even more prominent. Isaiah demands: "To what purpose are your sacrifices to Me? . . . your hands are full of blood. Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings fm. before Mine eyes; cease to do evil, learn to do well" (Is. 1.[11, 16, 17]).

Every one of the prophets bears the same testimony to the worthlessness of sacrifice without righteousness. At the same time Amos denounces the worship at Bethel and Gilgal. Another side of the religious function of the P. is shown to us by the incident of the Shunamite woman. Her request for means " to run to the man of God " is met by the question, " Wherefore to-day ? it is neither new moon nor Sabbath," implying a custom, on the part of religious people, of visiting the prophet weekly ; a practice that wd. imply something not unlike the later synagogue service. But one other aspect of prophetic activity must be noticed cursorily. While on one side nothing was so fitted to exalt Jewish national pride as the Messianic hope, the kge. that, as characteristic of that time, the " people wd. be all righteous," wd. be fitted to deepen the spirituality of those who " waited for the consolation of Isr." ; the coming of that glorious time was conditioned by the moral purity of the people.

The False Prophets.—As there were false gods so there were false prophets of these divinities ; thus at Carmel there were 450 men who were prophets of Baal. These, however, do not present the features of difficulty wh. the false prophets do who professed to speak in the name of J″. There was the old P. of Bethel who seduced the P. of Judah to his death ; there are the 400 prophets who persuaded Ahab to go up to Ramoth-Gilead and perish. Later, in the days of Jeremiah, we have, among others, Hananiah, who spoke in the name of the Lord, yet falsely ; God " did not send them yet they ran." We may not assume conscious imposture ; in the case of Hananiah he gave himself only " two full years " ere the falsity of his prediction wd. be manifest. The fact that there were physical concomitants to the presence of the Divine influence ; the further fact that, as is implied in the schools of the prophets, susceptibility to this cd. be increased if not induced ; all rendered poss. an unconscious or a semi-conscious simulation. Recalling what they had heard of the symptoms of Divine possession, they wd. cause their imagination to dwell on them till they seemed actually present to their experience. Thoughts rise in the mind conditioned by the predominant wish of the time ; their education has given them the power to express these thoughts in customary prophetic cadence. In confirmation of this it is to be observed that the false prophets seem to have belonged to the regular prophetic guild, who wd. have the kge. needful for this simulation : further, they were addicted to prophesy " smooth things " (Is. 30.[10]) ; i.e. declare things their audience desired to be true. Their messages wd. be applauded and themselves commended, hence the woe our Lord pronounces on those of whom all men speak well, " for so did their fathers to the false prophets." All the while they claim to be speaking in the name of the Lord, and prob. were to some extent themselves deceived. How cd. the ordinary Israelite distinguish the true fm. the false ? Fm. Dt. 18.[22] the test is : " If the thing follow not nor come to pass, that is the thing wh. the Lord hath not spoken."

Prediction.—When the P. was denunciatory, there was behind the denunciation a prophecy of doom ; the moral and the predictive blended into each other. As we have seen above, the failure or the fulfilment of a prediction was the test of the prophet's mission. So we find Micaiah (1 K. 22.[28]) admitting this test : " If thou return at all in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me." While prediction was thus a test of prophecy—the evidence that the moral truths the P. proclaimed were fm. God—such a function wd. only be a limited one ; the fulfilment must be soon enough to be within the poss. experience of his immediate audience. This, however, was not the opinion of the prophet's audience —they tended to put the message away fm. them : " The vision that he seeth is for many days to come, he prophesieth of times that are far off " (Ek. 12.[27]). When we consider the subject of most of the prophetic predictions this view is confirmed. These are mainly of two kinds : (1) Denunciatory, proclaiming the fall of kingdoms, mainly those of Judah and Israel. Amos denounced the fall of Israel in the splendid days of Jeroboam II. ; when God had delivered Jrs. and destroyed the host of Sennacherib, then it was that Isaiah declared that the seed of Hezekiah wd. be carried captive to Bab. If Is. 13. and 14. are authentic, before Bab. had attained an independent imperial power its overthrow was foreseen ; an event nearly two centuries off is described and exulted over. Fm. denunciatory prophecy it is imposs. to deduce that only what was of interest to his immediate audience was foretold by the P. In Is. 8. the P. was to engrave on a large tablet the name of his yet unborn son, Maher-shalal-hash-baz, and took witnesses in order that the date of the writing mt. be indisputable ; so that when destruction befell Rezin of Damascus and Pekah, the s. of Remaliah, there mt. be no poss. controversy as to the priority of the prophecy. Then there were (2) comforting promises of the Restoration fm. the Babylonian Captivity, and the times of the Messiah; behind that, and mingling with it, at all events in Daniel, is the Last Judgment. The second of these we shall consider separately, and the last belongs to ESCHATOLOGY. As to the Restoration, Jeremiah predicted the empire of Babylon and its overthrow when Nebuchadnezzar had only won his first battle ; this prediction is all the more telling that the period is fixed as seventy years. The probability was that very few, if any, of his auditors wd. live to the completion of this period ; their interest in the overthrow of an empire not yet arrived must have been slight; it found its raison d'être in the Captivity, when Daniel studied the letter of Jeremiah. When we turn to 1 P. 1.[12] we find that the apostle Peter, an inspired man, living while prophecy was an actual phenomenon, thinks that the prophets did not speak for their own time, and knew it was so. Their predictions were often ideal and symbolical reconstructions that did not expect ever to be realised, as Ezekiel dreaming over a redistribution of the land of Isr. under a restored prince of the house of David, and a ritual of worship in a glorified TEMPLE, with a mighty river taking its rise fm. the threshold of the sanctuary and sweetening the waters of the Salt Sea. These were parables, and suggested a spiritual fulfilment, not a fulfilment in the prose of actual fact.

Literary Prophecy.—We have seen it to be prob. that in the schools of the prophets the aspirants to the prophet's office got a certain amount of culture wh. may be called literary; and that perhaps they recorded the hist. of Isr. fm. the spiritual and prophetic side. Meanwhile prophecy, strictly speaking, was not generally written, but merely was spoken, or perhaps rather chanted. Many of the prophets, as ELIJAH and ELISHA, exercised their office more by deeds than words. When they spoke they gave utterance to no elaborate discourse, but spoke a few sharp sentences of rebuke, warning, or denunciation. By-and-by, as the outlook of prophecy became more extended, the necessity of giving it a permanent form arose into prominence. When prediction and fulfilment were separated by a considerable interval of time, it was needful, if it were to have any evidential force, that the prediction be recorded when it was delivered. Thus, when, in prediction of the overthrow of Pekah and Rezin, Isaiah named his s. Maher-shalal-hash-baz before his birth, the child's name was written on a tablet in the presence of witnesses; "in order that," to use the words of a Greater, "when it did come to pass they might believe." When the events foretold were more distant, the simple committing to writing served the purpose. It seems prob., although it is a subject of discussion, that the earliest of the prophetic writings wh. have come down to us is the short prophecy of JOEL, dating prob. fm. the beginning of the reign of JEHOASH.

Were we sure of the authenticity of JONAH it wd. of course be earlier than Joel; but, further, it is not a prediction but a history.

Joel begins with Divine judgments shown in a plague of locusts, and ends with "the day of the Lord." Nearly synchronous is OBADIAH; this prophecy is directed agst. Edom, and ends, like Joel, with deliverance coming "out of Zion."

There is a difficulty in regard to SEPHARAD; the LXX has Ephratha, "and the captivity of Jrs. shall inherit unto Ephratha"; the P.h. has the "captivity of Jrs. wh. is in Spain"; Tg. J. has "Ispamia, wh. prob. is Spain"; Jerome renders "Bosporus." In this textual confusion no deduction can be drawn; the frequent captivities of numbers of the Jews make it impossible to suggest any prop. emendation of text.

Next we have AMOS and HOSEA: both end with a time of happiness and restored prosperity to Israel. In the prophets of the Southern Kdm., ISAIAH and MICAH, we have the same characteristic. The splendid description of the return of the captives in Is. 35., the authenticity of wh. is not impugned, is a striking example of the outlook to a future of glory. In Micah we see it also present, but less definitely so. If we may date the 2nd Zechariah in this period (and there seems much to justify this), we find the same thing. In all these instances a time of humiliation is presupposed to separate the date of the prophecy fm. the vision of brightness. NAHUM's denunciation of Nineveh burns with unabated fierceness to the end; only a single sentence—half of wh. appears elsewhere—lightens the gloom of his denunciations (Na. 1.[15]; cp. Is. 52.[7]). HABAKKUK's Psalm ends not in glory but submission. Of the prophets of the Babylonian period JEREMIAH is the exception to this; and this is more apparent than real, for the destruction of Bab. is really the guarantee of the restoration of Judah. The prophets of the Restoration manifest the same phenomenon. We may then look on the "comfortable close" as a received law of prophetic composition. It wd. seem that in general the P. published the Divine message orally in the first instance, and then wrote down what he had been inspired to say. This necessitated that the prophecies shd. be published as literary productions, piecemeal, in small tracts each consisting of one vision or burden; these were then combined in a book. Sometimes it wd. seem that several short books were issued, each containing a number of prophecies. A good example of this is Isaiah; after the general introduction (chap. 1.) we have, "The word wh. Isaiah the son of Amoz saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem" (chaps. 2.–12.). Next we have the "Book of Burdens," wh. contains oracles agst. heathen peoples, ending with a summation of the results (chaps. 13.–27.). There is then the "Book of Woes," directed agst. the covenant people, wh. ends with the glowing account of the return of the captivity (chaps. 28.–35.). Whether these bks. were combined into one by the P. himself or by some literary executor we cannot tell.

The idea, to which the late Professor Davidson lent his venerable name, that the scribes "instead of keeping small anonymous prophecies apart by themselves, arranged them under general headings as Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the like," is incapable of proof, and the instances he gives, the Psalms and the Proverbs, are not to the point; the authorship of the non-Davidic Psalms is given and some are anonymous, so too with Proverbs. Ruth is an anonymous bk., yet it is not merged in any greater book.

Though Baruch appears to have been both amanuensis and literary executor of Jeremiah, yet there are portions that seem to show signs of having existed as separate collections; e.g. chaps. 27.–29. In the case of Ezekiel it wd. seem to have been to a large extent written fm. the first, and to have been edited by the P. himself. Daniel appears to have been issued in separate tracts, and edited at a slightly later date than that of the P. As to the material employed, whether clay tablets, papyrus rolls, parchment, or ostraka, we have not information to decide: possibly the material used was not in all cases the same.

Messianic Prophecy.—It is the Messianic idea and its fulfilment in our Lord that gives prophecy its value to us; it is because all the prophets testify of Him that we study them now. That the Jews, at the time when our Lord was in the world, had the expectation that one wd. come fm. their land, and fm. the race of their great king, who shd. rule the world, is incontestable. Josephus makes use of it to curry favour with Vespasian, by pretending to believe that the prophets spoke of him. When we go back to the apocalyptic books we find the dominant idea is the coming of the Messiah and Messianic times. The most interesting of these is that collection of visions called the book of Enoch, in wh. we find the Messiah designated "Son of Man," and regarded as, if not Divine, at all events super-angelic. These ideas had been borrowed fm. the prophets originally, but they had developed. When we look back on the prophets we find, as we already remarked, that all of them, if only in a sentence, indicated a great absorbing hope, when "a king shd. reign in righteousness," and "the people wd. be all righteous," when "the isles shd. bring presents to him, Sheba and Seba shd. offer gifts." This king was to be of the race and lineage of David; indeed, if the words were pressed to their literal meaning, it wd. be David himself who was to reascend his throne (Ek. 37.[24]; Ho. 3.[5]). The dominion of the Messiah is to be "fm. sea to sea"—not merely fm. the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf, but to the great ocean stream that engirdled the earth: starting fm. the river (Euphrates), the boundary of the Davidic empire, it was to extend to "the ends of the earth." Although there is all this splendour, there is, especially in the 2nd Isaiah, a description of "the Servant of the Lord" who shd. be "despised and rejected of men"; He is to be "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." There was a difficulty in harmonising these two pictures of the Promised One. Along with these there was the representation of the Messiah as a warrior "travelling in the greatness of His strength," with His "garments dyed in blood." While we have thus the general features of the Coming One sketched out fm. the external point of view, He is promised also as Himself a Prophet (Dt. 18.[15]). This is interesting, as it seems to have been this aspect of the Messiah that most impressed the Samaritans (Jn. 4.[25]).

At the Congress of Orientalists at Stockholm in 1889, Merx gave an account of a Samaritan hymn to the Messiah under the name "Taheb," wh. he had found in a MS. at Gotha. It is said, "J". shall call Him and teach Him, and shall give Him a writing (michtab) and clothe Him with prophecy." Yet "His kdm. is to be exalted, and He shall reign over seven nations." The result was to be that "The Jews shall say, 'This is He, let us come under His law (b'datho'); cursed be Ezra and the words wh. he wrote to his shame; a rocky mountain (ṭôr har) is Gerizim the holy, there is not among the mountains its like.'" It ends with the statement that He is the Prophet like to Moses.

Special features in the life of the Messiah are noted: His birth at "BETHLEHEM of Judah"; that He was to be born of a virgin, and enter into Jrs. riding on an ass; that He shd. die a death of shame, yet be buried in a rich man's tomb; all these and many more are quoted by Justin Martyr in his dialogue with Trypho. Much light is thrown on what passages are reckoned Messianic by the Jews, by the Targums; and by the proofs of our Lord's Messiahship adduced by the apostles. The more orthodox Jews still have extravagant hopes of the glories of the times of the Messiah.

Fulfilment of Prophecy.—In considering this we must bear in mind the idea prevalent among the Jews at the time of our Lord, of what was to be regarded as fulfilment. In many instances, when we shd. say such a phrase mt. be aptly quoted, the evangelist says, "Then was fulfilled"; although in many cases the meaning they attach to fulfilment is what we shd. not, e.g. Mw. 2.[15]; cp. Ho. 11.[1]. Prophecy was poetical, and therefore clothed in symbolic language. These symbols were of necessity expressed in terms intelligible to those to whom they were uttered. This is a view held by the rabbins; e.g. Edom is held to mean Rome. It is in accordance with this that it is maintained that promises given in terms to Isr. and Jrs. may be transferred to the Christian Church. Again it must be remembered that prophecy was always conditional; the destruction pronounced on Nineveh by Jonah was conditional on their failure to repent. As there was a human element in prophecy it is poss. that at times the P. misinterpreted the message he had been appointed to deliver. Thus Ezekiel proclaims the absolute desolation of Tyre (Ek. 26.[19, 21]): "Thus saith the Lord God, When I shall make thee a desolate city, like the cities that are not inhabited . . . I will make thee a terror; though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again." Taken absolutely, this means that Tyre shd. disappear as completely as have Bab. and Nineveh; yet Tyre has had a continuous history down to the present time. The utter disappearance of Tyre as an independent imperial power is interpreted by the P. as applying to the city. Certainly the contrast is immense between the insignificant village, that does not occupy the half of the ancient site, and the huge city described by Ezekiel, with its crowded marts.

NT. Prophecy.—In NT. the prophet is most prominent as one who "foretells," e.g. AGABUS (Ac. 11.[28], 21.[10]). The apostle Paul in 1 Cor. 14. gives a different idea of the function of the P.; in v. 3 prophecy is "speaking to men to edification and exhortation and comfort," but not a word of prediction; at the same time prediction is not excluded. It wd. seem that in the first century of the Church the P. was a regular official (1 Cor. 12.[28]; Eph. 4.[11]). In the Didache there is an account of the treatment to be accorded to the prophets, who are regarded as standing officials. It is to be noted that in the Didache the prophets are supposed to travel about fm. church to church; they seem to have borne with them no letters of authentication, for their right to assume the prophetic office was to be proved by their actions. The office very soon disappeared.

PROPITIATION. See SACRIFICE.

PROSELYTE. The Greek prosēlutos, "new comer," is the usual LXX equivalent of the Heb. gēr (see STRANGER). There is no distinction in the language of the OT. between the "stranger" who sojourns in the land of Israel, and the foreigner who not only dwells in Palestine but has submitted to the characteristic rites, and become identified with Israel as a religious community. One who had been circumcised and admitted to a share in the Passover feast could no longer be regarded as in any sense an alien. If the name gēr still attached to him it could only be as an indication of his origin. These concessions, however, in the earlier times, seem to have been due to the initiative and desire of the strangers themselves, and not to any attempt on the part of Israelites to produce a change in their faith. There is no evidence of any movement within Israel having for its object the conversion of the heathen to the service of Jehovah. On the contrary, in the story of the prophet Jonah we have probably a reflection of the narrow and exclusive temper of the average Israelite. Even the loftier souls among the OT. saints, who caught glimpses of the universal dominion of Jehovah, seem to have thought rather of the political subjection of the nations than of their conversion to the true faith. They were to be made the servants of Jehovah's people (Is. 60.[11f.]).

In later times Greek influence produced a liberalising effect upon the mind of Israel, especially among the Jews of the Dispersion. Away from the limitations of the little land, with its rigid ideas, and system of rule inherited from the past, they came into contact with the world's civilisation, and felt the throb of a larger life. They were touched by the claims of what was human, as distinguished from what was merely national. On the other hand, the sublime conception of the one God, wedded to the pure and high morality manifest in the life of the Jews, attracted many who found here something better and more satisfying than heathen systems had ever been able to produce. They were thus favourably inclined to the teaching which the Jews were moved to impart; and very many, by its power upon their hearts, were enabled to overcome the repulsion created by a ritual which to them must have been extremely offensive. The dream of a world devoted to the worship and service of Jehovah, quickened the enthusiasm of the Jews. If the movement was at first characterised by high spiritual sympathy and aims, it gradually lost that character, and conversion came to mean little more, if anything, than mere change of "customs." To bring about this change in the case of their heathen neighbours at a later time, Maccabæan princes did not scruple to use force (Jos. Ant. XIII. ix. 1, xi. 3, xv. 4; XV. vii. 9); and only great zeal in proselytising could have justified the words of Jesus, which scathingly expose the ethical futility of the process: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is become so, ye make him twofold more a son of hell than yourselves" (Mw. 23.[15]). The intense eagerness with which the work of proselytism was carried on in the latter days of the Jewish State, may have been due in some measure to the natural desire to increase the number of those who, in the conflict that must have seemed inevitable, would stand for its defence. The extinction of all hope of success against the arms of Rome may account for the decline of proselytism quite as much as the decree of Hadrian forbidding circumcision. Certain it is that Jewish efforts to make converts soon ceased, and the community, although widely scattered, was knit into a unity more hard and self-contained than ever; resisting all influences from without, and seeking to make no religious impression upon the peoples in the midst of whom they sojourned.

"Proselyte" in the NT. means simply a Gentile convert to Judaism. "Proselyte of the gate" is a phrase of the later rabbis, denoting a sojourner in the land of Israel. The true proselyte they distinguished as the "proselyte of righteousness." From the later rabbis also we learn that the proselyte on admission was circumcised: this, when the wound had healed, was followed by a bath, and then he was required to provide a sacrifice; whereupon he assumed all the responsibilities of a member of the Jewish religious community.

Proselytes are not to be confused with God-fearing men among the heathen, who took a more or less favourable view of the Jewish faith, like Cornelius, the Ethiopian eunuch, and others. Although they had not seen their way to take the final step of identifying themselves with Judaism, by submission to the essential rites, they were worshippers of the one true God, and attended Divine service in the synagogues. Among them were distinguished benefactors of the Jewish people, like the centurion who had built them a synagogue (Lk. 7.^{5}). They made contributions to the Temple, and observed Jewish customs as to the Sabbath, &c. They were not committed, like the proselytes, to the attitude of antagonism to Christianity assumed by the Jews. In this particular, indeed, the proselytes seem to have attained a bad pre-eminence. Speaking of them, Jerome says (Dial. 122): "The proselytes not only do not believe, but twofold more than yourselves blaspheme His name, and wish to torture and put to death us who believe in Him." Among the "God-fearing," on the other hand, the Gospel and its messengers seem to have met with a fair and unprejudiced reception.

PROVERBS. The book of Proverbs occupies a place in the third collection of the books of the Hebrew Bible, coming after Psalms and before Job. It was thus among the latest books to receive admission into the Canon. Objections to its canonicity are mentioned in the Talmud, but these are not important, and its use in the New Testament shows the authority it enjoyed at the time of Christ.

It consists of collections of proverbs (Hebrew, meshālīm) compiled by some unknown editor from various sources to enforce the teaching of wisdom in the Jewish sense, i.e. the practical conduct of life. The collections used are indicated (at any rate in part) by the titles given in the following sections:

Chaps. 1.–9. The Praise of Wisdom, ascribed to Solomon (9.^{1}).

Chaps. 10.^{1}–22.^{16}. Also ascribed to Solomon (10.^{1}), although this title is not in the Greek translation.

Chaps. 22.^{17}–24.^{22}. The Words of the Wise (22.^{17}).

Chap. 24.$^{23-34}$. Also the Words of the Wise (24.^{23}).

Chaps. 25.–29. "The Proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out" (25.^{1}).

Chap. 30. The Words of Agur.

Chap. 31.$^{1-9}$. The Words of King Lemuel.

Chap. 31.$^{10-31}$. An alphabetic poem concerning the virtuous woman.

The originally independent existence of these collections, suggested by the titles, is confirmed by the occurrence of the same proverb in identical or slightly varying words in the different divisions: cp. 11.^{14b} with 24.^{6b}, 13.^{9b} with 24.^{20b}, 18.^{8} with 26.^{22}, 19.^{1} with 28.^{6}, 24.^{23b} with 28.^{21a} (and other instances mentioned in C. H. Toy's Commentary, Intro. § 3).

By its subject the book of Proverbs is connected with the canonical books Job and Ecclesiastes, and the apocryphal Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon. These all together form the Wisdom Literature of the Hebrews. They are concerned with the practical problems of the personal religious life, and those not of Jewish life only, but of human life. When these works were written, Jewish thinkers had come in contact with the life and thought of Persia and Greece, and so, while they remained Jews, their outlook on life had become broader than that of the prophets and lawmakers who had preceded them. The special features of Judaism, its Temple, its ritual, its Messianic hope, do not appear. Questions of human conduct are the only matters of interest. The book of Proverbs differs from Ecclesiastes in that the latter professes to give the experiences of an individual, while the former is founded on the wisdom of the people, as it is accustomed to express itself in pithy fashion. It differs from Job, which is devoted to the consideration of one problem, by its general interest, its large observation, and its interest in common life.

The form in which the book is written is generally that of the māshāl or short proverbial saying, in which as a rule the phenomena of the natural world are used to illustrate or suggest those of the ethical and religious life. While these sayings were occasionally in prose, they were usually put in the form of parallel or antithetic statements, thus making couplets, sometimes groups of four lines, rarely of three, sometimes, however, expanded into strophes, which may be regarded as sonnets. The lines themselves are rhythmical, but probable differences between the later and earlier pronunciation of words and the imperfection of the text make it difficult to determine the accents.

As regards authorship, a distinction must be made between (1) the compiler of the work in its present form; (2) the compilers of the collections composing the work; and (3) the authorship of the separate proverbs. The ascription to Solomon cannot apply to the whole book, for other authors are named in 22.^{17}, 25.^{23}, 30.^{1}, 31.^{1}, while the ascription to Solomon in 10.^{1} is not found in the Greek version. Moreover, the objective way in which the king is spoken of (20.^{2}, 25.^{3}, 29.^{4}), the warnings against unchastity, and the praise of one wife, scarcely seem to indicate a Solomonic authorship for the passages containing them. The ascription of a Wisdom book to Solomon (cp. the Wisdom of Solomon) was founded on 1 K. 4.^{32}, and was as natural as the ascription of laws to Moses and Psalms to David. The whole work in its present form is, on account of its thought and its language, ascribed to an editor of the late Persian or early Greek period of Jewish history.

Of the collections used, the second (chaps. 10.^{1}–22.^{16}) seems to be the kernel of the book. It consists of 375 proverbs almost entirely in couplets, and mostly antithetic (375 is the numerical value of the consonants in the Hebrew form of the name Solomon). To this section were added the next two collections (22.^{17}–24.^{22} and 24.$^{23-34}$), while chaps. 25.–29. must have been added later still, otherwise it is hard to understand why they should have been separated from 10.^{1}–22.^{16}. Chaps. 1.–9. seem to have been prefixed to the whole later. In them Wisdom is treated much more as a personification (especially in chap. 8.). Chaps. 30. and 31. are generally regarded as a part of the latest material in the book, and may have been added at any time before the final editing. The dates of these separate collections cannot be determined with any approach to certainty.

As regards the individual proverbs, there is no means of determining either author or date. Doubtless much is old, and goes back to popular sayings, though they have been put in more literary form by editors.

The teaching of the book as a whole may be gathered from chaps. 1.–9. Its purpose is "to know wisdom and instruction," i.e. it is a handbook of personal religion. That it is religious and not merely ethical is shown by the use of the same words ("pious, righteous, wicked, sinner," &c.) as in the other books of the Old Testament. Wisdom is not the abstract idea of the Greek philosophy, but a religious and practical conception. Its beginning is the fear of the Lord (1.^{7}, 9.^{10}), which is to know God (2.^{5}), to understand righteousness and judgment and equity (2.^{9}, 1.^{3}), and to hate evil (8.^{13}). Wisdom comes from God (2.^{6}) and brings God's favour (8.^{35}). It bestows life (3.$^{16, 18}$, 6.^{23}, 8.^{35}), riches (3.^{16}, 8.^{21}), honour (3.^{16}, 4.$^{8, 9}$, 8.^{18}) and security (1.^{33}). Its appeal is not to a class but to all men (1.$^{20, 21}$, 8.$^{1-3}$, 9.$^{1-6}$). G. W. THATCHER.

PROVINCE (Lat. provincia, Gr. eparchia) meant originally the sphere within which a Roman magistrate exercised sovereign authority. It might be used also, as among ourselves, to indicate different departments of business. With the extension and organisation of the Roman dominions it came to denote an administrative district, paying tribute in taxes, and ruled by a Roman magistrate, proconsul or pro-prætor, answerable to the senate. The magistrate received no salary, while his outlays were very heavy. But the position was greatly coveted, because it furnished an opportunity of growing rich at the expense of the people. Grievous extortion was practised, and often, after a single year of office, an enormous fortune was carried away.

Under Augustus an arrangement was made in accordance with which the provinces where peace prevailed were to be governed under the supervision of the senate, while those where military occupation was required were to be under the direct control of the emperor—the commander-in-chief of the armies of the empire (see ROMAN EMPIRE, II.).

Under the empire the condition of the provinces was greatly improved. Extortion was sternly repressed, the governors received a stated salary, and each province had what was practically its own constitution—a statute, the terms of which guided the administration. The larger imperial provinces were governed by means of a Legatus pro prætore, an officer of prætorian or consular rank. The small province of Judæa was governed by means of a "procurator," whose business it was to preserve order, and especially to see that the imperial taxes were duly collected and forwarded to the proper quarter.

PSALMS, BOOK OF. The first book in that third division of the Jewish Canon of the OT. which is designated Ketubim or Hagiographa. It may have been this circumstance that occasioned the expression "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms" (Lk. 24.^{44}) as a designation of the whole OT. Scriptures; although it is possible that our Lord, in using the words, had in view the book of Psalms specifically, for no other book is quoted more frequently in the NT. In point of fact, the place of Psalms in the Canon seems to have varied. The oft-quoted passage in Baba Bathra puts Ruth before the Psalms. The order in our English Version, in which Job precedes, is given by Jerome, and is the usual order in German MSS., whereas many Spanish MSS. place Chron. first.

On a general and superficial view, the Psalter resembles any of our hymn-books, in being made up of a collection of sacred compositions of various tone and contents, suggesting that it may have been the work of various authors at various times, and probably having a history of composition similar to that of more modern collections. One difference strikes the reader, that, as compared with these, it does not to nearly the same extent group the hymns according to the subject matter. Another thing is remarkable, that, though there is a word prefixed to many of the compositions (mizmôr) which we translate "psalm," there is no plural of the word to denote the whole as a collection of Psalms. The name mizmôr is given only to this class of composition: another word, shir, frequently used alongside of it, may be applied to a secular song. The Hebrew name given to the collection, Tehillim, means "praises," indicating, no doubt, the use of the Psalms in common worship. Another word is found in Ps. 72.[20], which seems to be the earliest designation, viz., Tephilloth or "prayers." And this term is significant, for many of the Psalms are direct prayers, and, in general, they imply a lifting up of the soul, in confession, praise, or prayer, to God; so that, as has been said, as the law is God's voice to man, the Psalms are man's response to God. This view, along with the prominent part assigned to the Psalms in public worship, led at an early time to the arrangement or division of the whole into five books, to correspond, it is supposed, with the fivefold book of the law.

The place which the book of Psalms occupies in the Hebrew Bible may be taken as an indication that, as a completed work, the collection came into the Canon at a comparatively late date, and suggests that we may be prepared to find in it compositions of a date not far remote from the time of the closing of the Canon. At the same time, however, in a collection of sacred songs like this, we may expect to meet with compositions of various antiquity. It has become customary to describe the Psalter as the Book of Praise of the second Temple. The expression is correct as applied to the completed collection, but it is misleading if intended to imply that no part of its contents was known or used in praise before that time; otherwise the statement has no more significance than, e.g., to say that such and such a modern collection is the hymnbook of this or that branch of the Christian Church. The Psalter as a whole is indeed a more characteristic and integral part of the worship of the Church than of the worship of the synagogue. In point of fact, we have to fall back on an examination of the Psalter itself, and generally on an examination of its individual elements, for indications of the manner in which the collection was made and the time at which the individual Psalms were composed.

The division into five books, as now exhibited in our RV., does not help us far towards a conclusion as to the growth of the Psalter. It is evidently a late arrangement or division of what at the time was substantially a whole. But, underneath and behind the fivefold division, there are indications that point to what was either another division or a process of growth by the accretion of smaller collections. For example, there are larger or smaller groups with the same headings. Thus there are seventy-three entitled "to David," twelve "to Asaph," eleven "to the sons of Korah," two "to Solomon," one "to Moses the man of God," &c. Then there are the so-called "Songs of Degrees" (RV. "Ascents"), the "Hallelujah" Psalms, with the refrain, "Praise ye the Lord," &c. Moreover, there is a significant addition to the 72nd Psalm at the close of Book II., "The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended," which looks like a colophon to a collection ending at that place; and it is to be observed that almost all the Psalms up to that point bear the name of David, though there are others with his name in later parts of the book, the proportion being fifty-five in Books I. and II. out of a total of seventy-three in the whole Psalter. From such indications the conclusion is a reasonable one that the Psalter was a work that grew out of smaller collections; and that the headings, which might seem to denote authorship, are rather to be taken as indicating the names by which the smaller collections were known, or at least the names of prominent persons associated with psalmody, to whom the collections as such were ascribed. When we attempt, however, to trace the whole process of collection, and to determine the authors of the several compositions, we are on less secure ground. We may conclude that the colophon to Ps. 72. marks the point at which an original book of Psalms or "prayers" passing as Davidic ended; but how the succeeding portions came into their places is not so apparent. There is one feature which may help towards more light on the process. It has been observed that, in the Psalter, as in the Pentateuch, there is a varying usage in regard to the Divine name, some portions being mainly "Jehovistic" (i.e. employing predominantly the name Jehovah), while others are as notably "Elohistic" (using the name Elohim). The proportions are these: in the Psalms forming the first book (1.–41.) the name Jehovah occurs 272 times, while Elohim is found only 15 times; in the second book, on the other hand (Pss. 42.–72.), Elohim occurs 164 times, while Jehovah occurs 30 times. In the third book as it stands, the numbers are about equal, Jehovah 44 times and Elohim 43 times; but in the former half of this book, up to Ps. 83., Elohim preponderates, while in the second half Jehovah is more frequent. In Books IV. and V. Jehovah vastly preponderates, occurring in Bk. IV. 103 times, while Elohim is absent, and in Bk. V. 237 times to 7 occurrences of Elohim. This might suggest, as underlying the fivefold division, a threefold collection, Jehovistic, Elohistic, and Jehovistic; and there may be here a trace or reminiscence of the triennial cycle in which the books of the law were read in the synagogue. What may have been the reason for this preference of the one divine name or the other, here or in the Pnt., has never been satisfactorily explained. That it was intentional and deliberate there can be no doubt, as the numbers show. Moreover, we find what are practically two readings of the same Psalm, the one Jehovistic and the other Elohistic. Compare Ps. 14. with Ps. 53., Ps. 40.[13-17] with Ps. 70., Ps. 108. with Ps. 57.[7-11] and 60.[5-12]. The conclusion is most probable that there were two separate collections, a Jehovistic (now in Bk. I.) and an Elohistic (in Bk. II.), which were combined before the doxology was added at the end of Bk. II., and that the remaining parts of the Psalter are made up of other smaller collections or additions from time to time. Modifications, however, may have been made in the arrangement during the process or at the time of final redaction. As has just been indicated, e.g., an Elohistic portion in the beginning of the third book is separated from its kindred portion in Bk. II., and combined with a Jehovistic portion. And, in the process of adjustment, it is quite possible that late Psalms may have got inserted into what was an earlier collection, as it is also possible that Psalms reputed early may have only come into the collection at a later stage of the process. On this, and on the whole question of the growth of the Psalter, there is much uncertainty, and very various opinions have been held. Modern critics are mostly of opinion that even the earliest collection was not made till after the Exile. However that may be, the books of Chronicles (about B.C. 300) speak of psalmody as very ancient, and in one chap. (1 Ch. 16.) there are found portions of three Psalms (96., 105., 106.), which are not regarded as among the earlier. The bk. of Psalms is included in the Greek of the LXX made about two centuries B.C. Again, in the prologue to Ecclesiasticus (written B.C. 132), the author mentions that in the time of his grandfather (about B.C. 180) the Canon of the OT. consisted of three parts, "the Law, the Prophets, and the other books of our Fathers," and that a Greek translation of these was known and current in his time. And, finally, in 1 M. 7.[17] (about a century B.C.), a Psalm, which is so appropriate to those times that many have concluded it is of Maccabæan date (Ps. 79.), is quoted as Scripture.

Distinct, however, from the question of the date of the collection, is the question of the date of the individual Psalms of which it is composed, and the whole subject of the origin and history of this kind of composition. For, before a collection was formed, there must have been Psalms to collect; and, as each Psalm is a complete piece in itself, they may have been composed at sundry times by different hands, and gathered from various quarters. If we may judge from the case of other compositions of this kind in other languages, we may suppose that Psalms were first composed as the expression of the personal feelings or experiences of the poet, and afterwards were adopted for use in public worship. This was the case with many of the hymnic pieces now incorporated in the Jewish Prayer-books; and many of the best hymns in our Christian collections were first composed without reference to public worship. It will be observed that the Psalms in the later part of the book are for the most part of a more directly liturgical character than those, e.g., in the first book. The names, however, of persons standing in the headings of the Psalms cannot be pressed to prove authorship; for these headings must be regarded as later editorial additions, and probably were not intended to denote authorship in the strict sense of the word. At the same time, these names were no doubt affixed because the persons named were in a special way associated with sacred song and music. Since David is traditionally regarded as the one who introduced sacred song into the sanctuary service, and since he had a unique fame as a poet, one would naturally expect to find Psalms of David in the collection, and we can readily understand how, in process of time, the whole collection was known by his name, just as the Pnt. came to be spoken of as the five books of Moses. When, however, the attempt is made to specify particular Psalms as Davidic, or indeed to determine the date and authorship of individual Psalms, the evidence is far from decisive, and different critics have assigned the same Psalms to periods separated by centuries. This kind of composition, as modern collections prove, is peculiarly liable to additions and modifications in the course of transmission. The very character, also, of the Psalms which gives them their power and charm—their subjective lyrical nature, expressing itself in modes of the mind and heart, rather than in pictures of external events and phenomena—makes it possible to refer them to various situations of history and experience, just as it has made them appropriate to men in various situations in all succeeding generations of the Church.

It can hardly be doubted that sacred song of some kind was practised in the pre-exilian Temple. The guilds of singers who returned from the Captivity and exercised prominent functions in the restored service of the second Temple could not have originated in the Exile; and even the exiles by the streams of Babylon thought regretfully of the Lord's song in a strange land (Ps. 137.[4]). The prophet Jeremiah in one passage gives us incidentally a hint of what was apparently in his time a familiar and long-established use of sacred song (Jr. 33.[11]), when, in predicting the return from captivity, he says: "Again shall be heard in this place . . . the voice of joy and the voice of gladness . . . the voice of them that say, Give thanks to the Lord of hosts, for the Lord is good, for His mercy endureth for ever, and of them that bring sacrifices of thanskgiving into the house of the Lord"—using the very phrases of some of the Psalms in the later part of the collection (cp. Pss. 106.[1], 107.[1, 22]). What was the character and amount of that Temple song we do not know. We know, however, that lyrical composition was practised from an early time, and that poems of a hymnic kind are found embodied in the historical and prophetical books. The 18th Psalm is found in 2 S. 22.; we have the ancient songs of Moses (Ex. 15.) and Deborah (Jg. 5.), the hymnic pieces in Dt. 32. and 33., the song of Hannah (1 S. 2.), and the elegies of David over Saul and Jonathan (2 S. 1.) and over Abner (2 S. 3.[34]). And there are various pieces in the prophetical books which may be described as Psalms, e.g., Is. 12., 38.[10-20]; Hb. 3.; Jh. 2. Such an amount of poetical composition abundantly proves that Psalm production was not beyond the power of pre-exilian writers. And, though we may have to confess that we cannot for the most part identify the portions of the Psalter that were of earliest origin, we cannot but assume that the singers who came up from the Captivity preserved the traditions of an earlier time. The various headings of Psalms and small collections point to the manner in which these traditions were preserved; and no doubt after the Exile there was an outburst of "new song," and a more systematic cultivation both of psalmody and music.

The headings or superscriptions of the Psalms, to which reference has already been made, call for more special remark. These cannot be regarded as parts of the original compositions. They must have been added subsequently, and possibly not all at one time, in connection with the editorial process of collecting and arranging the Psalter. They consist of various elements. In a considerable number we find names of persons to whom, in some sense, the Psalm in question is ascribed. In most cases, probably, they indicate collections known by the names they bear; and they cannot in all cases be taken to mean authorship, as, e.g., those "to the sons of Korah." Yet it might be too much to say that the persons who added them had not some tradition or belief in some instances that the Psalm in question was from the hand of the person named, or else the collector, or even the writer, may have considered it befitting the situation and experience of the person, e.g., the Psalm of Moses (90.), the two Psalms of Solomon (72., 127.), and many of those assigned to David. For, it will be observed, a second element enters into the superscriptions, in the case of many Psalms in the first collection, which not only bear the name of David, but indicate the situation in his history, in which the collector thought the Psalm originated, or to which the Psalm was suitable. These historical notes are only found in Davidic Psalms, and only in those in the earlier portion of the book, where indeed, if anywhere, we are likely to find compositions of the Psalmist king. A third element consists of those musical or liturgical directions "to the chief musician," followed generally by expressions, the precise import of which has not yet been determined. Some of them, as Sheminith, Alamoth, Neginoth, seem to refer to the kind of music or musical instrument with which the Psalm was to be accompanied. Others may refer to titles of ancient melodies to which the Psalm was adapted, such as "the hind of the dawn" (22.), "the dove of the distant terebinths" (56.), and perhaps others. The "songs of Ascents" (120.–134. RV.) may have been considered suitable for use by the pilgrims in their goings up to the great periodical festivals, though other explanations of the title have been given. And we have one instance, in the "song for the Sabbath day" (92.), of what became a custom, of assigning certain Psalms for use on stated occasions. These notes must have been of comparatively early origin, and most probably arose out of the liturgical use of the Psalms, for, by the time of the LXX translators, who may not have been familiar with the arrangements of song in the Temple, they seem to have been unintelligible, to judge from the vague and variable renderings of that and other early versions.

It is almost as difficult to classify the Psalms according to their subject-matter as to assign to each its occasion of composition; and for the same reason. There are, it is true, a number that may be called historical, which take a review of the fortunes and vicissitudes of the people as a whole; and there are some which may be called Nature-psalms, celebrating the wonderful works of creation and providence. There are also what have been called "kingly" Psalms, and "Messianic" Psalms; and attempts have been made to classify the whole according to their "themes." It will be found, however, that a Psalmist does not adhere to one theme throughout a Psalm. In particular, a subjective influence comes into play; and, if any classification is to be made, it has to be made according to the prevailing tone of the piece, as plaintive, jubilant, penitential, thankful, and so forth. And yet, even here, a Psalm that begins on one tone may change to another before the close.

This characteristic of the Psalms, which makes the question of their literary form and primary occasion so difficult a problem to the critic, is the very feature which has endeared them to the pious of all ages, and given them a hold upon the religious consciousness in every variety of circumstance. The human soul here finds its many moods interpreted to itself, and readily adopts the language of the Psalms in its communing with itself, its struggles with sin, its aspirations after holiness, its efforts to reach the heart of God. However varied may have been the experience of God's children from age to age, they have turned to the Psalms for words in which to express it, and channels through which to find relief. No doubt many of the Psalms, especially at a later stage of Psalm composition, were composed with a direct reference to public worship, and intended to express national hopes, fears, encouragements; and no doubt many more, composed in the first instance to express the individual emotions of the Psalmist, were, like hymns in our modern collections, found suitable and adopted as expressions of the common feelings of the congregation. But it is unjustifiable to say that all the Psalms, or even the Psalms for the most part, have only a corporate or national reference, and that when the pronoun "I" is employed it must be taken to denote Israel as a whole, or what is called the Jewish Church. Psalm-writers could employ personification, and can clearly indicate when they mean to do so (see, e.g., Ps. 129.). But, even if personification is intended where it is not overtly indicated, it is clear that a writer must have had a conception of the individually personal before he could clothe the nation or community in the dress of the individual. As in Christian congregations the whole can sing hymns, whether the speaker be I or We, so we must admit that, in the Jewish synagogue, the Psalms were found suitable for devotion because the feelings they expressed were such as were common to the individual and to the congregation as a whole. This is the special interest of the Psalms in connection with the whole subject of the history of OT. religion, that they give proof of the presence of a religion of a simple but genuine kind, which did not consist in meats and drinks and divers offerings, but in the answer of the conscience towards God. Thus the Psalms were prophetic in the truest sense, inasmuch as, in the consciousness of sin which they express, in the longing for God and for righteousness which breathes through them, they give proof that the discipline of the old economy had not been without effect, and point forward to the redemption that was to come in the end of the days. They preserved and nurtured a remnant that was not swallowed up in ritual formalism and legal self-sufficiency, and they made ready a people prepared for the Lord. The appearance of the infant Jesus in the Temple was hailed by devout ones as Simeon and Anna, who poured out their welcome in the language of the Psalms. The earliest preaching of the Gospel in many instances took these prophetic songs for its text; and down through the history of the Christian Church, in dark catacombs, or stately cathedrals, in humble cottage, on hillside conventicles, as in cloistered monasteries or in lordly palaces, on lonely sick-beds, amidst the fires of the stake, the devout soul has found a voice for its deepest and most varied feelings in the simple words of the Psalms.

PUBLICAN. Under the Roman system great societies were formed who "farmed" the imperial taxes. They paid a certain sum to the treasury, which was thus freed from the trouble of collecting

The Publican's Corn Seal

The societies appointed agents, who were called publicani, to gather the taxes. Whatever they were able to secure over and above the sum paid to the treasury was gain to the societies employing them. The "publicans" of the Gospels were natives of the country who attended to this business at the various points of collection. The revenue from Palestine belonged to the emperor (cp. Mw. 22.[17], &c.), and its supervision was the main duty of the Procurator. The publicans were thus the agents of the heathen oppressor of their people. The Jewish law authorised taxation only for religious purposes. The publicans were therefore regarded as traitors alike to their country and to their religion, stooping to infamy for the sake of private gain. They were driven from the religious community, and treated with the utmost hatred and contempt, as no better than pariah dogs. The recurring phrase "publicans and sinners" is eloquent of the estimation in which they were held. Jesus differed from the religious teachers of His time in having kindly thoughts even for publicans, and His hopeful kindness was vindicated by the conversion of Matthew and Zaccheus.

The taxes now are collected in kind as well as in money. Until the publican's demand from the corn-heap has been met it is carefully guarded, an impress being made upon it by means of a "seal," as shown in the illustration.

PUBLIUS, the officer in charge of Malta, who entertained St. Paul (Ac. 28.[7f.]), was probably the representative of the prætor of Sicily and Malta. Tradition says that he became first bishop of Malta, and afterwards bishop of Athens. According to Jerome (De Viris Illust. xix.) he received the martyr's crown.

PUDENS, a Christian in Rome during the last imprisonment of St. Paul, mentioned as sending salutations to Timothy (2 Tm. 4.[21]). Tradition represents him as having been one of "the seventy" who accompanied St. Paul on his missionary journeys, and suffered martyrdom with him at Rome. In the Greek Church he is commemorated on the 14th of April. The name was not uncommon, and perhaps the suggestion referred to under Claudia must be regarded as merely fanciful.

PURIFICATION. In the Mosaic dispensation communion between God and man was subject to certain limitations, or in other words, the right of approach to the Deity was only allowed to man on the condition that he was ceremonially clean. Although this was essentially a religious idea, there was linked with it the necessity of bodily cleanness, so that in this matter also there was a needful preparation to meet with God (Gn. 35.[2]; Ex. 30.[20]). Apart fm. this there were various degrees of ceremonial impurity dependent upon cert. conditions of the body, or brought about by contact with what was in itself unclean; and that these mt. be removed, and the Isr. restored to his normal state and right to participate in divine things, the laws of purification had to be observed. It is to be particularly noted that all connection with the worship of other gods is everywhere in the OT. regarded as defiling, and so all relationship to them by way of magic and sorcery as also particular ways of cutting the hair and marking the skin, are strictly forbidden (Lv. 19.[27, 28]). Whoever has to do with such things is unclean (Jr. 2.[23]), and, as we shall see, nearly all the defiling elements came to be considered so fm. some supposed connection with false deities. For such reasons a great variety of foods (Lv. 11.; Dt. 14.) were forbidden to the Isr. These have indeed been classified in Deuteronomy in a particular way, but still behind it there seems to be an original reason for their prohibition in virtue of their being in some way connected with false worship. We know that in Egp. many of the animals were considered sacred to one or other of the gods, and although we cannot here trace the reason for each particular case, we learn enough to judge that the essence of the prohibition was in this. In Is. 65.[4], 66.[17] we see that the eating of swine's flesh was connected with idolatrous rites.

Closely connected with this was the prohibition of blood (Lv. 19.[26]), and consequently, as containing the blood, whatever died of itself or was torn by a wild animal (Lv. 17.[15]). This is explained fm. the fact that the blood is the life, and that the life belongs to the Lord, but this claim is so emphatically set forth that we cannot doubt it is in contrast to the claims made for the life-giving and fertilising deities of heathendom. This becomes all the more apparent when we consider the various causes of uncleanness connected with sexual relations—gonorrhœa dormientium (Lv. 15.[16, 17]) in the man, the monthly period in women (Lv. 15.[21-24]), sexual intercourse (Lv. 15.[18]), and child-birth (Lv. 12.). There is nothing in the OT. that suggests that the sexual life was in itself immoral or sinful, while sanitary and æsthetic grounds seem insufficient cause for the regulations made. Still, when we consider that all around the gods of fertility and increase were worshipped, such as Dagon, Ashtaroth, Ceres, and others, leading up to phallic worship itself, we can understand the necessity of formulating regulations to prevent all relationship to such deities. The claim is so often and variously repeated in the OT. that "it is the Lord who openeth and shutteth the womb," that it comes like an energetic protest agst. false claims raised elsewhere.

A very great degree of uncleanness was attached to the touching of a dead body, and all things connected with death were defiling, including mourning customs, the entering of a house in mourning, and even the touching of a grave (Nu. 19.[11f.]).* Modern Judaism still holds so strictly to the regulations on this point that no one who is reckoned a priest is allowed to remain in such a house or enter a cemetery. The Epistle to the Romans explains this idea of uncleanness as arising fm. death being the result of sin, but it has been objected that this is not an OT. idea, and that prob. the declaration of this uncleanness was made as a barrier agst. the "worship of the dead." Further, LEPROSY was regarded as the extreme case of uncleanness, and if the idea of sin is originally absent fm. the OT. view of the former case, it cannot be so easily separated fm. this one. The leper, as even the name implies (Nu. 12.[10]; 2 K. 5.[27]), is one who is smitten of God. The loathsome char. and the incurableness of the disease emphasise this, and show how one so afflicted must be in the eyes of his fellow-men a manifest object of God's wrath, shut off fm. communication with Him, and so unclean.

On the degree of defilement associated with each of these cases depended the nat. and extent of separation fm. divine and human fellowship, as also the greater or less complexity of the rites of purification. We read of cert. earthenware vessels that, having contracted defilement, were evidently incapable of purification and so had to be broken (Lv. 11.[33]), while those of metal were cleansed by fire (Nu. 31.[23]). The essence, however, of purification was usually water, either by way of immersion or sprinkling, but in certain cases it had to be accompanied by the use of the ashes of the red heifer (Nu. 19.) and sacrifices. The simplest case of purification was that of one who had touched an unclean animal (Lv. 11.[40]), for here the uncleanness passed away at sunset. When it had been eaten or carried (Lv. 11.[25, 40]), there had to be added the washing of the clothes or change of them (Gn. 35.[2]), wh. amounted to the same thing. In the case of sexual relations or gonorrhœa dormientium (Lv. 15.[17, 18]), washing of the body was required in addition. The case of a woman in her separation was equally simple (Lv. 15.[21-24]), the period of seven days being, however, to be reckoned before its completion; but in the case of a more prolonged issue, the seven days were to be reckoned from its conclusion (Lv. 15.[14, 28]), and then an offering of two turtles or two young pigeons had to be made at the door of the tabernacle. At the same place absolution fm. all uncleannesses connected with death had also to be effected (Nu. 19.[16]), as also those produced by child-birth (Lv. 12.), and leprosy (Lv. 14.[4-32]). For the first of these cases the ashes of the red heifer were used, the unclean person, because of contact with death, being sprinkled on the third and seventh days, after wh. he himself washed his clothes, bathed, and remained unclean till the evening. After the birth of a male child the mr. remained thirty-three days unclean, while in the case of a female child the uncleanness lasted sixty-six days. The offering in this event was a lamb of the first year, a pigeon, and a turtle-dove, but in the case of the poor the requirement was "two turtles or two young pigeons" (Lk. 2.[24]), and as such seems to have been brought by Mary, it casts some light on her worldly standing.

The case of leprosy was the most intricate of all. The leper had been compelled to dwell in a state of separation fm. man as well as fm. God, and so the restoration had to be carried through with due recognition of these two stages. The first of these was accomplished by examination, sacrifice, sprinkling, shaving, and washing (Lv. 14.[4-8]). The second stage was carried through seven days later, and consisted of shaving, washing, sacrifice, and anointing; after this he was readmitted to the society of his fellow-men. In post-exilic times the regulations regarding purification were extended, and applied to many cases not noticed in the OT. In the NT. there is the ritual washing of cups and pots, of brazen vessels and couches (Mk. 7.[4]), while the ceremonial washing of the hands before meals (Mk. 7.[3]) remains as prominent in Judaism to-day as it did in NT. days, and occupies a whole treatise in the Talmud. The chief authorities in NT. and rabbinical times were the Pharisees, and even the wives of the Sadducees were wont to consult them on the signs of conditions demanding purification. What the special cases of impurity mentioned in Jn. 11.[55] and Ac. 21.[24] may have been we cannot tell. A gen. purification may have been all that was meant, or it may have been connected with the idea that contact with heathen lands was defiling—an early Heb. notion (Am. 7.[17]; Ek. 4.[13]) which was still retained by the rabbinical Jew (Shem. Rab. § 15; Sanh. 39a). It is worthy of note that in the absence of the Temple and the means of purification all modern Jews are ceremonially unclean (Joma, 57a), and we might even challenge their right to pray. Rabbinical Judaism, however, replies that God remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness (Lv. 16.[16]; Joma, 57a). Nevertheless mod. Jews as a rule abstain on account of their uncleanness fm. visiting the Temple court in Jrs. The mod. critical theory recognises a gradual development in the ideas of ceremonial purity and impurity, and an increasing demand for purification. The distinction, however, between the clean and the unclean is as old as the Jahve religion. JE. knows the distinction between clean and unclean animals, while the altar law presupposes the idea to have been associated with the varying conditions of the sexual life. Dt., while it lays little weight on ritual, emphasises these laws as separating Isr. as a holy people fm. other races, and to its list of defilements it adds sorcery, blood, and mourning customs. In Ek. and P. the system is still more extended. The latter presents a complete system of lustrations designed to rule the whole natural life, and so to aid man to attain the purification necessary for sharing in divine worship. W. M. CHRISTIE.

PURIM, lit. "lots," referring in mockery to the lots by which Haman discovered the "lucky" day for the extermination of the Jews (Est. 3.[7]). The feast celebrates the signal deliverance which was wrought for the people from his murderous design by means of Esther and Mordecai. It was celebrated on the 14th and 15th of Adar (March). Probably this feast came into general observance only gradually. The time was given up entirely to pleasure, visiting, feasting, giving of presents, &c. (Est. 9.[30ff.]). For many centuries the people have met on the evening of the 13th and again on the morning of the 14th of Adar, in the synagogue, when the Megilla, the book of Esther, is read through. When the names of Haman and his ten sons are reached, the whole congregation, with violent gesticulations, stamping of the feet, hissing, &c., cry out at each, "Let his name be blotted out, let the name of the wicked perish." The closing sections are read by all together with hearty enjoyment. When this is over the people throw themselves into the joyful festival without restraint, grave and reverend rabbis becoming quite jocund. Such is the licence permitted, that it has been held almost culpable for one to remain sober. The song which Longfellow puts into the mouth of Rabbi ben Ezra is hardly an exaggeration :—

"And often at the Purim feast
I am as drunk as any beast
That wallows in its sty:
The wine it so elateth me,
That I no difference can see Between 'Accursed Haman be'
And 'Blessed be Mordecai.'"

On the 13th of Adar B.C. 161, Nicanor, the Syrian general, was defeated. 2 M. 15.[36] says that this victory was commemorated on the 13th of Adar, "the day before Mordecai's day." Possibly this may account for the beginning of the feast on the evening of the 13th. There is no certain reference to Purim in the NT. Some have thought it may be the feast spoken of in Jn. 5.[1]. This, however, was a feast for the due celebration of which it was not necessary to go to Jerusalem.

The difficulty of finding any Persian word corresponding to "pur," from which the festival takes its name, has led to suggestions of other origins for the feast of Purim. These are discussed in HDB. s.v.

PURPLE. The Heb. terms 'argāmān and tekeleth are trd. in EV. "purple" and "blue" respectively. These are shades of the same colour, the former with more of the reddish tone, the latter with more of the blue. Both colours were obtained from a fluid secreted by a mollusc found in great quantities on the Phœnician sea-coast, Murex trunculus, and Tyre was famous for its fabrics dyed with purple. This colour was largely used in the hangings, &c., of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25.[4], &c.). Wearing of purple was the mark of royalty. Thus in mockery His tormentors arrayed Jesus in purple as King of the Jews (Mk. 15.[17], &c.). This is called "scarlet" (kokkinos) in Mw. 27.[28], illustrating the loose way in which colours are spoken of. THYATIRA was celebrated for its manufacture of "purple," by which probably is meant "Turkey red." In this trade Lydia was engaged (Ac. 16.[14]).

PURSE. See BAG (2), (5), (7).

PUT, RV. See PHUT.

PUTEOLI, the Italian port where St. Paul landed (Ac. 28.[13]; cp. Jos. Ant. XVIII. vi. 4). It was originally an Ionic colony on the N. shore of what is now the Bay of Naples, formerly known as Sinus Puteolanus. The town was called Dicæarchia (Jos. Vit. 3). In the early days of the empire it was the most important centre of intercourse with the East. Remains of the ancient mole at which St. Paul landed can still be traced.

THE ADDAX OR PYGARG OF SCRIPTURE

From Wood's "Bible Animals," by permission of Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

PUTHITES, AV. PUHITES, a family of Kirjath-jearim (1 Ch. 2.[53]).

PUTIEL, the father of Eleazar's wife, who was the mother of Phinehas (Ex. 6.[25]).

PUVAH. See PUAH.

PYGARG (Heb. dīshōn), named among the clean animals in Dt. 14.[5]. The name comes to us through the LXX, where dīshōn is rendered pygargos, "white rump," by which name Herodotus (iv. 192) calls a Libyan kind of antelope. Perhaps the addax, an antelope with white tail and twisted horns, which, although rare, is still to be seen in Palestine, may be the animal intended.

PYRRHUS, the father of the Berœan SOPATER (Ac. 20.[4] RV.).

PYTHON, SPIRIT OF. In Ac. 16.[16] RVm. there appears as an alternative to "a spirit of divination," "a spirit of Python." Python was the name given to the serpent that, according to mythology, guarded the oracle at Delphi, wh. was poetically named P. also. This serpent was slain by Apollo, whence he is called Pythios. He was the god of poetry and prophecy; he took the oracle henceforward to himself. When the Hebrew wd. have said, as of the witch of Endor, "she has a familiar spirit" ('ōb), the Greek said, "she has a Python"; hence the tr. of AV. is quite accurate. P. is not used in LXX; the witch of Endor is called engastromuthos, "a ventriloquist."

Q

QOHELETH. See ECCLESIASTES.

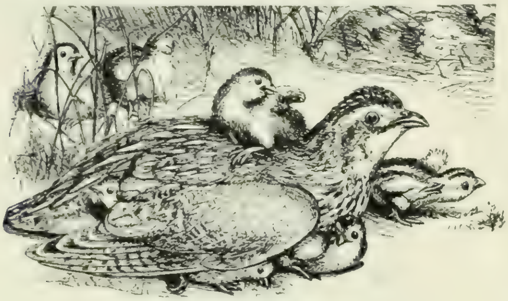
QUAIL (Heb. sělāv), the well-known migratory bird; mentioned in Scrip. only in connection with the wandering in the wilderness (Ex. 16.13; Nu 11.31-32; Ps. 105.40).



THE QUAIL

From Wood's "Bible Animals," by permission of Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

A difficulty, due to a misunderstanding, has been felt as to the huge number of quails that fell about the camp. The phrase in Nu. 11.31 is, "Let them fall by the camp, as it were a day's journey on this side and as it were a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth." But the real meaning of the word trd. "let fall" is "let loose"; hence the picture presented is not of a province of 1000 square miles in extent piled up a yard high with quails, but an immense flight of those birds flying at a height of two cubits above the ground.

QUARREL does not in Scripture have the modern meaning of "an angry dispute." It is the Lat. querela, "complaint," or "ground of complaint." Thus it is used of the "quarrel" of God's covenant, which He is to bring a sword to avenge (Lv. 26.25 AV.). The king of Israel thought Naaman's mission was to seek a quarrel against him, i.e. to find occasion for complaint (2 K. 5.7). So in Col. 3.13, "if any man have a quarrel against any," RV. gives "complaint" for "quarrel." Herodias' "quarrel" against John was evidently deep resentment because of his fearless fidelity (Mk. 6.19).

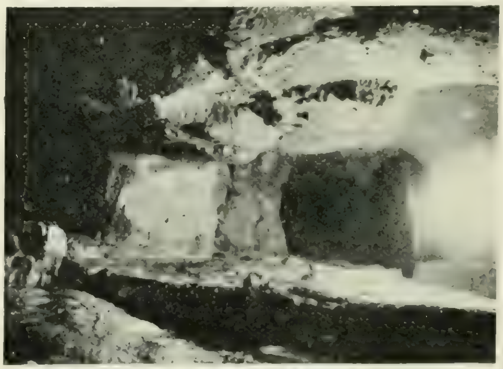
QUARRY. When Ehud had presented the gift with which he had been sent to the king of Moab, he set out for home; but we are told that he "turned back from the quarries that were by Gilgal"; and, when he had accomplished the assassination of Eglon, that he "escaped while they tarried, and passed beyond the quarries." EVm. suggests that we should tr. "graven images." They were probably stones roughly sculptured to the shape of images (cp. Moore, Judges, ad loc.).

In 1 K. 6.7, regarding the stone used in building the Temple, AV. reads that it "was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither": RV. "made ready at the quarry," but gives in the margin the alternative, "when it was brought away." The lit. rendering seems to be "stone perfect at the quarry," or "at the quarrying." The word, maṣṣā', does not occur elsewhere.

QUARTUS, a Corinthian Christian who joined St. Paul in salutations to the brethren in Rome (Rm. 16.23). Tradition makes him one of "the seventy," and subsequently bishop of Berytus.

QUATERNION (Gr. tetradion), a detachment of "four men." The "watches" each consisted of four men, taking the four watches of the night in succession. Peter was delivered to four quaternions, so in each watch he wd. be under the charge of four soldiers (Ac. 12.4).

QUEEN stands in EV. for several Heb. words not quite identical in meaning. The queen of Sheba (1 K. 10.1ff., &c.) and Queen Candace of Ethiopia (Ac. 8.27) are the only queens mentioned in Scripture as reigning in their own right. ATHALIAH did indeed exercise royal authority, but only as a usurper



QUARRIES UNDER JERUSALEM

(2 K. 11.3; 2 Ch. 22.12). While queenly rule was legitimate in other countries, there is no evidence that a woman had the right to reign in Israel. The position of Deborah was due to the assertion of her own personal ascendency at a time of crisis, when law had to give way to necessity (Jg. 4.4).

The title of "queen" is applied to wives of reigning monarchs in other countries; e.g. to the wife of Pharaoh (1 K. 11.[19]), to Vashti and Esther (Est. 1.[11], 2.[17]), &c. It is so used in Israel only in poetry (Ps. 45.[9]; SS. 6.[8f.]).

It was an almost inevitable result of polygamy that the mother of the king should possess considerable influence over her son. The name of "queen" in this capacity is given to Jezebel (2 K. 10.[13]), Maacah (1 K. 15.[13]), and Nehushta (Jr. 13.[18]) in Israel; and to the mother of Belshazzar (Dn. 5.[10]). Bathsheba is not called "queen," but the position she held, and the influence which she was able to wield, are sufficiently indicated by the provision of a throne for her by Solomon, so that she might sit at his right hand (1 K. 2.[19]). Maacah was able to maintain her evil influence throughout the reign of her son Abijah, and well into that of her grandson Asa. Only monstrous and intolerable infamy brought about her downfall (1 K. 15.[13], &c.). Jeremiah's reference to Nehushta, the mother of Jehoiachin (2 K. 24.[8]; Jr. 13.[18], 29.[2]), can be explained only if she counted for something considerable in opposition to his counsel. The king's mother seems to have had in Israel some recognised official position; but this it is impossible to define.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Heb. mĕleketh hashshāmayīm), a deity worshipped by the Jewish women (Jr. 7.[18], 44.[17-19, 25]), probably Ishtar, the Babylonian goddess whose star was the planet Venus. In the Heb. text the word for "queen" is pointed as if it were the word for "work" written defectively מלכת for מלאכת. The scholars who added the vowels evidently took it in this sense, apparently understanding it of the creative work displayed in the heavens: so that for them the phrase would be equivalent to "host of heaven." The EV. translation is, however, probably correct.

QUICK in AV. of Ac. 10.[42]; 2 Tm. 4.[1]; He. 4.[12]; 1 P. 4.[5], means "living." In all these passages save He. 4.[12] it is used in distinction from "dead." In He. 4.[12] the word of God is described as "living" (RV.).

QUICKEN in every case means to impart or to intensify life (Ps. 71.[20], &c.; Jn. 5.[21], &c.).

QUICKSANDS, RV. SYRTES. The Syrtes, Major and Minor, were two gulfs on the northern coast of Africa, with shallows and sunken reefs. The perils for shipping were increased by the moving of the sand-banks, and cross currents. Sailors dreaded to be caught in a storm amid the swirling waters of the Syrtes (Ac. 27.[17]). The greater S. is now called the Gulf of Sidra, to the E. of Tripoli: the smaller S. is the Gulf of Gabes, to the E. of Tunis.

QUIRINIUS. St. Luke explains (2.[1ff.]) how it came about that Jesus, whose parents had their home in Nazareth, was born in Bethlehem. They had to journey to their ancestral city to be enrolled there, in obedience to a decree issued by the emperor Augustus; and while in Bethlehem on this occasion their Son was born. In a parenthesis St. Luke observes that "this was the first enrolment made when Qurinius was governor of Syria" (2.[2]).

That St. Luke has assigned the true reason for the presence of Joseph and Mary in Bethlehem need not be questioned. Such enrolments were common, and from evidence supplied by Egyptian papyri, they seem to have taken place once in fourteen years. We know that a census was taken in Judæa during the years A.D. 6–9. This is the enrolment referred to in Ac. 5.[37], which provoked the ill-starred rising of Judas of Galilee. It is reasonable, therefore, to assume that fourteen years earlier, while Herod the Great was yet alive, a similar enrolment was carried out. This is what St. Luke states; and, "having traced the course of all things accurately from the first," he was not likely to err on a point like this.

But the mention of Quirinius as being governor of Syria at that time raises difficulties. Quirinius was governor of Syria when the census mentioned in Ac. 5. was taken. Has St. Luke erred, antedating his governorship some fourteen years?

The facts, as established by ancient authority, are these: the governors of Syria were from B.C. 9–7, Sentius Saturninus; 6–4, Quinctilius Varus. Here there is a blank in our knowledge till A.D. 6, when P. Sulpicius Quirinius was appointed. It is, of course, possible that he may have had an earlier term of office during these unrecorded years; but even so, this could not have fallen within the lifetime of Herod the Great, who died B.C. 4. That he was "governor" of Syria in the ordinary sense at the time of our Lord's birth cannot, therefore, be maintained. There is still the possibility that Quirinius, at the time specified, held some such position in Syria as would justify St. Luke in describing him as hēgemōn. After a careful consideration of all the available and relevant facts, Sir W. M. Ramsay concludes in favour of the "supposition that the foreign relations of Syria, with the command of its armies, were entrusted for a time to Quirinius, with a view to his conducting the difficult and responsible war against the Homonadenses, while the internal administration of the province was left to Saturninus or to Varus (according to the period when we place the mission of Quirinius). This extraordinary command of Quirinius lasted for at least two years, and had come to an end before the death of Herod in B.C. 4, for we know on the authority of Tacitus that the disturbances arising in Palestine on that event were put down by Varus; and this trouble, as belonging to the foreign relations of the province, would on our hypothesis have been dealt with by Quirinius, if he had been still in office" (Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 238). Illustrations are quoted of such temporary division of duties elsewhere, where two men hold precisely the same title and official rank. St. Luke's title, hēgemōn, exactly suits one holding such a position.

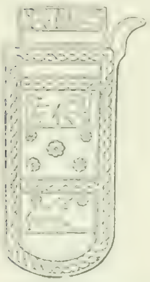
Of Quirinius himself we know that he held the consulship in B.C. 12; his second governorship of Syria began in A.D. 6; he prosecuted his wife, Domitia Lepida, whom he accused of having tried to poison him, in A.D. 20. His death and public funeral took place in A.D. 21.

QUIVER (Heb. 'ashpāh), the receptacle for spare arrows worn by the Egyptians at the side, and by the Assyrians on the shoulder.



Ornamented Quiver (Nimrud)

QUOTATIONS. There are quotations in the Bible from profane literature. Thus, in addressing the Athenians on Mars Hill, St. Paul reminded his hearers that certain of their poets had said of God, "We are all His offspring"; and this sentiment has been traced back to more than one of the Greek authors. In Tt. 1.[12] the writer quotes an extremely uncomplimentary reflection on the character of the Cretans from a prophet of their own, who has been identified as Epimenides, a poet belonging to the sixth century B.C. In his edition of The Book of Enoch, Charles gives no fewer than a dozen pages of passages in the NT. the language or ideas of wh. he believes to be coloured by those of that pseudepigraphon; but, in most cases, it requires the fond eyesight of an editor to detect any resemblance, and the ages of the different elements of which The Book of Enoch is composed are so uncertain that, where quotation may be acknowledged, it is impossible to determine on wh. side it lies. Not a few echoes of the Apocryphal Books of the OT. have been supposed to be heard in the NT.; but these are vague and indecisive. Of course even one indubitable quotation of marked importance in the NT. might have elevated an apocryphal into a canonical book.

In the Old Testament frequent reference is made to the Book of Jashar or to the Book of the Wars of the Lord as the source of statements in the historical books; and, according to the modern theory of these books, numerous older documents are embodied in the narratives as they have reached us—a mode of writing history wh. has been exactly reproduced in our own day in The Historian's History of the World. In the later prophets not only words but ideas are borrowed from the earlier ones; and many a later psalm is little more than a cento of phrases from those which are more primitive, Psalm 14. and Psalm 53., for instance, being almost identical.

But the phenomenon of greatest interest and importance is the quotation of the Old Testament in the New. This takes place on a large scale, and exhibits not a few remarkable characteristics. Some would state the number of quotations at about three hundred, but others put it at double that figure. This copiousness of quotation is one of the most striking signs of the harmony between the two Testaments. While all other influences on the Gospel History and the development of the Primitive Church are apt to be exaggerated, this one can hardly be sufficiently emphasised. The mind of our Lord Himself was soaked in the Old Testament; His language was deeply coloured with its phraseology; and, in this respect at least, all the writers of the New Testament resembled their Master. They all acknowledged and welcomed the Old Testament as the Word of God; they were persuaded that it spoke abundantly of Christ; and they found in it a vocabulary ready to their hand for the experiences and convictions which they wished to express. They quote it, therefore, in every possible way—sometimes unconsciously borrowing its phraseology; sometimes introducing allusions as flowers of adornment; sometimes quoting loosely from memory, at other times giving the very words; sometimes stringing together phrases taken from different places; sometimes, with the formula "that it might be fulfilled," indicating that the event related has happened in accordance with ancient prophecy. But the style of quotation is always free and flowing, not learned and exact. It is the new Gospel that carries the force of truth within itself, not the quotation wh. makes it true.

Generally the text of the OT. quoted is that of the Septuagint, which was the people's Bible of that age, giving the sacred books in the universally diffused Greek language. Only occasionally does one of the New Testament writers revert to the original Hebrew, though this must have been familiar to most of them. Now and then there is so wide a departure from both the Hebrew and the Greek, as these have come down to us, as to suggest that there may have been in existence a translation into Aramaic, the language then spoken in Palestine. It is of course possible that, in some cases, the Hebrew or even the Greek text of the Old Testament which lay before a New Testament writer may have varied from that which has come down to us. Looseness of quotation is, however, in most cases a more probable explanation. It is certainly extraordinary how much freedom the writers allow themselves in this respect. There are instances where they quote what we should now consider an incorrect rendering, and yet the point of the quotation lies in this very word; and, in some cases, words are quoted as if they bore on New Testament events when it is now very difficult for us to see in them any such reference. Of course it is easy to say, that there must be such a reference, if the Bible says so, and that the rendering must be the true one, if the New Testament adopts it ; but there is a conscience in scholarship, the violation of which is even more perilous than it is to acknowledge that, in a distant and simple age, and amidst the first enthusiasm of a new religion, a style of quotation may have been occasionally employed which we should not now consider scientific. It is true, however, on the other hand, that often in the words of Jesus, and not infrequently in other portions of the NT., there is a sovereign glance into the Old Testament text which penetrates to the core, and reveals a meaning never divined before but inevitable when once detected.

R

RAAMA, RAAMAH, son of Cush, and father of Sheba and Dedan (Gn. 10.[7]). Ezekiel speaks of the merchants of Raamah (27.[22]), along with those of Sheba, trading with Tyre in " the chief of all spices," and " all precious stones and gold." The name is probably to be found in that of Regma, a settlement on the Persian Gulf near Rās-el-Khaima (Glazer, Skizze, ii. 325).

RAAMIAH, one of the chiefs who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ne. 7.[7]). His name is given in Ez. 2.[2] as Reelaiah, and in 1 Es. 5.[2] as Reesaias.

RAAMSES. See Rameses.

RABBAH, RABBATH AMMON. (1) Rabbah of the children of Ammon was the capital of the Ammonites, where the bedstead (sarcophagus ?) of Og was shown (Dt. 3.[11]). After a siege, during which Uriah was exposed and slain, the city was taken by David and Joab (2 S. 11.[1], 12.[26], &c.), but soon again passed into the hands of native princes (2 S. 17.[27]). It was captured by Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 285–247), who called it Philadelphia. It was taken by Antiochus the Great, B.C. 218. In B.C. 135 we find it in the hands of Zeno Cotylas (Jos. Ant. XIII. viii. 1 ; BJ. I. ii. 4). Pompey joined it to the Decapolis. In A.D. 66 it was laid waste by the revolting Jews (BJ. II. xviii. 1).

Rabbah is identified with the mod. 'Ammān, an extensive ruin to the NE. of Heshbon, on the northern bank of Wādy 'Ammān, a fertile vale in the upper reaches of the Jabbok. The ruins are mostly of Roman origin, but there are also remains of very ancient buildings. The city appears to have been built in two portions. The site of the " Royal City," or " City of Waters," if the reading is correct (2 S. 12.[27]), may have corresponded with that of el-Qal'ah. By means of an underground passage this is connected with a large cistern or tank to the north, from which the stronghold was probably supplied with water. The besieger who secured command of the water-supply could speedily reduce the fortress (cp. Polybius, v. 7). When this strong position was taken the other part could offer no effective resistance.*

* Klostermann suggests that we should read עין instead of עיר, i.e. "fountain of waters," instead of "city of waters."

'Ammān is now occupied by a mixed population of Arabs and Circassians, who are fairly enterprising and prosperous in tilling the surrounding land. The Damascus-Mecca railway, with a station here, brings it into touch with civilisation.

(2) A city in the territory of Judah, named with Kirjath-jearim (Jo. 15.[60]), unidentified.

Rabbah: Temple of Molech

RABBI, a title of respect. Originally it was rab, " great," wh. with the suffix of the first pers. becomes rabbi, " my master." It was equivalent to " dominus," the title used by schoolboys to their teachers in the later Middle Ages. It is prob. derived fm. Bab. rab, " chief of." In the time of our Lord it meant " acknowledged teacher " ; in Tlm. it means, when absolute, the compiler of the Mishna, Jehūda haq-Qōdesh. A title of yet greater respect was Rabbon, with pronominal suffix Rabboni (Jn. 20.[16]) ; a similar variation is Rabban, a title given to certain older rabbis, e.g. Gamaliel. Our Lord's exhortation, " Be not ye called R." (Mw. 23.[8]), means that they were not to be eager for titles of distinction.

RABBITH, properly ha-Rabbith (with the def. art.), a city in the territory of Issachar (Jo. 19.[20]). It is possibly to be identified with the mod. Rābā, to the north of Ibzāq, on the southern part of the Gilboa range.

RAB-MAG, a Bab. title borne by Nergal-sharezer (Jr. 39.[13]). The exact significance of R.-M. is doubtful; formerly it was thought to mean "chief of the Magi," but magicians were not known by that name in Babylon. Rawlinson suggests R.-emga, "the wise prince." Pinches prefers R.-mugi, with uncertain significance. Delitzsch suggests maḫḫu, wh. wd. mean "magician."

RAB-SARIS, an Asyr. and Bab. title (2 K. 18.[17]; Jr. 39.[13]), originally supposed to mean "chief of the eunuchs"; it is now thought to stand for rabu-saresu, "chief of the heads," prob. the superintendent of the household; Luther's tr., der oberste Kammerer, has a good deal to recommend it.

RABSHAKEH, the title of an Asyr. military official, sent by SENNACHERIB to Jrs. fm. LACHISH to threaten HEZEKIAH into surrender (2 K. 18.[17-37]; Isa. 36.[2-22]). Formerly it was regarded as certain that this title meant the "chief of the cupbearers," but it seems clear that it is a modification into Heb. intelligibility of rabu-saku, "chief of the captains," equivalent to our "chief of the staff"; he was next in dignity to the Tartan. The R. of the narrative, if an insolent soldier, appears to have had accomplishments, as he knew Heb.; it is conceivable that, as in modern armies, officers in the armies of Asyr. were expected to be acquainted with the languages of neighbouring countries.

RACA (Heb. rīq, Aram. rīqa), a term of insult wh. made the utterer of it liable to prosecution before the SANHEDRIN (Mw. 5.[22]), but less opprobrious than mōre, "fool," as the latter, being the tr. of Heb. nābāl, implied moral delinquency (Ps. 14.[1]).

RACE. This was one of the earliest athletic contests instituted, and one of the most prominent; it is mentioned in the Iliad in connection with the funeral rites of Patroclus (Il. xxiii. 759f.), and Plato in the "Laws" regards it as a necessary part of the duty of the rulers of a city to institute such a contest (Leg. viii. 833). There were different lengths of race: (1) the stadion, the usual length of the arena of the stadium, about 600 ft.; (2) the diaulos or double course; (3) the ephippios, twice the diaulos; this was a test of endurance. The great test for this, however, was (4) the dolichos, wh. was

GRECIAN FOOTRACE

7, 12, 20, or 24 stadia in length. If one may deduce the practice in Greece fm. Plato's requirement in the "Laws," it was sometimes run in full armour, sometimes on an irregular track across mountains. In 1 Cor. 9.[24] the reference is to the race within the stadium; in v. 26 there may be reference to the long course over hills; adēlōs, "uncertainly," seems to point to the possibility of uncertainty as to the course. Paul frequently mentions "running in vain" (Gal. 2.[2]; Php. 2.[16]), a phrase that seems to suggest, not defeat, but rather bootless running through mistaking the course; it wd. appear to be a not infrequent cause of missing the prize. In He. 12.[1, 2] the fig. seems to be the ephippios, or even the dolichos; it is a test of patience, and it is run in the stadium, "looking" to Him who has instituted the race, who Himself sits as judge.

RACHAL, RV. RACAL, one of the cities in Judah to which David sent a portion of the spoil taken from the Amalekites who had raided Ziklag (1 S. 30.[29]). No place with a name resembling this has been found. Perhaps we should read with LXX "in Carmel" (of Judæa) instead of "in Rachal."

RACHEL'S TOMB

RACHEL, younger daughter of Laban, and chosen wife of Jacob, for love of whom the years of service spent to win her seemed "but a few days" (Gn. 29.). Jacob was deceived by Laban into marrying Leah, since it would be disgrace to her if the younger sister were married first. Rachel, however, was also given him, on condition of yet seven years' service. The elder sister bore him sons, while, to her sorrow, the younger and favourite wife remained long childless. Her dearest wish at length was gratified by the birth of Joseph. The two sisters stood by Jacob in his dispute with their father, and with their children and household accompanied him in his flight. With a view, no doubt, to securing good luck, Rachel carried off her father's TERAPHIM, thereby incurring a danger at the hands of her father when he overtook the fugitives, from which she saved herself by womanly guile (Gn. 31.[17ff.]). Somewhere north of Bethel Rachel died in giving birth to Benjamin. There Jacob buried her, setting up a monument over her grave. Rachel's Tomb is shown to-day on the west side of the road as one goes from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. It is a white-domed sanctuary, with a shelter beside it for the Jews who make pious pilgrimage hither. The Moslems do not permit them to enter the sanctuary where, they believe, the dust of their great ancestress sleeps. But a position to the north of Jerusalem, and not far from Bethel, seems to be required by 1 S. 10.[2, 5] (cp. Jr. 31.[15]). EPHRATH may have been a place near Ramah; and "the same is Bethlehem" (Gn. 35.[19], 48.[7]) must be taken as a gloss. No identification is at present possible. Jeremiah (31.[15]) imagines Rachel weeping for her children, Joseph and Benjamin, as their descendants are carried away into captivity (cp. Mw. 2.[17f.]).

RADDAI, brother of David, fifth son of Jesse (1 Ch. 2.[14]).

RAGUEL (Nu. 10.[29]), REUEL (Ex. 2.[18]). See JETHRO.

In the first of these spellings the AV. has followed the LXX, wh. in this instance represents the Heb. 'ain by γ: prob. in Heb. as in Arb. 'ain had a smooth and rough form, the latter being transliterated by γ. The RV. has not followed the eccentric variation of AV.

RAHAB, a woman of Jericho, a harlot, who received the spies. She hid them under the flax stalks on the roof, when the king's messengers sought them, and contrived for them a way of escape. By a sign then agreed upon—a scarlet cord hung in the window—her house was recognised when the city was taken, and she and all her household were saved alive (Jo. 2.[1ff.], 6.[17], &c.). She is named among those the memory of whose faith is cherished as an inspiration (He. 11.[31]; Js. 2.[25]). Rahab also appears in the genealogy as an ancestress of our Lord (Mw. 1.[5]). There is no reason to doubt that the same Rahab is intended.

RAHAB, lit. "pride," as in Jb. 9.[13]; in 26.[12] a poetic name for the sea (RV.). Most frequently a poetic name for Egp., as Ps. 87.[4], 89.[10]; also RV. Is. 30.[7]. It has been suggested that R. represents some native name of Egp., modified to suit a Heb. meaning, but no Coptic name of Egp. has been found wh. wd. lend itself to this.

RAHAM, a descendant of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Ch. 2.[44]), son of Shema and father of Jorkoam.

RAIMENT. See DRESS.

RAIN. See WATER, WINTER.

RAINBOW. For the use of this most striking and beautiful of natural phenomena in ancient Babylonian mythology see Sayce, Expository Times, vii. 463f. It was regarded as the bow with which God shot His gleaming arrows—i.e. lightning—in anger against men (Ps. 7.[12f.]; Hb. 3.[9ff.]). The hanging of it up in the clouds was a token that His wrath was past (Gn. 9.[13ff.]; cp. Jos. Ant. I. iii. 8). Whatever may have been thought of it in former days, the covenant with Noah, of which it was made the sign, invested it with a new and nobler significance. It was an ever-recurring reminder of God's promise of mercy. The splendour of its colouring makes it a fit image of God's glory (Ek. 1.[28]). Thus it impressed the son of Sirach: "Look upon the rainbow and praise Him that made it. Very beautiful it is in the brightness thereof. It compasseth the heaven about with a glorious circle, and the hands of the Most High have bended it" (Sr. 43.[11f.]). This also is alluded to in the vivid descriptions of the "rainbow-circled throne" (Rv. 4.[3]), and of the angel rainbow-crowned (10.[1]).

RAISINS. In vine-growing districts where the Moslem feeling against wine is strong, raisins are still made in great quantities, e.g., in es-Salṭ, east of the Jordan. For this purpose the grapes without pips, which flourish there, are especially prized. The bunches are plunged into a solution of potash and dried in the sun. From these raisins the Jews in Tiberias are accustomed to distil a strong spirit, which they call "brandy."

RAKEM, a descendant of Machir by Maacah his wife (1 Ch. 7.[16]), brother of Ulam.

RAKKATH, a fortified city in the territory of Naphtali, mentioned along with Hammath and Chinnereth (Jo. 19.[35]). Hammath may be identified with the hot springs on the shore south of Tiberias. A Jewish tradition identifies the site with that on which Tiberias was built. An ancient town did occupy that position, and the graves of its inhabitants were disturbed in preparing the foundations for Herod's city. But there is no certain knowledge as to its name (Neubauer, Geog. d. Tlm. 208).

RAKKON. This is probably a scribal error, a repetition of the name Me-jarkon immediately preceding. Only one name is given in the LXX (Jo. 19.[46]).

RAM. (1) Son of Hezron, brother of Jerahmeel and father of Amminadab (Ru. 4.[19]; 1 Ch. 2.[9]). He appears as the son of Jerahmeel in 1 Ch. 2.[25, 27]. His name is given as "Aram" in Mw. 1.[3f.]; Lk. 3.[33] AV. (2) Head of the family to which belonged Job's "friend" Elihu, the son of Barachel the Buzite (Jb. 32.[2]).

RAM. See SHEEP.

RAMAH, a name signifying elevation, attached to several towns in Palestine, occupying high positions. (1) A fortified city in the territory of Naphtali (Jo. 19.[36]), perhaps to be identified with mod. er-Rāmeh, a large Christian village on the road to the coast, about eight miles WSW. of Ṣafed. Much excellent land is cultivated by the villagers. It is noted for its olive and lemon groves, while fruitful vineyards climb the slopes of the mountain to the north. (2) A city in the territory of Benjamin, named with Gibeon and Beeroth (Jo. 18.[25]).

It was situated on the road which led north from Jerusalem, not far from Gibeah (Jg. 19.[13ff.]), and in the neighbourhood of Rachel's tomb (Jr. 31.[15]). At Ramah, Jeremiah was set free from among the captives of Jerusalem and Judæa who were being deported to Babylon (Jr. 40.[1]). It was reoccupied after the Exile (Ez. 2.[26]; Ne. 7.[30]). OEJ. places it six Roman miles north of Jerusalem. These conditions are well met by er-Rām, about two miles north of Tell el-Fūl (Gibeah), and five miles north of Jerusalem. It is a wretched hamlet, occupying a commanding position on a high hill. There are broken columns, squared stones, and other memorials of a town of some importance in antiquity. (3) The place of birth and the burial-place of the prophet Samuel (1 S. 1.[19], 25.[1]), also called Ramathaim Zophim (v. 1), in Mount Ephraim. Hā-rāmāthayim-tzōphīm is ungrammatical, and points to some confusion of the text. It may be trd. "the two hills of the Zuphites." It was on a height at no great distance from Shiloh, and was one of the towns within Samuel's annual circuit (1 S. 7.[16f.]). In 1 M. 11.[34] it is named (Remathem), along with the two toparchies, Apherema and Lydda (Ephraim and Diospolis), formerly belonging to Samaria, as being added to Judæa. OEJ. identifies it with Arimathea, and places it in the region of Timnah, near Diospolis. Guthe (KB.) would identify it with Rentīs, a small village on an ancient site, eight miles north of Lydda. Many (G. A. Smith, HGHL. 254; Driver, HDB. s.v.; Buhl, GAP. 170, &c.) incline to Beit Rīma, a village standing on a hill, 13 miles ENE. of Lydda, and two miles north of Timnah. Of other possible identifications only Rāmallah need be mentioned here. It is a large and prosperous Christian village, occupying a lofty position, with ancient remains, fully eight miles north of Jerusalem, twelve miles south-west of Shiloh, and three miles from Bethel. This place would agree well enough with the indications of the Biblical narrative. (4) A city on the boundary of Asher, near Tyre (Jo. 19.[29]). It is probably now represented by Ramia, 13 miles south-east of Tyre (Robinson, BRP. iii. 64). (5) By Ramah in 2 K. 8.[29]; 2 Ch. 22.[6], the city of Ramoth-Gilead is intended. (6) Ramah of the South, a city in the territory of Simeon (Jo. 19.[8]), apparently identical with Baalath Beer. It was one of the towns to which David sent a share of the Amalekite spoil (1 S. 30.[27], Ramoth of the South, where LXX retains the singular "Rama"). It is not identified.

RAMAH, or RAMOTH OF THE SOUTH. See Ramah (6).

RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM. See Ramah (2).

RAMATHITE. Shimei the Ramathite was David's superintendent of vineyards (1 Ch. 27.[27]), possibly a native of Ramah (2), but there is no certainty.

RAMATH LEHI, the place where Samson slew the Philistines with the jawbone of an ass (Jg. 15.[17]), lit. "the height of Lehi." It is not identified.

RAMATH MIZPEH, a city on the northern frontier of Gad (Jo. 13.[26]), possibly identical with Mizpah (1).

RAMESES (Gn. 47.[11]), RAAMSES (Ex. 1.[11]), the name of a city in Egp. built as a "store city" by the Israelites under Ramses II.; it is used as a name for Goshen (Qosem), wh., accdg. to Sayce (HDB.), was the capital of the 20th nome. The Israelites assembled here previous to their departure out of Egp. (see Exodus); prob. the scribe changed the superseded name, "Goshen," into the better-known Rameses.

Professor Flinders Petrie would identify the site of R. with Tell er-Retabeh in "Wādy Tumilat, about 20 miles from Ismailiyeh on the east." Here he found "a temple of Ramessu II. with sculptures in red granite and limestone; part of a tomb of an official who was over the store-houses of Syrian produce; and the great works of Ramessu III. All these discoveries exactly accord with the requirements of the city of Raamses, where both the second and third kings of that name are stated to have worked, and where a store city was built by the Israelites along with that of Pithom, wh. is only eight miles distant. The absence of any other Egyptian site suitable to these conditions, wh. are all fulfilled here, makes it practically certain that this was the city of Raamses named in Exodus" (quoted by M'Neile, Exodus, Addenda, from Hyksos and Israelite Cities, Brit. Sch. of Archæol. in Egypt, and Egyptian Research Account, 12th year, 1906).

Ramses II.: Colossal Statue

RAMIAH, son of Parosh, one of those who married foreign wives (Ez. 10.[25]).

RAMOTH. (1) A city in the territory of Issachar, given to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch. 6.[73]), perhaps to be identified with Remeth (Jo.

19.[21]) and Jarmuth (Jo. 21.[29]). (2) Ramoth, RV. Jeremoth, one of the sons of Bani, who married a foreign wife (Ez. 10.[29]).

RAMOTH-GILEAD, in the territory of Gad, was one of the most important cities east of the Jordan. It was chosen as a City of Refuge (Dt. 4.[43], &c.). One of Solomon's commissariat officers was stationed here. Two others, one at Mahanaim, seem to have been placed to the south, so that Ramoth-Gilead must have lain in the northern district of Gad (1 K. 4.[13, 14, 19]). The possession of Ramoth-Gilead was the object of fierce strife between Israel and Syria. Here Ahab was mortally wounded, Joram was badly hurt, and Jehu was anointed (1 K. 22.[3], &c.; 2 K. 8.[28ff.], 9.[1ff.]). It was open to the approach of chariots (1 K. 22.[31]). OEJ. places it 15 Roman miles west of Philadelphia, on the Jabbok. The distance might suit es-Salṭ, a prosperous village, with ruins of a mediæval castle, and a few traces of antiquity. But it was ten miles south of the Jabbok; and the surrounding country is such as to make chariot warfare impossible. Buhl (GAP. 261ff.) favours el-Jilʿād, on a height to the south of the Jabbok (see Gilead 2). If this is correct, Ramoth-Gilead cannot be identical with Mizpeh of Gilead (Jg. 11.[11], &c.) (see Mizpeh, Mahaniam). Merrell (East of Jordan, 284f.; HDB. s.v.) argues for identification with Jerash, the splendid ruins of which lie in Wādy ed-Deir, five miles north of the Jabbok. Guthe favours er-Remtheh, on the great Hajj road, ten miles south of el-Mezērīb (cp. G. A. Smith, HGHL.[1] 586ff.). Cheyne (EB. s.v.) proposes Ṣalkhad. Conder and others would identify Ramoth-Gilead with Reimūn, an ancient site to the west of Jerash. There are not available data for any sure decision.

RANSOM (Heb. kōpher), "a covering over"; the use is always in relation to God, as Ex. 30.[12]; Jb. 33.[24]; therefore really Propitiation. In NT. the Gr. lutron (Mw. 20.[28]) is taken fm. LXX. The Heb. word is also used for "pitch." It is also used in Nu. 35.[31] in the more ordinary sense of money compensation for murder; a practice common among savage nations still, but disallowed by the law of Israel.

RAPHA, RAPHAH. (1) In 1 Ch. 20.[4, 6, 8], where the Heb. word is hā-rāphāʾ, and in 2 S. 21.[16, 18, 20, 22], where the Heb. word is hā-rāphāh, each being trd. by RV. "the giant," RVm. substitutes, perhaps wrongly, the names Rapha and Raphah. There is nothing to suggest that a proper name is intended: while the article indicates a common noun. The phrase prob. only means that the men named were born of giant stock (see Rephaim). (2) Son of Binea, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch. 8.[37]). He appears as Rephaiah in 1 Ch. 9.[43].

RAPHU, father of Palti, who represented the tribe of Benjamin among the spies (Nu. 13.[9]).

RAVEN, the well-known bird Corvus corax, common in Pal. It is mentioned in the account of the Flood in Gn. 8.[7]; and declared unclean in Lv. 11.[15]; Dt. 14.[14]. Ravens supplied Elijah with food (1 K. 17.[6]).

There is an explanation of this miracle wh. is not without some plausibility. If we neglect the vowels the word trd. "ravens" may be rendered "Arabs," or "merchants," or "inhabitants of Oreb." Some scribe loving the marvellous mt. have made the change.

The ravens are mentioned as examples of Divine care (Jb. 38.[41]; Ps. 147.[9]; Lk. 12.[24]); as black (SS. 5.[11]); as dwelling in solitary places (Is. 34.[11]).

RAZOR (Heb. mōrāh, taʿar; the former word is strictly "razor"; the latter is really "knife"). Shaving was common among the Egyptians; not only the chin but the whole head was shaved. One of the signs of the consecration of the Nazirite was that no razor shd. come upon his head (Nu. 6.[5]); so too of Samson (Jg. 16.[17]); and of Samuel (1 S. 1.[11]). On the contrary, the sign of the consecration of the Levite was "shaving" (Nu. 8.[7]). When the leper was cleansed he was to "shave off all his hair" (Lv. 14.[8]). Razors were prob. first made of bronze, but afterwards of steel.

Approach to Es-Salt from the North

REAIA, REAIAH. (1) A Judahite, son of Shobal and father of Jahath (1 Ch. 4.[2]). (2) A Reubenite, son of Micah and father of Baal (1 Ch. 5.[5], AV. "Reaia"). (3) Ancestor of a family of Nethinim, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[47]; Ne. 6.[50]).

REAPING. See AGRICULTURE.

REBA, one of the five kings, or princes of Midian, slain in the campaign of vengeance undertaken against them in consequence of the evil wrought under the counsel of Balaam (Nu. 31.[8]; Jo. 13.[21]).

REBEKAH, NT. REBECCA (Rm. 9.[10]), was the daughter of Bethuel, and sister of Laban: she became the wife of Isaac, and mother of Esau and Jacob (Gn. 22.[23], 24.[29, 67], 25.[21], &c.). No OT. story excels in simple beauty that of the trusted steward's expedition in search of a wife for his master's son. It is familiar in every detail, so it need not be repeated here. The scene at the well, the conference in the house, the persuasions of the steward, the costly gifts, the frank willingness of the maiden to face the unknown in faith upon the steward's word, and the final farewell to home and kindred, receive memorable description, and we share the steward's conviction that Isaac's bride has been chosen for him by God. Her kindly and winsome disposition gains our affection at once. That she was also fair is sufficiently proved by the narrative in Gn. 26.[6ff.] When, at last, after long waiting, she was granted the joys of motherhood, and twin boys made sunshine in her tent, she revealed a lack of balance in her affection, which was destined to work disaster. All her heart seems to have gone out to the younger son, while for Esau she cared nothing. A woman of energetic nature, the history shows that she was not deficient in the craft that distinguished members of her family—LABAN her brother, and JACOB her son. For the deceit practised on Isaac, in the interest of Jacob, she paid a heavy penalty. To escape the anger of ESAU, under the pretext of seeking a wife among her kindred, she sent Jacob away, and never saw his face again. When she died she was buried in the cave of Machpelah (Gn. 49.[31]).

RECHAB. (1) Son of Rimmon, who, along with his br., murdered ISHBOSHETH (2 S. 4.[2-9]). (2) The ancestor of a branch of the Kenites (1 Ch. 2.[55]). He is probably the same person who is called the fr. of JEHONADAB (2 K. 10.[15]). In Jr. 35. we have an account of the Rechabites, the tribe called by his name. They have taken refuge in Jrs. fm. the armies of Bab. when the prophet gathers them into a chamber in the Temple buildings. They are reduced to a small number, since a single apartment can contain them all. On being offered wine they relate to the prophet their habits and the origin of them; their ancestor Jehonadab, the son of R., had forbidden them to use wine, or to practise agriculture; and commanded them to live in tents. Fm. the glimpse we have of Jehonadab he seems to have been a fanatical opponent of Baal-worship. Poss. he thought progress in civilisation meant progress in evil. It might seem to be the teaching of history. When Bab. had sunk into idolatry, the sons of TERAH, living in tents, maintained the purity of faith and worship. If the promise of Jeremiah has not been literally fulfilled, the principle that actuated him, the belief in the moral efficacy of the simple life, is ever with us. See JONADAB.

RECONCILIATION. In this article we intend to study the teaching of the NT. as to the significance of Jesus Christ—His life, death, and resurrection—in redeeming men and reconciling them with God. Nothing is gained by an effort to distinguish sharply between redemption and reconciliation. It is as they are reconciled that men are partakers in redemption.

The importance of the death of Jesus for salvation is not to be measured by the number of His recorded sayings about it. These are, in point of fact, extremely few. He could not explain the Cross while as yet the disciples were blind to its approach. Moreover, to die for the world's redemption was greater far than to interpret that death. Hence, while our Lord is quite explicit as to the fact that redemption and His Cross are bound up together, He no more left behind Him a theory of redemption than of Church government. It was for Him rather to be the Gospel than to construe it in intellectual terms. We can hardly place the anticipation of death too early in His ministry. The theory of a Christ who at the last resigned Himself to the blank shipwreck of early dreams, comforting Himself with the assurance that at least He might die for those He had failed to save, is the fantastic creation of an intemperately romantic age. Nor could anything be more unlike the facts. Jesus lived, be it remembered, in the OT.; from the first the picture of the Suffering Servant of the Lord in Is. 53. must have gone to reveal Him to Himself. The depth and glory of that ancient conception of Redeemership was a mirror in which He saw His own face. Hence at every stage of His ministry He forgives men their sins without reference to atonement, while yet His attitude to the Cross, when it drew nearer, is perfectly in keeping with this. It means only that He is giving a more definite shape, in circumstances which had ripened further, to His uniform assertion of His own Saviourhood. If before He had announced the coming of the Kingdom of God in His person, now He states expressly that its coming is meditated through the Cross. Death for Him was no accident, nor even an unfortunate necessity; it was the staple, rather, of the work given Him to do.

In Mk. 10.[45] Jesus says that "the Son of Man came . . . to give His life a ransom for many." This is His description, in an hour of solemn and heightened feeling, of the vocation appointed Him of the Father. Thus to give His life is the original ground of His presence in the world. By designating the gift of His life as a "ransom" He means, probably, that it is a precious object, surrendered to God, and by its intrinsic worth able to liberate the forfeited lives of many. Why and to whom they are forfeit is not expressed, but it is difficult to believe that Jesus' hearers would not understand the phrase as an allusion to the penalty of sin. This single word of Jesus puts the Cross at the centre of the Gospel. The very meaning of His life was that it should be given as a ransom. Passing to the words He spoke at the Last Supper, "This is My blood of the covenant shed for many" (Mk. 14.[24]), we note that since the idea of a covenant in blood (i.e. sealed with blood) is central, it matters little whether Matthew's addition, "for the remission of sins," is authentic or not. The meaning is the same either way, for the passage is shot through with ideas drawn from the OT. sacrificial system; covenant blood is therefore blood used in sacrifice, and blood so used is propitiatory or efficacious in mediating forgiveness. The irreducible minimum of meaning in this passage, accordingly, may be put thus. Jesus says that He is sealing a covenant with His blood, and that the cardinal benefit derivable from that covenant is the forgiveness of sins. The simple inference is that between these two things a real bond exists; the shedding of His life-blood is the ground on which, under the New Covenant thus sealed, forgiveness of sins becomes real. Not merely does Jesus imply that His death is meant to effect forgiveness; there is no other element in His experience about which He implies this. And yet we ought not to isolate the death from the preceding life. On the contrary, it is not so much the death of Christ that redeems men; it is the death of Christ.

In the fourth Gospel, also, stress is laid on the element of necessity in the life of Jesus, impelling Him to the Cross. And special weight is attached to His motives. The mighty passion of His love for men is shown by His voluntary acceptance of death. As the Good Shepherd He does for His flock a lonely and singular service they could not render for themselves or for each other. The thought of sacrifice is present in the great word put in the Baptist's lips, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world;" where the phrase "of God" indicates that the sin-bearing Lamb is not of man's providing, but a Divine gift.

The view of Jesus' death for sinners held by the apostles is in no sense a mere echo of the Master's words; yet it is in complete harmony with the indications He had given. For them plainly the word of the Cross is but another name for the Christian Gospel. St. Paul's teaching on atonement is most worth study, and may be comprehended summarily under four heads. (1) The death of Christ is vicarious. What Christ has done and borne, He did and bore for a sinful world; "one died for all." The need for His suffering was a need created by human sin. (2) The death of Christ is expiatory, or, to put it otherwise, it has direct relation to the Divine law that links sin and death together. Sin has established certain conditions in the world, which are charged with God's condemnation, and to these Christ bowed Himself in a sympathy that identified Him with the guilty. The right to forgive sin belongs to Him who expiates it, and the soul that abandons itself to the redeeming judgment and mercy present in the Cross has peace with God. (3) The death of Christ is propitiatory; that is, it has relation to the wrath of God against sin. It both reveals that wrath—as something which Christ sympathised with and felt to be the indispensable vindication of Divine righteousness—and averts its consequences for a sinful world. The way God took to express His mind about sin, and to mark its infinite seriousness, cost Him a price such as only love could have paid. So that even in this point of view it is made quite clear that the love of the Father is the fountain of all redemption. Christ's death is a sacrifice, in every befitting sense of that word; but, just as was the case in the OT., sacrifice is not the sinner's gift to God, but God's provision for the sinner. Did Paul regard the sufferings of our Lord as being strictly punishment? It scarcely seems so; He is nowhere described as having been the object of the Father's wrath, an idea indeed to which no moral meaning could be attached; but we may certainly affirm that He bore what for us would have been punishment, and so accomplished in the moral universe all and more than all than our punishment could have done. In the Cross there is that which attests and satisfies the inviolable holiness of God even more perfectly than His execution of judgment upon sinners. (4) The death of Christ effects reconciliation. "We were reconciled to God through the death of His Son" (Rm. 5.[10]). What is chiefly important is to note that this reconciliation takes its rise not on man's side, but God's. It is the love of God that is being illustrated from v. 5 onwards. So that "we were reconciled" cannot mean "we laid our enmity aside"; on the contrary, it must mean "God reconciled us to Himself by all that His love achieved in the Cross"; as it has been expressed, "He put away everything that on His side meant estrangement." Similarly in 2 Cor. 5.[18-20] Paul beseeches men to be reconciled; it is something for them to receive, not something for them to effect. Of course it remains true that for reconciliation the attitude of both parties must be modified; but what the apostle's language bears is that in this matter God took the first step and paid the whole cost; the change of feeling on our part being an ethically intelligible result of the appeal to us of what God has done. On the basis of this reconciliation life is changed from end to end; we are filled with the triumphant power to overcome sin, and made brethren one of another.

It is impossible, however, to seize the Pauline view of reconciliation and atonement truly, except as we place all that has been said full in the light of the great conception of Union with Christ. In this conception the apostle's whole doctrine of redemption is implicitly contained. It is in this connection that he utters his sublimest words. Thus in Rm. 8.[1] we read, "There is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus"; cp. Eph. 1.[7], "In whom we have our redemption through His blood." The death of Christ, in other words, is in a most real sense our death also, for we make it ours by faith. Our solidarity with Christ is such that in His cross we too are crucified (Gal. 2.[20]); in His grave we are buried; with the Risen Lord, because in Him, we too rise to newness of life. And in Him, the Living One who still keeps the redeeming virtue of His death, we have complete salvation. We have forgiveness, because His answer to God's holy law becomes, through our identification with Him in faith, our answer also; we have holiness, because there energises within us, likewise in virtue of the union due to faith, the Spirit of His perfect life. The believer has an interest in the death of Christ because first of all and chiefly he has an interest in Christ Himself, and by faith is one with Him. On the basis of that oneness he is a reconciled and redeemed man. And he is thereby assured of a growing assimilation to Christ's own character, not simply as mediated by gratitude to the Saviour—although the springs of gratitude within him have been unsealed as never previously—but because Christ has taken possession of his inner life and abides in him. In this union with Christ there is nothing magical; it is all ethical, spiritual, experimental. We are made one with Christ only as we have faith in Him as He is offered to us in the Gospel. This faith is not acquiescence in a prescribed dogma; it is trust in a living Person. And the union so effected is such that it can be regarded from either side; thus Jesus employs now the one phrase, "I in you," now the other, "ye in Me" (Jn. 15.). Careful study appears to prove that in this point we may discover the focus of NT. teaching about redemption. Hither the various types of apostolic doctrine all converge. The writers of the NT. are conscious that it is as being "found in Christ" that they are saved men.

For the modern mind also there is real help to be derived from this great religious idea. How, it is often asked, can the atoning passion of One Man benefit, or avail for, any other? And if Christ were as separate from us as we are from each other, no answer could be given, in logic or morality. But if, with Paul and John, we refuse to look upon Christ as one isolated person, and the Christian as another, the representative act of Christ in dying for sin will appear in a new light. The union, just because it is a union, has two aspects. He joined Himself to us, and so took our place upon the Cross; we join ourselves to Him, and so share in His relation to God. He takes us with Him into the favour of God, which is life indeed—our sins His, for we are His; His righteousness ours, for He is ours. There is no imputation on either side, but there is a coalescence of Life with life. This may be mystical, but, as has been said finely, the mystery is fact. Christ Himself is our wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption. He—not merely something He once did, but the Living One, in whom His passion is eternally present—He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world. H. R. MACKINTOSH.

RECORDER (Heb. mazkîr), a high official in the courts of DAVID and SOLOMON (2 S. 8.[16], 20.[24]; 1 K. 4.[3]). There has been some difference of opinion as to the precise force of this title; Luther trs. Kanzler; EV. following Vlg. regard R. as court annalist, but the form of the Heb. word and the rendering of the LXX confirm the view of Thenius (Com. Könige), followed by Keil, Nowack, and Benzinger, that he was the king's "remembrancer."

RED. See COLOUR.

RED HEIFER. In Nu. 19. there is an account given of the means by wh. the "uncleanness" or "taboo" due to contact with the dead was to be removed. The section begins in a special way, suggesting a different origin, "This is the ordinance of the law. wh. the Lord hath commanded," implying that this ordinance (ḥuqqāh) stood in a singular and special relation to the other ceremonial legislation. Unlike the most of the sacrifices this was to be, not a male, but a female, a heifer; the special colour is also prescribed—"red," i.e., is a reddish brown. This attention to colour is found in Egypt—thus the Apis bull had to be black; the Mnevis bull, judging by the monuments, was white. This heifer was to be brought by the children of Isr. to Eleazar, and he was to lead her forth out of the camp, and some one, presumably not a priest, was to kill her in his presence. Then Eleazar was to "take of the blood on his finger and sprinkle of her blood toward the front of (RV.; "directly before," AV.) the Tabernacle of the congregation seven times." It is difficult to understand what actually took place; the most natural supposition wd. be that Eleazar brought the blood in a bason to the front of the Tabernacle, and there dipping his finger in the bason, sprinkled the blood seven times towards the door of the Tabernacle; then returned to where the carcase was and saw it duly burned; then into the fire Eleazar threw cedar, hyssop, and scarlet. After this, first the priest and then the man who had burned the heifer had to wash their clothes and were "unclean until even." A third person, "a man that is clean," had to gather the ashes and deposit them "in a clean place," and he too became unclean, and had to wash his clothes and remain "taboo" till evening. The purpose of this is now revealed. When any one had come in contact with a dead body he was to be unclean seven days; he was to wash himself on the third day and the seventh, and after the last washing he was to be sprinkled by a clean person with water, fm. a stream or spring, wh. had been poured upon some of the ashes of the heifer; then only was he who had touched a dead body clean. It has been found that a number of superstitious observances, e.g. in India, have, totally independent of the ritual explanation, a hygienic origin; here the Divine regulation emphasised what possibly began by being a superstition for hygienic reasons. Contact with the dead, if the death had been the result of infectious disease, was obviously a thing to be discouraged. Even though the death had been by violence, and so no germs of disease were apparent, yet death tends to generate death. Such an ordinance it mt. be thought wd. be among the most primitive; notwithstanding that the general consensus of the critics declares this to be late, the evidences of the document itself all point to the consecration of an ancient custom. The circumstances taken for granted in the ordinance imply that all the people were collected together when it was enjoined; when they were scattered over the land it wd. be impossible for the law to be carried out in its entirety. Residents in Upper Galilee wd. be perpetually going up to Jrs. to be sprinkled with the water of "separation," or returning fm. the ceremony—a matter of a couple of weeks on each occasion. That the name Eleazar is repeatedly mentioned, while it is not said that the second High Priest is to superintend the slaughter of the heifer, suggests the same thing; antiquity was not particular to insert features that wd. indicate an early date. The introduction of Eleazar was needless unless Eleazar became a name for the second High Priest, a custom of wh. there is no trace. It may be noted that there is no trace historically that the ordinance was ever observed; it is, however, referred to in Hebrews (9.[13]) as one of the regular institutions of Judaism. That the killing and burning of the red heifer shd. not be mentioned is not strange; when we remember how small a pinch of ashes wd. suffice, the sacrifice wd. only rarely be offered. The rabbins say that nine were slain in all, a number that, if true, wd. prove, small as was the quantity of ashes required, that in general some less arduous mode of lustration was held sufficient.

RED SEA (Heb. Yām Ṣūph, "Sea of Weeds"). This is the sheet of water which divides Arabia from North-east Africa. It stretches from Bab el-Mandeb to Suez, a distance of about 1700 miles. At the western end it is split by the triangular peninsula of Sinai into the Gulf of 'Aqaba on the east and the Gulf of Suez on the west. There is abundant evidence that for ages the sea has been receding and growing shallower; or rather, that the land has been gradually rising. This is seen in the raised beaches which are found at various levels, containing the same shells and corals as now abound in the sea. One of these beaches is as much as 220 feet above the present level of the water. From evidence collected during the cutting of the Suez Canal, it seems probable that in comparatively recent, although prehistoric, time the western arm of the sea reached as far as the bitter lakes. How far the waters had receded at the time of the Exodus, when the sea first comes into notice, we cannot tell. Upon this would probably depend the point chosen for the crossing when the children of Israel were leaving Egypt (see EXODUS, THE). The Gulf of 'Aqaba forms the continuation southward of the great hollow which, under various names, stretches away to the north, the 'Arabah, the Ghōr, the Biqā' (see Jordan Valley, under PALESTINE). On this gulf lay ELATH and EZION-GEBER, so that it was associated with the two maritime enterprises attempted by Israelite monarchs: that under Solomon, with Phœnician seamen, being a great success: that under Jehoshaphat being a disastrous failure. See further SEA.

REDEEMER, REDEEM, REDEMPTION. There are two Heb. words so trd. (1) Gā'al, wh. suggests primarily relationship (cp. Arb. jīl, "a tribe"), hence gō'ēl, "the avenger of blood" (Nu. 35.[19]); it means to ransom fm. slavery; e.g. God redeems Isr. (Ex. 6.[6]). It is the technical word for the repurchase of house or land (Lv. 25.[24]; Ru. 4.[4]). (2) Pādāh, primarily meaning "to let loose," but it acquired the meaning of paying a money ransom (Ex. 13.[13]). The reference is especially to God and His people (Ps. 34.[22]). In NT. agorazō (Rv. 5.[9]), exagorazō (Gal. 3.[13]), lutroō (Tt. 2.[14]), all refer to the work of Christ. See RANSOM.

REED. The usual Heb. word is qāneh, from which comes our word "cane" (Greek, kalamos), signifying tall grass. It is used, e.g., for the stalk of corn (Gn. 41.[5]). Probably in Scripture it denotes mainly the tall and graceful Arundo donax, which grows luxuriantly along the streams in the Jordan valley. Its light, feathery head is sensitive to the slightest breeze (1 K. 14.[15]; Mw. 11.[7], &c.). Walking staffs (2 K. 18.[21], &c.), measuring rods (Ek. 40.[3], &c.), and other useful articles were made of its straight stem. The kalamos, from which pens were made (3 Jn.[13]), grew only in Egypt. Gōme' (Ex. 2.[3]; Is. 18.[2], AV. bulrush, RVm. "papyrus"; Jb. 8.[11]; Is. 35.[7], rush) is the famous papyrus cane, no longer found in Lower Egypt, but abounding in Upper Egypt, and also in the Upper Jordan valley at el-Ḥûleh, in Nahr ez-Zerqā, and Nahr el-Fālik. 'Agmōn (Is. 58.[5], AV. "bulrush," RV. "rush"; Is. 9.[14], 19.[15], "rush") denotes some tall grass with drooping head. 'Agamīm (Jr. 51.[32]) prob. refers to masses of reeds in the marshes. 'Ārōth (Is. 19.[7], AV. "paper reeds," RV. "meadows") properly denotes "bare plains."

"The wild beast of the reeds" (Ps. 68.[30], RV.) may be the hippopotamus, the crocodile, or the wild swine that frequents the cane-brakes. See also Flag.

Arundo Donax

REELAIAH. See Raamiah.

REFINING, the process of cleansing a precious metal of impurities; as the commoner metal, the reference is most frequently to silver (Ml. 3.[3]). The process involved melting and prolonged exposure to heat until it was complete; hence frequently metaphorically for the moral purification wh. results fm. affliction. See Metals.

REFUGE, CITIES OF. See Cities of Refuge.

REGEM, a Calebite, son of Jahdai (1 Ch. 2.[47]).

REGEM-MELECH. The name occurs in an obscure and difficult passage (Zc. 7.[2]) in connection with a deputation to the priest, inquiring as to the necessity for observing the fast of the fifth month, in which was commemorated the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldæans.

REGENERATION (Gr. palingenesia), a word occurring twice in the NT.; once referring to the renewal of the world in the General Resurrection at the second coming of the Messiah (Mw. 19.[28]); again to the renewal of the individual in conversion (Tt. 3.[5]). The word is most commonly used in the latter sense, and to this we now turn our attention.

The idea of a rebirth was not introduced by Christianity; but, like many other terms and ideas taken over in a similar manner, it is deepened in meaning. In the mysteries of Greece, especially in the most important of them, the Eleusinian (Preller, Griechische Mythologie, i. 654), there is the suggestion of a rebirth. This is the case with many of the initiatory rites of heathen races. When a young Brahmin is initiated, and has been invested with the sacred thread, he is thenceforth declared to be "twice-born" (Williams, Religious Thought in India, p. 361). More directly in the line of the evolution of Christianity is the admission of proselytes by the Jews; along with circumcision there was administered to the intending proselyte the rite of baptism to typify his rebirth as a son of Israel. This last characteristic explains the connection between R. and Baptism.

In approaching the question of Christian R. we must bear in mind that it is one to be handled with caution. The term is figurative; a physical figure for a spiritual fact. By the very nature of the case a "figure" has only a superficial connection with that of wh. it is the figure; pre-eminently is this the case when the figure is physical and that wh. is prefigured is spiritual. The figure is always inadequate because the physical never can be conterminous with the spiritual; hence the liability to error by pressing the figure too far, or on the other hand, of failing to get all the truth it conveys by not carrying it far enough. It is only one figure of many used to express the great truths of salvation. There is the forensic series of figures; justification, substitution, adoption, and in a manner sanctification also. This before us belongs to the vital series. R. is one way of representing the Divine and objective side of what is emphatically the great change, as "conversion" represents the human, the subjective side. The figure of raising fm. the dead is also used to convey this; as "God . . . even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ" (Eph. 2.[4, 5]). In this figure the unconverted state is represented as a state of death; a view wh. may be regarded as implicit in the figure before us. Death in the Biblical sense does not mean non-existence, but existence on a lower plane than that for wh. the being referred to was intended. This might, indeed, serve as a general definition of death. A corpse is a "dead body": it is not non-existent; it is a mass of matter occupying space, and having weight, but no longer the organ of a human spirit. So the human spirit may be regarded as dead when, though existent, it has ceased to be the organ of the Divine Spirit. In like manner he that has not been reborn exists, but as a slave, not a son of God. Under both figures the agent is the Holy Spirit; the regenerate is "born of the Spirit" (Jn. 3.5); so of the new life, "it is the Spirit that quickeneth" (Jn. 6.63). A man who ought to be a son of God lives to himself, and is thus "dead while he liveth"; the spirit in him is dead. But a change comes over him; the spirit in him is quickened, he is "begotten unto a lively hope," and he becomes the son of God which fm. the beginning he ought to have been.

We have now to consider R. in relation to its effects in life. A spiritual change that does not manifest itself in act is valueless; a tree that never put forth leaves or blossom cd. not be reckoned living. It has been well shown by Mozley (Baptismal Controversy) that R. always means moral goodness in the subject of it. This is test of it; thus the apostle Paul says, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God" (Rm. 8.14). Again he exhorts the Philippians to be "blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke" (Php. 2.15). The antithesis is the "children of wrath," "children of disobedience." The presence of righteousness is thus the distinguishing mark of R. When, however, the apostle John declares boldly of the regenerate, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin because he is born of God" (1 Jn. 3.9), we feel in the presence of a difficulty. Such a statement seems not only to contradict experience, but even the words of the apostle himself in chap. 1., "If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us" (1.8). In the first-mentioned passage the apostle regards the process of regeneration as completed in idea; in so far as a man is regenerate he cannot sin. If we imagine a dead body having the spirit of life given to it, the heart begins to beat, but only slowly and by degrees does the life of the heart reach the extremities. So the apostle Paul recognises that in his "flesh dwelleth no good thing"—that in his sinful dead nature his members are "instruments of unrighteousness unto sin." There is a warfare going on within his spiritual nature much as there wd. be in the physical constitution of one in whom, as we have imagined, the stopped heart has resumed its pulsations; there is a painful struggle in every organ, every member, before life entirely triumphs over death. In the spiritual sphere the pain amounts, in Paul's case, to an agony leading him to cry out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me fm. the body of this death?" The apostle John sees within the external struggle against evil to the "inward man," and sees that the essential man does not consent to the evil. We must remember that in Scripture sin is not an act or a series of acts, but a state—a state of alienation fm. God. R. is the removal of the person out of this state to that of reconciliation with God and of love to Him. Perfected R. is thus perfected sanctification.

That there was, fm. early days, a connection in thought between R. and Baptism cannot be denied. In the classic passage concerning R., the interview between our Lord and Nicodemus, we find these two brought into close relationship. "Except a man be born of water and the Spirit he cannot see the kdm. of God" (Jn. 3.5). In Titus we find the same thing asserted: God hath "saved us by the washing of R. and renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Tt. 3.5). We have already seen the meaning the Jews attached to baptism in the reception of proselytes; this idea is carried over into the NT. This connection it retains in Justin Martyr, the earliest of the Fathers to give any particular account of baptism (1 Apol. 61). As the Church became more and more essentially Hellenic, the Jewish meaning was lost sight of, but rhetoric became more and more dominant. We must remember that, before the first Christian century had ended, to be a Christian involved danger of the direst kind; for one to be baptized was publicly to confess himself a believer, and thus expose himself to all these dangers. The new spiritual life must have been strong and vigorous within a man to have emboldened him to make public his faith in these circumstances. The flush of enthusiasm that must have accompanied such an experience wd. of necessity be an emphatic waymark in the believer's spiritual history; he wd. then be most conscious of having passed fm. death into life. That epithets and descriptions applicable only to the spiritual change shd. be given to that wh. was its outward sign was but natural. What had to the Fathers of the first centuries been excusable rhetoric, became doctrine to the Schoolmen. The origin of the connection was lost sight of, and marvellous were the subtleties employed to harmonise the doctrine of infants being regenerate and yet becoming at an early age obviously to every good work wholly reprobate. At the same time, while it is easy to ridicule the doctrine of Baptismal R., we must recognise the truth it contains. When a child is presented for baptism the assumption is that he is of Christian parentage; if there is anything in heredity he may be supposed to have inherited a disposition in some measure congruous to the Gospel; if not regenerate he is prepared for R. Further, if his parents are really believers, the influence of their faith, exercised to a great extent unconsciously, tends to implant faith in his heart. But that infants, either of heathen or of Christian parents, dying unbaptized, are consigned to eternal perdition, is a proposition repugnant not less to the spirit of Christ than to reason and human feeling.

REGISTER, a record of the birth and Genealogy of every Jew (Ne. 7.5) wh. appears to have been kept. It was especially careful in the case of priests (Ez. 2.[62]).

REHABIAH, son of Eliezer the son of Moses (1 Ch. 23.[17], &c.).

REHOB. (1) The northern limit of the territory explored by the spies (Nu. 13.[21]), situated at "the entering in of Hamath." It is possibly identical with BETH-REHOB: unidentified. (2) A city in Asher held by the Canaanites (Jo. 19.[28]; Jg. 1.[31]). It is not identd., but is apparently distinct from (3), which is also a city in the territory of Asher, given to the Levites (Jo. 19.[36], 21.[31]). (4) The father of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (2 S. 8.[3, 12]). (5) A Levite who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ne. 10.[11]).

REHOBOAM, properly Reḥabĕ'am, "the people is enlarged." Son and successor of Solomon on the throne of Israel. His mother was Naamah, the Ammonitess (1 K. 14.[21], &c.), and he succeeded his father at the age of forty-one (2 Ch. 12.[13]). He was secure in the sovereignty of Judah, but the relations between the northern and southern tribes had never been too cordial (see EPHRAIM). The allegiance of the former to the house of David had been severely strained in the time of Solomon (see JEROBOAM). The situation was critical. Only a wise and tactful prince could have met it with success. Rehoboam was foolish and tactless. To secure the sovereignty of the ten tribes he must be elected by an assembly of the nation convened at Shechem. There the throne was offered him on condition that he should relieve the people of the grievous exactions and the forced labour imposed by his father. The elder counsellors of Rehoboam advised concession, but the proposals of the younger men fell in with his own ideas of what was fitting. Utterly misjudging the strength of the opposition, he threatened to increase rather than diminish the burdens of the people. Thereupon the ten tribes spurned his rule. Adoniram, whom he sent, clearly with the purpose of making terms with them, they stoned; and Rehoboam himself, as if in mockery of his boastful threatenings, had to find safety by flight to Jerusalem. JEROBOAM, who, at Solomon's death, had returned from Egypt, was elected king of the northern tribes, and the rupture with Judah was complete.

A Divine warning prevented Rehoboam from entering upon a war of subjugation, but peaceful relations between the two kingdoms were impossible (1 K. 14.[30]). Judah seems to have been the only entire tribe adhering to Rehoboam (1 K. 12.[20]). Some of the northern Benjamites joined the ten, although the main body of the tribe followed Rehoboam (12.[21]). The accession of the Levites also strengthened his position for a time (2 Ch. 11.[13]). He fortified many cities towards the south, as if fearing an attack from Egypt (2 Ch. 11.[5ff.]). Under Rehoboam there was a grievous lapse into idolatry. This was avenged by the invasion of Shishak, king of Egypt (1 K. 14.[21ff.], &c.). An inscription on the south wall of the temple of Amon at Karnak gives an account of this expedition. Jerusalem was taken, but there is no mention of a siege. The Temple was rifled of its treasures, including the golden shields which Solomon had made. These Rehoboam replaced with shields of brass. He maintained a large harīm. His favourite wife was MAACAH, the granddaughter of Absalom (2 Ch. 11.[21]), whose son, Abijah, succeeded him on the throne of Judah. Rehoboam is said to have reigned seventeen years. A history of his reign was written by Shemaiah and Iddo (12.[15]), but it has not been preserved.

REHOBOTH, "wide spaces." (1) A well digged by Isaac, which, unlike others for which the herdsmen of Abimelech had striven, he was allowed to possess in peace (Gn. 26.[22]). It is probably to be identified with a well about 19 miles south of Beersheba, where the ancient name is preserved in Wādy Ruḥeibah. (2) "Rehoboth by the river" (Gn. 36.[37]). The home of the Edomite king Saul. "The river" might mean the Euphrates, in which case Rehoboth might be sought at er-Rahabah, near Chaboras, on the western bank. Some, however, think the "river of Egypt," i.e. Wādy el-'Arīsh, is intended—the southern boundary of Palestine. There is no certainty.

REHOBOTH, THE CITY. The Heb. reḥobōth-'īr really means "the squares [or broad places] of a city"; it is named as one of the four cities that formed the beginning of NIMROD's empire (Gn. 10.[11] RV.). Esarhaddon (B.C. 681–668) mentions rēbīt Ninā, "the broad places of Nineveh," which may denote a quarter of the city, at first apart from it, with broad, open streets. It is possible that Heb. reḥobōth-'īr = Asyr. rēbīt Ninā.

REHUM. (1) One of "the children of the province" who went up to Jrs. from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ez. 2.[2]). He is called Nehum in Ne. 7.[7], perhaps a scribe's mistake (1 Es. 5.[8], "Roimus"). (2) "Rehum the chancellor," one of those who wrote to Artaxerxes, seeking to have the building at Jerusalem interdicted (Ez. 4.[8], &c.). The Aram. title, bĕ'el ṭĕ'em, "lord of decree," is simply transliterated in LXX (βαλτάμ): 1 Es. 2.[16], "Rathumus." (3) A Levite of the sons of Bani, who took part in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Ne. 3.[17]). (4) One of the chiefs who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ne. 10.[25]). (5) The head of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ne. 12.[3]).

REI, an officer of the guard who did not favour the claims of Adonijah. He is named along with other mighty men of David (1 K. 1.[8]) upon whose loyalty Solomon depended for his security. Rei is not mentioned again, and various attempts have been made to identify him with other men, the text here being doubtful. Josephus reads "Shimei, David's friend," so that Rei as a personal name disappears if his reading is correct.

REINS (Heb. kĕlāyōth, "kidneys," Jb. 16.[13], &c.; once only khalātzāyīm, "loins," Is. 11.[5]). In accordance with Hebrew ideas, which associated mental and other functions with various organs of the body, the kidneys were supposed to be the seat of the affections and emotions.

REKEM. (1) One of the five "kings" of Midian whom the Israelites slew at the time when Balaam was put to death (Nu. 31.[8]; Jo. 13.[21]). (2) Son of Hebron and father of Shammai, a Calebite (1 Ch. 2.[43]). (3) See RAKEM. (4) A city in the territory of Benjamin (Jo. 18.[27]), not identified.

RELIGION OF ISRAEL. Nature of the Problem.—The term "religion," for which the language of the Old Testament appears to possess no exact equivalent, includes a system of practices, or ritual, and a system of beliefs, or theology. Both of these are subject to fluctuation, and indeed to violent and sudden change; but on the whole the ritual is apt to be the more stable, being that with which the larger number of persons are acquainted, and capable at times of accommodation to various theological systems. An account of the religion of a nation, unless it be historical, can therefore be valid for only a limited period. The theory of the Old Testament with regard to the religion of Israel is very different. In the law of Moses it exhibits a code with which the national life of Israel is supposed to have started. Religion according to this takes the form of a contract between Israel and its Deity; Israel's part was to carry out the law; the part of the Deity is perhaps less clearly explained, but possession of the land of Canaan, with certain other tokens of prosperity, would be included in the contract. Since the history of Israel was on the whole a grim failure, the national historians, acting on the theory described, have an interest in showing that Israel failed to keep its part of the compact; and in all the historical books, but especially in the Chronicles, prosperity and adversity are made to follow on piety and impiety in a manner known to no secular records. The supposition that the law in its final and complete form was promulgated at the commencement of the national history is indispensable for this view of the events.

Certain problems are at once suggested by this theory, which call for at least a tentative answer. One is, What happened before this contract was executed? Another is, In what condition with regard to it are the other nations of the earth? The first could be answered by the supposition that the great contract was preceded by a series of preliminary contracts, made either with the immediate or remote ancestry of Israel; and to this extent the idea of "progressive revelation" is admitted into the OT., Noah, Abraham, &c., being represented as earlier contracting parties. There is reason for thinking that the reply to the second question would have been in the spirit of the narrative of the Flood, viz., that all other nations were outlawed.

The difficulties of the theory in relation to the OT. records themselves, when once those records were critically studied, proved to be very great, and have led to its being generally abandoned. On the one hand the law itself is not a single and consistent code, but clearly a combination of several, belonging to different times and perhaps localities. On the other hand the practice of even pious personages, as described in the earlier documents, differs widely from the prescriptions of the law. The books of Chronicles give evidence of a deliberate attempt to get rid of the latter difficulty by revising the earlier narratives. Moreover, not a few Israelitish institutions are in certain documents made out to be earlier than the institution of the law, and statements occurring in the latter are contradicted by others in the narrative portions of the Pentateuch. Thus circumcision appears to have commenced with both Abraham and Moses; and whereas in Exodus (6.[3]) there is a definite statement that the name of the national Deity (JHVH) was unknown before the time of the latter, in Gn. 4.[26] the name is said to go back to the days of Seth, and in 4.[1] it is used by Eve.

It has therefore become usual to place the law in its complete form at the end instead of the beginning of the national existence of Israel, meaning by the former some date after the loss of independence. The idea that the community had contracted to observe a code doubtless sprang up before that event, but it is unknown who first propounded the theory, and when that code was first attributed to Moses, with whose name it is traditionally associated. Epochs in its formation are connected with the names of Josiah and Ezra; in the time of the former a copy is said to have been casually "discovered," whereas the latter in the fifth century B.C. is said to have brought it with him from Babylon to Jerusalem; only we do not know whence he had procured it. Additions continued to be made even when the written form of the law had become in a measure unalterable; these were accommodated to the theory by the supposition that there was an oral as well as a written code delivered to Moses; and in time these too were committed to parchment.

The religion of Israel is therefore now interpreted as the practices and beliefs of the nation in the times for which we have records—some day, we may hope, to be supplemented by archæological discovery. These are no longer regarded as corruptions and offences against the law, where they differ from it, the innovations being rather the methods which ultimately prevailed. The attitude of the Biblical writers towards the former is in general so hostile that only an imperfect sketch can at best be drawn.

The Object of Worship.—Before the establishment of the kingdom, and even afterwards, many concurrent notions of the nature of the Deity appear to have been entertained, varying to some extent with the intellectual development of the worshippers. In patriarchal days He was in some way identified with a stone (Gn. 28.[18], 35.[14]), in accordance with a theory characteristic of Arabia. That the Israelites worshipped molten images of a calf is attested by the historians; the origin of the practice is ascribed to Jeroboam, and more strangely to Aaron, eponymous of the priestly caste; the narrative, however, in which the latter figures implies that this image-worship was based on an earlier zoolatry, in which a real calf led the tribal migrations, much as a camel led those of certain Arab tribes. The vengeance which Moses wreaks on the calf (Ex. 32.[20]) shows that it cannot have been of metal. Image-worship was during the period of the kingdoms prevalent throughout Palestine; the materials varying with the wealth of the devotees. The Israelites further worshipped the sun, moon, and stars; and Amos has the curious notice (5.[26]) that in the wilderness they worshipped the planet Saturn (Kaiwān); this seems confirmed by the institution of the Sabbath, the day sacred to that planet, which, in the ordinary astrology, was unlucky, whence work done on the day would be likely to be disastrous. The cult of the moon survived in the Mosaic ordinances for the observance of the new moon. Of Ancestor-worship it is possible to find a trace in the Ark of the Covenant, a remarkable symbol, which must originally have derived its sanctity from its contents. It first appears being carried in battle, a proceeding which it is difficult not to connect with the Arabian practice (which lasted to Fatimid times) of taking to the field a chest containing the bones or ashes of a deceased hero. The secret of the contents of the ark was jealously guarded (1 S. 6.[19]), and eventually lost. Probably ancestor-worship is also implied by the cult of the household gods or Teraphim, which must have had some approximation to human form (1 S. 19.[16]), and whose worship was normal at any rate down to the time of David.

Worship of a number of deities appears to have been carried on simultaneously with little friction till the time of Elijah. Analogy would indeed suggest that each tribe or community possessed some special object of worship, symbolic of its unity, although this kind of cult by no means prevented the recognition of similar deities who stood in the same relation to other tribes (Jg. 11.[24]), to whom members of the first community might in time of trouble resort (2 K. 1.[2]) without necessarily offending their own special deity. Probably we should be justified in crediting the Israelitish communities of the early kingdom with a pantheon, the members of which together were designated by the name Elōhīm ("gods," plural of elōāh = ilāh, itself probably plural of the old Semitic īl, "god"). In an early form of the Biblical records this word may have preserved its original sense, e.g. Gn. 1.[1], "In the beginning gods created the heaven and the earth"; afterwards it had in some places to give way to the name JHVH, whereas in others it was preserved, but treated as a singular. The Psalms retain vestiges of this doctrine of a multiplicity of deities (e.g. 82.[1]); and even St. Paul has to make some concessions to it.

The substitution for this pantheon of the monotheism embodied in the first two of the Ten Commandments was a process of long duration, attended by violent persecutions and reactions, of which we have a record in the books of Kings, which, however, suppose monotheism to have been restored, not introduced. The name of the God of Israel, written in papyri and proper names as JHV, in an inscription and ordinarily in the OT. as JHVH, but sometimes in the latter as JH, seems to meet us first in Israelitish records about the time of Saul; in Exodus (3.[14]) it is said to be the equivalent of "He is," a divine name rightly compared by Hitzig with the Armenian astouads (= vastuvān, "the really existing"), but the word is more likely to have had originally some less spiritual import. The conjectures which have been offered as to the tribe which originally worshipped JHVH seem to rest on uncertain data. The cult at some time became associated with the idea of rigid and spiritual monotheism, carried to the extent not only of iconoclasm, but even to the vetoing of the plastic and pictorial arts; on the other hand, the ritual connected with the cults which it displaced survived to a considerable extent. On the whole the theory which prevailed was that the connection of JHVH with Israel dated from the Egyptian bondage; and in the Ten Commandments deliverance by JHVH from that bondage is made the ground on which He is exclusively to be worshipped by the Israelites. There were, as has been seen, other opinions which traced the connection further back.

The phenomena primarily connected with JHVH appear to have been meteorological — thunder, lightning, hail, rain, &c.—and the title "God of heaven" is of frequent occurrence (compare the Arabic hawā', "air," from a similar root); the term Ba'al, which at one time might be applied to the national Deity, but afterwards owing to other associations was disapproved, belongs to this range of ideas. In the religious disputes wherein Elijah figures, the cessation of rain is the punishment for apostasy, whereas it recommences when true religion is restored. Those who endeavour to arrest the prophet are consumed by heavenly flame. Since in the latter narrative it is a king whose name indicates worship of JHVH (Ahaziah) who sends to another deity in a case of sickness, the gods of the early Israelitish pantheon may, as with other nations, have been assigned a variety of functions; of this the records show few traces, and the control of every natural operation (e.g. conception both human [1 S. 1.[6]; Ru. 4.[13]] and in the lower animals) was ascribed to JHVH.

It would seem that the notion of the Divine Being current among the monotheists was anthropomorphic, and this view is suggested by such visions as that of Isaiah, and various anecdotes (e.g. that of Jacob's wrestling) which have been preserved from the early mythology of the race or country, after undergoing considerable modification: doubtless, after the prohibition of images and representations, any detailed description would have been thought irreverent, and the assertion that Moses spoke with God face to face had to be revised (Ex. 33.[23]). Anthropomorphism is further suggested by the mode in which OT. writers habitually speak of the Deity—though their language has often been intentionally altered, and indeed in some of the versions systematically improved. In this language both the actions and emotions which are characteristic of mankind are ascribed to the Deity, who walks, talks, writes, smells sweet savours, is pleased and displeased, laughs, &c. The notion of the Deity was modelled on that of the king or despot, for whose ways there was no accounting.

Mythology.—Some hymn-writers praise JHVH for smiting Rahab, otherwise the serpent, a victory belonging to great antiquity (Is. 51.[9]); the author of Job appears to know most about it, as he states that Rahab had "helpers" (9.[13]), and that the victory was won by strategy (26.[12]). From Ps. 74.[14] the serpent (Leviathan) would appear to have had many heads, and after they had been smitten, the flesh was given to the Tziyyim to eat; but others think of the Leviathan as flung into the sea, whence he might still be roused. The details of this myth had been forgotten when the historical books were composed, or considered irreverent. The rescue of Israel from Egypt was substituted for it. The hymn-writers also assume the existence of a pantheon, in which the inferiority of the other gods (ēlīm) to JHVH is recognised, though their divine character is not otherwise questioned; and Dt. 32.[8] (which has clearly undergone alteration) implies that these were the gods allotted to other nations, whereas JHVH chose Israel for His own portion. The names of these beings are never mentioned, and it is only from a fragmentary record (Gn. 6.[2-4]) that we learn that they were at one time supposed to have been founders of famous houses by alliance with the daughters of men—a supposition precisely parallel to that of the Greeks. This passage gives us a glimpse of a whole system of mythology that has been expunged.

With the growth of monotheism these beings dwindled into a shadowy divine council, in which only one figure has a name—Satan, "the opposition." As, however, the divine court could not be thought of as empty, at some time angels took the place of the earlier "God's sons." These angels had Hebrew names, of obvious import, and they were assigned in some systems the function of protecting different nations which their predecessors had discharged. Of other beings, with fantastic forms, to be found in the divine court, we also have occasional notices. The location of the divine court itself seems to have varied with different minds, or indeed in the same minds. The most widely spread belief located it in the sky, and this could easily be reconciled with its location on the top of one or other mountain; the latter might be regarded as a stepping-stone between heaven and earth, and the theory of a sanctuary seems to have been that of a place where for some reason there was communication between heaven and earth—by an (ordinarily invisible) ladder in Jacob's dream. Hence the building of the Tower of Babel was an impious, but not wholly unpractical undertaking. There are, however, traces of the more spiritual view that the Deity is not located in space at all.

Female divinities appear nowhere in our records except as objects of forbidden worship; such are Ashtoreth, the "queen of heaven" (Jr. 7.[18]), Anath (only in local names). A verse of Ezekiel gives us a glimpse of a Tammuz or Adonis cult practised by women (8.[14]), doubtless involving the worship of a goddess. The myths current about these among their worshippers are not recorded.

Malignant beings bearing the difficult names shēdīm and seʿīrīm were recognised by the monotheists, who included among them the deities worshipped by their neighbours; and in the ritual of the Day of Atonement, which otherwise appears to have been a late addition to the code, a demon named Azazel was to be propitiated by the present of a goat. Probably the names of others were preserved by those who drove the forbidden trade of witchcraft. The fierce persecution of these persons by the monotheists is probably due to their perpetuation of primeval superstitions; so the wizard in Job (3.[8]) is prepared to eclipse the sun by rousing Leviathan. In the narrative of the wizard Balaam, as we have it, he, though hired to curse Israel, figures as the prophet of JHVH, perhaps in order to account for the effectiveness of his utterances; it is unlikely that this feature belonged to the original form of the story. The wizards and witches are associated with utterances coming from underground (Is. 29.[4]), and are likely to have been in relation with chthonian (or subterraneous) deities. Their names are obscure; yid'ōnī (wizard) seems to mean "inhabitant of Yid'ōn," or Wad'ān, a place near Yanbo in Arabia.

Places and Modes of Worship.—The analysis of the Biblical records, carried out most successfully by Wellhausen, has revealed three main stages in these matters: a period of licence, in which worship might be conducted anywhere and by any person; a period in which it is restricted locally to the Temple area of Jerusalem, and sacrificial operations are confined to certain privileged persons; and a third, in which the functions and privileges of this priestly caste are greatly increased and elaborated. The process whereby one stage passed into another was evidently highly complicated, and its reconstruction is rendered difficult both by the scanty nature of the documents at our disposal, and by the regular projection into the past of what each writer believed to have been normal. In a period for which we have no positive evidence it is probable that each community possessed its own sanctuary, and the persons in charge of these are likely to have been such as were acquainted with the practices belonging to them, i.e. such as had inherited the tradition from a period before the arrival of the Israelitish conquerors, who are charged with having allowed these cults to continue, whereas (in accordance with a later theory) they should have abolished them. The maintenance of a number of ancient sanctuaries as "cities of refuge" in the later legislation is evidence that there was no breach in the worship conducted in them; the Israelites, in maintaining it, acted in accordance with the ordinary practice of invaders in ancient times. The substitution in all these sanctuaries of the worship of JHVH for the original cult seems in the Northern Kingdom to have been the work of the Jehu dynasty, whence it spread to the Southern Kingdom. In the course of it many priestly families must have been exterminated. The next stage, the abolition of all places of sacrifice other than the Temple area at Jerusalem, and the creation of an inferior priestly caste (called Levites), out of the priests of the provincial sanctuaries, was later than the destruction of the Northern Kingdom, and appears to be connected with the name of Josiah; his reform was never carried out in its entirety till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the remarkable papyri of Elephantine show that the Jewish exiles built themselves temples outside the land of Palestine, the priests of which were not always at variance with their colleagues in the Second Temple of the capital.

The elevation of the priests into a caste, treated in accordance with ancient ideas as a tribe—and indeed the tribe which gave Israel its greatest hero and legislator—is closely connected with Josiah's reform, and the subsequent loss of political independence, rendering the priest (as in the Christian communities within the Ottoman empire) the national head. With the collapse of the old sanctuaries the irregular sources of revenue for the priests ceased; they became a permanent charge on the community, and were assigned in different layers of legislation an ever-increasing share of the produce, but as a set-off they were in theory to own no land. How this principle worked in practice is not known; Josephus, who declares he was a priest, was also a landowner. Of the mode in which the tithes, &c., were collected, and how they were divided among the members of the priestly caste, there is no record in the Bible or the works of Josephus. In any case only certain members of the caste can have devoted themselves to the performance of sacerdotal functions.

With the growth of the sacerdotal caste and the abolition of household gods as well as local cults, the distinction between sacred and profane appears to have been accentuated, or actually to have arisen. Whereas at an earlier stage every act of life was in some way associated with religion, the sphere of the latter became narrowed; gross forms of worship were abolished, though the memory of them was preserved (Dt. 23.[18]), and what was originally a mode of propitiating the Deity was interpreted as an offence deserving condign punishment (1 S. 2.[22]). The idea of merry-making became separated from that of worship, and the employment of the dance appears to have been abandoned, though David was thought to have practised it as a religious ceremony, not without occasioning some scandal (2 S. 6.[14]). The dissociation of art from religion never extended to music, which appears to have been highly elaborated; but to the variety of religious entertainments which other nations evolved the Israelites furnish no parallel. The taboos current in different parts of the community were at some time systematised, and some speculations on their reasons are preserved; thus blood might not be used as food because it was the life of the animal (Dt. 12.[23]), though it appears that this taboo was at first recognised by a limited number of persons or tribes (1 S. 14.[32]). Work might not be done on Saturn's day, according to one account, because the Israelites had been slaves themselves, and should therefore give their slaves an occasional holiday (Dt. 5.[14f.]); according to another, because the completion of the world in six days should be commemorated (Ex. 20.[11]). Such speculation is on the whole rare, and is perhaps controversial in character where it occurs. The most curious example is the explanation of a food-taboo by an incident in the life of the patriarch Jacob (Gn. 32.[33]), which suggests a state of cannibalism.

To what extent these ordinances were observed at any time before the final downfall of the Jewish State is not known. It is likely that a few practices took root, and became almost instinctive with the Israelites: especially circumcision, observance of the Sabbath, and abhorrence of images and of swine's flesh and blood. Otherwise it is likely that the sacerdotal legislation had, except when a fanatic like Nehemiah happened to be in power, largely academic value. Thus it is observable that the violation of the Sabbath, which, according to Nu. 15.[35], is punishable by stoning, meets in the Gospels only with mild remonstrance. The rigid enforcement of these regulations would have meant a sacerdotal inquisition into the whole of life, such as could not fail to stir up bitter resentment against the priestly caste; and of such a result there is no historical attestation. Experiments occasionally made at carrying out the enactments of the law on a great scale had a tendency to discourage such a course (Jr. 34.[12ff.]). Hence the charge of not keeping the law could be brought not only against persons imperfectly acquainted with it, but even against those whose lives were devoted to its study (Jn. 7.[19]).

Spiritual religion, or communication between the worshipper and the Divine Being, leading to the moral elevation of the former, was recognised by many persons as distinct from, if not absolutely opposed to, traditional practices; and of the existence of religion in this sense the Psalms and prophecies give evidence for at least a considerable period. Whether, however, prayer and preaching, the two most common expressions of this form of emotion—the former dissociated from requests for special favours, often or indeed ordinarily involving some kind of bargain—belonged exclusively to the monotheists and worshippers of JHVH is unknown; the literature of the sort which the OT. preserves has all passed through their hands, even if it did not all originate with them. The ecstatic state, which is not unconnected with such emotions, appears to have been known to the earlier stages of the Israelitish system (Nu. 24.[4]), and to have been induced by music (1 S. 10.[5], &c.), and perhaps by violence to the person (1 K. 18.[28]); of devotees, as the term is ordinarily understood—i.e. persons whose lives were spent in ascetic practice and meditation—we probably read first in the works of Philo and Josephus, and the systems which they describe show evident traces of foreign influence. Tendencies of this sort are illustrated from an earlier period by the practice of dedicating children to Divine service, and imposing on them certain privations, notably abstention from wine. The difficulties which exile ordinarily placed in the way of sacrifice led to the substitution of prayer at stated times of the day (Dn. 6.[10]) for more material offerings; and this rite developed at some time into a liturgy, leaving a permanent monument in the Psalms, of which the origin is perhaps somewhat more obscure than that of the law. For this development of Israelitish religion light is expected from the discoveries at Elephantine.

Theology in relation to Law and Order.—It is probable that conduct was in general thought to be regulated by the will of the gods, but the interpretation of this of course varied from time to time. Those who compiled codes embodied some existing practice with certain innovations; the Deuteronomist even contemplates the constant modification of the code by a succession of prophets (18.[15]), to be obeyed with some reservations (13.[2]). The enunciation of general principles belongs, however, to a fairly advanced stage of civilisation; the prophet at earlier periods is rather a person to be consulted on emergencies, whose suggestions, if they resulted successfully, might very likely furnish the norm for future practice. The moral value of these suggestions would vary with the character of the prophet; whence we find in David's biography a measure adopted for allaying the Divine wrath which absolutely conflicts with the rule (Dt. 24.[16]) which a later king is praised for observing. And the theory that the law, even concerning clean and unclean beasts, and marriage contracts, was given by Moses, is at times contradicted by relics of pre-Mosaic history.

Prior to the introduction of monotheism it is probable that various deities were made responsible for the prevailing practice; after that introduction right conduct was the will of JHVH. The epithets applied to Him furnished the general notions necessary for legislation, which was based upon them. Of these one of the most important was jealous, i.e. retentive of rights and unwilling that they should be shared. This adjective seems to have suggested the idea of conjugal jealousy, whence the worship of other deities is termed by the prophets "adultery." Another was of less obvious import—qādōsh, "holy," probably meaning concerned with the condition of those who approach Him, and resenting such approach except by persons in a suitable condition.

Although the records, in spite of repeated expurgation, were allowed to connect the name of the Deity with many immoral orders (e.g. Gn. 22.[2], 21.[11]), and violent persecutions of other sects were organised by prophets of JHVH, the tendency to connect the name with the higher morality cannot be ignored, and the analysis of the concept of justice or righteousness as applied to the Deity was productive of good. The relegation of all gods and goddesses save One to the region of fiction, and indeed blasphemous fiction, introduced the sublime and elevating conception of a philosophic First Cause. Yet the resulting contradiction between this idea and that of a Being connected by contract with one special nation, and ignorant of the others (Am. 3.^{2}), does not appear to have been faced by the Israelitish speculation. In certain books (e.g. Joshua and Esther), as noticed above, it might seem that on the ground of the covenant between JHVH and Israel, and the absence of similar contracts with other races, all other nations were outlawed ; while some prophecies contemplate their eventual annexation to Israel in the character of proselytes. The period of codification was the time when the most intolerant views prevailed.

Theology in relation to Psychology and kindred subjects.—The codes, while legislating for individuals, appear to deal with the nation corporately, and in the history also the individual has a tendency to disappear in the mass ; prosperity and adversity befall the nation as a whole, and are determined by the conduct of the king. The cases in which we hear of individuals thinking and acting for themselves (unless they be prophets) are rare. It is characteristic of this doctrine that the nation is constantly addressed in the singular as " thou." The nation being eternal (Sr. 37.^{25}), whereas the individual was ephemeral, personality was not of sufficient importance to deserve analysis : Israelitish thinkers remained absolutely unaffected by the speculations of their Eygptian neighbours, whose efforts were largely devoted to solving problems connected with the state after death ; and when a portion of the nation adopted the doctrine of a resurrection, it took the form of a belief that pious Israelites would be restored to life in their bodies to share in the happiness of a restored " kingdom of Israel." The prospect of a restoration was clearly not earlier than the destruction of the kingdoms, and the codes themselves, which are projected into the time of the Exodus, appear to contain no hint of any life save that on earth, or of any prosperity other than of a material kind. For the Exile, indeed, preparation is made ; but in such a way that both the national death which it implies and the restoration which is to follow on repentance are to be corporate experiences, in which individual conduct is not considered ; Israel as a whole sins, repents, and is restored.

This doctrine probably dominated Israelitish thought, and it accounts for many inconsistencies ; yet individualism was not without its representatives, and there were persons who, instead of accounting for misfortunes on the ground that the law had not been observed, asserted that " JHVH did neither good nor ill " (Zp. 1.^{12}) : in a late work of the Israelitish genius, the book Koheleth, this doctrine is set forth with great emphasis—it won, however, little support. REMALIAH, father of Pekah, king of Israel (2 K. 15.$^{25ff.}$, 16.$^{1, 5}$; 2 Ch. 28.^{6} ; Is. 7.$^{1ff.}$, 8.^{6}), apparently of obscure origin.

REMETH (Jo. 19.^{21}), possibly identical with RAMOTH 1 (1 Ch. 6.^{73}), called " Jarmuth " (Jo. 21.^{29}). A city of Issachar, probably represented by er-Rāmeh, about 11 miles south-west of Jenīn.

REMMON, RV. RIMMON (which see).

REMMON-METHOAR. See RIMMON.

REMPHAN, a term that in Ac. 7.^{43} replaces CHIUN (Kiwan, " the planet Saturn ") of Am. 5.^{26}. In the ordinary text of LXX it is Raiphan ; there is no satisfactory explanation of this variation.

REPHAEL, son of Shemaiah son of Obededom, one of the gatekeepers of the Tabernacle (1 Ch. 26.^{7}).

REPHAH, son of Ephraim, and ancestor of Joshua (1 Ch. 7.^{25}).

REPHAIAH. (1) Head of a family descended from Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3.^{21}). (2) One of the Simeonite chiefs who headed the raid on the Amalekites of Mt. Seir (1 Ch. 4.^{42}). (3) Son of Tola, of the tribe of Issachar (1 Ch. 7.^{2}). (4) Son of Binea, a descendant of Saul and Jonathan (1 Ch. 9.^{43} ; 1 Ch. 8.^{37}, " Rapha "). (5) Son of Hur, who assisted in repairing the wall (Ne. 3.^{9}), and had charge of a portion of the city.

REPHAIM, a pre-Israelite race in Palestine. They are first mentioned as occupying Ashteroth-Karnaim at the time of Chedorlaomer's invasion (Gn. 14.^{5}). Of these Og, king of Bashan, is described as a survivor (Dt. 3.^{11} ; Jo. 12.^{4}, 13.^{12} RV.). They are said aforetime to have inhabited Ar of Moab, and to have been called Emim by the Moabites (Dt. 2.^{11}). Ammon also aforetime was called " the land of the Rephaim " ; their Ammonite name being Zamzummim (v. 20). They are described as a people great and tall. Bashan also was called the " land of the R." (Dt. 3.^{13}). They are enumerated as among the nations of Palestine in pre-Israelite days (Gn. 15.^{20}). That they were found in Western Palestine is indicated by Jo. 17.^{15} ; and by the name attached to a vale south of Jerusalem. See REPHAIM, VALLEY OF. [AV. trs. " giants " in Dt. 2.$^{11, 20}$, 3.$^{11, 13}$; Jo. 12.^{4}, 13.^{12}, 17.^{15}.]

As a people they seem to loom from the dim past, vague and large, on the imagination of Israel. The name, from the verb rāphāh, may denote the " sunken " or " powerless " ones. The same term is used for shades, or ghosts (Jb. 26.^{5} ; Is. 14.^{9}, &c.).

REPHAIM, VALE OF. A fruitful plain (Is. 17.^{5}) south-west from Jerusalem (Jo. 15.^{8}, 18.^{16}), the scene of David's victories over the Philistines (2 S. 5.$^{18, 22}$, 23.^{13} ; 1 Ch. 11.^{15}, 14.^{9}). Josephus (Ant. VII. xii. 4) places it between Bethlehem and Jerusalem. The name might apply to mod. el-Biqa‘ to the S.W. of Jerusalem, or, as the narratives imply a considerable extent of space, it may have covered the district between Jerusalem and Bethlehem, in which are gathered the head waters of Nahr Rubīn. Up this valley would be the natural approach of the Philistines against Jerusalem.

REPHIDIM, a station between the Wilderness of Sin and that of Sinai (Ex. 17.[1, 8], 19.[2]; cp. Nu. 33.[14f.]). Possibly it lay in Wādy Feirān (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, index). Water was supplied for the camp of Israel by Divine intervention. The strife with Amalek here no doubt concerned possession of the springs—a matter of supreme importance to the dwellers in the waste. Jebel Taḥūneh, north of the valley, would command a view of the battle. Certain scholars (e.g. Sayce, HCM. p. 269) think that Sinai may have lain to the east of the Gulf of 'Aqaba, Elath being Elim. In that case Rephidim would have to be sought to the east or south-east of Elath. But see SINAI.

RESEN, one of the four cities built by Nimrod (RV.) in Assyria (Gn. 10.[12]), between Nineveh and Calah. These two are identified with Kouyunjik and Nimroud. Dr. Pinches would place it at or near the mod. Selamīyeh, and thinks that REHOBOTH-IR, CALAH, and Resen are to be taken as suburbs of Nineveh.

RESHEPH, son of Ephraim, brother of Rephah (1 Ch. 7.[25]).

RESURRECTION OF OUR LORD. The central fact on wh. all Christianity is poised is the R. of Jesus; the apostle Paul declares (1 Cor. 15.[17]), "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins."

(1) Evidence.—The earliest documentary account of the evidence is fm. the hands of ST. PAUL; in the opening vv. of 1 Cor. 15. the various witnesses for the fact are named. Three of the evangelists relate appearances of our Lord after He had suffered; or, if we hold the last eight vv. of Mark as authentic, all four do so. Their accounts, though later than Paul's in being committed to writing, yet as representing the primary, possibly oral Gospel, present us with earlier evidence. It is difficult to arrange in strict chronological sequence the different appearances, but we shall take the order that seems on the whole the most reasonable: (a) to Mary Magdalene in the garden beside the tomb (Jn. 20.[14-17]); (b) to the other women as they were hurrying to bring the disciples word (Mw. 28.[9, 10]); (c) then "He was seen of Cephas" (1 Cor. 15.[5]); (d) immediately after this He appeared to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus (Mk. 16.[12]; Lk. 24.[13-33]); (e) then "as they thus spake," narrating their experience to the ten apostles in the "upper room," "Jesus Himself stood in the midst of them" (Mk. 16.[14]; Lk. 24.[36]; Jn. 20.[19-25]); (f) then the following week when Thomas, who had previously been absent, was present (Jn. 20.[26-29]); (g) at the Sea of Galilee to seven of the eleven apostles (Jn. 21.[1-23]); (h) thereafter to the 500 "on a mountain where Jesus had appointed them" (Mw. 28.[16]; 1 Cor. 15.[6]); (i) then to James His brother (1 Cor. 15.[7]); (j) then to the assembled apostolate when "He led them out as far as to BETHANY," and "was parted fm. them and carried up into Heaven" (Lk. 24.[50]; Ac. 1.[4]). This body of testimony is very considerable, and mt. well call for credence were there no more to be said. But moreover, whatever may be said of some of the witnesses, others of them were persons little liable to yield to hallucinations. Of the apostles, the sons of Jonas and the sons of Zebedee, fishermen living in the open air, whose life depended on their nerves being in perfect control, cd. not be neurotic visionaries; Matthew the publican, by his profession, wd. be brought into perpetual association with the sceptical Romans; this wd. give him a tendency to doubt all narratives involving the supernatural; Thomas was constitutionally a sceptic. Further, we see that, although Peter and John had seen enough to make them believe, the rest of the disciples received with incredulity not only the testimony of the women, but even that of Peter and the two fm. Emmaus. When their doubts were removed nothing cd. make them deny their testimony. Though every effort was made to silence them, their answer to their persecutors always was, "We cannot but speak the things wh. we have seen and heard." In spite of the fact that first the Jewish then the Roman authorities made it a thing of danger to proclaim the R., they wd. not consent to be silenced. When a case is before judge and jury, both are influenced by the bearing of a witness, to belief or disbelief. When these witnesses for the R. proclaimed it they not only received general credence but those who believed were filled with a like enthusiasm of faith. Within less than a generation, among the Jewish community in Rome, believers in the R. were numerous enough to be the occasion of tumults so important that the imperial authorities had to take action. After little more than a generation believers were in sufficient numbers to make Nero's accusation that they had burned Rome at least plausible. The discrepancies wh. are alleged, when properly considered, really make for the credibility of the narratives. Even sworn affidavits as to an event very often do not perfectly tally. We may take it for granted that a writer always means to be consistent, yet St. Luke's two accounts of Christ's appearance to His disciples before His ascension are to appearance discrepant. This enables us to estimate the kind of accuracy aimed at. All the differences in the narratives are explicable on this understanding. Were there no even apparent discrepancies a fair case mt. be made out for collusion. We need not waste time over the hypothesis of a swoon, that Jesus was not really dead; or that other, that the body was removed, and that fm. the empty tomb the myth of the R. was evolved.

(2) The Nature of the Resurrection and of the Resurrection Body.—Had our Lord awaked fm. death as one awakes fm. sleep, or as Lazarus was recalled to life, He wd. have unwrapped the linen cloth in wh. His body had been swathed, and probably untied the napkin wound about His head; but Latham (Risen Master) has shown by a careful study of the Gr. that the cloth had fallen flat and the napkin still retained to some extent the shape of the head. The natural process of decay, wh. takes many yrs., is completed in as many hours; the equally natural process by wh. the human spirit builds up a body by the absorption of matter is hastened also, so that what takes a lifetime is done in a moment. It is clear that our Lord's Resurrection body must have differed fm. that of Lazarus, wh. was a mortal body. The phenomena recorded suit this. Our Lord vanishes fm. the sight of the disciples at Emmaus, He appears in the upper room in Jrs., "the doors being shut." In short, our Lord's body is a spiritual, not a natural body.

(3) The Consequences of the Resurrection.—The R. proved the Divinity of our Lord (Rm. 1.[3, 4]), and consequently the worthiness of His sacrificial death, and thus the completion of His redemptive work. It is the first step in His exaltation. It is evidence of His Messiahship; but also it reveals the real nature of Messiahship; it is not a mere imperialism; it is a spiritual supremacy (Ac. 2.[31-36]). The apostle Paul brings the R. into closest connection with our justification: "He was delivered for our offences and raised again for our justification" (Rm. 4.[25]). His R. is the pledge of our own R. (1 Th. 4.[14]; Rm. 6.[5], 8.[11]; 1 Cor. 15.[20]). It is impossible, in the short space at our disposal, to do more than indicate thus briefly the theological consequences of this sublime event.

REU, son of Peleg, an ancestor of Abraham (Gn. 11.[18-21]; 1 Ch. 1.[25]). The Greek transliteration of the Heb. name gives Ragau in Lk. 3.[35].

REUBEN, Jacob's first-born son, borne to him by Leah (Gn. 29.[32]). He should naturally have taken the first place among his brethren; but a peculiarly gross sin cost him his personal ascendency; and there is no evidence that his tribe ever exercised the hegemony in Israel. The pride of Jacob in his eldest son, and his sorrow over that which wrought his downfall, are reflected in Gn. 49.[3f.] (cp. 35.[22]). There may be a hint of the future greatness of Joseph's descendants in Gn. 48.[5] (cp. 1 Ch. 5.[1]), where Jacob adopts Ephraim and Manasseh, who are to be to him "as Reuben and Simeon." The details of this patriarch's life are scanty. He wrought for the deliverance of Joseph out of his brother's hands, and deserves credit for his intention, although he failed (Gn. 37.[21f.]). To reassure his father when Benjamin was required in Egypt, he offered his two sons as security for his brother's safe return (42.[37]). Four sons are mentioned as having been born to him in Canaan, before the descent of the tribe into Egypt (46.[8f.]).

Some scholars think that the notices of Reuben are simply bits of ancient tribal tradition, presented under the aspect of a biography of the supposed ancestor of the tribe. This theory is beset by many difficulties. There is nothing recorded which is inconsistent with the view that the details preserved are bits of the personal history of the man Reuben.

For the strength of the tribe in the wilderness see NUMBERS. The name of Reuben occupies the first place in Nu. 1.[5, 20]; subsequently the name of Judah takes the premier position; that of Reuben coming fourth (2.[10], &c.). The deposition of the tribe thus suggested, may have been the real cause of the rebellion in which Dathan, Abiram, and On, Reubenites, played a leading part. In that case Korah may have been but the tool of the conspirators (Nu. 16.[1], &c.).

The place of Reuben in the desert march, under the command of Elizur, was in the south of the Tabernacle, along with Simeon and Gad. With this latter tribe Reuben was in future to be closely associated. See GAD.

The territory they desired on the east of the Jordan having been assigned to Reuben and Gad, the fighting men of these two tribes crossed over and bore a part in the conquest of Western Palestine. One Reubenite, at least, seems to have distinguished himself. The stone of Bohan the son of Reuben

(Jo. 15.[6], 18.[17]) probably marked the scene of some heroic exploit. Reuben and Gad were pastoral tribes, and the land east of Jordan was well adapted to their pursuits. When the work of conquest in the west was done, they returned to their own territory. From fear lest the great cleft of the Jordan might tend to severance and alienation from their brethren in the west, they reared a great altar in the Ghōr, which was to be a witness, for all time, of the essential unity of all the tribes. The misunderstanding which this gave rise to was satisfactorily cleared up, and a threatened danger avoided. But the course of history showed that their fear was by no means ill founded. It would have taken more than a mere altar of witness (Jo. 22.) to preserve the unity of tribes severed as the eastern and western were, not merely by the great natural barrier, but also by the whole circumstances of life and pursuits. Those on the east were, as we have seen, mainly pastoral; those on the west gave themselves largely to agriculture, and the occupations of a city life. These sundering influences in time produced the result which might be expected.

The territory assigned to Reuben lay to the east of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, marching with Gad in the north, and reaching to the Arnon in the south. There is no indication of the eastern frontier; that, of course, was furnished by the desert (Jo. 13.[15ff.]). Bezer in Reuben was appointed a city of refuge (20.[8], &c.). The cities of Reuben are dealt with in separate articles under their own names. For description of the land see Moab, Palestine.

Reuben, evidently still a numerous tribe, took no part in repelling the invasion of Sisera (Jg. 5.[15f.]). From this we may gather that they were already losing touch with their brethren in the west. The Reubenites are technically included in "all the tribes of Israel" (Jg. 20.[10], 21.[5]); but it is hardly likely that they took any important share in the events there described. Holding, as they did, an outpost of the land of Israel, exposed to attack from the south, and to sudden raids from the desert, the Reubenites developed the martial spirit and military skill. In the days of Saul, assisted by Gad and Manasseh, they made successful war upon the Hagarites, taking rich spoil (1 Ch. 5.[10, 19ff.]). They are described as "valiant men, men able to bear buckler and sword, and to shoot with bow, and skilful in war." Of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, from beyond Jordan, 120,000 "men of war that could order the battle array came with a perfect heart to Hebron, to make David king," "with all manner of instruments of war for the battle" (1 Ch. 12.[37f.]). One of David's famous captains was "Adina, the son of Shiza the Reubenite" (11.[42]). David showed concern for their welfare, and that of their neighbouring tribes; but the influence of his "overseers" was clearly evanescent (1 Ch. 26.[32]). At the disruption of the kingdom they fell to the northern monarchy. In remoteness from their brethren in the fellowship of worship, the Reubenites probably found the descent into idolatry all too easy. What were the immediate causes of their decline we do not know; but the territory allotted to them east of the Dead Sea seems soon to have passed into the hands of Moab; and the inscription of Mesha (Moabite Stone), while naming Gad, takes no notice of Reuben. In the days of Jehu they suffered at the hands of Hazael (2 K. 10.[32f.]). They were among the first to fall into captivity, Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, overwhelming them and carrying them away "unto Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river of Gozan" (1 Ch. 5.[26]).

Reuben appears in the reconstructed Israel of Ek. 48., and among the tribes named in Rv. 7.[5].

REUEL. (1) Son of Esau by Bashemath the sister of Ishmael (Gn. 36.[4], &c.). (2) See Jethro. (3) Father of Eliasaph, chief of the tribe of Gad (Nu. 2.[14]). By mistaking ר for ד he is called Deuel in Nu. 1.[14], &c. (4) One of the chiefs of Benjamin (1 Ch. 9.[8]).

REUMAH, concubine of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (Gn. 22.[24]).

REVELATION, BOOK OF, has for its full title "The Revelation of St. John the Divine" (i.e. the Theologian), and was known in early Christian Lit. as the Apocalypse of John. This is, in fact, the description of his work given by the author himself in the first verse, and marks it out as belonging to a special class of religious Lit. known as "Apocalyptic." Much of the difficulty wh. has been found in the interpretation of the bk. is due to the fact that it is only here and in the bk. of Daniel, and to some extent in the bk. of Zechariah, that we meet with specimens of this form of Lit. wh. are at all familiar. But among the Jews from the time of Daniel to the end of the first cent. of our era it was a very favourite form, and several other specimens of it have survived, the study of wh. in recent yrs. has shed much light on the char. and the interpretation of the Apocalypse. Our Apocalypse differs from the other bks. of its class in that it is written by a Christian and for Christians, and in that it is not pseudonymous, i.e. it bears the name of its author, "John." Otherwise it shares their main characteristics, of wh. the following may be noted. An Apocalypse is usually the product of a serious crisis in religious hist.; it springs from a time when faith in God is being severely tried by the experience of the world's power and cruelty. Its purpose is to brace the faith of God's people to continued patience and steadfastness, to courage, and the triumphant assurance of victory in the end. And the method is to present the situation of the moment in the light of eternal facts, and to depict the future in such a way as to enhance the conviction that " the end is at hand," and that the end will be the vindication of God's rule and the glorious redemption of His people. The form in which these thoughts are expressed is that of a vision or series of visions—a form wh. in some cases may have been the actual experience of the writer, while in others it may have been a literary vehicle for conveying his convictions. In either case, the description of the visions is largely conveyed in the lang. of symbolism ; and this symbolism has a history. The writer, that is to say, did not invent his symbols. He borrowed them fm. earlier Lit.; they had already acquired a certain general meaning ; by some slight change in the figure, or by the place given to it in the context, he indicated the significance wh. the symbol had in his reading of hist. or prediction of the future. One reason leading to the adoption of this cryptic method of writing may have been the desire to veil from hostile oppressors the hopes and aspirations wh. were cherished by believers. The study of these characteristics of Apocalyptic Lit. is the essential condition for the right interpretation of our Apocalypse.

The construction of the bk., wh. at first sight appears to be loose, is really very closely articulated. It falls into three main divisions. The first, ending with the fifth chap., has for its theme the things that are, the unseen realities wh. form the background to all human experience and history. The second, wh. comprises the centre of the bk. fm. the sixth to the sixteenth chaps., describes in a threefold cycle " the things wh. shall be hereafter," up to the Judgment. And the third, comprising the last six chaps., describes certain great episodes connected with the Judgment. In the first section the vision of the Son of Man, wh. sets forth the glory of Christ and His relation to the Church, is followed by the letters to the Seven Churches, revealing His intimate kge. of their situation and char., His care and concern for them, and the glorious issues of their steadfastness. To this follows, in chaps. 4. and 5., the vision of the eternal realities in Heaven, the glory of the Creator, and the saving function of the Redeemer, the kge. of wh. may enhearten the Church to sustain the utmost cruelty of men. In the second section the predictions of the stages that lead to the final Judgment are thrown into the form of three cycles of seven (the Seals, the Trumpets, and the Bowls). The description of the successive strokes of judgment is throughout in terms of physical privation and suffering, and is largely based on the record of the plagues of Egypt, the horror being heightened by the widening of their area and the suggestion of diabolic agents at work. It is difficult to say how the writer intended these cycles to be related to one another, whether as consecutive or as a threefold description of the same series of events ; but prob. they are to be regarded as consecutive.

The orderly development of the first and second cycles is broken by the insertion of parentheses, three in all. The first, in the cycle of the bowls, gives the vision of the Redeemed in Heaven (chap. 7.), in wh. the writer prob. begins by quoting fm. an earlier Apocalypse what had been a Jewish anticipation of the future, in wh. the redeemed are a limited number, drawn from the tribes of Isr., and owing their redemption to their place among the chosen people. On this he builds the Christian counterpart, a redemption wh. covers an innumerable multitude, drawn fm. all nations of the earth, and owing their salvation to the fact that they have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb. The second parenthesis (chaps. 10.^{1}–11.^{13}) interrupts the cycle of the Trumpets, and contains two episodes, the purpose of wh. is prob. to provide a pause in the unrolling of judgment, and consolation and assurance in the first vision for the seer, and in the second for the believing dwellers in Jrs. In both episodes the writer prob. employs ancient material. The same is true of the third parenthesis, wh. stands between the trumpets and the bowls, and occupies three chaps. (12.–14.). The first of these, the vision of the Woman and the Dragon, is best understood as a fragment of earlier date and possibly of Jewish origin, in wh. the writer saw an anticipation of events in the life of Jesus. He takes it, with its description of the activity of the " dragon," as a clue to his own vision of the Beast or monster, wh. represents the power of the dragon upon earth. By this monster he understands the Roman empire esp. as impersonated in the emperor Nero, and by the second monster prob. the priestly guilds whose business it was to promote and enforce the worship of the emperor in Asia Minor.

The third section of the bk., beginning with chap. 17., contains visions of judgment in the double form of destruction upon the enemies of God and the Church, in wh. Babylon, drunken with the blood of the saints, undoubtedly stands for Rome, and of victory for Christ's faithful servants consequent upon His return (19.$^{11-16}$), followed by the vision of the ideal City of God and the bliss of the saints.

There has been much discussion in recent yrs. as to the composition of the bk. The difficulty of regarding all its contents as homogeneous and the original product of one writer has led to several different attempts to find distinct stages or distinct sources in its composition. It has been held to be originally a Jewish Apocalypse, altered and added to by a Christian writer ; or a combination of two or more such Apocalypses set in a Christian framework ; or an originally Christian document reissued after an interval of yrs. with additions by the same or another writer. The attempt to disentangle earlier Apocalypses, however, is baffled by the remarkable uniformity in the style of the bk. down to the minutest particulars of diction, and even the striking peculiarities of grammar. The most serious difficulties are removed by the recognition of the above-mentioned parentheses, and possibly one or two other short passages or quotations fm. earlier and extra-canonical Lit.; and the tendency of the best authorities at present is to dismiss the theories of a composite origin, and see in the bk. the work of a single writer. He was certainly very familiar with the OT., and his work is full of quotations and allusions drawn fm. that source. The visions in Patmos were granted to a mind wh. was saturated with the ideas, the lang., and the symbolism of the later prophets; and if, in their literary form, the visions came to be clothed so largely in traditional conceptions borrowed fm. the OT., there is all the more probability that they wd. borrow also some of their material fm. the Apocalyptic Lit. wh. so deeply influenced Jewish thought in the first cent.

The question of authorship is a double one. Was the author really John, as he calls himself three times in its course (1.[4, 9], 22.[8]); and was he John the son of Zebedee? The former of these questions is to be answered in the affirmative. The writers of other Apcs. write in the name of some ancient hero of the faith; this one writes as "your brother and partaker with you in the tribulation and kingdom and patience wh. are in Jesus"; he adopts throughout the tone of one who was personally known to the churches of Asia Minor, and who enjoyed their respect and confidence. Here are none of the signs of pseudonymity. It is more difficult, however, to decide who this John was. Down to the middle of the third cent. it was the practically unchallenged opinion in the Church that he was John the apostle, the son of Zebedee. This was the opinion stated explicitly by Justin Martyr (about A.D. 140) and by Tertullian (about A.D. 200), and implicitly by Irenæus (about A.D. 180), and Clement of Alexandria, who says that it was John the apostle who, on the death of the emperor, went fm. the island of Patmos to Ephesus. Of internal evidence supporting the identification of the "John" who wrote the bk. there is little or none, though the Gospel portrait of the sons of Zebedee has been thought to harmonise with the prob. char. of the writer of the Apc. On the other hand, there is an ancient and widespread tradition that the apostle John spent the later yrs. of his life in Asia Minor, with wh. the bk. is evidently connected, and that he there exercised a great influence, quite comparable to that which appears to be claimed by the writer here. Certain doubts as to the apostolic authorship began to make themselves heard towards the end of the second cent.; but these proceeded from heretical sources, and the first serious challenge fm. within the Church came fm. Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, about A.D. 240. He founded his objection on the diffce. between the fourth Gospel (wh. he held to be the work of the apostle) and the Apc. in respect of diction, grammar, and style, and also in respect of the ideas severally underlying the two documents. In view of these diffcs. he held that one and the same man cd. not have been the author of both; and drew the conclusion that there must have been two writers of the same name; he does not, however, suggest that the second John was John "the Presbyter." The effect of this criticism may possibly be traced in the omission of the Apc. fm. several of the authoritative lists of canonical bks., such as the canon drawn up by the Council of Laodicea, and also in the non-appearance of the Apc. in the Syriac versions of the NT. It was left to Eusebius to make the suggestion that the author of the Apc. was John the Presbyter referred to by Papias, to whom also some referred the second and third Epistles of John. This opinion has been widely held down to our own time, and some think to find confirmation of it in a recently discovered statement of an ancient writer to the effect that John and his brother James were killed by the Jews. The inference fm. this wd. be that both the sons of Zebedee perished as martyrs before the middle of the first cent.; and the place thus left vacant by the early death of John the son of Zebedee was taken by another John, known as the Presbyter, himself prob. one of the disciples of the Lord. This view meets with weighty support (Holtzmann, Bousset, Bauer, &c.); but it cannot be said to be established. There is little reason to doubt that the Apc. was written by one of the early disciples of Jesus named John, though it cannot be certain that this was John the apostle.

As to the date of the bk. we have more distinct information than in regard to any other bk. of the NT. Irenæus says plainly that the visions of the Apc. were seen "almost in our own time, at the end of Domitian's reign," that is to say, towards A.D. 96; and his statement is confirmed by several early writers. There are, however, indications that some early authorities dated the bk. some thirty or forty yrs. earlier, in the reign of Nero or Claudius; and though the later date is in this case the traditional one, and the one commonly accepted up to our own day, it is prob. that either as it stands, or in its earliest form, the bk. was written before the fall of Jrs. This was the opinion of Westcott, and with him agreed both Lightfoot and Hort. From a different point of view and for different reasons Johannes Weiss would date the greater part of the bk. fm. the same period. Internal evidence in favour of the later date has been found in the condition of the churches as reflected in the Seven Epistles, in the char. of the persecution referred to, and fm. the interpretation of the Beast in refce. to a revived and returning Nero. But there is nothing in the Letters to the churches wh. compels us to assume a longer interval than ten or a dozen yrs. fm. their founding. The general persecution in Asia Minor lies rather in the future than in the past. Only one martyr, Antipas, is specifically referred to. The souls of the martyrs beneath the altar may be those of the victims of Nero's persecution at Rome, and it is Rome, the city, wh. is "drunken with the blood of the saints." A fresh remembrance of the cruelties of Nero, and a keen anticipation of the outburst of similar cruelties in Asia connected with the attempt to enforce emperor-worship, wd. account for all the allusions to persecution. And the vision of the Beast in chap. 17. is best interpreted as dating fm. the reign of Vespasian. Five kings "have fallen," Nero being the fifth; the one who "now is" is the sixth, that is to say (omitting Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, who had failed to establish themselves as Augusti), Vespasian. This distinction between the ten who ruled and the seven who bore the names of blasphemy seems to underlie the similar description in chap. 13.; and this is not inconsistent with a writer in the reign of Vespasian anticipating the short reign of Titus, and after that the culmination of evil in the return of Nero. A theory wh. wd. more closely fit all the facts wd. be that the bk., written immediately before the destruction of Jrs., was reissued some twenty yrs. later with certain additions; but if that seem improbable, it is easier on the whole to assign it to the earlier than to the later date.

The first step towards the true interpretation of the Apc. lies in the study of its symbolism. This will be found to be derived partly fm. the OT., partly fm. the later Jewish writings, esp. the Apcs., and partly fm. the popular ideas of the time. To the last of these classes belongs the representation of Nero as about to return either fm. the place of his concealment or fm. the grave, to be the incarnation of anti-Christian power. This expectation was widely current in Asia as early as A.D. 69, the yr. after Nero's death, and persisted in one form or the other down to the beginning of the next cent. It furnishes the explanation of the head wh. was wounded unto death and yet healed, as also of the monster that had been one of the seven, and yet was himself the eighth. With this agrees the most probable interpretation of "the number of the Beast," wh. finds the equivalent of 666 in Nero Cæsar. Another group of allusions is connected with popular religious ideas, many of them akin to "Gnostic" speculation. These are chiefly found in the Seven Letters, wh. betray the minutest acquaintance, not only with the circumstances of each church, but also with the most influential forms of surrounding paganism.

We may trace to the speculations of post-canonical Judaism such things as the allusion to "the hidden manna," the name of power, and the millennial reign of the saints; and to Hebrew cosmology the refce. to the "pit" and the "abyss." And in the OT. we have the source of the representation of world-empires under the form of monsters, and their history in the description of their appearance and their fate. But still more important is the use of numbers to indicate not the actual length of space or time, but the char. of the area or the period. Seven and ten and a thousand are numbers of completeness; whereas three and a half, a broken seven, is "a symbol of the interruption of the Divine order by the malice of Satan and evil men." The last number occurs in various forms ("time, times, and half a time" = $3\frac{1}{2}$ years, 42 months, 1260 days), and derives a special significance fm. the fact that it was understood to tally with the duration of Jerusalem's suffering under Antiochus Epiphanes. The recognition of the true significance of these numbers has this important consequence, that there is "no chronology" in the bk. To attempt to ascertain out of it the date of the End is to misapprehend its char. entirely, as well as to ignore our Lord's solemn warning that such kge. is not for us.

The interpretation of the Apc. must be sought in the first instance in the message wh. it brought to the churches of Asia. They had reached their first critical period. The first glow of enthusiasm had passed away. The early hope of an immediate return of Christ had been disappointed. The problem of their relation to the people among whom they lived was intensely difficult. The Jews were hostile and contemptuous. The influences of Grecian thought and pagan immorality were working insidiously. The worship of the emperor was becoming more and more central to the public life of the day; to refuse to participate in it was not only religious eccentricity but constructive treason. And the tidings of what the Christians at Rome had undergone through the mad fury of Nero had reached the Asian churches. They must be prepared to face a similar storm. The Apc. was written for their sakes; it records those visions of the seer in wh. he was permitted to behold the powers at work behind the veil of history, and to foresee the utter destruction of the forces of cruelty and oppression wh. threatened the Church, the glorious fruitage of her highest hopes. These are the eternal and the eternally important things; and the pictures and symbols by wh. they are set forth have for their main purpose, not to denote the process of their realisation in hist., but to enforce the certainty of their existence now in heaven, in the will of God, and of their becoming part of human experience in God's good time. The writer of course believed that time to be very near at hand. In one sense he was justified; in another sense he was mistaken; but his mistake in expecting the immediate and final return of Christ was one wh. he shared with all his fellow-believers at the time. The heavenly realities wh. he reveals remain eternally true.

The most noteworthy feature in the theology of the Apc. is the position wh. it assigns to Christ, and that in combination with a monotheism as extreme as anywhere else in our Bible. God is here the God of the OT., the self-existent, and supreme; He is the Creator and the Judge. And yet there goes along with this an equal recognition of the Divine glory and power of the Risen Saviour. He is "the Lord of lords and King of kings." He is the absolutely Living One, who can take upon His lips the words otherwise used by God: "I am the first and the last." To Him, therefore, is committed the unfolding of the bk. of human destiny, the waging of the final conflict with evil, the holding of the Last Assize. He holds the keys of Hades and of death. He searches the hearts of men. He shares in the Divine honour paid to God: even angels join in worshipping "God and the Lamb." This title of "the Lamb" (wh. is similar to but not identical with that used in the fourth Gospel) exhibits characteristically the redeeming function of Christ as recognised by the writer. It is no mere title, but a description of our Lord in the essential relation of His work to the salvation of men. The redeemed are "they wh. have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." It is He who "loveth us and loosed (or, washed) us from our sins by His blood." And His sacrifice, though it was consummated in hist., has yet the quality of eternity; He is "the Lamb slain fm. the foundation of the world."

Closely parallel to the glory assigned here to Christ is the splendour of the picture drawn of the glorified Church. The present circumstances of the Church are depicted with frank recognition of her imperfection, her dangers external and internal, and the possibility that part of her corporate whole may fall away fm. the faith. But fm. it all and through it all a Church is to be saved to become the Bride of Christ, to be the ideal City of God; that is to say, the purpose and promises of God include not only the salvation of the individual, but also the organisation of a redeemed humanity. No book of the NT. expresses more vividly the triumphant conviction of the present rule and ultimate vindication of Divine righteousness and mercy, or the profound assurance that "he that endureth to the end shall be saved."

The Lit. bearing on the Apc. is very copious, but for readers who wish to profit by the studies of recent yrs. much more limited. On the Greek text the best English commentary is that by H. B. Swete; the best introduction to the whole subject of the Apc. is F. C. Porter's volume in the Messages of the Bible; the theology of the bk. is well set forth by Stevens' New Testament Theology; and the articles on Millennium in the EB., on Apocalyptic Lit., Revelation, Angels, and Man of Sin in HDB. should be consulted; also The Letters to the Seven Churches, by Sir W. M. Ramsay. C. A. Scott.

REZEPH, one of the towns of which Sennacherib boasts the destruction, along with Gozan and Haran (2 K. 19.[12], &c.). It corresponds to Asyr. Raṣappa or Raṣapa, a name borne by several towns. It is probably to be identified with the mod. Ruṣāfa, on the right bank of the river Euphrates, south of Raqqa.

REZIA, RV. RIZIA, son of Ulla, of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch. 7.[39]).

REZIN (Heb. Rĕzīn, Asyr. Rasunnu), a king of Damascus, mentioned by Tiglath-pileser along with Menahem as a tributary. He became confederate with Pekah, k. of Isr., possibly with a view to throwing off the yoke of Asyr. The confederates wished to compel Judah to join them. Ahaz not only refused but called in Tiglath-pileser, their suzerain, poss. informing him of their proposed defection (2 K. 16.[5, 9]; Is. 7.[1-9]). R. was probably killed in the capture of Damascus. The conquest of Elath ascribed to R. and the Syrians (1 K. 16.[6]) really was the work of the Edomites, and the statement is due to the confusion of the r in Aram (Syria) with d in Edom, two letters very like each other in most varieties of Heb. script.

REZON, son of Eliadah, a subject of the king of Zobah, who, when David subjected his people to the fate of the vanquished, fled, gathered a troop of freebooters, took the city of Damascus, and founded a dynasty there. He appears to have been a man of statesmanlike gifts, and his kingdom became powerful. Considering his origin and experience, he could not be expected to prove very friendly to Israel. He is represented to have been an unwearied foe of Israel "all the days of Solomon" (1 K. 11.[23ff.]).

RHEGIUM, an ancient Greek colony at the south-west corner of Italy, on the western side of the straits of Messina, over against Syracuse. It is represented by the mod. Reggio. The Dioscuri (Castor and Pollux), the "sign" of St. Paul's ship, are figured on coins of this town, and doubtless were greatly reverenced by seafaring men in the adjoining waters, which, with Scylla and Charybdis, were so perilous for ancient shipping. St. Paul's vessel lay here a day (Ac. 28.[13]); then a south wind carried it northward to Puteoli. It was the terminus of the road known as Via Popilia, which joined the great Appian Way at Capua. The city had an exciting history, and was destroyed more than once (B.C. 387, 280–270). Augustus favoured Rhegium, and in the Sicilian war (B.C. 38–36) profited by its assistance. In St. Paul's day the population was mingled Greek and Latin. In 1891 the population of Reggio was returned at 44,415.

RHESA, son of Zerubbabel, and ancestor of our Lord (Lk. 3.[27]).

RHODA, "rose," the name of the maid in the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark, who recognised Peter's voice at the door after his miraculous deliverance from prison (Ac. 12.[13]). This name is still very popular in Palestine, in the Arabic form Wardeh.

RHODES was one of the states to which orders favourable to the Jews were sent by decree of the Roman Senate (1 M. 15.[23]). It is an island in the Levant, about 12 miles off the coast of Caria. The city, Rhodes, on the north-east point of the island, was founded in B.C. 406, and at once took an important place in the eastern Mediterranean. It reached its greatest prosperity after the time of Alexander the Great. Arts, science, and commerce long flourished here. The city was visited by Herod the Great, who seems to have lavished gifts upon it, repairing ruined buildings, rearing a temple to Apollo, bestowing money for the construction of ships, &c. (Jos. Ant. XIV. xiv. 3; XVI. v. 3; BJ. I. xxi. 11). It was touched at by St. Paul on his voyage from Miletus to Ptolemais (Ac. 21.[1]; cp. Jos. Ant. XIV. xiv. 3; BJ. I. xiv. 3 for Herod's voyages). In later times Rhodes was associated with the knights of St. John, who took the city in A.D. 1310, established authority over adjoining islands and part of the mainland, and defied the might of the Turks till A.D. 1522, when the city was surrendered to Sultan Suleimān. The place has fallen on evil days. The population is not more than 30,000, and the trade is insignificant.

The coins of Rhodes bear the sun and a rose. From the abundance of roses produced the island may have been named. It was said that the sun shone every day in Rhodes.

RIBAI, father of Ittai of Gibeah, a Benjamite (2 S. 23.[29], &c.).

RIBLAH. (1) A place on the eastern boundary of the promised land. It lay between Hazar-enan and the Sea of Galilee (Chinnereth, Nu. 34.[11]), apparently south of Shaphan and east of Ain. Shaphan is quite unknown. Ain may be "spring," but which of the great fountains in that district it is impossible now to say. Ezekiel (47.[17], 48.[1]) places Hazar-enan "by the border of Hauran," "at the border of Damascus." It may possibly be represented by the mod. village el-Ḥaḍr, at the south-east base of Mount Hermon. Riblah will then be somewhere to the south of this. (2) The place "in the land of Hamath" where Pharaoh-necho threw Jehoahaz in chains (2 K. 23.[33]—see, however, 2 Ch. 36.[3]). Here also Nebuchadnezzar cruelly treated Zedekiah (2 K. 25.[6f.]). It is represented by the mod. Ribleh in the north of the great hollow between the Lebanons, on the right bank of the river Orontes, about 35 miles north-east of Baalbek. It lay on the great highway between Egypt and the empires of the north. For Nebuchadnezzar's head-quarters no position could have been more advantageous. He could strike with ease either at the cities on the Phœnician seaboard, or at Palestine in the south, or at Damascus in the south-east. See DIBLAH.

RIDDLE. The Heb. word ḥīdāh, from ḥūd, "to tie knots," or "turn aside," means properly "something twisted" or "involved"; hence "a dark speech" (Nu. 12.[8]), an "enigma," or "riddle" (Jg. 14.[12], &c.; Ek. 17.[2]; Hb. 2.[6], RVm.), or "hard question" (1 K. 10.[1], &c.). In Pss. 49.[4], 78.[2], it is parallel to "parable." In Pr. 1.[6] "dark saying" is clearly the sententious utterance otherwise called "proverb."

Orientals have always found much entertainment in propounding and solving riddles. They are not fond of making direct statements, but they love compact and pregnant phrases, especially such as imply an apt comparison. Conversation is liberally spiced with proverbs, in which are crystallised commonly accepted opinions. Great delight is found in displays of mental dexterity, and in conflicts of keen wit, like that between Solomon and the queen of Sheba (1 K. 10.[1], &c.). For the contests between Hiram, king of Tyre, and Solomon, see Josephus (Ant. VIII. v. 3).

RIGHTEOUSNESS. I. In OT. Usual words צַדִּיק (tsaddîq, righteous, just), צֶדֶק, צְדָקָה (tsedheq, tsedhāqāh, righteousness, justice), with צָדַק (tsādhaq, justify, be justified, &c.). The physical root-meaning has been lost, but the ruling idea is rightness, the kind of rightness applicable to any given case, as Ps. 4.[5], "right sacrifices." ("Paths of righteousness," Ps. 23.[3], may = "paths right and safe for sheep," or "prosperous paths," or, literally, "righteous paths.") The words embrace complex ideas; here are the chief:—

(A) Righteousness of the People.—(1) Some common meanings. (a) Very often the words have a forensic meaning—are used as in a court of law or the like. Thus "to be righteous" ("justified") means "to be in the right," "to be found or declared to be in the right" (Ex. 9.[27]; Ps. 51.[4]; Is. 5.[23]). To Hebrew thinking right is not on a sure footing until pronounced to be right, as by a righteous judge, who is superior to bribes, and judges impartially as between rich and poor (Lv. 19.[15]; Dt. 16.[18, 20]). He is the natural protector of the weak, and righteousness = deliverance (Ps. 82.[3]; Jr. 22.[3]). (b) "Righteous" = "of blameless character before some perfect tribunal," viz. before God (Gen. 6.[9]; Dt. 9.[4-6]; 1 K. 3.[6]).

(2) Teaching of the Prophets.—This is one of the most remarkable things in the OT. Righteousness is the central idea in Amos, but the other prophets strike the same passionate note. (a) It is social righteousness they call for, denouncing wrongs like falsehood, plunder and oppression under forms of law, class selfishness, general misrule (Am. 5.[7, 11f., 24], 6.[12]; Is. 3.[14f.], 10.[1f.]; Mi. 2.[1f., 8f.], 3.[1-3, 9f.]; Jr. 22.[13, 15f.]). They preach, not a self-centred correctness, but righteousness as a large humanity. The judge, besides judging impartially, should protect the weak (Is. 1.[17ff.]). Righteousness is linked with mercy (Ho. 10.[12]; Jr. 9.[24]). (b) Righteousness is the inflexible demand of J″.'s moral nature. As compared with it He sets little store by ritual (Mi. 6.[6-8]; Is. 58.[5-12]), and He hates the offerings of unrighteous men (Am. 5.[21f.]; Ho. 8.[13]; Is. 1.[11-16]). By righteousness He will judge Israel and the world (Am. 1.[3], 2.[4], 8.[4-8]). (c) Righteousness is to mark Messiah's reign (Is. 11.[4, 5], 32.[1f.]; Jr. 23.[5f.]; cp. Ps. 72.). All this teaching is not set aside, but amply "fulfilled" under the Gospel (Mw. 5.[17-50]).

(3) Personal rightness of relation to God.—The ruling idea in Israel's history is, that the people are in covenant relation to J″., but the righteousness of individuals is also noticed, especially in later times (Jer. 31.[29ff.]; Ek. 18., 33.; Jb.). The classical example is in Gn. 15.[6] (cp. Rm. 4.[3]; Gal. 3.[6]; Js. 2.[23]): Abraham cast himself entirely upon J″., and this constituted "righteousness," a right attitude to Him. Cp. Ps. 106.[30f.], which suggests merit, and reward as of debt (Rm. 4.[4]) for a good deed. In the Psalms the righteous, as a party or as individuals upholding J″.'s cause, plead that they are in the right as against the ungodly (35., 43.[1], 74.). They claim cleanness of hands (18.[20, 24]), integrity (7.[8], 25.[21], 41.[12]), uprightness of heart (32.[11], 64.[10], 97.[11]), but not sinlessness (25.[11], 130.[3], 143.[2]). As to the relation of Providence to righteousness, one great question troubled good men then, as now: Why do the righteous suffer, while the wicked prosper? (Jr. 12.[1]; Ps. 37., 49., 73.); see Job.

(4) Isaiah 40.–66.—In the OT. the people, as J″.'s people, feel they are in the right as against the heathen: thus His interpositions on their behalf are righteous acts (Jg. 5.[11]). In Is. 40.–66. we find a highly important development of this idea. (a) There is still much to contend with in the people (42.[19], 46.[12], 48.[1]), yet at least a portion of them, as forgiven and cleansed, have a real righteousness of heart (44.[21f.], 51.[7], cp. 60.[21]), and as J″.'s servant, wronged by heathen foes, a hidden right on their side (40.[27], 49.[3f.]; cp. Ps. 37.[6]). (b) They are to be justified, vindicated, put right in the eyes of the world, as well as in their own consciousness, by outward tokens of Divine favour. Their hidden right is to come into clear day. Thus "righteousness" = "prosperity," the positive side of salvation (46.[13], 48.[18], 61.[10], 62.[1f.]).

(B) Righteousness of God.—(1) The most common meaning is His self-consistent, unswerving character as Supreme Ruler of the world (Gn. 18.[25]; Dt. 32.[4]; Ps. 9.[8]; Zp. 3.[5]). Even Israel is not outside this moral order (Dt. 6.; Am. 3.[2], &c.).

(2) As, however, a true judge was the champion of the weak and actively upheld the right, the righteousness of God wears a more gracious aspect (Ps. 89.[16], 145.[7]; Mi. 7.[9]). It is not = "mercy" ("grace") or "faithfulness": the latter rather means that He is true to His promises; His righteousness, that He is true to His character as Ruler of the world and Covenant God of Israel. Yet it is often joined with those attributes (Ps. 36.[5-7], 89.[14-16], 143.[1]). The Psalmists often plead His righteousness, rather than His grace (71.[2, 16], 119.[40], 143.[11]; cp. Ps. 69.[27] ("righteousness" = "justifying activity"), also Jn. 17.[25]; 1 J. 1.[9]).

(3) Isaiah 40.–66.—The righteousness of God is revealed in history as a gracious purpose world-wide in its sweep. It embraces the very calling of Israel (42.[6]), and His consistency and straightforwardness with His people (41.[10], 45.[19]) extends to other nations (51.[4f.]), and includes His raising up of Cyrus (45.[13]). It was almost prior in origin to J″.'s creating act (45.[18, 22f.]). While it demands the punishment of sin, it is chiefly redemptive (59.[15-19], 65.[1ff.], 63.[1]); its end is the new creation (65.[17]; cp. 2 P. 3.[13]). It is not, so to speak, an afterthought, but of the very Being of God. The passage 45.[21f.] is indeed remarkable: "There is no God else beside Me; a righteous God and a Saviour"—i.e. a righteous God and therefore a Saviour—"Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." His righteousness is not opposed to His saving activity, but embraces it. The OT. does not tell how He justifies the sinner, but it speaks of the righteousness, i.e. salvation, of men, their being forgiven, and like Him, and in manifest favour with Him, as His gift (46.[13], 51.[5f., 8], 56.[1]; Ps. 24.[5]).

II. In NT. δίκαιος, "righteous," "just"; δικαιοσύνη, "righteousness"; δικαιοῦν, "justify."

(A) Teaching of Jesus.—Referring to this as a whole, and specially the Sermon on the Mount, we find: (1) He contrasts the righteousness of the Kingdom with the legal externalism of the scribes and Pharisees, their foolish traditions, their servile exalting of the letter, while neglecting the spirit, of the Law (Mw. 5.^{20}, 23.^{23}; Mk. 7.$^{8-13}$). It is entirely opposed to their vanity, display, and haughty contempt (Mw. 6.$^{1-6, 16-18}$; Mk. 2.$^{16f.}$; Lk. 15., 18.$^{9-14}$; Jn. 5.^{44}, 12.$^{42f.}$), their hypocrisy and covetousness (Mw. 23., 6.$^{19-24}$; Lk. 16.$^{13-15}$). This righteousness is a rightness of heart; humility and purity, truth and charity, are demanded there (Mw. 5., 11.^{29}, 18.^{3}; Mk. 7.$^{6, 20-23}$). The very longing for it ensures possession (Mw. 5.^{6}). (2) It is the life that flows out of a right relation to God as our Father in heaven. It includes religious acts like almsgiving, prayer, and fasting, which are to be done as before Him (Mw. 6.$^{1-18}$ RV.). His perfection is our model (5.$^{45, 48}$). We are to seek the rightness of heart and life in full accord with His Kingdom, (which He will bestow, 7.$^{7f.}$), and all needful things will be added to us (6.$^{9-11, 25-34}$). It is Jesus who introduces us to this filial relation (Mw. 11.^{27}; Jn. 14.^{6}), and Mw. 3.^{15} is best taken as referring to His calling as Servant of the Lord (Is. 42.$^{1, 6f.}$, 53.^{11}). (3) It lies in rendering the service of love to our fellow-men, which both includes just dealing and clean transactions, and far transcends them. Christ came to fulfil the Law and the Prophets, and many OT. counsels as to the obligations of rulers must now be applied to the people, to whom so much power has passed, to convince them of their duties and opportunities as large-hearted citizens. Readjustment and redress in social and economic conditions, the hard driving of commercial competition, questions of class and colour, fall within a Christian survey of righteousness. We are to show mercy (Mw. 5.^{7}), make peace (5.^{9}), judge charitably (7.$^{1-5}$), give exacting men more than their due (5.$^{40-42}$), banish unholy anger (5.$^{21-24}$), rejoice in persecution for righteousness' sake (5.$^{10-12}$), love our fellow-disciples (Jn. 13.$^{34f.}$), love and pray for our enemies (Mw. 5.$^{43-48}$), act a brotherly part to those of alien race (Lk. 10.$^{25-37}$), win and welcome others into the Kingdom (Jn. 1.$^{41f., 45}$, 4.$^{28f.}$; Lk. 15.). Jesus does not propound any social scheme (Lk. 12.$^{13-15}$; cp. Jn. 6.^{27}), but lays emphasis on the worth and the regeneration of the individual (Mw. 12.^{12} RV.; Jn. 3.$^{3, 5}$) and the leavening effect of the Gospel (Mw. 13.$^{31-33}$), while the covetous and selfish are condemned (Lk. 12.$^{16-21}$, 16.$^{19-31}$; Mw. 25.$^{41-46}$). (4) Self-abandonment to the interests of the Kingdom (Mw. 6.^{33}, 10.$^{37-39}$; Mk. 10.$^{17-22, 29f.}$; Lk. 9.$^{23f., 57-62}$), as Jesus taught by His own example (Jn. 4.^{34}, 6.^{38}, 17.^{19}). (5) Righteousness is one of the three things in respect of which the Spirit is to convict the world (Jn. 16.$^{8, 10}$). When Jesus ascends to the Father His righteousness will be vindicated, but not vindictive, and men will be humbled to find, that when thus triumphant over their dark hate, it is but crowned with new power to save.

(B) Teaching of Paul.—Other parts of the NT. do not call for separate treatment, but with Paul "righteousness" bears a special sense. How shall a sinful man be righteous before God? is the question underlying Romans. He says that "a righteousness of God" is "witnessed by the law and the prophets" (Rm. 3.^{21} RV.). (1) This points to the righteousness of God as Moral Ruler. His forbearance in passing over sins in previous ages had looked like indifference, and He had to demonstrate His righteousness by visiting the doom of sin, viz., death, upon Christ (Rm. 3.^{25} RV.). (2) Yet the OT., as we have seen, bears witness also to His righteousness as the positive side of salvation, His justifying activity or saving purpose (Is. 45.$^{21ff.}$, &c.). He is a righteous God and therefore a Saviour. Thus in the Gospel "is revealed a righteousness of God" (Rm. 1.^{17} RV.), i.e. a justifying sentence of God, or "a Divine righteousness," or a righteousness valid before God (Luther), which in any case is the result of the justifying sentence. In setting forth Christ as a propitiation God demonstrates His righteousness in two ways not in the nature of things opposed to each other. He vindicates His character as holding no parley with sin, and He displays another aspect of His righteousness by justifying the sinner that has faith in Jesus (Rm. 3.^{26} RV.; cp. 1 Jn. 1.^{9}). (3) Paul adduces the "witness" of the OT. further by referring to Abraham (Rm. 4.; Gal. 3.^{6}; cp. Js. 2.$^{20-24}$). So, he says, if we cast ourselves upon God in His omnipotent saving power in Christ, our faith is reckoned for righteousness. Righteousness, indeed, is God's gift: yet for the reception of it faith is necessary all through (Rm. 1.^{17}, 3.$^{22, 26ff.}$, 10.$^{6-10}$; Php. 3.^{9}). (4) This faith is no other than the faith that joins us in living union to Christ as our Representative. We are "in Him," "found in Him" (Php. 3.^{9}), and He has become righteousness to us (1 Cor. 1.^{30}). He was made sin for us, "that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." By faith we identify ourselves with Him in His attitude to sin, and reckon ourselves alive to God, the bondservants of righteousness (Rm. 6.; 1 P. 2.^{24}; cp. 1 J. 2.^{29}). We are living branches in Christ, the Vine (Jn. 15.$^{1-6}$), who pours His power of right living into us. Thus faith not only is reckoned for righteousness, but also leads to righteousness realised in believers, so that their righteous acts become as fair linen (Rv. 19.^{8} RV.), and have the character of persistence and finality (Rv. 22.^{11}).

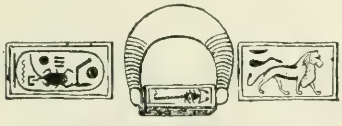
RIMMON, a Benjamite of Beeroth, whose sons, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Ishbosheth, who had claimed succession to the throne of Saul his father (2 S. 4.[2, 5, 9]).

RIMMON, " pomegranate." (1) " Rock of the pomegranate," where 600 Benjamites, the broken fragments of the force defeated at Gibeah, found asylum for four months (Jg. 20.[43ff.]). It is described as lying " towards the wilderness," i.e. eastward from Gibeah. It is probably identical with a conical, chalky hill, a prominent feature of the landscape, on the top of which is situated the mod. village Rummān. It lies about four miles to the east of Bethel. This corresponds to the " Remmon " of OEJ., 15 Roman miles north of Jerusalem. (2) A town in the territory of Judah, in the south, allotted to Simeon (Jo. 15.[32], 19.[7], AV. Remmon; 1 Ch. 4.[32]), mentioned by Zachariah (14.[10]) as " south of Jerusalem "; see Ain. (3) A city in the territory of Zebulun, assigned to the Merarite Levites (1 Ch. 6.[77], " Rimmono "). It is called " Dimnah " by a clerical error in Jo. 21.[35]. In Jo. 19.[13] AV. reads that the border of Zebulun " goeth out to Remmon-methoar to Neah," where we must read with RV., " went out at Rimmon which stretcheth unto Neah." It is represented by the mod. village, er-Rummāneh, a small place, with ancient remains, six miles north of Nazareth. (4) Rimmon-parez, RV. perez, a station in the wilderness wanderings, named between Rithmah and Libnah (Nu. 33.[19, 20]), unidentified.

RING. The ring (gab) of Ek. 1.[18] is the "felloe" of the wheel. Rings of the precious metals were used for arranging curtains (Ex. 25.[12], &c.; Est. 1.[6]). The Seal was often set in a ring, and so the ring became the symbol of authority. When Pharaoh gives Joseph his ring it means that Joseph can act in the king's name, with his full sanction (Gn. 41.[42]; cp. Est. 3.[10, 12], &c.). The finger ring was a very common article of adornment (Ex. 35.[22]). Great numbers of rings have been found in Egypt, mostly of gold, with scarabs, or engraved gems, set in them.



Egyptian Ring with Seal

The profuse use of rings in apostolic times is suggested by the adjective which describes the rich man in Js. 2.[2]. He is called chruso-daktulios, lit. " golden-ringed." Rings were worn for ornament in nose and ears, as they are to this day in the East (see Ear-ring, Nose-ring). In Egypt at one time rings of the precious metals served for money. They may also have been used as charms or amulets. Thus among Orientals to-day a ring knotted in the hair is allowed to hang on the forehead of one whom it is desired to protect (Ek. 16.[12]).

RINNAH, son of Shimon, of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. 4.[20]).

RIPHATH, son of Gomer (Gn. 10.[3], &c.), whose descendants are identified by Josephus (Ant. I. vi. 1) with the Paphlagonians, living to the SW. of the Black Sea. In 1 Ch. 1.[6] a clerical error makes the name " Diphath."

RISSAH, a station in the wilderness wanderings (Nu. 33.[21f.]), which may be identical with Rasa of the Peutinger Tables, on the road between Jerusalem and ʻAqaba.

RITHMA, the station in the wanderings next after Hazeroth (Nu. 33.[18f.]). The place may have been named from the abundance of the broom (AV. " juniper "), called rothem.

RIVER is used in EV. rather loosely as the tr. of a variety of Heb. words which have this in common, that they denote running water (see Brook). Yūbal (Jr. 17.[8]) and 'ūbal (Dn. 8.[2], &c.) signify " flowing water." Peleg, " division," is applied to the channels by which water is conducted from spring, stream, or reservoir for purposes of irrigation (Ps. 1.[3], &c.). The water flows in a " river," peleg, from the great storehouses on high to supply the rain (Ps. 65.[9]). Tĕʻālāh is a conduit or aqueduct (2 K. 18.[17]; Jb. 38.[25], RV., &c.). Nahar is the most common Heb. word for river (Gn. 2.[14], &c.). " The river " (Gn. 31.[22]) and " the great river " (15.[18]; Dt. 1.[7]) denote the Euphrates; while the latter phrase denotes the Tigris in Dn. 10.[4]. Mesopotamia is " Aram of the two rivers," Aram-naharaim (Gn. 24.[10], &c.). The word is used, like the Arabic nahr, for perennial streams; but it is also applied to canals which probably, like the Ahava (Ez. 8.[21]) and the Chebar (Ek. 1.[1]), contained a constant supply of water (Ps. 137.[1]; Na. 2.[6], &c.). The Jordan is the one true river of Palestine; but some of its affluents, notably the Yarmuk and the Jabbok, are important streams, which rise high in winter floods. For other streams see Palestine, Streams.

For a people who, in the absence of bridges, had to cross them by fords—as is still largely the case in Palestine—swollen rivers presented features of terror not so easily appreciable by us. These are reflected in the imagery of Scripture (Is. 8.^{7}; Jr. 46.^{7}, &c.). Bridges are still few and far between. The present writer had occasion to ford the Jordan when it was swollen by the melting snows on the mountains to the north. After swimming his horse with difficulty to the other side, he was told that just the day before, at the same place, the son of the sheikh of a neighbouring village, attempting to cross, with his horse, had been swept away and drowned. How vivid such an experience makes the imagery of such a verse as Is. 43.^{2}.

The refreshing power of the river was highly valued. Perhaps the poet had seen the river that makes glad the city of Damascus before he wrote his ideal picture of the city of God (Ps. 46.^{4}). In the new heaven and new earth there may " be no more sea " (Rv. 21.^{1}), but the new Jerusalem would not be complete without the " river of water of life, bright as crystal . . . in the midst of the street thereof " (22.^{1}). The unceasing flow of the river suggested what cannot be exhausted (Is. 48.^{18}). For " River of Egypt," see Egypt, River of.

RIZIA. See Rezia.

RIZPAH, daughter of Aiah, and concubine of Saul, to whom she bore two sons, Armoni and Mephibosheth (2 S. 3.^{7}, 21.^{8}). After Saul's death his son Ishbosheth, with the support of Abner, maintained a certain sovereignty over the northern tribes. Whether the charge were justified or not —Abner does not deny it—he accused his commander-in-chief of an intrigue with Rizpah, which practically meant a charge of aiming at the throne; and thus alienated the one soldier on whose fidelity and skill the hopes of his house rested. In order to allay a blood feud between the Gibeonites and the house of Saul, David gave up the two sons of Rizpah, and five sons of Merab—MT. in error reads " Michal "—to the Gibeonites, who " hanged them in the mountain before the Lord . . . seven together . . . at the beginning of the barley harvest." Rizpah's long vigil by their dishonoured corpses is one of the most pathetic scenes in all history.

ROCK. (1) Ḥallāmīsh, " flint," the rock worked by miners (Jb. 28.^{9}). It describes the rock whence water was brought for Israel, " flinty " rock (Dt. 8.^{15}); see Flint. (2) Kēph, perhaps an Aram. loan-word, " a rock." It is used only in the plural, and occurs twice: in Jb. 30.^{6} as a dwelling-place, and Jr. 4.^{29} as a place of refuge. (3) Mā'ōz (Jg. 6.^{26}, RV. " stronghold "), lit. " place of strength," or " of safety." (4) Ṣela', " crag," or " cliff " (Jg. 6.^{29}, &c.); a place in which tombs are cut (Is. 22.^{16}); the haunt of wild animals (Ps. 104.^{18}, &c.) and of birds (Jb. 39.^{28}, &c.). (5) Tzūr, a rocky wall, or cliff (Ex. 17.^{6}, &c.), a haunt of bees (Ps. 81.^{16}, &c.), as the home of goats (1 S. 24.^{2}); snow-covered (Jr. 18.^{14}). Olives grow in its interstices (Dt. 32.^{13}); it is the resort of the homeless—i.e. the caves furnish shelter (Jb. 24.^{8}); it is pierced by the miners (Jb. 28.^{10}). As the place whence stones are cut, the quarry is used as a fig. of Abraham, as ancestor of Israel (Is. 51.^{1}). It is a place of security (1 Ch. 11.^{15}, &c.), and is a symbol of what is firm (Jb. 14.^{18}, &c.) and enduring (19.^{24}). Ṣela' and tzūr are often used figuratively of God, as the support and defence of His people (2 S. 22.^{3}, &c.). As the " Rock " of Israel He is contrasted with the gods of other nations (Dt. 32.$^{30f.}$, &c.). In the NT. the rock (petrā) is the only safe foundation (Mw. 7.$^{24f.}$, 16.^{18}, &c.). In the rock the new tomb is hewn (Mw. 27.^{60}, &c.). The ground with the rock near the surface is the figure of the shallow nature (Lk. 8.^{6}, &c.). The rock whence water was struck for Israel is the symbol of Christ in His power to preserve and refresh His people (1 Cor. 10.^{4}).

The physical features of Palestine made inevitable frequent references to rocks in the Lit. of Israel. It abounds in rocky tracts (Am. 6.^{12}), fastnesses among the mountains (1 S. 13.^{6}, &c.), great caves in the rocks which furnished asylum in evil days (Jr. 16.^{16}; Is. 2.^{10}, &c.), and rocky heights, easily guarded against attack (Jg. 15.^{8}, &c.). Isolated crags and mighty boulders are often associated with particular events, and named accordingly (Jg. 20.^{47}, 7.^{25}, &c.). The lofty rock walls of the deeper gorges are among the most impressive sights in Palestine. See SELA.

ROCK BADGER is RVm. for AV. CONEY, the Hyrax Syriacus (Lv. 11.[5]).

ROD stands in EV. for several Heb. words. (1) Ḥōṭer (Pr. 14.[3]; Is. 11.[1]), a twig or shoot. (2) Maqqēl is used for the rods cut from poplar and almond trees (Gn. 30.[37], &c.; Jr. 1.[11]), and also for staff (Gn. 32.[10], &c.), which is cut from the tree in the same way. (3) Maṭṭeh is used of the rods of Moses and Aaron (Ex. 4.[2], 7.[9], &c.), the rods of the tribal princes (Nu. 17.[2], &c.), and also for "staff" (Gn. 38.[18], &c.). It is practically equivalent to maqqēl. (4) Shēbeṭ, properly "sceptre" (Gn. 49.[10], &c.), is used to inflict punishment (Ex. 21.[20], &c.). It is also trd. "staff" (2 S. 23.[21]; 1 Ch. 11.[23]). In Ps. 23.[4] it appears in connection with the "staff" (mish'eneth) as part of the shepherd's regular equipment. The staff was the invariable companion of a journey in the East, and served alike for support and as a ready weapon of defence. But for purposes of conflict it is inferior to the "rod" or club which every shepherd carries. This is a rod about 18 inches long, with a heavy knob, into which spikes are often fixed. On the handle is a strap by means of which it is attached to the wrist. It is a really formidable weapon, and in view of possible encounter, with wild beasts or marauding men, its possession is a reasonable cause of comfort.

ROGELIM, the city whence came Barzillai the Gileadite (2 S. 17.[27], 19.[31]). It probably lay near the path taken by David in his flight to Mahanaim, in the uplands east of the Jordan. It is not named elsewhere, and no trace of the site has yet been discovered.

ROMAN EMPIRE. The outstanding fact in the world's history during the period covered by the New Testament narrative is the Roman supremacy over, and even beyond, the lands which border the Mediterranean Sea. We may briefly summarise—I. The history of its development; II. The character of its administration; and III. Its relation to the Jews.

I. The empire of Rome had not been built up consciously and systematically, but mainly as the result of wars forced upon her by external powers or of bequests of foreign princes: Rome had "stumbled into the conquest of the world." The close of the first Punic War (B.C. 264–241) had brought the subjection of Western Sicily, and with it the beginning of provincial government. We cannot here trace in detail the successive steps which followed: it must suffice to say that by B.C. 27 Rome had incorporated in her dominions Sardinia and Corsica, Spain, Gaul, Northern Italy, Illyria, Macedonia and Achæa (Greece), most of the coast-lands of Asia Minor, Syria, Cyprus, Crete, Egypt, Cyrene, and "Africa" (roughly equivalent to the modern Tunisia). There were also numerous allied states and client kingdoms which were really under Roman suzerainty, and might be robbed of their independence at the will of their powerful mistress. To the early emperors was left the task of extending the empire to its natural frontiers, the Atlantic on the west, the Rhine and Danube in the north, the Euphrates in the east, and the Sahara in the south. Augustus created six fresh provinces—Lusitania (Portugal), Rhætia, Noricum, Pannonia, and Mœsia, bordering the Danube from source to mouth, and Galatia, comprising the central highlands of Asia Minor. Tiberius annexed Cappadocia; Gaius separated Numidia from "Africa," making it an independent administration; Claudius conquered Britain and formed also the provinces of Thrace and the two Mauretanias (Morocco and Algeria). Finally, Nero annexed Eastern Pontus and Lesser Armenia, though he did not at once make them into separate provinces.

II. Under the republic the government of the provinces had been in the hands of ex-consuls or ex-prætors sent out by the Senate for a single year immediately after their tenure of office at Rome or, since B.C. 52, after the lapse of at least five years. This system, which placed almost autocratic power in the hands of inexperienced and constantly changing officials (for together with the governor the whole civil service was changed each year), was attended by great hardships to the provincials, who were mercilessly oppressed not merely by unsalaried governors, often as rapacious as they were incompetent, but also by the publicani, representatives of the great Roman societies which contracted for the levying of taxes and the carrying out of public works in the provinces, and by money-lenders and men of business. The establishment of the empire (B.C. 27) brought the adoption of new methods of provincial rule. Those provinces which required a military force as garrison or to complete their subjugation, i.e. Gaul, Hither Spain, and Syria (including Cyprus and Cilicia), became directly dependent upon the emperor in his capacity of proconsul, and were administered by officers whom he appointed and removed at will (legatus Cæsaris: in the New Testament, ἡγεμών). These were chosen from the senators, and were usually ex-consuls in the case of the larger provinces, ex-prætors in that of the smaller ones. There were also imperial officials, procuratores and præfecti, taken from the "knights" or freedmen, who administered certain districts, e.g. Rhætia, Noricum, Thrace, and the Mauretanias, but had no legionary troops under their command. Lastly, the emperor retained Egypt, which was governed by a præfectus and had a garrison of three legions: this was regarded as an imperial possession, and no senator might set foot in it without the emperor's permission. All other provinces remained after B.C. 27 under senatorial control, and were governed by proconsuls (ἀνθύπατοι in the New Testament), appointed from ex-consuls for "Asia" and "Africa," from ex-prætors for the rest, by a combined system of rotation and lot: their office lasted for a single year, and was extended only in exceptional cases over two or more years. In B.C. 22 Augustus transferred to the Senate Cyprus and Gallia Narbonensis, but the area of the emperor's administration was enlarged by the addition of Dalmatia and of all the provinces formed after B.C. 27, so that by A.D. 70 the imperial provinces numbered something like twenty, containing the entire regular army of the empire and stretching round it in an almost unbroken ring. Whatever the character of the early Cæsars, there can be little doubt that their rule brought a marked improvement in provincial administration. Their deputies were kept under stricter supervision, they received fixed salaries, and were usually experienced men. Special financial officials were appointed, and the severe burdens of the provincials were lightened if not removed. So much was this the case that we have more than one instance of a province brought to the brink of ruin by senatorial mismanagement being transferred temporarily to the emperor and soon recovering its prosperity. An insight into the attention paid by an able emperor to minute details of provincial government is given us by the extant correspondence between Trajan and the younger Pliny, who, as legate of Bithynia in A.D. 111, consulted the emperor on a great variety of questions, ranging from the proper attitude to be adopted towards Christians to the construction of baths or the institution of a city-guild.

III. The first contact of the Jewish state with Rome dates from the Maccabæan period. About B.C. 161 Judas Maccabæus formed an alliance with the Senate against Demetrius of Syria, and this was renewed by Jonathan and by Simon (1 M. 8.[22ff.], 12.[1ff.], 15.[7ff.]). In B.C. 63, Pompey, after setting aside the Seleucid kingdom and organising Syria as a Roman province, invaded Judæa and demanded the deposition of the ruling Asmonæan prince, Aristobulus, and the restoration of the old high-priestly constitution. Jerusalem submitted, but the Temple rock was heroically defended for three months. After its capture, Hyrcanus, Aristobulus' brother, retained the high-priesthood, but Judæa was henceforth practically a part of the Roman empire. The revolts which soon followed led to the abolition of the high-priestly rule and the partition of the Jewish land into five independent districts. In B.C. 38 Herod the Great was appointed by Antony king of Judæa and the neighbouring regions, and his power was continued, even though at Actium he sided against Augustus, until his death in B.C. 4. Archelaus succeeded him in Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, but was deposed by Augustus in A.D. 6. Judæa now became a Roman province of the second rank, governed by an imperial procurator resident at Cæsarea and in close relation with the neighbouring province of Syria. For a brief period, from A.D. 41 to 44, Claudius restored to Herod Agrippa, a grandson of Herod the Great, the territory his grandfather had held. But this experiment was soon abandoned, and between A.D. 44 and 66 there were eight procurators, of whom Antonius Felix (A.D. 52) and Porcius Festus (A.D. 60) were the fourth and fifth. A revolt broke out in 66, and after its suppression and the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in A.D. 70 the high-priesthood and the Sanhedrin were abolished, and Judæa became a province under a legatus with a single legion, the 10th, as garrison.

ROMANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. Happily we need not spend time on the usual topics of introduction with regard to the Epistle to the Romans. With few exceptions (and these are so eccentric that they may be disregarded) most people are agreed that this epistle was written to the Roman Church, and written from Corinth about the year 57–58. Paul had behind him many years of work, and a wide experience of dealings with men, ere he wrote this epistle. He had evangeliesd Galatia, had passed over into Europe, had founded the churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, and Corinth, had revisited many of the churches he had founded, specially the churches in Phrygia and Galatia. He had been at Ephesus for two years, and had so great success there that the writer of the Acts of the Apostles, in summarising it, says, " So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed " (Ac. 19.[20]). Then it is added, " Now after these things were ended, Paul purposed in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there I must also see Rome " (19.[21]). From the epistle itself we gather a definite view as to the time when it was written. " Wherefore also I was hindered these many times in coming to you ; but now, having no more any place in these regions, and having these many years a longing to come unto you, whensoever I go unto Spain (for I hope to see you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if first in some measure I shall have been satisfied with your company), but now, I say, I go unto Jerusalem, ministering to the saints. For it has been the good pleasure of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain collection for the poor among the saints that are at Jerusalem " (Rm. 15.[22-26]).

This makes the time of writing very definite, and it needs no further notice here. We gather further from this passage that Paul had a purpose for many years of visiting Rome. He had preached the Gospel of Christ from Jerusalem, and round about even unto Illyricum, and it was natural that his eye should be fixed on the great city to which all roads led, the seat of the Roman power, the place into which all the tendencies and interests of the time converged. He had set his heart on winning the world for Christ, he had sought to Christianise all the influences, institutions, and interests which were symbolised by the great name of Rome. Up to the time of writing he had been fully occupied with the planting and establishing of churches in Galatia, Greece, and Asia Minor. These had been established, they could go along by themselves ; they were active, vigorous, and aggressive, and he was free to carry the Gospel of Christ into other regions, and specially into that great metropolis which was the head and heart of the great organism of the Roman Empire. " Having no more place in these regions " means that the work could now go on without his superintendence, that he was free for other work. Thus he must see Rome. He had not only preached the Gospel, and established the churches, he had won for them their freedom. He had, after a long controversy, established the right of Gentiles to become Christians without first becoming Jews. This had been authoritatively declared at the Council of Jerusalem, and the churches of the Gentile world could rest in the open access secured to them into the Christian Church, and rejoice in the liberty with which Christ had made them free.

So Paul purposed to see Rome. But he had still some work to do ere he could carry out that purpose. He had to return to Jerusalem, as the bearer of the liberality of the churches of Achaia and Macedonia towards the Church of Jerusalem. No doubt he had also in mind to bring both sections of the Church into closer agreement, and more brotherly fellowship. This was one of his most constant aims. He never lost hope of his kinsmen, and he eagerly desired their conversion to Christ. Specially he desired that the Jewish Christians should realise the unity of the Spirit, and feel that they were, with their Gentile brethren, sharers in the common salvation. With this aim in view we note that he fell in with the suggestion of James, and strove with all his strength to conciliate them.

As he had to travel first from Corinth to Jerusalem, and then, as he planned, to travel to Rome, he resolved to prepare the way by writing an epistle to the Church at Rome, which would prepare the way for his personal visit, and at the same time place on record the main elements of the Gospel as he conceived it to be. Other epistles he had already written, and while in all of them he set forth the Gospel, he had laid stress mainly on the defects of his readers or on the misunderstandings of the Gospel or on the applications of the Gospel which he had found in the belief and practices of the various churches. It is to be noted that in these epistles, such as those to the Thessalonians, the Galatians, or to the Corinthians, he had mainly in view the correction of mistakes, the clearing up of difficulties, or the correction of conduct. No doubt Christian doctrine and Christian faith are inculcated in them, but stress is laid on the special circumstances of each Church. Thus the Galatians had to be taught what the Gospel of Christ really was, and they had to be warned against false interpretations of it. Paul wrote out of a full, personal knowledge of these churches, and his epistles are directed to particular situations. If we compare the Roman epistle with those mentioned we find an instructive difference. This epistle moves in an ampler region, and in a more tranquil atmosphere. If we compare it with the Galatian epistle in particular we find that, while the same topics occur in both, and occur in a similar order, yet the tone and outlook are different. The Epistle to the Galatians is fiery, personal, controversial; hurt feeling is apparent in every line, personal attitudes and grievances are there. It is written in a fervour of wounded feeling, and the apostle is largely concerned with his personal relations with his people. He does not forget to set forth what the Gospel is, but that setting is placed in the environment of the Galatian Church. One can understand it better if he places it among the earliest, if not the earliest, of the extant epistles. The present writer has a growing conviction that the date ought to be placed early—earlier than the Council of Jerusalem; and the most fruitful way of regarding it is to make it one of those documents which were originated by the Judaistic controversy, and that it is Paul's contribution to the settlement of the question. It is difficult to think of it as written after the decision of the Jerusalem Council.

Be that as it may, we note the difference between it and the Roman epistle. Here we are in a larger atmosphere. The controversy between Jew and Gentile within the Church is in the background. It is no longer a burning question. The questions are discussed in a larger fashion, the horizons are wider, and the issues are not local or temporal, but universal and eternal. The wider sweep of the epistle is manifest from the great doxology with which it concludes: "Now to Him that is able to stablish you according to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which hath been kept in silence through times eternal, but now is manifested, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the eternal God, is made known unto all the nations unto obedience of faith: to the only wise God, through Jesus Christ, to whom be the glory for ever. Amen" (16.[25, 27]). This doxology contains or refers to all the leading thoughts of the epistle, and a good view of its teaching may be had simply from an analysis of the doxology.

It may be well, however, to notice briefly some questions which necessarily arise. As to the authorship, date, and authenticity, much need not be said. The epistle was written by Paul, about the year 57, and written to Rome, to prepare the Church for his coming. As to the origin of the Church of Rome we have no trustworthy information. Very likely it dated from a very early period. "Sojourners from Rome" (Ac. 2.[10]) were among those present on the Day of Pentecost. On their return to Rome they would in all likelihood tell of the wondrous things they had heard in Jerusalem on that eventful day. Intercourse between Jerusalem and Rome was frequent and close, and as the years went on many Christians would arrive at Rome, and the Church would quietly grow. Paul himself would likely know something of Rome and the Church there. At Corinth he knew Aquila and Priscilla, who had left Rome at the command of Claudius, and from them he would know what was the state of matters with regard to the Church at Rome. All that can be safely said is that there was a church at Rome, but of its origin and history we know nothing. Nor can much be said regarding its prevailing character, whether it was Jewish or Gentile, or both. In the epistle itself the point of view varies; sometimes the apostle appears to speak only to Jews, and sometimes to Gentiles, and sometimes both are addressed together as Christians, and differences are left out of view. It is not necessary to discuss the question at any length. Scholars have largely forsaken extreme views, and there is a growing consensus of opinion that the Roman Church had in its membership both Jews and Gentiles.

The apostle had written his former epistles to churches which he himself had founded. In this epistle he writes to a church with which he had had no previous relation. It is a new situation, and it has its effect on the form of the epistle. He has not to deal with local situations, or with causes of contention arising in the church to which he is writing. He has to deal with matters of universal interest, with doctrines which are permanent, and with matters of discipline belonging to every age. Had we space we might admire the great and courteous way in which he introduces himself and his epistle to the Roman Church, and note how he selects in his introductory sentences those topics which had an equal interest for all Christians. Having established himself on common ground with his readers, he goes on to speak of the Gospel, and this is his main theme throughout—the Gospel of which he is not ashamed, "for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first and also to the Greek" (Rm. 1.[16]), the Gospel which is to succeed where all other schemes had failed. For the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation. His purpose, then, is to set forth the Gospel, to explain and enforce it. It embraces, continues, and yet supersedes the older dispensations. Briefly the theme is, How is man to become righteous in the sight of God? "And the answer is: (1) By certain great redemptive acts on the part of God which take effect in the sphere above, though their consequences are felt throughout the sphere below; (2) through a certain ardent apprehension of these acts and of their Author, Christ, on the part of the Christian; (3) through his continued self-surrender to Divine influences poured out freely and unremittingly upon him" (Sanday and Headlam, International Critical Commentary on Romans, p. xlvii.).

A detailed analysis of the epistle is not possible within our limits. The great thesis is set forth in manifold ways, and with many illustrations and applications. But the question, How is man to become righteous in the sight of God? is never lost sight of. Man becomes righteous, not by any effort of his own, but by the gift of God, through faith, through a real, loyal attachment to Christ. Former systems and attempts have failed. Tried by their own standards, Gentile and Jew have alike failed. The law of Moses has condemned the Jew, the law of conscience has condemned the Gentile. The failure to attain righteousness is universal. But the Gospel has succeeded where all else has failed. The new system is expounded, its relation to law set forth. It is universal, through the free gift of God. It is made possible through the propitiatory death of Christ. In this propitiation through the death of Christ God's twofold purpose of the condemnation of sin and the pardon of the sinner is made manifest. Having set forth the relation of the Gospel to the OT. in the case of Abraham, the apostle describes the blissful effects of righteousness by faith. These effects are vividly described (chap. 5.). Here are the vivid contrasts of sin, condemnation, death on the one hand, and righteousness, grace, life on the other. Then in two chapters progressive righteousness is set forth. Here there is the answer to the casuistical objection, "If more sin means more grace, why not go on sinning?" followed by a description of the Christian's release, what it is and what it is not. This is followed by the profound analysis of the moral conflict in the soul, and of the ending of the conflict by the interposition of Christ (7.[25]). From the state of mind known as no condemnation to the state of no separation is the theme of the 8th chapter. Once the Christian dreaded condemnation as the greatest possible calamity, now he dreads most of all the fact of separation from God. But this dread is overcome by the feeling of inviolable security which he attains in dependence upon God's favour and the love of Christ.

Then comes the problem of the Gospel in history. How are we to regard the failure of all former attempts to attain righteousness? How are we to account for Israel's failure, for the sad contrast between the privileges and apparent destiny of Israel and its rejection? Is the rejection just? Is that rejection consistent with the Divine promises, or with the Divine justice? Yes, the apostle answers, for God is absolute. But he further shows that Israel failed because they sought for righteousness in their own way, not by God's way. They sought to earn their own salvation, and they necessarily failed. Yet God's way of salvation had never been difficult or remote, it had been within the reach of all. Israel had been rejected not suddenly or without warning, nor had the essential meaning of the Gospel been hidden from them. Yet the rejection is not final, nor irremediable. It is only temporary, and has, in fact, a special meaning, and even in the rejection there is a gracious purpose. "For God hath shut up all men unto disobedience, that He might have mercy upon all" (11.[32]). Then follow the ethical and practical parts of the epistle, of which it is not necessary to give an account. Nor can we deal with the interesting critical questions regarding the concluding parts of the epistle. Nor can we answer the question as to whether there were two editions of the epistle. It is a question of great interest, and of difficulty, but it is not important, theologically, nor can we discuss it here.

The main purpose of the epistle is to set forth the Gospel, and to prove that it is destined to succeed where all else had failed. Failure had been written large over all the efforts of men to attain to righteousness. Men had gone from bad to worse, until they actually did not desire to retain any knowledge of God within their minds. Jew and Gentile had alike failed. The failure had its stages of development. The Gentiles might have retained that knowledge of God which was really imprinted on His creation (1.[19, 20]). They had, however, neglected this knowledge, and had landed in idolatry, and in the third place, because they did not retain that knowledge of God, and had landed in idolatry, they were given over to every kind of moral degradation. Such, briefly, is Paul's doctrine of degradation. The failure of the Gentile is complete, but the failure of the Jew is quite as notable. But the Gospel, which is the power of God, is successful. It restores the true knowledge of God. It sets men free from idolatry, it restores the power of holy living. The universal need of man for righteousness, and the way in which that need is met by the Gospel, is thus the main theme of the epistle. It is thus the counterpart of the old system which had failed, it is also its correction and completion. He then shows how it works in the individual life, and in the life of the Church. It is shown also how it works in history. The rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles are steps in a process, the end of which is the summing up of all things in Christ. The various parts of the epistle are steps in the great argument. It is an argument of the greatest scope and of the highest validity. It is both a Gospel message and a philosophy of history. The Gospel of Jesus Christ in itself, and in its effects on human life and on the history of the race, is thus seen to be the final revelation of the purpose of God for mankind. It is also the outcome of the peculiar personal experience of the great apostle of the Gentiles. As of all Scripture, so of this particular Scripture, it is the outcome not merely of Divine influence exerted on the soul of man, it is the response of that soul to the Divine influence. The great argument was wrung from the soul of Paul, and was written in the living agony of a soul which sought to know the meaning of his experience of the Divine influence. This can only be stated, it cannot be unfolded. But we must read the epistle many times and from many points of view, ere we can grasp its meaning. We may read it as an account of Paul's religious experience, we may read it as an objective account of the Divine method of salvation, or we may read it in other ways; but however we read it, it remains one of the great writings of religious experience, and one of the greatest formative documents which help to determine and to guide the religious experience of mankind. JAMES IVERACH.

ROME, the capital of Italy and metropolis of the Roman empire. The city lies on the left bank of the Tiber, some fifteen miles from its mouth. According to tradition, it was founded on the Palatine Hill in B.C. 753 by Romulus, son of Mars and Rhea Silvia. Servius Tullius, Rome's sixth king (578–535), surrounded the city with a wall which included the Seven Hills, the Capitoline, Palatine, Aventine, Cælian, Esquiline, Viminal, and Quirinal, and this, though partly dismantled, remained the only wall of Rome down to the empire. In B.C. 390 the town was destroyed by the Gauls, and the haste with which it was rebuilt was held to account for its irregular and crowded appearance, the narrowness of its streets and the meanness of its buildings. Gradually, however, efforts were made to beautify it. In 184 Marcus Porcius Cato made the first market-hall, and Quintus Metellus Macedonicus (consul in 143) built the first "marble temple." But though from that time onwards Rome gained many magnificent buildings, public and private, yet the streets remained steep and winding, narrow and poorly paved, and the Rome which Augustus found on his accession (B.C. 27) was "not adorned in a way befitting the majesty of her empire" (Suetonius, Augustus, 29). His rule inaugurated a new era in the city's history, both in outward appearance and in administration. He boasted "that he had found the city of brick and left it of marble." Foremost among his public buildings were the new Forum Augusti with a splendid temple of Mars Ultor, vowed at the battle of Philippi and dedicated in B.C. 2, the temple of Apollo on the Palatine, built to commemorate the battle of Actium, and that of Jupiter Tonans on the Capitoline. The senate-house, which had been begun by Cæsar, was completed by Augustus, who also rebuilt Cæsar's basilica after its destruction by fire. Noble and wealthy Romans were not slow to follow the emperor's example: temples and palaces, theatres and baths, porticoes and libraries vied with each other in size and magnificence. The work went on, though less vigorously, in succeeding reigns, perhaps the most notable structure being the Aqua Claudia, an aqueduct begun by Caligula and completed by Claudius. Augustus also remodelled the administration of the city, dividing it into 14 regiones or districts, subdivided into 265 vici or wards. The governor of the whole was the city prefect, appointed temporarily during the absence of Augustus, but afterwards becoming a permanent official, charged with the task of securing order in the streets and suppressing turbulence; for this purpose he was placed in command of 14 "city cohorts," stationed in seven barracks in various parts of Rome. A fire-brigade was also organised, at first under the command of the ædiles, but after A.D. 6 under a special officer nominated by the emperor, the præfectus vigilum. Commissioners were also appointed to superintend the water-supply, the banks and bed of the Tiber, and public works and places. The corn-supply, which came almost entirely from Africa, was regulated by a board of commissioners, replaced towards the end of Augustus' reign by a single præfectus annonæ. Thus by Augustus' death (A.D. 14) the chaotic administration of the republican period had been replaced by one under the emperor's own supervision, which secured as far as possible order and efficiency.

Such was Rome when Paul entered it in A.D. 61, in the seventh year of Nero's reign. The time of the city's greatest splendour was to come half a century later, yet even then she could boast that she was unrivalled. Storey was piled on storey in her towering buildings, especially the insulæ or lodging-houses. The products of every land in the known world were on sale in her markets and shops—the silk of China, the spices of Arabia, the costly wares of Babylon and India. Her population was enormous, numbering probably about a million and a quarter, half of whom were slaves: every nation and tribe of earth was represented in the motley crowd which thronged her busy streets and market-places. Amongst them the Jews were conspicuous from the time of Pompey's conquest of Palestine; Julius Cæsar and Augustus showed them some marks of favour, and though Claudius "commanded all Jews to depart from Rome" (Ac. 18.²), this banishment must have been merely temporary, for we find numerous Jews living at Rome under his successor, Nero (Ac. 28.¹⁷). But often the foreigners represented the dregs of their nations, adventurers or criminals, and the moral tone both of the wealthy and luxurious aristocracy and of the lower classes was corrupt and degraded: even religion was regarded as a political rather than an ethical force. Prices were high, and the majority of the citizens could not have lived but for the corn-doles granted by the state, while their chief amusement was to watch the gladiatorial and other shows given by the emperor or other wealthy Romans. By day and night the din was incessant. Not infrequently houses collapsed owing to the jerry-building of speculating contractors; serious floods occurred from time to time; any interruption of the corn-import threatened the great city with famine. demics, too, raged among the crowded population in their insanitary dwellings, and great conflagrations sometimes defied the efforts of the fire-brigade, notably that in A.D. 64, which devastated more than two-thirds of the city. A charge of incendiarism was immediately afterwards brought against the Christians, who were already numerous in Rome, and though unsupported by any evidence, it led to their persecution by Nero. Even the fire, however, was not without its advantage, for a new Rome sprang from the ashes of the old, built on a grander scale, with broader, straighter streets and houses of more moderate height. MARCUS N. TOD.

ROOF (see HOUSE). The R. in ancient times was always flat; it was often used for retirement (Ac. 10.[9]).

ROOM in AV. stands for several Heb. and Gr. words. In most cases no misunderstanding is possible. In Mw. 23.[6]; Mk. 12.[39]; Lk. 14.[7, 8], 20.[46], the Gr. word is prōtoklisia, which means the highest place at the feast, or as RV. trs., "chief place." In Lk. 14.[9, 10] AV. trs. the Gr. topos by both "place" and "room," RV. uniformly "place."

ROSE. The word ḥăbatztzeleth occurs twice only in EV. In SS. 2.[1] the rose of Sharon is used figuratively for the Shulamite; and in Is. 35.[1] the desert transfigured is compared in beauty to the rose. The word probably means "narcissus." Tg. gives nargūs, which is equivalent to the Arabic narjūs, "narcissus." In Sr. 24.[14] Wisdom is compared to "a rose plant in Jericho." Tristram thought this might be the rhododendron. It may, however, have been the true rose, which was also found in the district. Roses are now plentiful in Palestine, and are greatly valued for the perfume which is distilled from their petals; and also for the rose-scented water, of which the natives are extremely fond. The plant popularly called "rose of Jericho" is not a rose at all, but a low crucifer, Anastatica hierochuntina, frequently found in sandy soil in Egypt and Palestine. Admiration of the rose expresses itself in the female name RHODA, Arabic Wardeh, which has always been a favourite in the East.

ROSH. (1) Son of Benjamin (Gn. 46.[21]), where, for "Ahi and Rosh Muppim," possibly we should read "Ahiram and Shupham" (cp. Nu. 26.[38]). (2) Instead of "the chief prince" (Ek. 38.[2], 39.[1] AV.) RV. reads "prince of Rosh," with the support of many scholars. If this is correct it denotes a people coupled with Meshech and Tubal, otherwise unknown. RVm. suggests "chief prince of Meshech and Tubal," as descriptive of Gog.

RUBY (Heb. pĕnî and 'edom), a precious stone not identd.; it was red in colour, so may have been the "red coral" (Jb. 28[18], &c.).

RUDDER. See SHIP.

RUE (Gr. pēganon) must have been a garden plant in the time of Christ, and so subject to tithe (Lk. 11.[42]), although later the Talmud calls it a kitchen herb, and free from tithe (Shebiith, ix. 1). It is probably the Ruta graveolens, a plant growing to a height of over two feet, greatly prized for its medicinal qualities, and also as a condiment.

RUFUS. (1) Son of Simon the Cyrenian, and brother of Alexander (Mk. 15.[21]). (2) A Roman Christian saluted by St. Paul (Rm. 16.[13]). Some have thought that this Rufus is the same as (1), to whom and to his brother no doubt special interest attached because of their father's deed. "Chosen in the Lord" involves some distinction, but the exact significance cannot now be determined.

RUG is RV. and AVm. tr. of sĕmīkāh (Jg. 4.[18], AV. "mantle"). The word probably denotes a thick coverlet, but the meaning is uncertain.

RUHAMAH. Hosea gave to his daughter the name LO-RUHAMAH, "not pitied," as a sign of the fate of Isr. as unrepentant (Ho. 1.[6, 8]): this name is changed to R., "pitied," when Isr. repents (2.[1]).

RULER OF THE SYNAGOGUE. See SYNAGOGUE.

RUMAH, the native city of Pedaiah, whose daughter, Zebudah, became a member of Josiah's harīm, and mother of Jehoiakim (2 K. 23.[36]). It may be the same place as that called Arumah (Jg. 9.[41]), in the neighbourhood of Shechem. It may, however, be identical with the Rumah in Galilee mentioned by Josephus (BJ. III. vii. 21), which is probably represented by the mod. Khirbet Rumeh, about three miles north of Ṣaffūrieh.

RUST (Gr. brōsis, Mw. 6.[19, 20]; ios, Js. 5.[3]). In Mw. our Lord uses R. as a generalisation of the forces wh. make earthly things transitory; James makes it the symbol of the corroding effect of injustice empoisoning all seeming prosperity.

RUTH, THE BOOK OF. This book contains the story of the kindness shown by R. the Moabitess to her mother-in-law NAOMI, and the reward she received. The narrative begins with the removal of Naomi, with her husband ELIMELECH and her two sons, MAHLON and Chilion, to Moab. During their residence of ten yrs. Elimelech died; his two sons married, and both soon died. Naomi, hearing that plenty now reigned in Judah, purposed to return thither. Her two widowed daughters-in-law accompanied her so far, but ere they had crossed into Israel, Orpa, at Naomi's suggestion, went back to Moab, but R. clave to her mother-in-law. When they arrived at Bethlehem R. began by endeavouring to support Naomi by gleaning; in doing this she attracted the notice of BOAZ, in whose fields she was reaping. At Naomi's advice she made a direct appeal to Boaz, who was the kinsman of Elimelech.

As the result of this he redeemed the land of Elimelech and married R. Fm. the fruit of this marriage sprang DAVID the king. Naomi occupies the grandmother's place in the house of Boaz, taking into her bosom the child that took the place of Mahlon's son.

Very interesting are the glimpses of ancient customs given in the book, e.g. as to the duties of next-of-kin, concerning redeeming and concerning exchanging, and the manner of attesting a transaction. The reference to the days of the Judges (1.[1]), and to the "former times," shows that the book was written long after the events occurred with which it is occupied. But it is very difficult to fix the date of writing. Linguistic evidence is, as usual, somewhat uncertain in its purport. The long form of the first pers. pron. is predominant, and this is usually regarded as a proof of antiquity; but König, in the case of R., says it is due to intentional archaism; as if the Jews of the post-exilic period knew or cared about this. The presence of Aramaisms is doubtful, even if they proved recency, wh. they do not. The internal evidence proves that R. dates after David; it may be in the days of SOLOMON, as after Moab regained independence there was too great racial hatred for a story to be committed to writing wh. exhibited a Moabitess in so favourable a light.

SABAOTH. See LORD OF HOSTS.

SABBATH, THE. This was the name given by the Hebrews to the seventh or last day of the week, and the period of time covered by it extended from sunset on Friday to what, in our reckoning, would be sunset on Saturday. The root idea of the word is Rest, in the sense of ceasing, or desisting from, work; and the value of the day to the social and religious life of the Jewish nation was incalculable.

Its Origin is wrapped in obscurity, though mention of it is made very early in the Bible (Gn. 2.[1-3]). What the sacred writer there says is ideally true, but neither chronologically nor historically correct. He was reading into the institution the ideas of a later age—ideas that were not known at the beginning, but took shape after a long period of religious evolution. What is certain is that the custom of marking off time, in cycles of seven days, is very old. Some say this division had a connection with astrology. Others assert that it is determined by the moon; and it is to be remarked that "new moons and Sabbaths" is a Bible phrase, as if the one belonged to the other. It is known, also, that among ancient nations particular days stood out as having a peculiar significance or sacredness. In Rome, e.g., there were regularly recurring days on which the courts were closed and work might not be done. Among other peoples there were days on which fires might not be lighted and no one was allowed to bathe. Whatever its origin, one point is to be noted. True religion transfigures everything which it touches; and among the chosen people this day, alike in its idea and purpose, was purified and elevated. Other nations have their separate creation narratives. What distinguishes the Hebrew narrative is its freedom from puerility, superstitions, debasing elements, and the impression which it makes on the mind of the power and goodness of the Creator, and the utter dependence of the creature. A similar transfiguration took place in regard to the Sabbath. The Hebrew took it and invested it with a sacred meaning, which was altogether unique.

To say that this day may have been originally taken by the Hebrews from the Babylonians or Canaanites may seem to some to make it less divine. But the crowning evidence of its divinity is to be sought, not in the manner of its coming, but in the transfiguring process through which it was made to pass and the gracious ends it has served. Our daily bread, which comes to us through the operation of natural laws, is as much the gift of God as was the bread which Christ multiplied by the side of the lake. And the Sabbath, even though it may have come to us through the channel of heathendom, is as much divine as if it had been handed down direct from heaven, and apart from any human medium.

Its Purpose or Design.—It was meant to secure for the labourer respite from wearing toil. The wheels of the world's machinery were to stop. Even in the busier seasons of the year, and when pressure was on, the tools of labour were to be thrown aside. "In ploughing time and in harvest thou shalt rest" (Ex. 34.[21]).

The strictness of this rule as to unnecessary labour was exemplified and emphasised in the case of the manna—a double portion of which fell on the sixth day, that there might be no gathering of it on the seventh (Ex. 16.[22-30]). In one passage (Ex. 23.[12]) there is vividly brought before us the philanthropic aspect of the Sabbath as a day of rest. Strangers, bondsmen, and beasts of burden were all to share in the merciful boon. That this idea of rest was burned into the mind of the people is clear from such a passage as Nu. 15.[32-36], where we are told that for gathering sticks on Sabbath a man was adjudged worthy of death, and met his death by stoning. The Romans respected the day so far as to free the Jews, while it lasted, from military service; and during the Maccabæan wars the Jews at first chose rather to be slain than to fight on Sabbath.

But to say, as has been said, that physical rest was the only end contemplated in the institution of the Sabbath, is to rob the day of its chief glory. Man has a body but he is a soul, and this higher part of his nature stands even more in need of refreshment than the lower. Indeed, the lower is meant to subserve the higher: "Body helps soul." The day was to be hallowed. But mere repose hallows nothing. Idleness, indeed, is more likely to be productive of evil than of good. Special rites and services were therefore appointed to lead the thoughts of the people Godward. On that day the daily burnt-offering—the expression of personal devotion to God—was doubled (Nu. 28.[9]), and fresh cakes of shewbread were set before the Lord—symbolic of the spirit of consecration which should run through all the common days (Lv. 24.[3-9]). Above all, the Sabbath and the observance of it were to be a special sign that God was their Lord and that they were His people (Ex. 31.[12-17]; Ek. 20.[12]).

Passages and customs such as these—and they are numerous in the Scriptures—make it abundantly clear that a character of sacredness was attached to the day, and that its chief function was to free the minds and hearts of the people from absorption in secular cares, and give them opportunities of rising to their true dignity by cultivating fellowship with God.

Its Abuse.—The Sabbath has not escaped perversion. The rabbis, whose duty it was to read and interpret the law, added to it, until the traditions of the elders became an intolerable burden. They made it an end in itself instead of a means. This was done with an ingenuity and a casuistry which would be comical, were it not for the serious issues involved.

As to work, thirty-nine kinds which might not be done were catalogued; but under each of these thirty-nine a number of cognate works were included, until the list became confusing and burdensome. For example, ploughing is one of the thirty-nine, and under it falls digging. It might be lawful to spit on a stone and efface it with the foot, as no mark would be made, but this might not be done on the ground, as the drawing of the foot along would form a rut. Tying or untying knots was prohibited. This led to a classification of knots. A camel-driver's knot or a boatman's might not be made, unless it could be done with one hand. Reaping was forbidden on the Sabbath. A woman, therefore, must not look into a mirror, for she might see a grey hair and be tempted to pluck it out, which would be a kind of reaping. These are illustrations of the way in which what was meant as a blessing was perverted into a curse by the rabbis. It is right to say, however, that, despite such restrictions, the day was to many a gladness and a joy. The healthy element in human nature, which nothing can wholly efface, rebelled and asserted itself.

A Sabbath Day's Journey.—This is referred to in Ac. 1.[12]. The space covered by the phrase was about 2000 cubits beyond the city. Rabbinical ingenuity again set to work. If a man wished to go further, it was only necessary to deposit two meals at the boundary on Friday. That boundary, by a kind of fiction, became his home or "place" (Ex. 16.[29]), and he might journey 2000 cubits beyond it. Or if he fixed his eye on a tree in the distance, that tree became, for the time, his "place," and from it he could set out as a starting-point.

It is in the light of these rabbinical perversions that we must interpret some of the collisions and controversies between the scribes and Christ. Christ was no iconoclast. He came not to destroy but to fulfil. As a loyal Jew He reverenced the Sabbath, frequented the synagogue on that day, and took part in its exercises (Lk. 4.[16-20]). But His attitude was one of large freedom. His soul revolted against burdensome traditions as it did against the sham grief in the house of Jairus. Hence His indignation when they grumbled at Him restoring power to the man's withered arm, and at the disciples plucking a few ears of corn and rubbing them in their hands as they walked through the fields. It was easy for Him, when challenged, to show from Scripture (1 S. 21.[1-6]; Mk. 2.[23-28]), and from their own practice (Mw. 12.[10-13]), and from the tireless activity of God (Jn. 5.[17]), that to do good on the Sabbath is lawful, and that human life is much more sacred than rabbinical rules. His summing up of the situation was: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath."

The question of the permanence of the day has often been debated. Attempts have been made to prove its obligation from its place in the decalogue—the idea being that it would be as feasible to rescind the laws against theft or murder as the law of the Sabbath. All this is needless. The Sabbath was given because man needed it. This need will last through all time and in all lands, and therefore the necessity for the Sabbath will abide. But our Sabbath is somewhat different from the Jewish Sabbath. The type has given place to the reality, the shadow to the substance. All is changed because Christ has lived and died, and risen again. The truth has made us free. See LORD'S DAY.

SABEANS, SHEBA, SEBA. The first of these is twice used as ethnic fm. the second, and twice as ethnic fm. the third. The former of these represents three races: (1) A Hamite, s. of Cush (Gn.

10.[7]). Sheba is identd. by Jos. (Ant. II. x. 2) with Meroe, south fm. Egp. More recent discoveries place Sheba in S. Arabia, where a number of interesting and valuable inscriptions have been found by Prof. Glaser and others. The inhabitants seem early to have attained a high degree of civilisation, as they are referred to in the Assyrian marbles. It is evidently fm. that region that the queen of S. came who visited Solomon, not fm. a region that wd. have implied her passing through Egp.

She is called Balkis in the Koran and in Rabbinic legend, and marvels are related about her.

Punt, referred to in the annals of the Egyptian Queen Hatasu, must have been near if not identical with Sheba. A queen there seems to have supreme authority. (2) There is a Shemite son of Joktan and grandson of Eber (Gn. 10.[28]). There is nothing to fix the region occupied by the tribe named for him. (3) A descendant of Abraham, son of Jokshan the second son of Keturah (Gn. 25.[2, 3]); the territory of his tribe wd. prob. be between Edom and Egp. It is impossible to decide to wh. of the Shebas Joel prophesies that the children of the Tyrians and Sidonians shall be sold in punishment for their traffic in the children of Judah. The other, Seba, is also a son of Cush. In Ps. 72.[10] the two are brought together and contrasted with Tarshish and the isles. It wd. seem prob. that some place in Africa south fm. Egp. is designated. Bent wd. localise it in Mashonaland: although this view is favourably regarded by Margoliouth, we venture to doubt whether a place so far south is intended.

SABTA, SABTAH. The name occurs among those of the sons of Cush, between Havilah and Raamah (Gn. 10.[7]). This leads us naturally to seek identification with some Arabian tribe or district, possibly on the east or north-east coast of Arabia. So far no trace of it has been found.

SABTECHAH, RV. SABTECA. This name follows that of Raamah in the list of the sons of Cush (Gn. 10.[7]). It is not as yet identified with any Arabian place or district.

SACAR. (1) Father of Abiham, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch. 11.[35]), called Sharar (2 S. 23.[33]). (2) A Kohathite Levite, son of Obed-edom, one of the gate-keepers in the Tabernacle (1 Ch. 26.[4]).

SACKBUT (see Music) represents Heb. sabkā (Dn. 3.[7]). If the tr. of the Gr. VV. sambukē (Vlg. sambuca) is correct, then the tr. in the EV. is wrong, for S. is a "trumpet," while the sambuca was a "harp."

SACKCLOTH is a coarse fabric, woven of goats' hair or camels' hair, dark in colour, used still, as it has been from ancient times, to make the sacks in which grain is transported on camel-back from the village threshing-floor to market town or seaport (Gn. 42.[25], &c.). The wearing of sackcloth was a sign of mourning (37.[34], &c.), or of a desire to excite compassion (1 K. 20.[31f.]). Originally, at least, it appears to have been worn as a loin-cloth, knotted in front. The word used for "to put on" means "to gird," and "to put off" is lit. "to untie" as a knot. This custom, resorted to in the hour of distress, seems to have preserved the earliest form of Semitic costume. Whatever is associated with religious practice in the East tends to stereotype. A similar survival is seen in the waistcloth worn by the Moslem who visits the Ka'bah in Mecca. Sackcloth was worn as a mark alike of private and public distress, and also in the hope that the appeal thus made to Divine pity might avert further disaster (2 S. 3.[31]; Jr. 48.[37]; 1 Ch. 21.[16], &c.). See also Hair.

SACRIFICE (the Heb. word so rendered conveys by etymology the idea of cutting the throat: the Greek that of turning into smoke); the presentation to the Deity of gifts, usually animal or vegetable, either at certain seasons or with some special object. The practice was common to the Israelitish with other cults, and formed the chief external manifestation of the religious sentiment. In the OT. it is first mentioned in connection with Cain and Abel, and afterwards forms the subject of elaborate regulation in the Mosaic code; speculation on its meaning and purpose is to be found chiefly in the Epistle to the Hebrews within the Bible, but in the sacred literatures of other communities there is much discussion of these subjects, and they have received much attention from writers on comparative religion. The prevailing view of modern times connects the practice with the anthropomorphic conception of God current at certain stages of religion, while accounting for it by a variety of motives. One such is the same as gives rise to sympathetic magic: the desire to exhibit to the Deity the object which the worshipper requires. In such a case the object sacrificed may be supposed to have the value of a specimen, and it is placed or disposed of in such a way that the Deity will see it. Another theory is that the Deity shares in human wants, and should therefore be fed, as well as housed and clothed, like a human being. Thirdly, sacrifice has at times propitiatory or atoning value, and represents gifts or concessions whereby the favour of the Deity may be obtained. Fourthly, it has been shown that in some cases the sacrifice is a process whereby the victim is sublimated, without reference to the Deity to whom it is offered.

Analysis of Israelitish Sacrifices according to the above.—Of the exhibitory sacrifice we seem to have an example in the shew-bread (literally, face-bread), which consisted of loaves laid on a table and renewed every week. Another example is perhaps to be found in the offering of the first-fruits, which were to be laid on the altar, but not consumed.

The second theory, that sacrifice, or parts of it, are the Deity's food, is expressed in various parts of the OT. with great emphasis. In Nu. 28.[2] the phrase "My bread" is used by the Deity of the offerings, and in Ek. 44.[7] of the fat and blood which were unlawful for human food. Rather more frequently the thought represented is that it is the savour or odour of the sacrifice wh. is acceptable rather than the food offered. Still the prevailing theory was that conveyance was effected by fire: spontaneous combustion was a sign that a sacrifice had been accepted, and we find both Elijah and the prophets of Baal prepared to accept that criterion. The theory that the Deity required food led to two sorts of sacrifice; a regular and daily supply, and occasional banquets, in which the Deity took part whether as host or guest. In the latter case there was room for the display of lavish magnificence; and we usually hear of burnt-offerings and "peace-offerings" together, the flesh of the latter being consumed by the human guests after a share had been withdrawn for the Deity. With regard to the former the practice is likely to have varied prior to the building of the Temple, when definite arrangements could be made. So long as the custom of maintaining household gods (Teraphim) prevailed, provision of this sort must have been made for them. We hear of them in David's house (1 S. 19.[13]); but Josiah among his other reforms destroyed these.

With regard to propitiatory gifts, they were of course by no means always food or drink, but might be any object capable of gratifying desire. Incense, music, poetry, dancing, employed in Divine service, were doubtless intended to gratify certain tastes, and the case was the same with gifts of jewels, clothing, and perhaps statues and painting: this idea is most clearly expressed in the building of a palace or temple. At times tastes were gratified which were based on a barbarous interpretation of the Divine will; by the torture and execution of defeated enemies (1 S. 15.[33]), or of persons belonging to a doomed race (2 S. 21.[9]), or the wholesale destruction of enemies' property (Jo. 6.[21], &c.). To this last category we must refer the practice, at one time common in Israel, of sacrificing the first-born. There can be little doubt that this terrible custom was not due to the desire to give God the best, but to the widespread belief in the jealousy of the Deity, which could thus be appeased. In the Pentateuch, which contains precepts belonging to different periods, we find it expressly commanded in Ex. 22.[29], but in other places, while the principle is assumed, it is enacted that an animal shall be substituted therefor (Ex. 34.[20]; Nu. 18.[15]); while yet another theory is that the Levites, devoted to God in another sense, are the substitute (Nu. 3.[12], &c.). Gn. 22. furnishes a definite example of the substitution of an animal for the child.

The history of the Israelitish states is far too imperfectly recorded to enable us to possess any accurate knowledge of the practice prior to the Exile, which undoubtedly varied greatly at different times and places, and with the theological opinions of different kings. The "building of a house for the Lord" which was accomplished by Solomon was a step of tremendous importance for the evolution of the doctrine of sacrifice, because, while the preaching of the prophets led to the eventual triumph of monotheism, the maintenance of this sanctuary through many generations led to the accumulation of a sacerdotal tradition, furnishing the answer to the numerous questions that constantly cropped up. The prophets, at any rate at some periods, appear to have condemned the process of sacrifice absolutely, as involving an unworthy idea of the Deity; and Jeremiah in a well-known passage (7.[22]) denies that the Law contained any sacrificial precepts whatever. The custom was indeed too deeply rooted to permit of abolition; for the theory, however, that the Divine tastes were to be materially gratified there was substituted a mystical theory that sacrifice was a means ordained for the atonement of sin, or the purification of the unclean. Its value, therefore, lay not in itself, but in the scrupulous observation of the rules for its presentation. Unless performed at the right time and place, by authorised persons and in the right manner, it was ineffectual, indeed likely to incur Divine displeasure instead of propitiating.

Systematisation of sacrifice became therefore a matter of vast importance: the earliest example which we possess of such an attempt appears to be found in the final vision of Ezekiel, than whom the final collection of precepts which is contained in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers must be later, but probably embodies earlier materials. Prior to the publication of this code there was doubtless great variety; and it is unsafe to draw inferences with regard to general practice from the occasional records of sacrifice. Thus it has rightly been inferred from 1 S. 2.[14] that at Shiloh the sacrificial meat was boiled; but it has been shown that to infer thence that sacrificial meat was ordinarily boiled would lead to ridiculous results. Similarly the meaning of the narrative in Gn. 4. (the sacrifices of Cain and Abel) is evidently that in that primeval experiment it was demonstrated that animal sacrifices were acceptable, but not vegetable; nevertheless we find that vegetable sacrifices of several sorts were afterwards ordained.

The animals offered in sacrifice appear, so far as our sources supply information, to have been the same as were lawful for human food, except that we hear only of domestic animals used for the former purpose. The sacrifice of kine, recorded in 1 S. 6.[14], would seem to be at variance with the later practice, which regularly required males for sacrifice in the case of this beast. Water appears to have been employed in some sacrifices (1 K. 18.[33]), but of this the code contains no mention. A distinction which goes back to early times is that between sacrifices in which the whole animal was burned ('ôlâh), and those in which certain parts were burned, but the rest consumed by the worshippers (shelem, plur. shelâmîm). A further difference lay in the nature of the parts burned, according as they were such as must necessarily be consumed for the Deity, or of a sort in which human beings might also participate. This sacrificial terminology appears to have been common to several Semitic races, as the famous inscription of Marseilles, giving the tariff at a Punic temple, agrees in some technicalities with the language of the OT.

The parts wh. constituted the food or "bread" of the Deity were in ordinary cases the fat and the blood (Ek. 44.[7]). The latter of these had certain mystic associations, as the "life" of the animal; of the former none such are recorded in the OT., though they can be found in the folk-lore of other races. Conveyance, in the case of the blood, was effected by spilling on the soil: in the Solomonic and later temples there were elaborate arrangements for carrying it away by drains. It has been argued from Dt. 12.[15] that the slaughter of animals prior to the centralisation of the worship was regarded in all cases as a sacrificial act, and indeed the word employed there for "to slaughter" is the same as is elsewhere employed for to sacrifice, originally meaning "to cut the throat." That passage, however, would also imply that the slaughter of wild animals was not so regarded, whence the distinction between the two acts must go back to somewhat higher antiquity. The principle of the burnt-offering shows that the two elements mentioned were not regarded as exclusively the "food" of the Deity; and in narratives of certain improvised sacrifices, miraculously consumed, flesh and cakes feed the heavenly flame (Jg. 6.[21], 13.[20]), while the broth is poured on the ground, like blood. In certain cases the conveyance is effected through consumption by the priests: the fact of a portion having been sacrificially consumed invests the remainder with a sacred character. The sacrifices of meat had for their ordinary accompaniments, salt, flour, unbaked or else baked or fried with oil, and wine. For the incense employed there was a special prescription. Perfume was an ordinary accompaniment of an Oriental meal, and its use is due to this association: the suggestion of Maimonides that it was to conceal the odour of the burned fat appears to be erroneous.

At a later period we meet with two sorts of sacrifice termed ḥaṭ'ath and âshâm, words signifying "sin" and "guilt" respectively, and rendered "sin-offering" and "trespass-offering." Both appear to have been represented in the time of the Kings by money-payments (2 K. 12.[16]); but whether this was commutation or an earlier system than offerings in kind is uncertain. The difference between the two has been the subject of much discussion and not a few hypotheses have been put forward; in the case of both all but the fat, which was burned, went to the officiating priest, or to the priests in general, unless indeed the priest himself were involved in the sin which it was to expiate, in which case the flesh was burned, but not on the altar. The meat which belonged to a ḥaṭ'ath seems to have acquired greater sanctity than that which belonged to an âshâm, but the mode in wh. these sacrifices are described in Leviticus is only intelligible on the supposition that rules have there accumulated wh. belonged to times or places with varying usage. Thus in 5.[7] the âshâm is to consist of two pigeons, one for an 'ôlâh, and the other for a ḥaṭ'ath. In 14.[21f.], however, all three sacrifices are mentioned together, as separate offerings. The usage is much more regular with minḥâh, wh. appears to stand for an offering of meal, whether raw or cooked with oil by some process or other.

Supposing these various sorts of sacrifice to have had their appropriate occasions, there was from the first a tendency to accumulate them. Thus the 'olâh is usually mentioned in the company of either "sacrifices" generally, or of shelâmîm; and in the sacrificial rules in Leviticus it is usual to mention several together. A Nazirite who has through accident broken his vow has to bring an 'olâh, a ḥaṭ'ath, an âshâm, and shelâmîm (Nu. 6.[12-17]). This multiplication of processes is rightly explained as due to the concentration of national speculation on sacrifice after the loss of their independence, just as at a still later time, when sacrifice was no longer permitted, it became concentrated on the distinction between lawful and unlawful meats.

System of Sacrifice according to the Priestly Code.—Sacrifice may be divided into regular and occasional; and the latter sort into compulsory and voluntary.

I. Regular Sacrifices.—Every day sacrifice was to be offered morning and evening of a lamb (two years' old), accompanied by a meal-offering of a stated amount of meal and oil, and a libation of wine. This daily sacrifice constituted the fundamental solemnity of the Jewish religion. The "abolition of the tâmîd" (as it was called) was equivalent to the suppression of Judaism.

On certain holy days additional sacrifices were to be offered. On the Sabbath the tâmîd was doubled. On the first day of the month it was increased to two bullocks, a ram, and seven lambs; on the great feast-days there was yet further increase.

II. Occasional Sacrifices. (A) Compulsory.—These were to be offered by persons who had contracted certain kinds of uncleanness, or committed certain offences. Cases of the former sort were ordinary occurrences like child-bearing, or extraordinary occurrences like leprosy, which admitted of cure. Cases of the latter sort were involuntary breaches of the commandments, or such intentional breaches as admitted of restitution, with some minor offences. The amount of the sacrifice was in these cases to vary with the means of the culprit.

(B) Voluntary.—These are divided into three classes: (a) Sacrifice of thanksgiving; (b) votive offerings; (c) freewill offerings. The distinction between the three sorts is not observed with precision in the code. These seem to represent the old-fashioned sacrifices, and while the fat was consumed on the altar, the priest merely got as perquisite the breast and right shoulder, after an operation called "waving" had been performed on them. The meat belonged to the person who had furnished the sacrifice, and had to be consumed by him and his party: in the case of (a) on the same day as the sacrifice, whereas in the other two cases an extra day was allowed. The great hecatombs offered on special occasions would in the main come under this category. But at such times many animals were doubtless offered as holocausts, while the division between priests and feasters may have been more liberal to the former.

Sacrificial System according to Josephus.—In the Antiquities (III. ix., x.) Josephus describes the sacrificial system in use in his day, and, if his assertion that he was himself a priest is to be trusted, this account should be of value. He gives the double division of (1) public and (2) private holocausts and thank-offerings ('ôlôth and shelâmîm). The private holocaust might be sheep or goats, one year old only, or cattle, not necessarily yearlings. They must always be males. After slaughter, blood is sprinkled round the altar, the carcase is dismembered, the portions sprinkled with salt, and burned on wooden sticks already placed on the altar. The feet and entrails are cleansed and then burned, and the skins are kept by the priests. The same animals are used for shelâmîm, only older than yearlings, and in these cases a male and a female are sacrificed together. In this case the blood is poured on the altar; the kidneys, caul, fat, lobe of the liver, and in the case of a sheep the tail, are burned on the altar; the breast and right shoulder given to the priest; while the rest of the meat provides a banquet for two days; after which any that remains must be burned. The remaining sacrifices are for involuntary and voluntary offences respectively. The mode of sacrifice is the same as in the case of the shelâmîm, except that all that is not burned goes to the priest, who must eat it in the same day. The blood in this case is not sprinkled on the altar itself, but on the horns. For voluntary offences a ram is offered; for involuntary, ewe-lamb or she-goat (yearling). There is a further distinction between prince and plebeian: for the former in these cases sacrifice males, and bullocks instead of rams. Every sacrifice is accompanied with an offering of meal mixed with oil, in quantities varying with the size of the victim. The public daily and festal sacrifices are then described in accordance with the statements of the priestly code.

If the account given by Josephus represent his recollections of the actual practice, it is evident that the priests of his time must have had some simpler manual for their guidance than the middle books of the Pentateuch. The difficulty wh. occurs to the reader of these precepts—how, in those days of difficult and dangerous travelling, could provincials be perpetually journeying to Jerusalem whenever a child was born or a peccadillo had been committed?—is no more met by him than it is in the Pentateuch itself. The Pentateuch, however, ostensibly deals with a time when the whole nation was crowded round the Tabernacle, and was therefore less confronted with the difficulty.

The Abolition of Sacrifice.—If it be true that ere the rise of Christianity the Judaic conscience had been impressed with the belief that sacrifice could be offered only in one place, it followed that when entrance to that place was closed, sacrifice could not be offered; and such entrance was forbidden the Christians so soon as the relations between them and the Jews were strained to breaking point by the admission into the former community of persons who had not submitted to the characteristic badge of Judaism. But ere long it was forbidden to the Jews themselves, owing to the destruction of the city by the Romans, and though doubtless hopes were cherished that the Roman conquest would be no more permanent than that of the Babylonians or Greeks, the ages passed leaving those hopes unfulfilled. Whether in the event of the Jews recovering Jerusalem the sacrificial system would be restored, seems to be disputed by different authorities ; such an event seems, however, to be no nearer than ever. In Jewish worship prayer came to be regarded as a substitute for sacrifice. In the Christian community the theory gained ground that sacrifice had from the first typified the crucifixion : when that event was over, and the types all had been realised, there was no further ground for the continuance of the type. For the cessation of sacrifice preparation had long been made by the best Israelitish thinkers, who, as represented in the prophecies and psalms, declare the process to be unworthy and ineffectual ; while its claim to take away or atone for sin is resolutely denied by even such moralists as Ben-Sira (third or second century B.C.), who recommend compliance with the Biblical rules, on the ground that they form part of the tradition.

D. S. Margoliouth.

SADDUCEES (Heb. צדוקים). This was the name given to the party of the priestly aristocracy which exercised considerable influence in Jewish affairs fm. the time of the Maccabees till the fall of the state. Epiphanius tells us that they called themselves by this name, wh. is connected with the Heb. word for righteousness, and that they meant thereby to claim that they were "just and righteous." Others seek to derive it fm. the only proper name of importance connected with this same word in the OT.—Zadok, who was priest in the days of David (1 K. 1.[8]). In later days his descendants held a distinguished position in the nation, and such designations as "sons of Zadok" and "priests of the seed of Zadok" are met with, and so it has been thought that "Zadokites" and "sons of Zadok" are identl. Still another and not altogether unlikely explanation has been offered—that they were the followers of Zadok, a pupil of Antigonus of Socho, c. B.C. 200 (Pirke Aboth, I. 3), one of the transmitters of the oral law. Inspired by a deep sense of the supreme obligation of morality, he taught that "men shd. serve God without hope of reward." Zadok and a fellow-disciple Boethus, developed his teaching on schismatical lines, so that their followers came to disbelieve in future rewards and punishments, and finally to deny the continuance of the soul. It has been said that it wd. be very un-Jewish to name a sect fm. its founder, but the position is strengthened in the present case by the fact that a party of the S. were also named Boethusians, and as the S. were now the richer and governing class, the judges and the priestly aristocracy (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6), just as the former Zadokites had been, they may not have been averse to connecting themselves with the old name, though indeed they had acquired the designation fm. another and more recent source. At first their diffcs. from the Pharisees were merely political and practical. The Rm. conquest had brought greater suffering and loss on the aristocratic class than to any others in Isr., and so they became essentially the patriotic element in the nation. The Pharisees were attached to a kind of fatalism, and acted under the belief that it was Isr.'s duty to suffer in patience and to look forward with hope for a reward at the resurrection. The S. failed to get their political scheme accepted by a party with such a faith, and so the teachings of the Pharisees, used to advocate submission, became more and more distasteful. They were strongly opposed to Pharisaic fatalism, and declared the freedom of the will. "They take away fate, and say there is no such thing, and that the events of human affairs are not at its disposal ; but they suppose that all our actions are in our own power, so that we ourselves are the causes of what is good, and receive what is evil fm. our own folly" (Ant. XIII. v. 9). This led them to devote their thoughts and activities to the visible present and to be careless of the imagined future ; while their dislike of the materialism of many of the descriptions of the future state, and the unbridled excesses of Pharisaic exegesis of the psalms and prophecies, induced them to insist more and more on the significant silence of the written Law ; and finally to declare that souls died with the bodies (Ant. XVIII. i. 4), and that there was neither angel nor spirit (Ac. 23.[8]). Their denial of the second life may have begun as an objection to transmigration, in wh. the Pharisees seem to have believed ; but it soon went beyond that, and we already find protests agst. their objection to any resurrection in the Bk. of Enoch, the Psalms of Solomon, and the "Eighteen Benedictions." Reports of discussions too are found in the Tlm., e.g. "A S. once said to a Pharisee, 'Woe unto you wicked people, who maintain that the dead will rise. You see the living die, and yet you say the dead will live.' To wh. he replied, 'Woe unto you wicked people, who deny the resurrection of the dead. If those live who at one time had no existence, how much more shall the dead live, who have had an existence'" (Sanh. 91[a]).

Their relationship to the question of the existence of spiritual beings is difficult to understand, in view of their acceptance of the OT. Either we must regard them as looking upon the theophanies there recorded as mere transitory, insubstantial representations of the Deity, or that their disbelief in angel and spt. extended only to a denial of the angelic system of Judaism developed in post-exilic days ; or perhaps we may think of them as accepting the OT. occurrences as real, while they disbelieved in such events in their own times.

The S. were conservative in all matters of ritual, and believing that the oral law had sanctioned all the innovations made by the Pharisees wh. they opposed, they declared that the written law alone represented old practice, and opposed the unwritten "tradition of the elders" so dear to the hearts of their opponents. Nevertheless they in some things, including the use of phylacteries, followed the same practices as the Pharisees, and their wives consulted the Pharisaic doctors on matters of purification. Josephus tells us too that as magistrates and for the sake of getting the multitude to hear them "they addicted themselves to the notions of the Pharisees" (Ant. XVIII. i. 4). With the lapse of time, too, they betrayed a tendency to Greek learning, loving specially the writings of Homer (Yadaim, IV. 6), and became more and more worldly-minded and lukewarm in religious matters.

In the NT. as we shd. expect the High Priest and his party were S. (Ac. 4.^{1}, 5.^{17}). John the Baptist had included them in his words of condemnation as a "generation of vipers" (Mw. 3.^{7}), and to this we find an interesting parallel in the Tlm., where the family of Annas the High Priest are characterised as "Hanan's viper brood." They repeatedly attempted to entrap Christ (Mw. 16.^{1}, 22.^{23}), and He warned His disciples agst. their "leaven" (Mw. 16.^{6}). Herod Antipas accepted their teaching, but his faith in it was unstable (Mk. 6.$^{14-16}$). They combined with the Pharisees to compass the death of Christ (Mw. 27.^{1}), and when the resurrection was preached they became energetic against the disciples (Ac. 4.^{2}).

Some of the early church fathers, including Origen and Jerome, tell us that the S. rejected all Scrip. except the Pnt. In this they seem to have made the mistake of confusing the S. with the Samaritans, who were sometimes so designated by the rabbis. Josephus mentions nothing of this. It has been regarded as significant that Christ quoted only the Pnt. to them, proving the doctrine of the resurrection therefrom by inference alone (Mw. 22.$^{31-32}$; Mk. 12.$^{26f.}$; Lk. 20.^{37}), though He mt. have found stronger arguments elsewhere in the OT.: still He may have had other reasons for that. One of these doubtless was their objection to poetical expressions being used as proof texts for doctrine. We are well aware that they knew and loved the psalms and the prophets, and this can be seen in the work of the S. author of I Maccabees.

After the fall of Jrs. (A.D. 70) the S. rapidly disappear fm. hist. To men without a country and a home, their teaching grew more and more cold and heartless, and the Jew was driven to seek consolation in the hopes of a future life. The Christian teaching on the resurrection, too, did much to establish faith in a general resurrection, so that when the political influence of the S. passed away, their peculiar tenets became merely matters of academic interest.

The idea that the S. formed a religious philosophical school is due partly to Josephus, who was fond of presenting things Jewish in terms of Greek Philosophy, but more especially to the rabbinic tradition wh. looked upon the whole hist. of Isr. as made up of a variety of scholastic controversies similar to those of Talmudic days.

WM. M. CHRISTIE.

SADOC, a descendant of Zerubbabel, ancestor of Jesus (Mw. 1.^{14}).

SAFFRON (Heb. karkōm, corresponding to the Arabic kurkum, or zaʿfarān, from which comes our word "saffron"), in SS. 4.^{14}, denotes the Crocus sativus, the "saffron crocus." It has been greatly valued for perfume from ancient times. The styles and stamens are dried and preserved, and used to flavour or impart a yellow colouring to cooked food, e.g. rice. Among the Greeks as well as Orientals, saffron leaves were greatly prized. "Saffron morn" is a phrase of Homer's; the divinities were arrayed in robes of this bright colour. "Saffron water was sprinkled on the benches of theatres, the floors of banqueting halls were strewn with crocus leaves, and cushions were stuffed with the same material" (Groser, The Trees and Plants mentioned in the Bible, 219f.).

SAINTS in Scripture are simply the people of God: in OT. worshippers of J″.; in the NT. followers of Jesus Christ (I S. 2.^{9}, &c.; Ac. 9.^{13}, &c.). The term means lit. "holy ones," i.e. those who are "consecrated," sundered from the evil world by the work of redemption. It is to be observed that the word applies in NT. to the whole company of believers: there is no trace of its being regarded as a title to be won by peculiar excellence.

SALAH. See SHELAH.

SALAMIS, the seaport at the eastern end of the island of Cyprus, where Paul and Barnabas landed after sailing from Seleucia on their first missionary journey (Ac. 13.^{5}). Here "in the synagogues" they proclaimed the word of God. Jews, therefore, were numerous in the town. They had settled here centuries before (I M. 15.^{23}). It was a considerable trading centre, its excellent harbour affording safe shelter for shipping. This, and the interest of Herod the Great in the Cyprian copper mines, would attract the Jews (Ant. XVI. iv. 5). The town was situated on the river Pediæus, about three miles from the mod. Famagousta, at the eastern extremity of the plain of Salaminia. It suffered severely from an earthquake, and was restored by Constantius in the reign of Constantine. For a time thereafter it was known as Constantia. Epiphanius was bishop of Constantia from A.D. 367-403. A good road connected Salamis with PAPHOS in the west of the island.

There are few remains of importance, and the harbour has been quite silted up with sand.

SALATHIEL. See SHEALTIEL.

SALCHAH, SALCAH, RV. SALECAH, a city of Bashan subject to Og (Dt. 3.^{10}), on the eastern border of his territory (Jo. 12.^{5}, 13.^{11}). It was allotted to Manasseh (v. 30), and later occupied by Gad (I Ch. 5.^{4}). It is represented by the mod. Ṣalkhad, a city occupied by Druzes, on a lofty and commanding position at the southern end of Jebel ed-Druze. It is dominated by the castle, a great structure probably built by the Romans, and repaired by the Arabs. It stands in the mouth of an extinct volcano, some 300 ft. higher than the town. Ṣalkhad depends for water-supply entirely upon the rain stored in the cisterns. Past Ṣalkhad ran the great Roman road from the west across the desert to the Persian Gulf. The line of it can still be traced from the castle wall, away towards the eastern horizon.

SALEM (Gn. 14.[18]; Ps. 76.[2]) is probably to be identified with JERUSALEM: the available evidence establishes no more than probability. Jerusalem was known in the age of the Tel el-Amarna tablets as "Urusalim." The name of the king given in Jo. 10.[1], Adonizedek, bears a certain resemblance to that of Melchizedek. The king's vale, in which Abraham and Melchizedek met, may be the same locality as that in which Absalom raised his pillar: this was probably near Jerusalem (2 S. 18.[18]). The city is called "Salem" in Ps. 76.[2]. Little weight would attach to this poetical abbreviation if it stood alone; but taken with the other evidence here summarised it makes the identification probable.

SALIM, near by which was ÆNON, where John the Baptist was baptizing (Jn. 3.[23]), lay on the west of the Jordan (cp. 1.[28], 3.[26], 10.[40]). If Ænon were where OEJ. places it, viz., eight Roman miles south of Beisān, the district within which it must be sought is fairly definite. About six miles south of Beisān, near by the ruin of Umm-el-'Amdān, are seven fountains affording plentiful supplies of water. This might fitly be called Ænon, "place of springs," while the ancient "Salim" may survive in the shrine of Sheikh Selīm, on the north side of Tell er-Ridhghah. It might be objected that this place lay within the boundary of Samaria; but it seems likely that it was then included within the lands of Beisān. No other identification has been suggested which meets the requirements of the narrative.

SALLAI. (1) A Benjamite who with 928 of his tribesmen settled in Jrs. after the captivity (Ne. 11.[8]). (2) Head of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ne. 12.[20]), called "Sallu" in v. 7.

SALLU. (1) A Benjamite, son of Meshullam (1 Ch. 9.[7]). (2) The same as SALLAI 2 (Ne. 11.[7]).

SALMA. See SALMON.

SALMAI, RV. See SHALMAI.

SALMON, SALMA, son of Nashon, who married Rachab of Jericho, and by her became the father of Boaz (Ru. 4.[20f.]), and thus comes into the genealogy of our Lord (Mw. 1.[4f.]; Lk. 3.[32]). The connection of Salma, son of Caleb, with Bethlehem, suggests that the same person may be intended.

SALMON, MOUNT. See ZALMON.

SALMONE is the promontory at the north-east corner of Crete, the mod. Cape Sidero. The north-west wind encountered over against Cnidus led to an alteration of the course of the ship in which St. Paul was sailing to Rome. This brought it under the lee of Salmone, whence, protected by the island, it steered westward (Ac. 27.[7]).

SALOME (Gr. salōmē). (1) The wife of Zebedee and mother of the apostles James and John. Comparison of the relevant passages (Mw. 27.[56]; Mk. 15.[40]; Jn. 19.[25]) seems to show that she was the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus. She was one of the women who followed Christ, ministering to Him of their substance. She was present at the crucifixion. (2) The daughter of Herodias, not named in Mw. 14.[6], and Mk. 6.[22]. See HERODIAN FAMILY.

SALT is found plentifully in Palestine, especially at the south-west of the Dead Sea, where a great cliff of salt rock, Jebel Usdum, furnishes practically inexhaustible supplies. It is easily obtained by evaporation from the Dead Sea water. Salt marshes in different quarters also yield considerable quantities. The same word, melaḥ, in all Semitic languages, points to its use in the earliest times. The son of Sirach names salt as one of the necessities of life (Sr. 39.[26]). The use for food no doubt suggested its employment for offerings—the food of the deity worshipped (Lv. 2.[13], &c.). From its purifying and preserving qualities, the eating of salt together came to be the symbol of indestructible friendship: hence the "covenant of salt" (2 Ch. 13.[5], &c.; cp. Ez. 4.[14] RV.); see HOSPITALITY. To this day in the East, rubbing with salt is supposed to promote the health of a new-born child (Ek. 16.[4]). Christ's people act as salt in the community (Mw. 5.[13], &c.). Frequently other substances are gathered with the salt. When the sodium chloride has been washed away, the residuum may be described as salt that has "lost its savour." Salt is fatal to vegetable life. To sow the site of a city with salt is to doom it to utter extinction (Jg. 9.[45], &c.). In Greek times salt was taxed (1 M. 10.[29], &c.), and it is now a government monopoly in Palestine.

SALT SEA, THE, is also called Sea of the Arabah (Dt. 3.[17], &c.), the East Sea (Ek. 47.[18], &c.), the Dead Sea (Jerome on Ek. 47.), and by the natives to-day Baḥr Lūṭ, "Sea of Lot," this name enshrining an old tradition. It is the great lake stretching north and south between the uplands of Judah on the west and Moab on the east. It is about 47 miles long by about 9 miles broad.

Thirty-three miles from the mouth of the Jordan, on the eastern shore, a broad tongue of land (el-Lisān) juts out into the sea. To the north of this the sea is about 1280 ft. deep; to the south the average depth is not over 18 ft. The proportion of salt in the water is very great, four times greater than that in the ocean—hence the name, "the Salt Sea" (Gn. 14.[3]; Nu. 34.[12], &c.). Its high specific gravity makes it difficult if not impossible for any organic body to sink in it. No fish of any size can live in it; although at points where purer water enters small fishes may be seen, which here and there make their way some distance round the shore. The taste of the water is most disagreeable. As it dries on the body of the bather, it deposits a thin encrustation of salt, which makes a plunge in Jordan soon after not only agreeable but necessary.

There was an ancient belief that the waters of the sea covered the ground formerly occupied by Sodom and Gomorrah. Modern investigation has shown this to be impossible. The land now covered by shallow water south of el-Lisān, "the Lagoon," may indeed have been higher in ancient times; but it could only have been salt marsh like that at the south end of the lake to-day (see Siddim, Vale of). The surface of the lake is now 1292 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. Deposits, however, in the floor of the Arabah prove it to be an old sea-bottom. There is ample evidence to show that at some period in the distant past the waters rose to the level of the Mediterranean, forming a vast lake, stretching from 40 miles south of the Dead Sea almost to the roots of Hermon in the north (see Palestine, Geology). Besides the great volume of water brought down by the Jordan, the sea receives the contributions from the springs and winter torrents of the high lands of Judæa and Moab, and also from the 'Arabah. Locked in that deep hollow there is no outflow for the water: the level is therefore preserved only by evaporation. In that great valley with hot crags on either hand, rising in some cases over 4000 ft. above the lake, the evaporation is extremely rapid. Between winter and summer the level varies only to the extent of some 21 inches (Dr. Masterman, PEFQ., 1907, Oct., 302f.; 1908, April, 160f.).

Seen from the mountains in clear weather the lake is of a beautiful deep blue colour. At the springs on the shore, e.g. 'Ain Jidy, there is luxuriant growth, but elsewhere round the coast no vegetation can live.

SALT, THE VALLEY OF, is probably identical with Wādy el-Milḥ, to the east of Beersheba, in which stands the City of Salt. It was the scene of defeats of the Edomites by David (2 S. 8.[13], for Aram, "the Syrians," read Edom, 1 Ch. 18.[12]), and by Amaziah (2 K. 14.[7]; 2 Ch. 25.[11]).

SALU, father of Zimri, the Simeonite prince who was slain by Phinehas (Nu. 25.[14]).

SALUTATION, SALUTE. Among Orientals much more importance is attached to the formal courtesies of life than among us. Any neglect of customary word or gesture, as determined by the relative position of the persons meeting, may be taken as insult (cp. Lk. 7.[15]). Common greetings on the highway are marḥabā, "welcome," to wh.

the answer is marḥabatain, "two welcomes"; "peace be upon you"—response, "and on you be peace"; "may your day be happy"—response, "may your day be happy and blessed." Much importance is laid upon the response, esp. to the second of these. Failure to reply may be understood as a sign of hostility (Mw. 10.[12f.]).

The kiss figures largely in Eastern salutations. Equals in rank and near relations kiss each other on the cheek. The humbler in station will kiss his superior's hand; and the youth that of the elder. The utterly humble may kiss another's feet (Lk. 7.[38]). The writer remembers the embarrassment caused by a suppliant once suddenly kissing his feet. The slave may kiss the skirt of a master's robe. A common gesture is to bow low, let the back of the hand touch the ground, and then raise it to the heart, the lips, and the forehead.

The duty to salute first lies on the younger and the lowlier in rank. But the horseman salutes the footman. The smaller company salutes the larger. In a crowd only the more exalted and honoured are saluted (Mw. 23.[7], &c.).

Salutations are often drawn out to a preposterous length by the repetition of conventional question and answer wh. make neither party the wiser. This was the danger guarded against by the directions of Elisha (2 K. 4.[29]), and of Christ (Lk. 10.[4]).

SALVATION. See Reconciliation, Regeneration.

SAMARIA is the Gr. form of Heb. Shōmĕrōn, "outlook," the city built by Omri on the hill of Shemer, wh. under Ahab became the capital of the Northern Kdm. (1 K. 16.[24, 29]). Its history then runs parallel with that of Jrs. till the Asyr. captivity (see Israel). Under the influence of Jezebel, Ahab here established the worship of Phœnician Baal, and erected for him a great temple (1 K. 16.[32]). See Jehu.

The position was one of great natural strength. The hill rises in the midst of a wide and fertile vale, the "valley of barley," by wh. it is almost entirely cut off from the surrounding hills, a low saddle to the NE. alone connecting them. Vines and olives grow luxuriantly on the encircling slopes; and the "fat valley" (Is. 28.[4], &c.) yields abundant crops of grain. The view over the lower hills to the W. includes the plain of Sharon and the Great Sea. Under the conditions of ancient warfare it might easily be made impregnable. The narratives of 1 K. 20. and 2 K. 6.[24ff.] show that the besiegers' only hope was to reduce the city by famine. In this way it fell to the Assyrians after a resistance of three years (2 K. 17.[5]). The fall of Samaria completed the conquest of the kdm., to wh., as the capital, it had given its name. Its inhabitants were included in the general deportation; but the city was not entirely destroyed (Jr. 41.[5]), and the Asyr. inscrs. tell of an unsuccessful rising two years later. Thus were fulfilled the prophetic denunciations of wrath against the idolatry and wickedness wh. prevailed in S. (Is. 8.^{4}, 10.^{9}; Ho. 7.^{1}, 13.^{16}; Am. 3.^{12}, 8.^{14}, &c.). Alexander the Gt., in B.C. 331, sent the bulk of its inhabitants to Shechem, replacing them with Macedonians. Ptolemy Lagi and Demetrius Poliorcetes both damaged the city, wh. was taken and destroyed in B.C. 107 by John Hyrcanus, agst. whom it held out for a year (Ant. XIII. x. 2f.). Pompey rebuilt Samaria, making it a free city (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; BJ. I. vii. 7); Gabinius also restored and strengthened it (Ant. XIV. v. 3; BJ. I. viii. 4). Herod, to whom it was given by Augustus, greatly enlarged, beautified, and strengthened the city, calling it Sebaste, or Sebasteia (lit. Augusta), in honour of his patron. Here some of the darker tragedies of his life were enacted (see HERODIAN FAMILY). S. was the scene of Philip's preaching (Ac. 8.^{5}). Of its subsequent hist. little is known; and nothing of the catastrophe of its final overthrow.

S. is represented by the mod. Sebasṭiyeh, a poor vill. on the E. end of the hill, about five miles NW. of Nāblus. Remains of a colonnade and scattered traces of ancient buildings probably date from Herod's time. A crusader's church, now a Moslem mosque, is called by the name of John the Baptist, whose body is said to have been buried here. Jerome says that the prophets Elisha and Obadiah were also buried at Samaria.

Subject in succession to the masters of the great Northern empire, Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians, the country of S. passed to Alexander the Great after the battle of Issus. Subsequently it changed hands between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, falling to the Romans under Pompey. Augustus gave it to Herod (Ant. XV. vii. 3), but on the banishment of his son Archelaus it was added to the province of Syria (Ant. XVII. xiii. 5; BJ. II. viii. 1). The name Samaria, in our Lord's time, applied to the central division of W. Pal., lying between Judæa on the S. and Galilee on the N. (Jn. 4.^{4}). See PALESTINE.

HILL OF SAMARIA FROM THE SOUTH

SAMARITANS are first named in 2 K. 17.^{29}, where apparently the Israelitish inhabitants are intended. Probably only the higher ranks and more influential of the people, including the priests, were carried away, and strangers fm. Bab., &c., brought in their places (2 K. 17.^{24}); and altho' these were reinforced by later contingents (Ez. 4.$^{2, 9f.}$), the Israelites seem to have been in the majority. Their religion prevailed over that of the conquerors (2 K. 17.$^{27ff.}$), and the whole land was affected by Josiah's reforming zeal (23.$^{15ff.}$; cp. Jr. 41.^{5}). The blunt refusal of their proffered help in rebuilding the Temple (Ez. 4.$^{1ff.}$) occasioned a bitterness of feeling between the Jews and Samaritans, wh. deepened with time, and was fruitful of many evils. The hostility of the Samaritans (Ez. 4.$^{4ff.}$; Ne. 4.$^{7ff.}$, &c.) provided a ready asylum for Jews who found the administration of the law in Jrs. too strict for them. One of these, Manasseh, br. of the High Priest, was son-in-law to Sanballat, the Persian governor of S. The latter secured the permission of Alexander the Gt. to build a temple on Mt. Gerizim, of wh. Manasseh became High Priest. He was supported by many renegade priests and Levites (Jos. Ant. XI. vii. 2: viii. 1ff.).* While claiming to be "the children of Israel," possessing the only true copy of the law (see SAMARITAN PNT.), they were ready on occasion, for their own advantage, to deny relationship with the Jews, and to profane their temple by dedicating it to a heathen deity (Ant.

* There is some doubt as to the dates of Josephus. The temple was poss. built in the time of Nehemiah.

XII. v. 5). The temple was probably destroyed by John Hyrcanus (Ant. XIII. ix. 1). The Samaritans often ill-treated Jews who passed through Samaria to the feasts at Jrs. (Ant. XX. vi. 1f.), and it became customary to avoid Samaria by going down the E. of Jordan. The Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans. "Thou hast a Samaritan and hast a devil" (Jn. 8.48) was language of deepest contumely.

In a rising during the Jewish war Cerealis put to death 11,600 Samaritans. For some centuries they seem to have been fairly numerous, and widely scattered. In A.D. 529 they were heavily punished by Justinian for indulging their hatred against Christians. Since that time the community has gradually shrunk, until now it numbers only some 200 souls, who live together round their single synagogue at the foot of Mt. Gerizim, in the city of Nāblus.

The Passover, as now observed by the Jews, can hardly be described as more than a "memorial" of the original feast. To this day, on Mount Gerizim, the Samaritans claim, the Passover is celebrated according to the ancient ritual. Two days before the first full moon in the Greek Nisan, the community move to the mountain, where, hard by the "place of sacrifice," tents are pitched for them. The occasion attracts a great company of onlookers, Moslem and Christian, while tourists from far and near gather to witness the spectacle. At sunset on the following day the Passover lambs are slain. They are roasted whole in a pit which has been heated for the purpose, by burning in it great quantities of brushwood. When they are sufficiently cooked they are taken out, and eaten by the worshippers, who take hold of the flesh with their fingers, being shod and girt as if ready for a journey. An account of this unique ceremonial is found in Mills' Nāblus and the Mod. Samaritans, 248ff. A more recent account, which is also much fuller, is given by Dr. J. E. H. Thomson in PEFQ., 1902, pp. 82ff.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH. It was known to the Christian Fathers and to the Talmudists that the Samaritans had a recension of the law, wh. to some extent differed fm. that used by the Jews, but after the eighth cent. A.D. it fell totally out of knowledge. In 1616 the Italian traveller, Pietro della Valle, sent to Europe a Samaritan codex wh. he had purchased in Damascus fm. the Samaritan community then existing there. A great controversy at once arose as to its relation to the Massoretic. Morinus, its first editor, a Roman Catholic, saw a way of impugning the Protestant dogma of the sufficiency of Scripture, and asserting the need of an infallible Church to decide what was Scripture, by maintaining that the Samaritan Pnt. contained the primitive form of the text. He was opposed, among others, by Buxtorf, who went so far as to assert that Moses wrote the law in square character. The arguments were a priori, and tended to no conclusion. Nearly two centuries after della Valle's purchase, in 1815, Gesenius gave for his doctorate a thesis entitled de Pentateuchi Samaritane Indole Origine ac Auctoritate; in it the subject was removed out of the sphere of theology into that of scholarship. While exceedingly able and painstaking in his treatise, Gesenius too obviously assumes the priority of the MT., and the dependence of S.P. on it. In considering the S.P. we shall follow so far the line of Gesenius' thesis.

The Character of the Samaritan Pnt.—The first thing that strikes one who opens a Sam. codex is the difference of the character in wh. it is written fm. ordinary Heb. When it is compared with the angular in wh. the Siloam inscr. was written, and with the ordinary square character, it is found to be intermediate between them. This is admitted by the Jews; in the Talmudic Treatise, Sanhedrin, 21b, it is said: "Originally the law was given to Isr. in the Heb. character and the holy tongue; it was given to them in the days of EZRA in the Assyrian character and the Aramaic tongue. Isr. chose for herself the Assyrian character and the holy tongue, and left the Heb. character and the Aramaic tongue to had-diotēth." This last is explained as meaning the "Cutheans," i.e. Samaritans; it is, however, unfair to say that the language of the S.P. is Aramaic. While on the whole the S.P. may be regarded as identical with the MT., there are subordinate differences, wh., however, are of value in investigating the history of the recension. In S.P. there is a greater tendency in orthography to use the matres lectionis as they are called; consonants that are used for vowels. Also there is preference for the ordinary grammatical forms instead of the abnormalities; thus S.P. has the fem. third personal pron., and does not use hu' for both masc. and fem.; so too with na'ar, "a youth," it uses the fem. na'arah for a "young woman." The Samaritans seem to have had a different usage in regard to the cohortative. A very marked feature of S.P. as compared with MT. is pleonasm: thus in the account of the plagues of Egp. in MT. the commands of J". to Moses are given fully, telling what he is to say and do; when it is narrated that Moses did go to Pharaoh these particulars are not repeated; but in S.P. they are. This does not prove S.P. the derivative, as any one who has heard an Eastern story-teller can testify. In a few cases theological views have occasioned changes; thus "Gerizim" is read instead of "Ebal" in Dt. 27.[4].

The Relation of S.P. to the LXX.—That in some points the LXX agrees with S.P. agst. the MT. is undeniable: in Gn. 2.[2] LXX and S.P. agree agst. MT. in having "sixth day" instead of "seventh"; both insert in 4.[8] what CAIN "spake to ABEL his brother," viz., "Let us go into the field." There are also some other cases of the same agreement; Castelli has reckoned them as over a thousand. So important do they seem to some scholars that they have maintained the LXX to have been trd. fm. the S.P. Yet one has only to examine the critical passages, those in wh. the doctrinal peculiarities of S.P. appear, to find that in no one of these does the LXX agree with it. In regard to the genealogy of the antediluvians, and in regard to that of the descendants of Shem, the three recensions are manifestly perfectly independent of each other. Several of the alleged proofs of the dependence of the LXX on the S.P. really render it probable that the LXX was trd. fm. MSS. written in the Samaritan script. The fact that there was an independent tr. of the law into Gr. called the Samaritikon, a thing proved by quotations in the Fathers, shows this hypothesis to be mistaken without further argument.

The Origin of S.P.—Historically we have no distinct statement, and a priori arguments are of little value in such questions. There seem to be two points at wh. the introduction of the S.P. cd. have taken place. Either the priest sent by Esarhaddon to teach the colonists "the manner of the God of the land" brought it with him; or when the son-in-law of Sanballat—called by Jos. Manasseh—became High Priest of the temple on Mt. Gerizim, he may have introduced it.

It is almost certain that Jos. post-dates this event by a century. The improbability is great that two successive chiefs of the Samaritans shd. bear the unusual name of SANBALLAT, and that each shd. have a daughter married to a son of the Jewish High Priest; the latter becomes all the more improbable when NEHEMIAH'S reformation is remembered, wh. involved the putting away of foreign wives and the abjuring of all such relationships. Then there is the tendency wh. great names, like Alexander's, have to attract events. So we may dismiss the idea that S.P. originated in the days of Alexander the Great.

SAMARITAN CAMP ON MOUNT GERIZIM AT THE TIME OF THE PASSOVER

If the Nāblus roll were the only copy of the law saved when the Temple on Mt. Gerizim was burnt by John Hyrcanus, the peculiar sanctity ascribed to it may be understood. It certainly is written in Samaritan script; the question arises, What was the script of MS. fm. which it was copied? Of the differences due to mistakes of sight, the resemblances of letters wh. have caused them are to be found not in the square script, but the angular wh. preceded it. The angular script has itself a history wh. we can to some extent trace, fm. that on the stele of MESHA, the contemporary of AHAB, to that on the sarcophagus of Esmunazar, the contemporary of NEHEMIAH. Some of the resemblances seem to imply the period of the Siloam inscription, wh. wd. suit the earlier of the dates. By the Maccabean period the Samaritan script, as proved by coins, is in full vogue. As epigraphy usually affects the archaic, this probably implies use for a couple of centuries previously.

Authority: i.e. value for criticism of the MT. Despite the conclusion reached by Gesenius, that only in four cases was the reading of S.P. to be preferred, we venture to give it a much higher importance. At latest it represents a text earlier than that behind the LXX, wh. again is older than MT. by seven centuries. Each case of variation must be decided by itself. Where the LXX supports S.P., other things being equal, the weight is predominant.

gomery, The Samaritans. There is a Targum—a version in Samaritan Aramaic.

SAMGAR-NEBO (Jr. 39.^{3}), apparently the name of a Babylonian official, but the text is evidently corrupt; it is difficult to amend it, but the probability is that instead of the first Nergal-Sharezer we shd. read Nebuzar-adan, and regard Samgar as the blundering reproduction of his title as captain of the guard. Nebo again is the first part of Nebushashban, Sarsechim being the rest, as we find in v. 13.

SAMLAH, one of the kings of Edom. Apparently his royal city was Masrekah (Gn. 36.$^{36f.}$; 1 Ch. 1.$^{47f.}$).

SAMOS, an island 28 miles long by 5 to 12 miles broad, lying about a mile off the coast of Ionia, nearly equidistant from Ephesus and Miletus. In the strait between Samos and the shore was fought the battle of Mycale (B.C. 479). There were numerous Jews in the island, who enjoyed many privileges (1 M. 15.^{23}). In B.C. 84 it was joined to the province of Asia. It was visited by St. Paul on his return from his third missionary journey (Ac. 20.^{15}). Wine, olive oil, tobacco, oranges, raisins, silk and leather, are among the exports of the island.

SAMOTHRACIA, RV. SAMOTHRACE, a small island off the southern coast of Thrace, over 30 miles from the mouth of the river Hebrus. The town lay on the north side of the island. The lofty peak in which its mountains culminate is a conspicuous object at sea (Ac. 16.^{11}). Although probably a dependency of the province of Macedonia in the time of St. Paul, according to Pliny it enjoyed the privileges of a free state. In Samothrace Perseus took refuge after he had suffered defeat by the Romans at Pydna. In ancient times it was associated with the mysterious worship of the Cabeiri.

SAMSON, son of Manoah, a Danite, whose home was in Mahaneh-dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol (Jg. 13.). Like others who played a great part in history—e.g. Isaac, Samuel, John Baptist—he was given to his mother after long childlessness (vv. 2f.). He was consecrated a "Nazirite unto God from the womb." As he grew to manhood he became possessed of prodigious strength, which is attributed to the moving of the Spirit of the Lord (v. 25). Later it seems to depend upon his strict observance of the Nazirite conditions (16.$^{17ff., 22}$).

Samson loved a Philistine woman of Timnath, and despite his father's remonstrance, sought her in marriage. Going down to the betrothal, he slew a lion that roared against him. Going down afterwards to the marriage he found honey in the carcase of the lion, and this suggested his riddle for the entertainment of the wedding guests. It was not properly a riddle, as the facts essential to its solution were not known. The Philistines to whom it was set, however, succeeded in solving it, with the assistance of Samson's wife. To provide the forfeit he slew thirty men of Ashkelon and took their spoil. Enraged at his wife's duplicity, he returned to his father's house. His wife's father, thinking he had deserted her, gave her to another. On hearing this, Samson set fire to the corn of the Philistines by means of the jackals, with firebrands. To avenge their loss the Philistines burned down the house of his father-in-law, causing the death of all the household. A dreadful slaughter of the Philistines by Samson ensued, after which he retired to "the cleft of the rock of Etam." This was in Judah. The men of Judah were willing to purchase immunity from Philistine attack, by handing Samson over to them bound with cords. This he submitted to, but only to find fresh occasion to do them hurt. He burst the cords, and with the jawbone of an ass which he found, he slew a thousand of their men. When an attempt was made to entrap him in Gaza, he carried away the gate, posts, "bar and all," to the mountain east of Hebron. The story of his dalliance with Delilah and its disastrous issue is familiar.

As the narrative stands Samson appears at a time when the Philistines were in undisputed ascendency. His father has the true Israelitish contempt for the "uncircumcised Philistines" (Jg. 14.[3]), but the tribe seems to have acquiesced in the rule of their neighbours from the plain. Judah also has not the heart to defend even such a champion as Samson from the wrath of their masters. Samson, however, is not represented as leading any national or general uprising against them. He neither claims nor has ascribed to him any patriotic motives. His reasons for his exploits are personal. He is held in honour because those who suffered were the foes of the Lord and of His people. He possessed a certain grim humour, allied to a somewhat caustic wit; and the practical jokes in which he took delight suggest the pranks of an overgrown schoolboy. But these are just the things that would lend his story exhaustless interest for the peasants when the day's toil was done, and for the townsmen meeting at evening by the gate. Samson is the ideal of the popular hero, whose morals are taken little account of as long as his gallantries and deeds of prowess excite the admiration of the multitude. His passions are under no control, and he is liable to sudden access of fury when he is thwarted. The perils from which by his great strength he extricates himself, are often the result of illicit intrigues; and his doom is finally sealed by his pitiful surrender to the spell of a treacherous woman.

The Philistines were not brought under any enduring subjection by Samson; but while he lived in freedom they could enjoy no sense of security. His periodical incursions, apparently accompanied by great slaughter, were bound to excite deep resentment. The history of Samson serves as introduction to the account of the more serious and sustained warfare under Samuel and Saul, which prepared the way for the complete subjugation of the Philistines by David.

To be caught in the toils of an evil woman; to be deprived of hair, strength, eyes, and freedom; to be set in a dungeon to the Philistine equivalent of the treadmill, was a wretched end to a career which had opened with such brilliant promise. The manner of his death (see an interesting discussion by Mr. Macalister in Bible Side-lights, 127ff.) invests it with a certain grandeur, although here again his motive was personal. He humorously gives us to understand that the destruction of all the Philistines will serve to avenge him for only one of his two eyes! (Jg. 16.[28], RVm.).

It was perhaps inevitable that a parallel should be drawn between the labours of Hercules and those of Samson, suggesting a common source for the two histories, e.g. the exploit with the Nemean lion, and the incident recorded in Jg. 14.[5ff.]; the pillars of Hercules, with those of Jg. 16.[3]; while both owed their destruction to women.

Samson's name, "Sunny," or "the sun man," has suggested to others that his story may be only a Hebrew variant of the sun myth.

The history of Samson, however, presents a character too individual and self-consistent, and a series of incidents too thoroughly in harmony with what is known of the life and conditions of those times, to permit serious question of its authenticity.

To the phrase "he judged Israel" (Jg. 15.[20], 16.[31]), perhaps a pretty free interpretation may be given. One feels with Beer (Guthe's KB. s.v.) that for this son of the mountains, mighty but undisciplined, the mantle of the judge might have been something like a strait-jacket.

SAMUEL (Heb. shĕmû'ēl, poss. = "name of God"). Altho' he is mentioned in other parts of Scripture, practically our only source of information regarding S. is the first book that bears his name. S. was sent to Hannah, the favourite but childless wife of Elkanah, whose life had been made bitter by the taunts of her rival Peninnah. He was consecrated to God under the conditions of the NAZIRITE, and as soon as possible he was brought to minister in the temple at Shiloh. Here God made known through him the doom about to befall the house of ELI. He grew in influence as in years, and he became known throughout the land as a prophet of the Lord. After the capture of the ark by the Philistines and its return to the house of Abinadab, S. takes the lead in Isr. as "judge"; he being the last to hold that office (Ac. 13.[20]). Moved by him to repent of their sin and put away idolatry, the people gathered at his call to Mizpeh, for a season of penitence and prayer. Their Phil. masters thought this meant rebellion, and marched against them. S. interceded for Isr. (cp. Jr. 15.[1]), and, with Divine help, the Phil. were utterly overthrown, so that during Samuel's supremacy "they came no more within the border of Israel." The stone, EBEN-EZER, commemorated this victory. A period of peace and prosperity followed, S. having his headquarters at RAMAH, and making an annual circuit for the administration of justice, &c.

As years were multiplied upon him his sons succeeded to his authority but behaved ill. This led to a popular demand for a king. Much against his will, but in obedience to the will of God, S. first declared "the manner of the king" (8.[11]), and then assented to the demand. By Divine direction SAUL was made known to Samuel. In view of what has been said of Samuel, one wonders why Saul knew nothing about him (9.). Many scholars hold that this and the following chap. are part of an older account combined by the editor of the book with a later account wh. we have followed up to this point. Clearly, however, the compiler intended to indicate that after assent to the demand had been intimated, the people were given a period for reflection, during wh. the king to be was shown to Samuel. Then a public assembly was called, at wh. the choice of Saul was divinely ratified by the lot. After Saul's first successful campaign the people met to "renew the kingdom" at Gilgal (11.). Samuel, having vindicated the fidelity and justice of his administration, and having assured king and people that obedience to God wd. bring prosperity, and disobedience destruction, resigned the reins of government into the hands of Saul (12.). Still, such was his influence that in a true sense he might be said to have "judged Isr. all the days of his life" (7.[15]).

The cause of Samuel's first breach with Saul is somewhat obscure (13.[8-14]). Apparently it concerned Saul's offering of sacrifice. The second was more serious—Saul's failure in obedience to God's express directions to smite Amalek "and utterly destroy all that they have." Samuel appears here stern and unrelenting, with his own hands hewing Agag in pieces before the Lord. It would not be surprising if certain very human emotions, quite as much as zeal for the honour of the Lord, urged the old prophet in his relations with the man who had superseded him in the rule of Isr. And yet his sorrow over the king's fall seems to have been very real (15.).

His mourning was interrupted by the command to anoint Saul's successor, whom, according to Divine direction, he found in the shepherd lad David in Bethlehem (16.[1ff]).

Later, when David fled from Saul to Samuel, they both took refuge in NAIOTH, perhaps the building in Ramah where Samuel presided over a "school" of the prophets and where the spirit of the pursuing Saul was subdued (19.[18ff.]).

Samuel's age at his death is not stated; but he must have been a very old man. He was buried in his own house at Ramah (25.[1]). A later tradition, to wh. no importance need be attached, made Mizpeh (Neby Samwīl) his burying-place.

We can understand the lamentations of the people over the passing of one who had been the supreme figure in Israel for as long as most of them could remember; under the influence of whose splendid personality a perilous period of transition had been safely passed. He stands easily in the front rank of leaders in those far-off days. He found Israel broken, idolatrous, dejected, under the heel of the Philistine oppressor. He left it united, in great measure purified, and free, under the sway of a popular monarch. Prophet as well as statesman, he prepared the way for that grand succession of prophetic preachers unequalled in the history of religion. With entire fitness he is chosen as a shining example of faith (He. 11.[32]).

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. These two books, as we now have them in our Bible, form really one whole, and were reckoned as one in the Jewish enumeration of the "four-and-twenty" books of the canon of the OT. The separation into two, however, must have been made at an early time, for it is found in the LXX version some two centuries before the Christian era. That version, indeed, went further, for it classed the books of Samuel with the succeeding books of Kings, and gave to the series the names of first, second, third, and fourth books of the kingdoms; and this was followed and slightly modified by the Vulgate, which called them books of the Kings. The name of Samuel attached to the books cannot be taken as intended to denote authorship, as the history is continued to a time considerably after his death; but it is not inappropriate, seeing that he is a prominent figure in the earlier part of the nar., and his influence extended to the time at wh. it closes. The time covered by the two books is about a century, and embraces the careers of the three outstanding personages—Samuel, Saul, and David; for it opens just before the birth of Samuel, and closes soon before the death of David. In the series of historical books of wh. it forms a part, it is the natural sequence to the book of Judges, and the necessary introduction to the books of Kings. At the opening of the narrative we see Eli the aged priest in charge of the Tabernacle and the sacred Ark at Shiloh, and the people coming up from time to time, no doubt at the stated periodic feasts, to worship. Among them comes Hannah, the childless wife of Elkanah, who prays earnestly for a son, and vows to dedicate him to the service of the Lord. In due time Samuel is born, and while still a child is brought by his mother and consigned to Eli's care. In a vision of the night there is revealed to him the impending doom of Eli's house, wh. takes place in the disastrous defeat at Aphek, in wh. Hophni and Phinehas are killed and the Ark of God is taken by the Philistines.

The shock causes the death of Eli, and Samuel takes his place as administrative head of the people, round whom the nation takes heart to rally in its death-struggle with the Phil., and gains the signal victory of Ebenezer. Samuel is then seen going from place to place judging the people, and becomes known as the seer or prophet, to whom the people resort in cases of difficulty, "for all that he saith cometh surely to pass." But the national situation changed as Samuel grew old; his sons, whom he had appointed judges, did not walk in their father's steps; the hereditary priesthood had got disorganised since the time of the ill-fated Eli; and a strong hand was needed to cope with the hostile Phil., and give better organisation to the people. The time anticipated in Dt. 17.14ff. had come when the monarchy was to be set up; and, though Samuel had misgivings that this might lead the people to forget their Heavenly King, he yielded to the impulse of the time, and Saul the son of Kish was appointed. Samuel continued, however, to act as more than mere adviser, fearlessly denouncing the king when he gave signs of arbitrary action, and at last, by Divine command, secretly anointing David as successor on the throne. The history goes on to tell of David's introduction to the court, his signal victory over Goliath, his growing popularity with the people, and the fits of gloomy melancholy and jealousy into which Saul fell, culminating in open hostility, from wh. David has to flee and lead the life of an outlaw. His precarious experience, as he gathered around him a devoted band and eluded the attempts of Saul to seize him in the south country of Judah, is related at length. By the death of Saul and his sons in the battle with the Phil. at Mount Gilboa, with wh. the first book ends, the way is open for David to ascend the throne, and the second book is entirely devoted to his reign. As king of Judah only he reigns in Hebron for 7½ years, during wh. time a son of Saul, Ishbosheth, is recognised by the other tribes, till, by the treacherous murder of his prime-minister and the cruel death of the prince himself, the dynasty of Saul becomes extinct. Then follows the account of the 33 years of David's reign over all Israel. He takes Jerusalem from the Jebusites and makes it his capital, brings up the Ark of the Covenant, and makes preparation for the erection by his successor of a House worthy of the worship of the national God. David was a man of war, subduing and reducing to vassalage the neighbouring small states, and extending the boundaries of the empire as far as to the Euphrates. The lists, also, of the officers of his household, and the description of his state magnificence, show to what a pitch the monarchy had been brought in his reign. But the historian is no court flatterer; for, on the back of the description of David's prosperity, there follow a number of chapters of a more personal and domestic char., showing how his own sin, and the evil in his own house, were undermining this grandeur, alienating a section of his people, and raising animosities wh. prepared the way for the disruption of the kdm. wh. took place after the reign of his successor. As in some other books of the OT., there are a few chapters at the end containing supplementary matters wh. have not been woven into the continuous narrative.

Who was the author or editor of these books it is impossible to say. The materials out of wh. they are composed, from whatever source they were derived, have been evidently put together by one who had in his mind the whole period covered by the book, and who lived after the last of the events recorded. How long after them it is hard to say. There is no mention of the Babylonian captivity, as there is in the book of Kings; nor is there any indication of the downfall of the northern kdm., although 1 S. 27.6 has an allusion to the schism of the kdm. As the writer does not, like the author of Kings, refer to written authorities, except to the poetical collection called the book of Jashar (2 S. 1.18), we can only conjecture the sources, written or oral, from wh. he drew. The more public events recorded were of such interest in themselves, and so important as national episodes, that they must have been the subject of popular discourse from the first; and there are some prominent actors in the scenes described who are, in the later books of Chronicles, referred to as writing authors (1 Ch. 29.29, RV.). David had, like succeeding kings, a "recorder" and a "scribe" among his court officials, and documents from their records may have been available, such as the lists of heroes and officers (2 S. 21.15ff., 23.8ff.). And then the narratives of a more personal kind are so graphic and circumstantial in their details that we may well believe them to have come from eye-witnesses and actors, and to have taken literary shape very soon after the events, even if we should conclude that they were arranged and put together by a considerably later editor. If, as is natural to suppose, these accounts were of the nature of popular recitals, we can understand how discrepancies in details might be found in two parallel accounts of the same events. Here as elsewhere in the OT. the manifest candour and impartiality of the writers are a strong guarantee for the trustworthiness of the history. At the same time, there are so many links of connection with what we know of the antecedent history, and so many germinal features that come to fuller manifestation in the future, that we may regard the books of Samuel as containing an authentic and indispensable portion of the sacred history of the Hebrews. We may say of them generally that they mark the transition from the unsettled period of the Judges to the more settled condition of the monarchy. We see here coming to bloom what lies in germ in the prophetic outlook of the great legislator in the book of Deut. The time had come vaguely indicated in Dt. 17.14, when the people would say, "I will set a king over me like as all the nations that are round about me"; and Samuel himself is, in many respects, a prophet from the midst of the people like unto Moses (Dt. 18.15) speaking directly in God's name, even when there was a king constituted as civil governor. The marks of the period are the monarchy under which Israel was to fulfil its destiny as a nation, and prophecy the distinguishing feature of the religion which was to have a world-wide influence. We are not informed as to the origin of those "schools of the prophets," as they have been called, which came into prominence in Samuel's time; for the Hebrew writers make prophecy much older. But in these institutions we see for the first time a movement which assumed large proportions in the days of Elijah and Elisha, and was followed or accompanied by that "goodly fellowship of the prophets" extending to the close of Israel's history, of which St. Peter makes Samuel the first (Ac. 3.[24]). If we knew more of those societies and how the men in them employed their time, we should obtain light on many difficult problems of the OT. literature. It is not without significance that the historical books from Joshua to Kings are denoted by the Jewish collectors of the canon the "earlier prophets," for they are characterised by the prophetic point of view from wh. they are written. We cannot but believe that a nation, beginning fully to have consciousness of itself, and having already a wonderful past to look back upon, would cultivate the study of its history, and keep alive the memory of the past as an incentive and hope for the future.

A very notable thing in the books of Samuel is the prominence given to music and song, not only as popular accomplishments, but as accompaniments of religion. This is seen in the religious exercises of the sons of the prophets. David's entrance to the court of Saul was due to his reputation as a musician; and he exercised his gift not only in soothing the king's melancholy, and, later on, in the elegies over Saul and Jonathan, and over Abner, but also in connection with the bringing up of the Ark to Jerusalem. There is in these books an unusual number of poetical pieces ascribed to this period; and all these indications put together give ample justification for the fame of David as the sweet singer of Israel, and for the ascription to him of the origin of that volume of sacred song which never ceased in Israel, and has become embodied in the Psalms. The establishment of the kdm. in the line of David, wh. is the event of supreme importance to the historian of these books, however "secular" it may seem in the ordinary sense of the word, is secular in the higher and fuller sense of pertaining to the ages, inasmuch as it was the direct preparation for the setting up of a kingdom that can never be moved.

SANBALLAT (Asyr. Sin-ballidh, "the moon-god has given life") is called the Horonite—"native of Beth-horon" (Ne. 2.[10], &c.). Josephus calls him a Cuthæan. He may have been son of an Asyr. fr. by a Jewish mother. Whether he held office or not, he was a man of influence among the Samaritans (Ne. 4.[1f.]), and one of the most bitter opponents of Nehemiah. A party in Jrs. favoured him (Ne. 6.[10ff.]). One of the priests who had married Sanballat's dr. was driven out by Nehemiah (13.[28]).

The account of Josephus (Ant. XI. vii. 2; viii. 2ff.) places Sanballat a century later. See Samaritans.

SANCTUARY. See Temple.

SAND. The Heb. name ḥōl, from the verb ḥūl, "to whirl," "dance," or "writhe," is no doubt due to the ease with which the light particles of silex, mica, felspar, &c., which constitute the sand, are lifted and whirled by the wind. No fitter symbol of what cannot be counted is to be found than "the sand which is upon the sea shore" (Gn. 22.[17], &c.) Along the seaboard of Palestine and Egypt it lies in enormous quantities, tending to encroach on the cultivated land wherever it is neglected. Many orchards, gardens, and dwellings of ancient days are now buried below many feet of sand. In Dt. 33.[19] "treasures of the sand" refers to glass, which the ancients "regarded as mysteriously produced out of sand." In Jb. 29.[18] we shd. probably read "phœnix" for "sand" (RVm.). Although the particles are light, the mass is compact and heavy (Jb. 6.[3]). In contact with water, however, the mass at once dissolves (Mw. 7.[26], &c.)

SANHEDRIN. In the Mishna (Sanh. I. 6) this institution is traced up to the 70 elders appointed by Moses (Nu. 11.[16, 17]); but as we hear nothing of that assembly or its work in later times it was prob. only a temporary arrangement. The oldest reference to a council like the S. is that mentioned in 2 Ch. 19.[8]. We do not find anything of the kind in older Isr., nor after the Captivity till the days of Antiochus the Great (Ant. XII. iii. 3), when we meet with an assembly of a similar nature—the Gerusia or senate of the elders, wh. we must regard as the original of the S. As the name is Gr. (συνέδριον, assembly), not appearing before the days of Hyrcanus (Ant. XIV. ix. 4), we must assign its beginning to the Greek period. Josephus, Philo, and the Mishna all mention it, but they tell us little of its constitution. The NT. gives us some light, and the Gemara is pretty full, but unfortunately it is mixed up with the arrangements of later times and the thoughts of the later rabbis on an ideal state and S., wh. are set down as if they had been realities. So far as we can judge it seems at first to have been only the municipal council of Jrs.; but as on its initiation the Jewish population of Pal. was located in the city and immediately surrounding districts only, its influence was coextensive with Palestinian Judaism. As that grew it gradually extended its influence and assumed further powers till it exercised a supervision over all Isr. and became its supreme court when Rome granted the necessary recognition. In the Mishna it is called "the San-hedrin," "the Great Sanhedrin," "the Sanhedrin of 71," and "the Great Court of Justice." At first it consisted mainly of the priestly Sadducean aristocracy, but under the later Maccabean priests and during the days of Herod the Great the Pharisees, gradually advancing in power, acquired great influence and numerous seats here also. In NT. days it was still to a great extent aristocratic, being made up of the chief priests and rulers, but at the same time including (Jn. 18.[35]; Mk. 15.[1]) the heads of the courses, elders, scribes, and lawyers. Judging fm. Paul's action (Ac. 23.[6]), we may assume that at that time the Pharisees preponderated, and we can see fm. that incident that both parties allowed their antipathies and peculiar prejudices to influence their verdicts. The members of the S. were required to be fathers, men of age and experience, learned, good-looking, bearded, understanding sorcery, sophistry, and languages, in order that evidence mt. be heard without an interpreter (Sanh. 17[a], 31[b]). O wise precaution!—a description that shd. help us to form an idea of and correct common mistakes about such men as Gamaliel, Joseph of Arimathea, Nicodemus, and Saul of Tarsus.

The president was designated Nasi, and was usually chosen on account of his worth and wisdom. The Gemara gives us a succession of presidents in the direct hereditary line fm. the gentle Hillel; but it seems that during the days of the Jewish State the office was usually occupied by the High Priest, at whose right hand sat the vice-president or Ab-beth-din. The members were said to have sat in the form of a semicircle, at the middle point of which was the president's seat, while the centre was the place assigned to such as were to be heard by the court. The first place of meeting was the hall called Gazzith, on the SE. of the temple court; but special meetings seem to have been called for special purposes at the house of the High Priest (Mw. 26.[3]). About 40 yrs. before the destruction of the Temple the meetings were removed to Chanoth, a series of rooms over the eastern gateway of the Temple.

The S. was allowed to exercise judicial and administrative power (1 M. 12.[6], 14.[20]), but the extent of that power varied fm. time to time, being dependent on the amount of the autonomy possessed by the nation. At the time of the Crucifixion it did not possess the power of life and death (Jn. 19.[31]), and the Tlm. tells us that about the same time—when it was removed fm. Gazzith—it had ceased to have authority to impose judicial fines (Ab. Zar. 8.[b]). The death of Stephen is not to be regarded as a judicial act but rather as a riotous outbreak (Ac. 7.[57]), and we must not imagine that the mission of Saul to Damascus (Ac. 9) implied that the S. possessed authority in that city. The letters were without doubt given by the High Priest, and wd. have been effective only on act. of his personal influence with Aretas and his friendship for that king wh. is so often mentioned in the Tlm.

The S. for the time being required implicit obedience fm. every Isr., and it claimed the right to examine the pretensions of any new teacher or prophet (Jn. 11.[47]; Ac. 9.[2]); but it did not claim infallibility, and the S. of one generation might alter or even overturn what a previous assembly had done.

The Jewish tradition wh. looks upon the S. as a rabbinical assembly sitting under the guidance of a president and two vice-presidents does not represent that wh. met in Jrs. Such an institution only came into existence after the destruction of the Jewish State, and when the study of the law was Isr.'s only heritage. It began at Jabneh and it migrated through various towns in Galilee till finally it settled at Tiberias, and there it became in reality what the rabbis wrongly claim for the Great Council of Jrs.—the foundation-stone of the oral law. The Nasi lived like a temporal prince, his court gave responses to all who admitted its authority, and it gradually assumed greater powers, even pronouncing capital sentences (Orig., Ep. ad. Afric., § 14). It looked forward to the restoration of the Jewish State, almost with Zionistic hopefulness, and one of its claims for itself was that a king could not be appointed but by its decision. Under its supervision "the traditions of the elders" were gathered up in the Mishna, while the Palestinian Gemara was also nearly completed before its hist. closed about the yr. A.D. 414. And but for the work it did we may safely say that mod. Judaism would have had a very different hist. In addition to the Great S. we hear also of minor Sanhedrins of 23 members in every city that contained 120 Isr. householders, as also still smaller courts of three judges for the trying of minor cases, but these cd. not be created except by the authority of the great S., and it is doubtful how far the system was ever carried out.

WM. M. CHRISTIE.

SANSANNAH, a town in the south of Judah (Jo. 15.[31]). In the parallel lists (Jo. 19.[5]; 1 Ch. 4.[31]) it is represented by "Hazar-susah," and "Hazar-susim": it is not identified.

SAPH, one of the sons of the giant slain in the battle at Gob by David's hero, Sibbechai the Hushathite (2 S. 21.[18]).

SAPHIR, RV. SHAPHIR, a town in the Philistine plain named by Micah (1.[11]). OEJ. places it "in the hill country between Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrīn) and Ascalon." Three mud villages bearing the name es-Sūāfir stand close together some 30 miles SE. of Ashdod, one of which is possibly intended by OEJ. But there is no certainty as to its identification.

SAPPHIRA. See ANANIAS.

SAPPHIRE, the second stone in the second row on the High Priest's breastplate (Ex. 28.[18]), and as such it is engraved. Although in name identical, the precious stone denoted by the Heb. sappīr was not our sapphire. From the descriptions of the "sapphire" given by Theophrastus and Pliny, there can be no doubt that lapis lazuli was the sapphire of the ancients. It is of an azure colour, speckled with iron pyrites, which, from their colour and lustre, may be easily mistaken for particles of gold. "Sapphire" forms the second foundation of the new Jerusalem (Rv. 21.[19]).

SARAH (of which name SARAI is an older form) means "princess." Sarah was half-sister, and wife of Abraham. He explains that she is daughter of his father, but not of the same mother (Gn. 20.[12]). A sister born of the same mother he would not have married. We have here a trace of the old matriarchate, the system which counted relationship through the mother (see FAMILY). Sarah was the companion of Abraham through all his wandering life, from leaving Ur of the Chaldees (Gn. 11.[29]), until her death. In her youth she seems to have been beautiful. Abraham's half truth about her to Pharaoh and Abimelech came near to costing them dear (12.[14ff.], 20.[2ff.]). The barrenness of Sarah was a sore trial to her. The scheme she adopted to remedy this (see HAGAR) brought bitter dispeace into her tent. Both Abraham and Sarah greeted with incredulous laughter God's promise that she, in her old age, should bear a son (Gn. 17.[17], 18.[12f.]). In due season the promise was fulfilled, and Sarah became the mother of Isaac (Gn. 21.[2]). The impartial record does not always present Sarah in the most favourable light. We gather that she was a devoted wife and mother, with not overmuch patience, and very jealous for her honour in her own tent. Absorbed in the interests of her own son, she could tolerate no possible rival near him. The very strength of her affection for him made her indifferent even to the claims of simple humanity where others were concerned. She died at the age of 127, and with her burial the great sanctuary of Machpelah received its earliest consecration (Gn. 23.).

SARAPH, a Judahite, descendant of Shelah (1 Ch. 4.[22]).

SARDIS appears in Scripture only in connection with the letter addressed to the church there (Rv. 1.[11], 3.[1, 4]). It was the capital of Lydia, and played no small part in ancient history. It crowned a hill about 1500 ft. high, at the northern foot of Mt. Tmolus and fully two miles south of the river Hermus. The precipitous sides of the hill made it inapproachable save on the south, where a narrow ridge joined it to the mountain. The space on the hill was limited, so as prosperity grew and the population increased, a new city sprang up under the hill; the old city now serving as the Acropolis. Josephus speaks of Jews in Sardis (Ant. XIV. x. 24). The glory of Sardis had greatly faded before the close of the first cent. A.D. But even in the days of its strength the Acropolis had been scaled by two enterprising soldiers—in B.C. 549 by a Median in the service of Cyrus, and in B.C. 218 by the Cretan Lagoras. This gives special point to the word in Rv. 3.[2f.], "Be thou watchful. . . . If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee." The decay of the city was matched by that in the morals of the Christians here. Only "a few" were found in Sardis which did not "defile their garments." The church seems to have revived, possibly in consequence of this letter, and in subsequent days the bishop of Sardis held a prominent position. The city received a new lease of life as capital of the province of Lydia, instituted about A.D. 295. Situated as it was on the great highway between east and west, it continued for long an important commercial centre. After many vicissitudes it received practically its death-blow from Tamerlane, A.D. 1402. The name still lingers in Sart, a poor village amid the ruins, a station on the Smyrna-Philadelphia railway.

SARDIUS (Heb. 'odem; Gr. sardion), the first stone in the High Priest's breastplate (Ex. 28.[17]), the sixth foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rv. 21.[20]). It is also called the sardine stone (Rv. 4.[3], AV.). The Heb. name points to the red colour of the stone, which may be identified with our carnelian. In ancient as well as in modern times it was very frequently engraved. A fine dark carnelian, el-'aqīq was obtained from Arabia.

SARDONYX (Heb. yahălōm). RVm. so renders instead of EV. "diamond," in Ex. 28.[18]. It is a precious stone forming the fifth foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rv. 21.[20]). The name denotes those varieties of onyx, or stratified chalcedony, wh. are composed of alternate layers of white, and red or brown. It has always been highly prized by cameo engravers.

SAREPTA. See ZAREPHATH.

SARGON, the most powerful of the kings of Asyr., though only once mentioned in Scripture (Is. 20.[1]). When SHALMANESER, during the siege of SAMARIA, died, Sargon took the throne, pressed the siege to a conclusion, and removed 27,200 of the inhabitants (B.C. 722). He carried on campaigns in all directions either personally or by his TARTAN. One of his most formidable opponents was MERODACH-BALADAN, who seized BABYLON; finally S. conquered and expelled him not only fm. Bab. but fm. his ancestral city of Bit-Yakin. S. had himself crowned as k. of Bab. He was murdered B.C. 705, and was succeeded by his son Sennacherib.

SARID, a town on the southern borders of the territory of Zebulun (Jo. 19.[10, 12]). The true reading here is possibly "Sadid." If this be so, then we may identify Sarid with Tell Shadūd, a site on the north of the plain of Esdraelon, five miles west of Iksāl (PEFM., ii. 70).

SATAN. The primary meaning of the Heb. word is "adversary," "accuser," hence it is used to describe the action of the "Angel of the Lord" in meeting Balaam (Nu. 22.[22]). In 1 S. 29.[4]; 2 S. 19.[22]; 1 K. 5.[4], 11.[14, 23, 25], it is used of a political or military opponent. With the later bks.—Chronicles, Job, and Zechariah—S. becomes a definite spiritual being. In 1 K. 22.[22] "the lying spirit" who engaged to put false words in the mouths of the prophets of AHAB performs somewhat the same function as that assigned to S. in later times. It is, however, in the prologue to the book of Job that the idea of S. is fully developed. On what wd. be called, in regard to an earthly royalty, a court day in heaven, among "the sons of God" appears S. An account is demanded of him of his recent proceedings. God demands of him, "Hast thou considered My servant JOB?" a question that implies that the possibility of such a character had been denied by S.; this is confirmed by the answer of S., "Doth Job serve God for naught?" his godliness is mere self-interest (Jb. 1.[6-10]). The second colloquy presents the same characteristics (2.[1-6]). A single picture is presented to us in Zechariah (Zc. 3.[1]), "Joshua the High Priest standing before the Angel of the Lord, and S. standing at his right hand to resist him." Here S. has a function similar to what he has in Job. A like view meets us in the imprecations of Ps. 109.; v. 6 is, "Let S. stand at his right hand." There is a further elucidation of the character and function of S. in 1 Ch. 21.[1]. In Zechariah he accuses, putting the worst construction on every action; in Job he not only does this but further tests the accused, as in the old Inquisition, by torture, by external sufferings. Here by internal mental suggestion he allures David to sin by numbering the people. In 2 Samuel (24.[1]) we are told "the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and He moved David against them to say, Go number Israel and Judah." These presentations can only be harmonised by presupposing some such transaction as that described by Micaiah the son of Imlah in 1 K. 22. The late date of Chronicles and Zechariah and, by many assumed, of Job also, might suggest that the definition and naming of S. was due to the influence of Zoroastrianism. But S. is not an Ahriman—is not in any sense the rival of J″. He is an official of the court of heaven, of the nature of public prosecutor. For purposes of his own, for the furtherance of his controversy with God as to man, he is eager to publish all the ill he knows of men or mankind; and this malevolent impulse is utilised by God to realise His great purposes. These purposes do not find their end in man, they involve the ANGELS. S. is for ever giving God the occasion of justifying before the angels His gracious plan in regard to mankind.

In the period between the Testaments the idea of S. is further developed, though always on OT. lines. Although in the Enoch books we have a vast hierarchy of angels and devils, and though the latter have a ruler, Semjaza (En. 6.[7]), yet he does not at all act as S. In the Book of Similitudes S. is indirectly introduced: the instruments of punishment are called "instruments of S." Further, the hosts of the fallen angels are called the "hosts of Azazel." More nearly does the Mastema of the "Book of Jubilees" coincide with S. of OT.; he comes to God after the Flood and demands as of right that men be given up to him. "Berial," of the Ascension of Isaiah, in his action with regard to Isaiah is modelled on S. in the Prologue of Job. It is to be noted that while it is doubtful whether

"Belial" in such phrases as "a man of Belial" is to be regarded as a proper name, there is no dubiety in the Ascension of Isaiah that "Berial," wh. is a variant of it, is the name of a person. Another evil spiritual being is introduced into the Ascension, "Sammael." In the Apocrypha the name S. does not occur. In Tobit Asmodeus is introduced, but he is not conceived as S.; in the Book of Wisdom, however, the fall of man is attributed to the "envy" of the devil. The doctrine of the devil attained greater definition in the teaching of our Lord and His apostles. In the NT. the name S. is frequently trd. into diabolus, "the accuser"; his function is not by any means restricted to mere accusation. In the parable of the "Tares" S. introduced evil into the world, and all evil persons are his children. Hence, before our Lord cd. enter upon His work, He had to encounter S.: "He was led up of the Spirit to be tempted of the devil" (Mw. 4.^{1}). S. was ever endeavouring to frustrate the Divine work; the seed sown in the hearts of the wayside hearers he takes away (Mk. 4.^{15}). On the return of the seventy disciples fm. successfully spreading the kdm. our Lord declares that He "beheld S. as lightning fall fm. heaven" (Lk. 10.^{18}). At that last evening when He ate the passover with His disciples before He suffered, "S. entered into Judas" to betray Him. The representations of the apostles suit this; Peter declares that it was S. who had prompted the lie of Ananias (Ac. 5.^{3}); it was S. that hindered Paul when he wd. visit the Thessalonians (1 Th. 2.^{18}). S. is made to help mysteriously in church discipline; the sinner was "delivered to S. for the destruction of the flesh"—a statement that brings out the idea that S. inflicted disease; an idea supported by our Lord's saying of the woman "whom S. hath bound, lo! these eighteen years," and Paul's regarding "the thorn in the flesh" as a "messenger (an angel) of S. to buffet" him. This view connects itself with a large number of passages wh. appear to imply that in some sort this physical world is under the dominion of S. In the temptation of our Lord S. offered Him "all the kingdoms of the world" (Mw. 4.$^{8,\ 9}$); in the parallel passage S. claims that this power was "delivered unto him" (Lk. 4.^{6}). Our Lord's answer assumes the reality of this offer and the correctness of this claim. In the Gospel of John S. is called repeatedly "the prince of this world" (12.^{31}, 14.^{30}, 16.^{11}). Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians (2.^{2}) calls S. "the prince of the power of the air." No satisfactory explanation of these passages has been reached; we know too little of the influence of spiritual beings upon matter to assume that this whole mode of representation is due to ignorance and misconception on the part of our Lord. In the Apocalypse, S., under various forms, is more prominent than elsewhere in Scrip. S. has under him angels who are his emissaries—a view implied in Mw. 9.^{34}, 12.^{24}, and Eph. 6.^{12}; in agreement with Enoch he is represented as having dwelt in heaven and fm. thence being expelled. The persecutions inflicted on the Church are due to the influence of S.; all heretical doctrines and immoral practices are looked upon as "the depths of S." Notwithstanding all, evil as S. is, we learn fm. Jude (^{9}) and Zechariah (3.^{1}), that he has a certain position and dignity wh. are to be respected. The NT. view of S. is essentially the same as that of the OT.; there is, however, greater definition given to his character, and greater power assigned him; in both S. is a powerful spiritual being who desires evil rather than good, and so endeavours to frustrate all efforts to establish a kdm. of heaven. But though he works freely, everything is so overruled that it falls rather to the furtherance of the Gospel. S. may desire to have believers "that he may sift them as wheat," but this trial works experience, hope, and every grace; his persecution of the Church but purifies it fm. its dross, burns up its chaff.

It is assumed in these days that S. does not exist; that the only S. there is, is simply the personification of our own evil passions. The reason of such a conclusion is not far to seek; to be in the presence of what we cannot understand frets us, and the universe wd. be much more easily understood if angels and devils were left out. Men of the highest spirituality, at a time when the presence of our Lord stimulated spirituality to its utmost activity, had no doubt in the matter; with them have been in agreement those souls of every age that have been most sensitive to spiritual influences. To affirm a universal negative on a priori grounds against alleged experience is hazardous. It is impossible to deny the immense probability that we are not the highest of finite spiritual beings, that there are spirits of greater power and might than we. As impossible is it to deny that freedom is an attribute of spirit, and that being free they might sin. Given these things we have the possibility of S. That spirits such as we have supposed cd. affect human spirits is perfectly conceivable. Christian consciousness is aware, so many believers can testify, of suggestions to evil wh. cut athwart the natural succession of ideas; these may be the result of the influence of S. In many directions psychology is making new beginnings; it wd. be rash to decide what discoveries may be in store.

SATRAPS (Heb. ăḥashdarpĕnīm [Ez. 8.^{36}; Est. 3.^{12}, 8.^{9}, 9.^{3}; AV. Lieutenants, RV. "satraps"]; Aram. ăḥashdarpĕnīn, only in emph. form ăḥashdarpĕniyā' [Dn. 3.$^{2,\ 3,\ 27}$, 6.$^{1,\ 2,\ 3,\ 4,\ 6,\ 7}$, AV. "princes," RV. "satraps"] = the Persian khshatrapāvan, "protectors of the empire"). These were the great officers who governed the provinces. In many instances their state and authority were hardly less than regal.

SATYR (Heb. sa'îr, "a he-goat," applied to Esau, pl. sĕ'îrîm). While generally tr. Goat, in Is. 13.[21] and 34.[14] it is rendered "satyr"; in Lv. 17.[7] and 2 Ch. 11.[15] it is trd. devils. Prob. imaginary beings like the satyrs of Greek mythology.

Satyr

SAUL. (1) Son of a Benjamite farmer named Kish, accustomed himself to attend to the animals and to follow the plough. He was a man of splendid physique, and of regal build; and his disposition, when we first meet him, commands our trust and admiration. Not less modest (1 S. 10.[21f.]) and considerate (9.[5]) than brave and chivalrous (11.[1ff.,13]), he presents a truly heroic figure. His frank and generous nature wins our affection. When his sky darkens, and the night falls on the tragedy of his life, our deepest compassions are stirred.

When the demand of the Israelites for a king had been yielded, Saul was by Divine direction pointed out to Samuel as the coming prince over the people (1 S. 9., 10.); see Samuel. His anointing clearly took Saul by surprise, and Samuel foretold a series of events, the fulfilment of wh. was designed to reassure him. The most remarkable of these was the change in himself when he met the band of prophets and "prophesied among them." This was incongruous with the popular impression of his character. "Is Saul also among the prophets?" the people asked. Perhaps the same impression found utterance in the words of the men who asked, "How shall this man save us?" This points to the fatal defect in Saul—the lack of religious depth and insight.

The Divine choice of Saul was publicly ratified by the lot (1 S. 10.[20ff.]), and he soon found occasion to prove his patriotic feeling, his soldierly qualities, and his capacity for leadership, in his expedition for the relief of Jabesh-Gilead. Saul, who had returned to the farm after his election, was now formally installed in the office of king (11.[14f.]).

When the Philistines again won ascendency over Israel we cannot say; but in their jealous fear they had reduced the people to great straits (13.[19ff.]). Saul and his son Jonathan planned a struggle for freedom. Jonathan struck the first blow (13.[3]). The Philistines advanced with a great army to Michmash, and in the terror they inspired Saul's force dwindled rapidly. Waiting at Gilgal for a tryst with Samuel, the prophet having failed to keep his appointment, Saul offered sacrifice, entreating the favour of the Lord in the coming conflict. For this Samuel, arriving late, denounced the rending of the kingdom fm. Saul. With this ringing in his ears he led his handful of men up to Geba, where Jonathan held his ground. The great force of the Philistines at Michmash had been much weakened by the sending out of predatory bands. By the heroic enterprise of Jonathan and his armour-bearer (see Michmash, Jonathan) they were discomfited, and only the fatigue of their pursuers saved the Philistines from extermination (14.[30ff.]). Is there not a trace of incipient madness in Saul's foolish curse and his dealing with Jonathan (14.[24, 37ff.])?

The next important recorded occurrence in Saul's life is the destruction of Amalek (15.). His failure to carry out in the fullest sense the instructions given him led to a final rupture with Samuel, who once more prophesied the downfall of his house. The scene is one of the most pathetic in all history. Nothing more vividly shows the kingly nature of Saul than his bearing in this crisis. There was nothing petty or merely personal, but concern for the dignity of his great office, and the responsibilities attaching to it. "He was not unnerved by Samuel's denunciation of him. The very tremendousness of the sentence strung every nerve within him. He was strong. He did not go howling through the camp of Israel like a dog at wh. some one has cast a stone, bewailing his fate, and flinging down the reins of government in order to lament over his personal rejection." He addressed himself with high seriousness to the duties required of the king; nor, despite the attacks of insanity which unhappily befell him, does he seem to have fallen far short of what the conditions of the time demanded. Information is very scanty, but he distinguished himself in war with his people's foes (14.[47ff.]), and although the Philistines gave perpetual trouble (v. 52), his reign seems to have been fairly prosperous.

Much space is occupied with an account of the relations of Saul with David. These are discussed under David. The darkest blot upon this period is Saul's slaughter of the priests at Nob, because they had succoured his supposed youthful rival (21., 22.[9ff.]). Withal the king still held the loyalty of the dwellers in the region where David sought asylum (23.[1ff.]). He must also have been powerful E. of Jordan, as there his son raised his standard after the king's death (2 S. 2.[8f.]). We may infer that his authority reached northward to Esdraelon, and that the Philistines, fearing this might give him command of the great highways of commerce that cross the plain, on wh. their wealth and prosperity depended, resolved to risk all in a pitched battle (1 S. 29.^{1}). Filled with anxiety as to the result of this struggle, and urged, it may be, by a yearning for conference with the counsellor and friend of youthful days, Saul made the strange pilgrimage to the witch of Endor (28.$^{3ff.}$). He returned with his worst fears confirmed. Notwithstanding, true to his own nature, he fought on Gilboa with conspicuous gallantry, until, seeing his three sons stricken, and the day clearly lost, he preferred death to dishonour, and fell upon his sword. The Philistines treated his body with great barbarity, furnishing the men of Jabesh-Gilead an opportunity to show that they remembered the succour he had brought them in their dire need (31.$^{8ff.}$).

At this distance it is not easy to do justice to the true greatness of Saul. The history is obviously written fm. the point of view of one who sympathised with David, and the conduct of Saul is always made to appear in the worst light. There is no denying, however, that in his earlier days he was as much distinguished by his nobility of nature and chivalry of spirit as by his heroic stature. The task to wh. he was called was both delicate and difficult. The scattered tribes of Israel had been in some measure drawn together by the influence of Samuel, finding a common centre of attraction in his magnetic personality. But the confederation, if such it cd. be called, was very loose, and liable to rupture at the touch of tribal jealousies and ambitions. It was to Saul's advantage that he belonged to the small tribe of Benjamin, and not to either of the old rivals for supremacy, Judah or Ephraim. Judah cd. hardly be jealous of her weak neighbour on the N., while Ephraim wd. not grudge the honour to a tribe of Joseph's stock. But obviously the situation was one calling for much skill in the handling. The success of Saul is sufficiently attested by the devotion to his cause shown by certain cities in Judah, even against the interest of their kinsman David; and by the loyalty to the house of Saul, after his death, displayed by the eastern as well as the northern tribes.

There is much in the history to show that Saul accepted seriously the responsibilities of his exalted office, and with disinterested zeal sought the good of his people. Even in the dark days of personal rejection he squared his shoulders to the burden, with high resolution and manful courage wh. command our admiration. Baffled by problems wh. cd. be solved only by one possessing religious depth and insight, in wh. he was deficient, perplexed by the non-acceptance of service wh. was rendered with no consciously unworthy motive, keenly alive to the claims wh. were legitimately made upon the king of Israel, and aware of the impairment of ability, due to withdrawal of Divine favour, it is easy to believe that these circumstances combined to produce that overthrow of reason wh. resulted in such disaster.

That David in speech and bearing, in ways not recorded, gave Saul grounds for the suspicion that he was aiming at the kdm., is not unlikely. The prevailing methods of Oriental despots with possible aspirants to the supreme place, explain if they do not justify Saul's attitude to David. For the rest, no doubt Saul, like his great successor, had his own share of the ferocity inherent in the Semitic nature.

The pathos of Saul's history lies in the picture it presents of a man, high in character, with many great gifts, but with certain obvious limitations, struggling with a task wh., constituted as he was, must prove beyond his power. His failure is due to no moral lapses. The grosser temptations to wh. his greater successors succumbed left him practically unscathed. The spectacle of the spirit which, however baffled, and beset with perplexities, faces duty with unflinching courage, moves respect as well as sympathy. We feel that the tragedy of Gilboa, lending it dramatic completeness, was the only fitting close of such a career.

(2) Saul of Tarsus. See Paul.

SAW. From ancient times the use of the saw was understood (1 K. 7.^{9}; Is. 10.^{15}, &c.). The two-handed saw is frequently figured on the monuments. Apparently it was employed in cutting both wood and stone. It was also used as an instrument of torture. Recent excavations in Pal. have shown that the penalty of sawing asunder was not uncommon (He. 11.^{37}). The hand-saw in the modern East is set with the teeth pointing to the handle. It is entered at the heel, and cuts on the back stroke. This is explained by the fact that the Oriental will not stand to do anything that may be done sitting. If one sits, holding the wood to be sawn between the great toes and the hand, using our saw, entering at the point and cutting on the down stroke, should the saw stick he will be thrown backward. The Oriental uses his own saw in his own way; the stress is purely muscular, so his balance is not disturbed.

Half of a Double-handed Saw (from Nimroud)

SCAB. See Diseases and Remedies.

SCAPE-GOAT (Heb. 'ăzā'zēl, RV. Azazel). The meaning of the name is uncertain. It cannot be translated "scape-goat" with AV., and it is better to transliterate with RV. To Azazel a he-goat was to be sent as over against that devoted to J″. (Lv. 16.$^{8, 10, 26}$). The name occurs nowhere else in Scripture. It is clear fm. the context that it is not a place-name. It must be the name of a being to whom the goat was despatched, laden with the nation's sins. Some have thought that the devil is intended. But altho' Jesus encountered him in the wilderness, he is never specially described as a dweller in waste places. No sure interpretation of this part of the ritual is now possible. It seems to imply a belief corresponding to that of the Arabs in Jinn, strange beings that haunt the solitudes, Azazel being conceived as their prince. He figures in the bk. of Enoch as the prime mover of the angels who married the daughters of men (Gn. 6.$^{2ff.}$) and wrought great evil in the earth, on account of wh. he was bound hand and foot, and put under certain great rocks in the desert, to await the Day of Judgment. The place, Dudael, is prob. identical with the mod. Beit Hadūdō, some nine miles E. of Jerusalem, where, fm. the edge of a limestone cliff, one looks down into a deep abyss. Over this cliff, we may suppose, the scape-goat was pushed by the man in charge. This having been signalled to Jrs., the High Priest might proceed with the remaining part of the ritual. Particulars as to the practice of the later Jews are given in the Mishnic tractate Yoma. The symbolical transfer of the nation's guilt to the animal, wh. shd. bear them away to a solitary land, is not without parallels among primitive peoples. It may have been a survival from some ancient cultus, wrought into the ritual of Israel. The same idea seems to underlie the regulation connected with the cleansing of the leper (Lv. 14.^{53}). A grim story is told somewhere of the consternation caused by the return of the scape-goat to the Temple, before the destruction of Jerusalem.

SCARLET: Heb. shānî (Gn. 38.^{28}, &c.), tōlā' (La. 4.^{5}, &c.), and combinations of these. The first suggests "doubling," as if "twice dipped"; the second means "a worm," referring to the Coccus Ilicis, an insect, the body of wh., when dried, is pounded to produce the dye. See Colour.

SCEPTRE. The use of shēbeṭ (Heb.) for the symbol of royal authority is clearly a development from its use for the "rod" of the shepherd (Lv. 27.^{32}; Ps. 23.^{4}, &c.), and for the baton of the military commander (Jg. 5.^{14}, RV.). It appears also as an instrument of punishment (Pr. 26.^{3}, &c.), and as a weapon of offence (Ps. 2.^{9}, &c.) Wherever it appears connected with a king, it may be taken as the emblem of regal power (Ps. 45.^{6}; Am. 1.$^{5, 8}$, &c.). Sharbīṭ (Est. 4.^{11}, &c.) is only an Aramised form of shēbeṭ. Mĕḥōqēq (Gn. 49.^{10}; Nu. 21.^{18}, &c.) is the "commander's staff." In Gn. 49.^{10} both shēbeṭ and mĕḥōqēq are named, prob. with a similar significance; the former being the short ornamental sceptre developed fm. the "marshal's baton," the latter the longer form derived fm. the staff.

Sceptre of a Queen (Egyptian)

Saul is said to have sat under the tamarisk in Ramah "with his spear in his hand" apparently as the symbol of authority. So in former times Joshua held the javelin (Jo. 8.^{18}). Beyond this we have no indication as to what particular emblem was used by the kings in Israel. The golden sceptre of the Persian monarch mentioned in Esther was a long, tapering staff ornamented with gold. The lowering of this by the king was the sign that one who had ventured unbidden into his presence might safely approach him. Syrian and Philistine princes are referred to in Am. 1.$^{5, 8}$. The short ornamental sceptre of the Assyrian monarchs is often figured on the monuments. In Egp. a special form of sceptre belonged to the queen.

Eastern Sceptres

SCEVA, a Jewish High Priest whose seven sons practised exorcism in the name of Jesus; two of whom (RV.), attempting this on a madman, were overcome by him and driven from the house, "naked and wounded" (Ac. 19.$^{14ff.}$). S. was prob. an Essene (see Waiters for the Kingdom); those who presided at their feasts were called "priests"; the Essenes also were addicted to magical arts. The genuineness of the passage has been impugned among the rest by Prof. Sir Wm. Ramsay (Paul the Traveller, p. 172), but without sufficient reason. Headlam (HDB. s.v. "Sceva") gives a copy of an exorcism in wh. the name "Jesus" occurs, called "the God of the Hebrews."

SCHISM appears only once in AV. (1 Cor. 12.^{25}), "that there shd. be no schism (lit. 'rent') in the body." The same Gr. word, schisma, is used for a "rent" in a garment (Mw. 9.^{16}; Mk. 2.^{21}), and for "divisions" among the people (Jn. 7.^{43}, &c.; 1 Cor. 1.^{10}, 11.^{18}).

SCHOOL, SCHOOLMASTER. In Israel the first teachers were the parents, and the first S. the home. The duty of education as then understood was imposed on the parents by Moses (Ex. 12.[26], &c.), and to the early Isr. this would be no great burden as he had about one-fifth of the yr. free, and on such occasions instruction, mainly oral, was expected to be given in explanation of the seasons observed and their relationship to the national hist. Other instruction wd. embrace such moral teaching as we find set forth in the name of parents in the Bk. of Proverbs. In addition to this we find traces of other education from the beginning. The Tell-Amarna tablets have shown that Pal. was not much behind Egp. and Bab., still we cannot infer too much from these as to the condition of the people generally. The case of Moses was exceptional (Ac. 7.[22]), as also were those of Solomon and Job in their kge. of Natural Hist. (1 K. 4.[33]; Jb. 38.–41); but writing seems to have been known from the earliest period. It is first mentioned in Ex. 17.[14], but even then as something familiar, and further we cannot doubt that the writing on the priest's mitre and breastplate were meant to be read by the people (Ex. 28.[11], 39.[30]). Such names as Kirjath-sepher imply the existence of bks. According to one tr., Zebulun handled the pen of the writer (Jg. 5.[14]), the law of the kdm. required the king to transcribe Deuteronomy himself (Dt. 17.[18]), and the case of the boy fm. the town of Succoth beyond Jordan is significant (Jg. 8.[14]). The management of Solomon's affairs, too, required a well-trained, educated staff of scribes, among whom a recorder is mentioned (2 S. 20.[24]; 2 K. 18.[18]; 2 Ch. 34.[8]). That meant for those employed at least some course of systematic S. training. The Siloam inscr. (8th cent. B.C.) wd. lead us to believe that even the workmen employed in excavating it were familiar with writing, while the forms of the letters used show an elegant and characteristic development among the Heb. people. The teaching of the people by the priests in the Temple (Lv. 10.[11]; Ek. 44.[23-24]; Ml. 2.[7]) was of course religious, as wd. also be that in the assemblies of the sons of the prophets (2 K. 2.), but in the case of both parties we find traces of further teaching of the youth of their own classes (1 Ch. 25.[7-8]; Am. 7.[14]). For the pre-exilic period we cannot say more than this. After the Captivity, with the development of the synagogue system the possibilities of education were greatly increased, as it was understood there shd. always be a place in or near them for teaching. The Tlm. attributes their establishment to Joshua ben Gamla (Bab. Bath. 21.[a]), and it says there shd. be one teacher for 25 pupils, while for 40 there shd. be one master and one assistant. The community that had no S. was ipso facto excommunicated. Instructions are given as to the health and safety of the pupils so far as these things were then understood. The S. was not to be in a densely populated quarter of the town nor near a dangerous bridge wh. the pupils must cross. The teachers sometimes received an appointment from the local authorities, but it was recognised that they were at liberty to settle freely. The pupils were led to S. by the father or the mother, the S. life beginning at five. At five the study of Scrip. was begun, at ten the Mishna or traditions of the elders, while later there was added at fifteen the Gemara. The pupils had scrolls on wh. were written portions of Scrip.—Story of the Creation, the Shema, the Hallel, extracts fm. the Law and fm. the sayings of the wise men (Sr. 2.[9-11]; Aboth. I. 1). Jerome tells us that the Jewish children were required to recite even the genealogical portions of the OT. The instruction was mainly catechetical, and parables and proverbs were in frequent use as illustrations. Corporal punishment was thoroughly approved. The question is asked in the Talmud: "When the master enters the S.-room with the thong in his hand, who fears?" To wh. the answer is given: "He that is accustomed to be beaten every day" (Succa, 29[a]). The elementary schools must have been very like the Jewish chedārīm of to-day, in wh. the pupils, each with his own dirty, tattered leaf or volume, sit around on the floor, the rabbi occupying a small platform about 18 inches higher. They wd. be close and unventilated, and, especially in the upper classes where points had to be discussed, there wd. be a great deal of noise; for the Jew has never known how to argue calmly. We can think of the existence of such a S. in Nazareth in the early yrs. of the first cent., and we may be sure that, out of Jerusalem, it was among the best in Pal., for, as the poems of Eliezer hak-Kalīr tell us, that town was a meeting-place of the priests when going to the Holy City, and their frequent presence wd. influence the S. life, if indeed the S. did not belong to them.

Higher education, but also on religious lines, was given by the more distinguished rabbis. It was their aim to gather "many pupils" around them. In the genial climate of Pal. they were in the habit of teaching in the open air in the first and second cents. Joshua ben Zakkai taught in the temple court all day: Ben Azzai and Rabbi Jehudah on the shores of the Lake of Galilee (Erubin. 29[a]). In the stricter sense of the word, as also with the meaning "systems of thought," Hillel and Shammai were heads of "schools" just before the Advent. The teachers were regarded by the pupils with profound respect and were addressed by the title Mar or Rabbi. The master had full authority over his scholars, and the relationship of the pupil to the rabbi was designated as "service of the ḥakhamim" (Ab. vi. 6). During the period of service the pupils were designated talmīdīm. When the course of study was concluded they became talmīdē ḥakhamīm. As such they were considered fully qualified for the office of rabbi or ḥakham, wh. they received through ordination. In addition to the learning of the midrashīm, it was strongly insisted upon that such acquire good manners, of wh. we find a summary in Aboth, v. 10: "Seven things are apparent in the conduct of an educated man, and seven in the behaviour of an illiterate. (1) A learned man will be quiet in the presence of one more learned than himself; (2) He will not interrupt any one while speaking; (3) He will not give a hasty answer; (4)

His questions will be appropriate; (5) He will give appropriate answers; (6) He will reply to questions in order to the first, first, to the last, last; (7) He will confess it when he is ignorant of anything. The reverse of these seven things are all to be seen in the illiterate."

Of female education in Isr. we know very little. The good housewife was the ideal woman (Pr. 31.), and apart from household duties she gave her time to all sorts of needlework and weaving for the adornment of her family. The embroideries (Jg. 5.[30]) which were so much prized in early Isr., and the finery that went to make up a lady's wardrobe in Isaiah's time (3.[16-24]), implied a good deal of training of the women in needlework. In later times the rabbis objected to women being taught the Law, and if it were done at all it was not allowed to be done systematically. The apostle Paul brings us into touch with the education of his own time, but apart from his statement of having "been brought up at the feet of Gamaliel" (Ac. 22.[3]), where, by the way, he stood and did not sit (Sota, ix. 15), his references have more to do with Greco-Roman education than with Jewish. With this he wd. be fully acquainted, as belonging to a city that had a long and distinguished educational hist. The education of the Rm. boy usly. extended fm. his seventh till his fourteenth yr., and embraced the usl. branches, letters, and the syllables and words, so leading up to a kge. of his own lang., while he was initiated into writing by means of the stylus and wax tablets. Plautus tells us of the use of the rod; and Martial mentions the floggings and cries of the children in Rm. schools. The earlier teaching was very often committed to a household slave, the pædagogus (παιδαγωγος), whose duties were confined to the teaching of the elements (στοιχεῖα). When that was accomplished he was then employed to conduct his former pupils to the real S.-master or the hall of some distinguished philosopher. His humble office was naturally looked upon with something of contempt (1 Cor. 4.[15]). Paul sets forth the ceremonial law as a pedagogue (Gal. 3.[24]) that fm. the elements of religious teaching was meant to lead men to Christ—the true philosopher.

SCHOOLS OF THE PROPHETS. See PROPHET, PROPHECY.

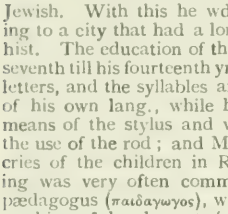
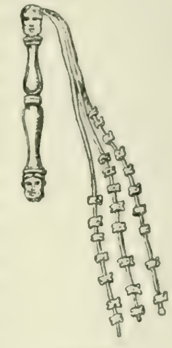
SCORPION, an articulate animal of the order Arachnidæ; it has claws like a lobster's, and a long tail with a venomous sting at the end; with this it kills the insects wh. are its prey. There are various species of S. in Pal.; one attains sometimes the length of six inches. The sting of the S. is the characteristic most referred to in Scrip. (Rv. 9.[10]). The small yellow S. may be fancied to be like an egg; hence Lk. 11.[12], "If a son ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion." Fm. its habit of hiding under stones it is a symbol of desolation (Dt. 8.[16]; Ek. 2.[6]).



SCORPION

SCOURGE, SCOURGING. Stripes were prob. inflicted with rods in early times; but we have seen (CRIMES AND PENALTIES) that they were subsequently inflicted with a three-thonged scourge. In the OT. the word "scourge" (Heb. shôṭ) occurs several times in a fig. sense (Jb. 5.[21]; Is. 10.[26], &c.), never literally. "Scourged" in Lv. 19.[20] shd. be simply "punished" (RV.). Rehoboam's reference to "whips" and "scorpions" (1 K. 12.[11, 14], &c.) may have been figurative. But the literal use must in any case precede the figurative; and in connection with the forced labour (11.[28]) the bastinado was prob. not unknown. The "scorpion" we may presume to have been an instrument of torture resembling the Roman scourge. This was made of long strips of leather, the tips of wh. were armed with sharp bits of bone or metal. The culprit was bound in a bending posture over a pillar, and the scourge was applied to his naked back. It tore the flesh, and produced injuries not unfrequently ending in death. This torture was endured by Jesus (Mw. 27.[26], &c.). It was about to be inflicted on St. Paul when he claimed the protection from this indignity wh. his Roman citizenship afforded him (Ac. 22.[24f.]). The scourging in the synagogue never exceeded forty stripes. This was inflicted with a scourge of three thongs, thirteen strokes being laid on each shoulder, and thirteen on the naked breast. Five times St. Paul endured this (2 Cor. 11.[24]).



SCOURGE

SCREECH OWL (Heb. lîlîth, Is. 34.[14]). It is not certain what sort of owl is here intended. The word was regarded by some of the Jewish commentators as being a night monster, hence AVm. A midrashic fable declares that before EVE, ADAM had a wife whose name was Lilith, and now she plays the vampire. See OWL, LILITH.

SCRIBES. In the OT. the scribe (ṣôphēr) is one whose profession it is to write, not in a literary sense, but as copyist or transcriber (Jr. 8.[8], &c.). "The king's scribe" was an officer of state, whom we find associated with the High Priest (2 K. 12.[10]). He held a position of importance in the royal establishment. It may have been his duty to attend to the records to be preserved in the state archives. In Ezra the offices of priest and scribe were combined (Ne. 8.[9], &c.). And now the term takes on something of the meaning wh. it subsequently bore. Ezra is called "a ready scribe in the law of Moses," "a scribe of the words of the commandments of the Lord and of His statutes to Israel" (Ez. 7.[6, 11]). Simon the Just is the last High Priest whom tradition represents as also a scribe, and the head of a "school." Whether he was Simon I. (c. B.C. 300) or Simon II. (c. B.C. 220) is uncertain.

From the days of Ezra the law was the main interest of the Jewish people. As they no longer spoke Hebrew it was necessary to translate the ancient books into Aramaic, the language thenceforth spoken in Palestine. In this way the Targums came into existence. But the uninstructed required also to have the law expounded, and its requirements made intelligible, that they might be able to render obedience, upon which so much depended for both individual and nation. In response to this demand there arose a class of men learned in the law, able to give counsel and guidance on all points of doubt or difficulty. Alongside the priesthood there thus grew up a great profession, with ever-increasing influence, and with the further advantage that, unlike that of the priest, it was restricted to no caste. It was open to aspiring youth from any family in Israel. In the NT. the scribes are constantly named with the PHARISEES, the popular party, to wh. in fact they belonged, as we learn from several passages: "the scribes of the Pharisees" (Mk. 2.[16] RV.); "the Pharisees and their scribes" (Lk. 5.[30] RV.); "the scribes of the Pharisees' part" (Ac. 23.[9]).

The Torah was regarded as the expression of God's will for His people. It was to Israel the supreme fountain of law, alike civil and religious. It was held to prescribe, either directly or by implication, a man's duty in every detail of life, whether public or private. Obviously the men whom the people trusted to expound and apply the law to individual cases, who could "bind," i.e. forbid, or "loose," i.e. allow, what they believed to be contrary to or in accordance with the Divine will, exercised a great influence in the community. Their functions called for special endowments and training. We find that certain eminent exponents of the law founded "schools," in wh. disciples were taught their principles and method. These "schools" were not always in perfect accord; witness the rivalry of Shammai and Hillel. In one respect, however, they were all agreed—in the reverence paid to the "traditions of the elders."

The decisions of the more famous scribes in the cases brought before them stood as authoritative interpretations of the law, and as such were quoted by their successors. This habit of quoting from others in order to buttress their own doctrine is referred to in the contrast drawn between them and Jesus (Mw. 7.[29]). Gradually a body of decisions was formed which, claiming to be necessary inferences from it, were held of equal authority with the written law. They might even avail to make the written law of no effect (Mw. 15.[6], &c.). This "oral law" grew to such vast dimensions, so complicated and minute in its details, that no human being could possibly observe it all. The ingenuity of the scribes was therefore largely exercised in casuistical efforts to find ways whereby the letter of the law might be fulfilled, while the spirit of it was evaded.

When we remember that these men were the real leaders and teachers of the people, their influence securing for them the first places in the synagogues (the priestly class concentrated mainly in Jerusalem); when we consider the inevitable tendency of their system to destroy the conscience and stunt the nobler elements of manhood, we may find it easier to understand why the evangel of Jesus met with such a limited response among His countrymen.

Not only did the scribes sit "in Moses' seat" (Mw. 23.[2]), they also found their way into the Sanhedrin (Jn. 3.[10], 7.[50]; Ac. 5.[34]), and seem to have discharged the functions of local judges. The names of Hillel, Shammai, Gamaliel, and Nicodemus show that men of high excellence were not wanting among them.

It was not considered seemly for the scribe to receive a fee. Doubtless ways were found of getting round this difficulty in many cases. But we know that certain great teachers supported themselves by their trade. Hillel is said to have been a carpenter; and St. Paul, who studied under Gamaliel, was a tent-maker. It was a weakness of the class, however, to long for recognition at the hands of their fellows. They loved the chief places at feasts, and to be saluted by the honourable title of "Rabbi." The perception that the teaching of Jesus was destined to undermine their authority may explain the bitterness of their antagonism, and their zeal in pressing for His removal.

SCRIP is EV. tr. of Heb. yalkûṭ (1 S. 17.[40]), the bag carried by the shepherd lad, into wh. he put the stones for his sling. It is also AV. tr. for πήρα (Mw. 10.[10]; Mk. 6.[8]; Lk. 9.[3], 10.[4], 22.[35f.], RV. in every case "wallet"). This stands for the leathern satchel or wallet in wh. the Eastern traveller to this day carries his store of provision for the journey.

SCRIPTURES. In the present article we purpose to consider the Canon; its formation, function, and extent. In the NT. we find repeated refce. to S. (Gr. graphai), the decisions of wh., in matters of doctrine and practice, are looked upon as authoritative. It is mainly the OT. writings that are so referred to, but in 2 P. 3.[16] the Epp. of PAUL are called S. We shall therefore, in the sequel, treat first the Canon of the OT., and then that of the NT. While there are points of similarity between the history of these two, the points of diffce. are too striking to permit them being treated other than successively. They differ in language; the OT. being in Heb. with some chapters in Aram., and the NT. in Gr.; they also differ in mode of presentation; the OT. appearing at irregular intervals during centuries, the NT. being the product of one generation.

The Old Testament Canon.—In the introduction to Ecclesiasticus the translator makes a threefold reference to "the law, the prophets, and the rest of the books" as being marked off fm. all Jewish and other literature. In Jos. (con. Apion.) we learn that among the Jews certain bks. were regarded as of supreme value and importance. We have similar testimony, though indirectly, fm. Philo Judæus.

He refers to all the bks. of the OT. with the exception of four: the influence of two of these may be traced, but he has no note of being even acquainted with the Song of Solomon or Ecclesiastes. He never quotes any of the bks. of the Gr. Apocrypha, although he freely quotes fm. heathen philosophers.

In the NT. we find, as we have said above, that "the Law of MOSES, the Prophets, and the Psalms" (Lk. 24.[44]) occupied a wholly special place. We may therefore assume that a collection of writings were acknowledged as sacred fm., at the latest, the days of the younger Siracides (at latest B.C. 130). Further, that this collection agreed in the main with the Massoretic Canon seems nearly equally certain. It is impossible, with the material at present at our disposal, to determine either the date when the Canon was fixed, or the occasion of this being done, with any degree of precision. It was probably a gradual process. One notice we have of something that looks like the formation of the Canon. In the epistle wh. introduces the second bk. of Maccabees it is said: "Neemias, founding a library, gathered together the acts of the kings and of David, and the epistles of the kings concerning the holy gifts" (2.[13]). This mt. be better rendered "books about the kings and the prophets, and the books of David"; this wd. seem to indicate the presence of the historical books of Samuel and Kings, the prophetical writings, and the Psalms. In the same passage there is reference to the "commentaries of Neemias," wh., as they contained an account of Solomon's dedication of the Temple, may be regarded as probably our books of Chronicles. The law is not mentioned; it is already sacrosanct: what we have here is thus the second step in the formation of the Canon; it is a Deutero-canonicon.

Niese (Kritik der Makk.) makes out a strong case for the early date and authenticity of this portion of Maccabees. It may then be held as representing the opinion of intelligent Jews living a couple of centuries after the date of NEHEMIAH.

While formerly the Hebrew and the Christian Scriptures were looked upon by theologians as occupying a perfectly unique position, we now recognise that many other races had sacred books also. The Egyptians had "The Book of the Dead," wh. portends to be a revelation of the state after death, with implied inculcation of moral conduct and ritual observances as the means by wh. future rewards will be attained and future punishments averted. There are also the great Babylonian Epics and Penitential Psalms; the Code of Ḥammurabi claims to be a revelation, as also the magic formulæ. The Vedas are made up of ritual and hymns of adoration connected with it. The same may be said of the Zendavesta; the creation-legends, the adumbrations of the future, the moral and ritual injunctions, are put in the mouth of Ahura-Mazda. The prominent place occupied by ritual of sacrifice does not need to be pointed out. The very idea of a revelation in connection with ritual implies that the primary object of such a revelation wd. be to lay down rules for an acceptable approach to Deity; this wd. naturally include words of praise and prayer; these as naturally wd. assume the form of poetry. Connected with this wd. be legends of the origins of things, the creation of the world and the origin of evil. The earliest portion of the Heb. Scriptures we shd. expect to be (though this is in direct opposition to predominant theories) the ritual of worship as we find it in the documents designated P.; and along with this, some portion of the book of Psalms. When the ritual, at first traditional, was written down, it wd. necessarily be preceded by a book of Origins, narrating how the institutions regarded as sacred came into being. In accordance with this we find in Amos and Hosea, the earliest of the literary prophets, that the law is known and recognised as supreme, and they manifest an acquaintance with all the component parts of wh., accdg. to the critics, the Pentateuch is made up. The case of Amos is very striking, as he, a herdsman, uses the technical terms for special sacrifices in a way that implies that he expects his audience to be acquainted with the legal requirements involved (cp. Am. 4.[4] with Nu. 28.[3, 4]; Dt. 14.[28, 29], 26.[12]; v. 5 with Lv. 7.[13f.], 22.[18f.]). All this means that the law was no mere possession of the priests, but was generally known; in other words it had been, to some extent at least, committed to writing. AMOS also has references to the narratives in Gn.—the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah—using the word hāpak, wh. is used in Gn. in regard to this catastrophe. The exodus fm. Egp., the wilderness journey, the conquest of the territory of Sihon are also referred to (Am. 2.[10]). Hosea has yet more references, especially to the history of the Pentateuch, and in terms wh. suggest, if they do not imply, that there were written records of these things. Further we learn fm. Amos (5.[23]) that music of voice and instrument accompanied the sacrifices. Thus we have, in the days of the earliest literary prophets, evidence that the people had a book of the law wh. contained all the elements J.E.D.P., wh. critics have found in the Pentateuch: also there was a Psalter of some sort. The history as given in Joshua, Judges, and Samuel, is also appealed to, though not so frequently. If, however, we regard Samuel as authentic history we have an earlier reference to the law. We are told (1 S. 10.[25]) that the prophet "told the people the manner (mishpāṭ) of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord."

It is difficult to fix precisely the meaning of mishpāṭ hammalūkah; it naturally means the rights and duties of kingship, a description wh. exactly suits Dt. 17.[14-20]. It may have been that then, and by Samuel, that passage was written and inserted in Deuteronomy. At all events it was a body of law; and it was laid "up before the Lord," probably in the Tabernacle. A common critical view is to regard this passage of S. as written by E. of the Pentateuch.

This implies that there was a practice of consecrating certain books by prophets. If this is correct, we have the nucleus of the third element of the Jewish Canon. It is evident that the history afterwards included in the prophetic writings was understood to be well known. Joab expects that, when David learns of a slaughter of his men on account of the assault on Rabbath Ammon being pressed with too great vehemence, he will refer to history and quote the case of Abimelech. Hosea refers repeatedly to the tragical incident of GIBEAH (cp. Ho. 9.[9], 10.[9] with Jg. 19.–21.). Another book, probably existing in some form, at all events in nucleus, while Amos and Hosea were prophesying, was Proverbs. Fm. chap. 10. to chap. 22.[17] is a section of the book beginning with a special title mishlē Shlōmōh; it is characterised by its "proverbs" being of only one distich. The passage that follows (22.[18]–24.[22]) has characteristics wh. suggest the writer of the prologue (1.[1]–9.[18]); there follows a small section of a dozen verses. Then we have (25.[1]) the statement, "these also are the proverbs of Solomon wh. the men of Hezekiah copied out," wh. implies the existence of the nucleus with its prologue and additions.

The finding of "the Book of the Law" (2 K. 22.[8-20]; 2 Ch. 34.[14-29]) does not necessarily mean that it was the book of Deuteronomy only that was so discovered; everything in the passage itself points rather to its being a book containing the whole law that was so found. The finding of a copy thus wd. direct attention to the contents of the law more effectively than before. The allegation that the destruction of the high places started with this discovery is incorrect, as proved by 2 K. 18.[22]. Hezekiah had already begun the process. When the colonists sent to replace the Israelite captives entreated that some one be sent them to teach them "the manner of the God of the land" (mishpāt 'Elohe hā'āretz), it seems but reasonable, in the light of what we found in Amos and Hosea, that the priest who came brought a book. If this is so, the presence of Deuteronomy in the Samaritan Pentateuch is demonstration that it was not first seen in the reign of Josiah.

The fall of the Jewish State is necessarily an important point in the development of the doctrine of Holy Scripture. Away in Babylon the Jews cd. maintain themselves in fidelity to their religion only by the perusal of the law and such portions of the prophets as had yet been committed to writing. The law in its ritual portions wd. necessarily fall into the background, as there were no temple and no sacrifices to illustrate its enactments. The original Psalter too, as it wd. largely consist of ritual chant associated with special sacrifices, wd. sink very much into abeyance. So only the prophets remained. The "former prophets" (nebī'īm ri'shōnīm), Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, contained the history of Israel viewed as a divine process; persons were characterised and actions estimated in the light of it. The Jews, regarding themselves as the products of this process, wd. segregate themselves, though national rites wd. be largely in abeyance.

If the historicity of DANIEL be admitted, we have an explanation of the otherwise inexplicable faithfulness of the Jews to their religion. In the light of the discovery of an Israelite temple in Upper Egp. at Assouān the fact that the Jews in Babylonia never attempted this is very striking. The preservation of the books of a ritual they cd. not observe implies the high respect with wh. they were regarded.

The return of the exiles and the rebuilding of the Temple gave a new impulse to the study of the law; there are elements in the Psalter wh. point to this event; the presence of the prophets HAGGAI and ZECHARIAH kept that portion of the sacred writing in evidence. The second return under EZRA and NEHEMIAH was accompanied by a yet greater attention especially to the law. It wd. seem not unlikely that something occurred about that time wh. led to the fixation of the number of the sacred books. Tradition, as represented by the Tlm., ascribes this to the nebulous body, "the Men of the Great Synagogue," wh. owed its institution to Ezra (Wright, Ecclesiastes, 3–10). A yet earlier and even more confused form of this tradition is found in 2 Es. (4th bk. of Ezra) 14.[19-48], where Ezra is commanded to dictate ninety-four sacred books to five scribes; of these books seventy are mystical, and to be retained, leaving the twenty-four books of the ordinary Jewish Canon. The date of 4th Esdras is prob. A.D. 95. Yet earlier is the form the tradition assumes in the prologue to 2 Maccabees above referred to, that Nehemiah collected a sacred library. It is clear that the age of Ezra and Nehemiah was a critical one in the history of the Canon.

It will not do to oppose the above view, as did Robertson Smith, by bringing forward the fact that the Canon of Alexandria was so much more extensive. The younger Siracides had evidently what was practically the same canonical books as we; Philo only quotes fm. our Canon; Josephus agst. Apion, writing to an Alexandrian audience, describes our OT. Canon. These facts imply that these additional books had a deutero-canonical position among the Jews much as they have among Protestants. Still less of force is the appeal made to the decisions of Jabne. These stories are of no historical value; they give a historical setting to scholastic arguments as to the canonicity of certain bks. that might fm. internal reasons of a technical kind be spoken against; it was not the Solomonic authorship that was supposed to be questioned in the case of Ecclesiastes, but its moral teaching. Esther was defended against the reproach of never having in it the name of God; Ezekiel, whom no critic assails, was impugned because the regulations he promulgated concerning priests and sacrifices did not harmonise exactly with those in Leviticus. The pseudo-historical setting was simply a mnemonic device adopted by the Rabbins; a story is more easily remembered than an argument.

We may assume that at the time when Nehemiah was governor over Jerusalem, certain books were selected to be looked upon as authoritative; the governor's own commentaries being added. Whether there were any other books or portions of books inserted later is a matter for debate. More important in regard to the question before us is the principle that guided the choice of the books so set apart. According to Josephus (contra Apionem, i. 18) only such books were chosen as were (a) written by a prophet, and (b) dated before the end of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus. This wd. be valuable if only as the view of one who had had exceptional opportunities of judging; but it is more if it is confirmed by facts. If we consider the case of the books excluded and compare them with those included, the inclusion and exclusion seem most easily explicable on Josephus' principle. Why is Ecclesiastes included in the Canon and Ecclesiasticus not? The former claimed to be written by Solomon, the latter made no such claim; that is to say, Ec. conformed to the rule laid down by Jos. but Sr. did not. Though we wd. not maintain their criticism either to be scientific in its methods or accurate in its results, yet they did not admit every book on its mere claim. Though the book of Wisdom was reputed to be written by Solomon, yet it was excluded. If it be answered that Ws. was published in Egp., this cannot be said of Baruch, Enoch, or 2nd Esdras.

It is impossible to fix, with any degree of exactness, the date of the settlement of the Jewish Canon, but the limits, if we do not take into account the dates ascribed by critics to certain books included in it, may be said to be fm. B.C. 430, the date of Nehemiah's second governorship, to B.C. 130, the latest date we can assign to the descent of the younger Siracides into Egp.

This is not the place in wh. to discuss this latter date, but strong arguments can be adduced to antedate the arrival of the yr. Siracides in Egp. by about a century. By most moderate critical authorities B.C. 100 is the date favoured. It has really nothing to recommend it but the fact that it leaves room for the reception of bks. into the Canon wh. they have declared to be late. The still later date, A.D. 100, is due to the misunderstanding of the meaning of the story of the "Council of Jabne" and its debates.

The constitution of each division of the Canon is a matter of some importance. We have already seen that very early the sacred books were arranged in the three classes: the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings. As to the law, external evidence is unanimous in declaring that it consisted of the five books; presumably the five we have at present. Any one who reads the LXX will observe the difference of the relation of the version to the original in the case of the Pnt. as compared with the other books. The latest prob. date at wh. the Samaritans cd. get their Pnt. was during the second governorship of Nehemiah; then the Pnt. was marked off fm. Joshua so decisively that while they have received the law J.E.D.P., they did not recognise or even possess the bk. of Joshua. Internal evidence is of little value as against external evidence so strong and so unequivocal. In regard to the prophets, as is well known, the majority of what we reckon the historical books are classed by the Jews as prophetic writings, and are called the "former prophets." Jos. appears to have included in this the bks. of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. The later prophets, according to the Jews, omit Daniel but otherwise coincide with ours. In regard to Daniel, the Canon of Jos. included it among the prophets, as did also that of Melito and the Alexandrian, as seen in LXX. Our Lord also quotes "Daniel the prophet" (Mw. 24.[15]); a fact that implies that in His day Dn. was not placed as now among the K'thubīm, but among the "prophets." The third portion of the Canon, "the Hagiographa," is much more extensive in later Jewish reckoning than in earlier; indeed more extensive, if we exclude the Apocrypha, than that of Alexandria as seen in the LXX. Jos. has only four bks., Psalms, Proverbs, Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes; with this agrees Melito, save that he includes Job, wh. Jos. had reckoned to the prophets. The present Jewish reckoning, wh. appears to date fm. about the fourth Christian cent., as it is referred to by Jerome, has Psalms, Proverbs, Job, the five Megilloth (Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther), Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles. While this is the order of these bks. as found in the ordinary Hebrew Bibles, it is by no means the only order in MSS.; a very common order placed Chronicles first instead of last.

The authority of the Old Testament is exhibited by the numerous quotations made fm. nearly every book. The decisions of Scripture are the final appeal as to doctrine and conduct. Although we do not press this beyond what may be legitimately deduced fm. it, yet the fact that our Lord foiled Satan by a constant appeal to Scripture invests it with a sanctity wh. it wd. be difficult to overestimate. However, the main function of the OT. is to lead to the New and prepare for it. Its precepts and injunctions are binding on Christians through Christ, and as promulgated anew by Him with deepened meaning.

The New Testament Canon.—As with the Canon of the OT., so with that of the New, the determining of the books wh. compose it was a gradual process; yet by no means so gradual as that of the OT. In the one case we have the condensation of the Lit. of a millennium, and the consecration of the elements selected; in the other it is the Lit. of less than a century that is so treated. The gradual and unconscious segregation of certain books as the norm of faith and conduct is the more instructive, as we see the process taking place under our eyes. As the principle of selection, according to wh. the bks. of the OT. had been gathered together, was that each bk. had been the work of a prophet, so in the NT. apostolicity was understood to be the gauge and guarantee of the right of an Epistle or a Gospel to be admitted into the Canon. At the beginning, when our Lord had but recently passed away fm. the midst of His disciples, and a cloud had received Him fm. their watching eyes, the believers expected that the time was not far distant when, as they had seen Him go into heaven, so in like manner wd. they see Him come again. The presence of such hopes was antagonistic to the idea of writing. They had with them the apostles who had companied with the Lord while He was on the earth and had heard His gracious words; there was no need of ink or pen. When the first persecution dispersed the apostles it is not improbable that there were short, condensed manuals of the life and teaching of the Lord that wd. prompt the memories of the first preachers. In the most primitive stage this evangelical deposit mt. possibly be conveyed fm. person to person memoriter; although we ought not to forget that shorthand notes were already in use, and an imperial official like Matthew cd. scarcely fail to be practically acquainted with it. While different individuals committed these to writing with a general resemblance, there wd. be differences due to additions fm. the personal experience of the individual speaker. This in all likelihood is the origin of the "many Gospels" to wh. Luke refers. These, however, never seem to have been collected together. The earliest portion of NT. Scriptures to be formed into one collection appears to have been the Epp. of St. Paul. If we may regard 2 Peter as authentic, then even during their author's lifetime they were regarded as authoritative and inspired (2 P. 3.[16]). The fact that they were "wrested," not declared not to be of authority, proves how highly they were regarded when opponents resorted to twisting their words, not denouncing or ignoring them. In the fourth decade of the second cent., Justin Martyr, in his first Apology, appeals to the Memorabilia (Apomnēmonē eumata) of the apostles; he quotes or shows himself influenced by the language of every chap. in the Gospel of Mw. His pupil Tatian combined the fourfold narrative into one in the Diatessaron. This quite independently of the frequent quotations found in the works of the early Fathers. Clement of Rome (c. A.D. 98) quotes the Gospels and Epp. repeatedly as authoritative; the same may be said of Polycarp and Ignatius. The early Christian writing, The Didache, seems to show that the writer was acquainted with the Gospel of Mw.; prob. with that of Lk. also; yet he refers to the Gospel as if it were a writing to wh. they cd. apply and expect their hearers to do so also (i. 5). When we proceed down the Christian centuries we find always clearer evidence that certain bks. were regarded as canonical and authoritative; it is further growingly evident that the books so distinguished coincided in the main with those that form our NT. Irenæus either quotes or appears to be influenced by the language of every bk. in the NT. except Philemon and 3rd John. Hippolytus does not quote or show any traces of acquaintance with either of the minor Epp. of John, but otherwise his evidence coincides with that of Irenæus. The list of books guaranteed by Tertullian is the same as that of Irenæus, save that he does not refer to 2nd Peter. Very much the same evidence is given by the Fathers till we come to the age of the more voluminous writers, when every NT. writing is noticed directly or implicitly. In what is called the "Muratori Fragment" we have a portion of a very early catalogue of the books of the NT. Scriptures wh. contains almost all our present Canon.

It is in Latin, but has been translated from Greek. Bishop Lightfoot, in a letter to the Athenæum shortly before his death, gave very plausible reasons for holding that this original was in verse. It may be dated somewhere between A.D. 170 and 190. Some thought Hippolytus was the author. It is mutilated both at the beginning and end; probably also there are lacunæ in the body of it. After a line wh. apparently is the conclusion of a description of Mark's Gospel the author proceeds to say that the third Gospel is Luke's. He gives an account of the reason why the Apostle John wrote the fourth Gospel, in course of wh. the 1st Epistle of John is quoted. The bk. of Acts is described as "the Acts of all Apostles." All the Pauline Epistles are named, but Hebrews is not among them. Clement of Rome is so impressed with that epistle that his own is in parts a paraphrase of Hebrews. It is impossible that this catalogue, compiled in Rome as it was, shd. have failed to take any notice of a bk. so influential as the Epistle to the Hebrews must thus have been: the omission was probably due to scribal carelessness, a thing that may explain the omission of reference to James, 1st Peter, and, if Westcott is right, 1st John also. The writer notices an "Apocalypse of Peter" wh. may possibly be our 2nd Epistle of Peter.

There are two versions wh. cannot be dated later than the middle of the second century: the Latin Vetus and the Syriac Peshiṭṭā. Tertullian's quotations from the former prove that it contained all our bks. except Hebrews and 2nd Peter; the want of quotations fm. the short and purely personal Epp. of Phm. and 3 Jn. does not prove their omission. The latter did not contain Rv., 2 and 3 Jn., 2 P., Ju. When we come to the fourth century we have the evidence of Eusebius, wh. is specially valuable, as he gives unconsciously the process by wh. bks. were admitted into the Canon. He divides the bks. wh. claimed to be authoritative into three classes: (a) Homologoumena; (b) Antilegomena; (c) Notha. The first class contained those bks. that were universally admitted to be apostolic and authoritative; the second, those whose claims were contested by some; the third, those whose spuriousness was in his day generally admitted. This division is founded on one of Origen, with wh. it in the main coincides. In the first are the Gospels, fourteen Epp. of Paul (that is including Hebrews), 1 John, 1 Peter, and the Apocalypse: in the second are the Epp. of James, Jude, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John: in the third the Acts of Paul, Hermas, the Apocalypse of Peter, Barnabas, the Teaching of the Apostles. As an appendix to this he mentions that some reject the bk. of Rv., a statement due to the fact that Dionysius of Alexandria had suggested that it mt. have been written by "John the Presbyter." * The evidence of the three great uncials represents Christian opinion in the century wh. immediately followed the age of Eusebius. These may be regarded as bearing evidence in favour of our present Canon, with this exception, that, on the one hand, the Codex Vaticanus is defective fm. the 10th chap. of Heb., and so it is without the Pastoral Epp. and Rv. (the Catholic Epp. are placed after the Gospels and the Acts, and before the Pauline Epp.).

With the third Council of Carthage the Canon assumed permanently the elements we now have in it. The action of the Christian consciousness in regard to the sacred Scriptures is to be compared with that of the æsthetic consciousness of those who speak a language and its literature. In English no academy decreed Shakespeare his supremacy, or placed Chaucer, Spenser, Milton, and many more, on high as indefeasible classics: their rank was recognised, and this recognition is shown by their necessary appearance in every collection of English poets. By the end of the fourth cent. believers knew in their hearts what really afforded them spiritual nutriment, hence those bks. formed the Canon. It is true that the Fathers and the Councils thought they decided the question as to each bk. on the ground of apostolic origin. When the Holy Spirit, working on their spirits, had moved them to accept a bk., they strove to persuade themselves that an apostle had written it: hence it was that the Epistle to the Hebrews was so long among the Antilegomena, and so many had doubts of 2nd Peter. The greatest difficulty was the adjustment of this theory to the case of the second and third Gospels; Mark and Luke were certainly not apostles, yet their Gospels were universally recognised as authoritative. The device was adopted of regarding the writers as little more than the amanuenses of the apostles Peter and Paul respectively. While in the case of Mark there is nothing against this view to be found in the bk. itself, Luke bears all the marks of being the result of independent thought and investigation. Although Jude, by appealing to the evidence of the apostles ([17]), marks himself off fm. the Twelve, yet because there was a Judas, not Iscariot, among the apostles the epistle was attributed to him, when the hesitancy produced by the quotations fm. Enoch and the Assumption of Moses was got over. The hesitancy of the Church to accept the claim 2 Peter makes in its first verse, shows the important place external evidence had with them. Acceptance by the churches, as the unbroken succession of officials in these communities guaranteed a valid tradition, was the test of canonicity, as proving the apostolic origin of the bk. concerned: what it did prove was the universality of its application to spiritual needs. The fact that certain bks.—the Epp. of Clement, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Pastor of Hermas—hovered for a time on the edge of canonicity, but were rejected, may be mentioned for the evidence of caution it gives. That the present Christian Canon represents the decision of universal Christian consciousness, carefully interrogated for three centuries, gives it a value it cd. never have derived fm. the mere imprimatur of any council, however ancient or however august.

* Jülicher (Intro. to NT, p. 526) is mistaken in maintaining that Eusebius was willing, if so desired, to place the Apocalypse among the Notha; logic ought to have shown him that Eusebius meant that he was willing to degrade Rv. to the class of Antilegomena instead of being where Origen placed it, among bks. universally acknowledged.

SCYTHIANS, a race inhabiting a vast district, including modern Poland and Southern Russia, both in Europe and Asia. They had the reputation of being the most uncivilised of peoples. The principal account of them is that given by Herodotus (iv. 99–102), who does not assign to them so large a territory. The Scythian is referred to by Paul (Col. 3.[11]) along with Barbarian.

SEA (Heb. yām). This word is used for the collection of the waters as distinguished from the dry land (Gn. 1.[10]). It is also used quite generally, with no refce. to any particular sea, as in Gn. 1.[26], "the fish of the sea"; Ps. 107.[23], "they that go down to the sea in ships," &c. We find that the name is also applied to such large bodies of water as are collected in the Euphrates (Is. 21.[1], &c.) and the Nile (Is. 18.[2], &c.). The mod. Egyptians still call their river "the sea," el-Baḥr. "From sea to sea" (Ps. 72.[8]; Am. 8.[12]) is prob. intended to cover the whole habitable earth. For the most part, however, when another sea is not definitely indicated, the Mediterranean is meant. This for Israel was "the sea" par excellence, the largest expanse of water with which they were familiar, the Great Sea (Nu. 34.[6]). It formed the western boundary of their land, and from many a height far inland glimpses were obtained of its shining breadths, stretching away to the setting sun. So largely did it bulk in their minds that in their speech the "west" and the "sea" were identified: so that when a man would say "westward" he said "seaward" (Ex. 26.[22]; Jo. 5.[1]; 1 K. 7.[25], &c.). The Sea of the Philistines is of course the Mediterranean, from Jaffa southward, where it washes the Philistine seaboard. The Dead Sea is known by various names. It is the Sea of the Plain (Dt. 4.[49]; RV. "sea of the Arabah"). Again it is the Salt Sea (Jo. 15.[2], &c.). Sometimes both names are given (Dt. 3.[17]; Jo. 3.[16], &c.). It is also the "former" or "eastern," hayyām haq-qadmōnī, as distinguished from the "hinder" or "western" sea, hayyām hā'aḥărôn, i.e. the Mediterranean (Zc. 14.[8]; cp. Dt. 34.[2]). The Red Sea, the scene of Israel's deliverance and the disaster to Pharaoh's host (He. 11.[29]), is in Heb. yām Ṣūph, lit. "Sea of Weeds" (Ex. 13.[18], &c.). The name "Red" may be due to the colour of the coral wh. abounds; or possibly to the red hues of the mountains on the northern horizons. Yām Ṣūph in EV. is invariably trd. Red Sea (Nu. 14.[25], &c.). The Sea of Chinnereth (Nu. 34.[11]), or Chinneroth (Jo. 12.[3]), is the Sea of Galilee, also known in the NT. as the Lake of Gennesaret (Lk. 5.[1]) and the Sea of Tiberias (Jn. 21.[1]). The Babylonian Tiā-mat, the primeval sea, suggests the Heb. Tĕhōm, "the deep." Certain resemblances have been pointed out between the Babylonian cosmogony and that of Genesis; along with striking differences (see Creation). There may be a survival of the primitive conception of the sea in Jb. 7.[12], where it is represented as a great beast over wh. God sets a watch; and in Dn. 7.[3], &c., where it figures as the prolific mother of monsters. Perhaps there is a reflection of this in Rv. 20.[13], where the sea gives up the dead that lie in its great maw. The sea is a figure of the turbulence of the wicked (Is. 57.[20]), of instability (Js. 1.[6]), and of impotent rage (Ju.[13]).

Signet of Orchamus, King of Ur

The Hebrews were not a seafaring people. They were for the greater part of their history practically barred from the sea by the peoples holding the coast plain and cities. The absence of good natural harbours made it less necessary for them to secure the seaboard. As they viewed it from a distance we can in a measure understand how, when they saw the splendours of the mighty mirror flashing in the glories of the sinking sun; when they saw the billows breaking on the beach, and heard the thunder of the storm; when the moaning of the unquiet waters was borne to their upland ears like the sound of "sorrow on the sea"; the Hebrews were impressed with a sense of its mystery and fear. We are not surprised, therefore, to find that in the Hebrew seer's description of the heavenly country there is "no more sea" (Rv. 21.[1]). See Galilee, Sea of.

SEA OF GLASS, THE. In the Apocalypse we have this figure twice, in 4.[6] and 15.[2]. The figure does not imply a sea smooth as glass, but a transparent solid on wh. the saints stood. The reference poss. is to Ex. 24.[10] and Ek. 1.[26]. The picture may have been suggested by the appearance of the Sea of Galilee with the fiery glow of the sunset lighting up its waves, and the white peak of Hermon looking down on it.

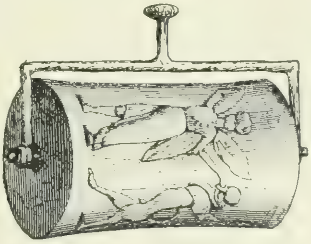
SEAL (Heb. ḥōthām, Gr. sphragis). Anciently all documents had to be authenticated by affixing a S. Herodotus (i. 195) and Strabo (xvi. 513) mention concerning the Babylonians, the ruling race in SW. Asia, that every man bore a staff and a S.; many have been found, chiefly cylinders. In Egp. the scarab was used as a S. Very frequently the S. was set in a signet-ring. The material used in the ancient East for receiving the S. was clay; now the S. is dipped in ink and applied to the paper. To entrust another with one's S. or signet, was to give him absolute power to act for the owner; hence Pharaoh gave his ring to Joseph (Gn. 41.[42]). Hence also seals were used for authentication (1 Cor. 9.[2]; Jn. 3.[33], 6.[27]) and as marking property (Rv. 7.[3]).

SEBA, son of Cush (Gn. 10.[7]; 1 Ch. 1.[9]), named in connection with Egp. and Ethiopia (Is. 43.[3]). In Is. 45.[14] the inhabitants are described as "men of stature," who may, as Margoliouth suggests (HDB. s.v.), be referred to in Is. 18.[2, 7]. In Ps. 72.[10] it is mentioned along with Sheba, not as lying also in Arabia, but as representing far-off peoples. S. must clearly be sought in Africa. Strabo's reference to a town of this name on the sea coast near the mod. Massowah may furnish a clue to its position. No ident. is yet possible.



Seal-cylinder on Metal Axis

SECACAH, a city in the wilderness of Judah (Jo. 15.[61]). It is not mentioned in OEJ. Conder suggests identification with Khirbet ed-Dikkeh, which is also known by the name of Khirbet es-Sikkeh, two miles south of Bethany. This is uncertain.

SECHU, RV. SECU, a place near Ramah, mentioned only in connection with David's visit to Samuel (1 S. 19.[22]). There is no sure clue to its position. Conder thinks it may correspond to the mod. Khirbet Shuweikeh, south of Bīreh. But perhaps we ought to read with LXX (B.), "He came to the well [or cistern] of the threshing-floor that is on the bare hill" (en tō sephei), understanding a height within the city.

SECOND COMING. See Parousia.

SECT. See Heresy.

SECUNDUS, a Christian of Thessalonica who, with Aristarchus, preceded St. Paul to Troas, and went with him to Jerusalem, possibly bearing contributions from the Macedonian churches to that at Jerusalem (Ac. 20.[4f.]; cp. 24.[17]).

SEED. The Heb. zera' is used in its lit. sense of the seed whence vegetables grow (Gn. 1.[11], 47.[24], &c.). It is most frequently used, however, figuratively, of family or descendants. The first occurrence in this sense is in the protevangelium (Gn. 3.[15]), "I will put enmity . . . between thy seed and her seed." The covenant was made with Abraham and his seed; a term wh. St. Paul interprets of all who by faith prove their spiritual affinity with faithful Abraham (Rm. 4.[9ff.], &c.). More specifically he applies it to Christ (Gal. 3.[16]), in whom believers become one, and as "Abraham's seed," are "heirs according to the promise" (v. 29). St. Paul's argument from the use of the noun "seed" in the singular is probably due to the subtleties of his rabbinical training. The word never elsewhere occurs in the plural, either in OT. or NT., and the apostle himself uses the singular form with the plural meaning (Rm. 9.[7], &c.). The argument, therefore, does not logically establish his point. But "even rabbinical writers saw that 'the Christ' was the true seed of Abraham. In Him the race was summed up, as it were. In Him it fulfilled its purpose and became a blessing to the whole earth. Without Him its separate existence as a peculiar people had no meaning. Thus He was not only the representative, but the embodiment of the race. In this way the people of Isr. is the type of Christ" (Lightfoot, Galatians in loc.). In 1 Jn. 3.[9] "unquestionably the σπέρμα is . . . the new life-principle implanted by the Divine begetting" (Law, The Tests of Life, p. 389). For seed-time see Agriculture.

SEER. See Prophet.

SEGUB. (1) The youngest son of Hiel, the rebuilder of Jericho (1 K. 16.[34]). He may have been sacrificed, in accordance with a certain ancient custom; but the context points rather to death as the result of an accident. (2) Son of Hezron, fr. of Jair (1 Ch. 2.[21f]).

SEIR (Heb. sē'īr, "hairy," or "rough"). (1) A name applied to the land occupied by Esau (Edom), covering a wide district, wh. included the mountainous country to the SE. of the Dead Sea (Gn. 33.[14, 16], 36.[9], &c.); the highlands between the 'Arabah and the south boundary of Israel (Jo. 11.[17], &c.), where apparently dwelt the Amalekites (1 Ch. 4.[42]); while, according to Dt. 33.[2], Seir extends to the neighbourhood of Sinai. The name probably applied specially to the district E. of the 'Arabah, occupied by the Horites, before the coming of Edom (Gn. 14.[6]; Dt. 2.[12], &c.). (2) The name-father of the Horites (Gn. 36.[20]). (3) Mt. Seir is named as on the border of Judah, near Kirjath-Jearim and Chesalon; prob. part of the range wh. runs NE. fm. Sārīs, by Qaryat el 'Anab and Biddu, to the plateau of el-Jīb, on wh. traces are still to be found of the ancient forest (Jo. 15.[10]).

SEIRATH, RV. SEIRAH. A place, apparently in Mount Ephraim, to which Ehud escaped when he had killed Eglon, king of Moab (Jg. 3.[26]). It has not been identified.

SELA. The Heb. word Ṣela', denoting "rock," "cliff," or "stone," often occurs in Scrip. (2 Ch. 25.[12], &c.). In some cases it seems to be a place-name. In Jg. 1.[36], some position near the S. end of the Dead Sea is required. Moore (Judges, p. 56) approves Buhl's identification with "the modern eṣ-Ṣāfieh, a bare and dazzlingly white sandstone promontory, a thousand feet high." More prob. is the ident. with the easily fortified wall of rock on the way leading from mod. Tell el-Milḥ over the pass of Akrabbim towards Edom. This would also agree with the narrative in 2 K. 14.[7]. The Sela (see Jokteel) there named is by many identified with the famous city of Petra, taking its name "Rock" as simply a translation of the Heb. Sela' (cp. Is. 16.[1], EVm.; Jos. Ant. IV. vii. 1), the capital of the Edomites, and known in OT. as Bozrah (Am. 1.[12], &c.). Wetzstein (Excursus in Delitzsch's Jesaia [3]) thinks the full ancient name may have been Boṣrat haṣ-ṣela', "Bozrah of the rock cleft." Petra has been often described in recent years. The best account of this wonderful city will be found in Dalman's Petra und seine Felsheiligtümer (Leipzig, 1908). Popular and interesting is that of Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra (New York and London, 1905). The ruins of Petra lie in a great hollow among the many-hued cliffs of Edom, at the base of Jebel Harūn, c. 50 miles S. of the Dead Sea. The remains consist chiefly of temples and tombs, cut with great skill and infinite pains out of the living rock. While not wholly inaccessible from other points the main entrance to the valley (Wādy Mūsa) is by a deep winding cleft in the wall of rock, called the Sīk, in the bottom of which flows a stream from the east. The Sīk is continued E. of the city, and the stream plunges over a deep precipice, making its way through the gorge to the 'Arabah. Of great interest are the high places discovered in the neighbourhood of the ruins. The chief of these is figured under High Places. The place must always have been one of great strength; but of its history we know little or nothing until it became the capital of the Nabatæan Arabs, about B.C. 312–A.D. 105. At the latter date it was merged in the Roman province under Trajan. "The Rock"

PETRA: THE SĪK

(Nu. 20.[8], &c.) is of course the wall of rock at 'Ain Qadīs, whence the water flowed at the touch of Moses' rod. The rocky strongholds that abound in Pal. no doubt suggested the frequent figure of the Lord as "the Rock" of His people (2 S. 22.[2], &c.).

SELAH, a musical term wh. occurs only in the Psalms and Hb. 3.; seventy-one times in the Psalms—seventeen times in the 1st bk., thirty in the 2nd, twenty in the 3rd, and four in the 5th; it is three times found in the Ps. of Habakkuk. In sixteen cases it occurs once in a Ps., in fifteen twice, in seven thrice, and in one Ps. four times. It is always found at the end of a clause, almost always at the end of a verse, very generally at the end of a paragraph. The Tgg. render it by words meaning "for ever," a view that has no justification in etymology, and is manifestly unsuitable in a large number of cases. The translators of LXX render it by diapsalma, so also Thd. and Sym. There is no certain meaning of this word; the most plausible interpretation is that it is a sign of repetition. Aquila follows the Tgg.; the Psh. when it does tr., wh. is seldom, also does so. Jerome in the Vlg. omits S. altogether, but in his Commentary and the version of the Heb. connected with it he renders by semper. Although there can be no certainty, the most likely view seems to be that S. indicated a pause in the singing filled up with instrumental music.

SELA-HAMMAHLEKOTH, "Rock of divisions," or "escape" (1 S. 23.[28] RVm.), a hill in the wilderness of Maon, apparently with precipitous sides, where David narrowly escaped capture by Saul. It is not identified. Conder thinks it should be sought in Wādy el-Malāqī, wh. issues on the shore of the Dead Sea c. four miles S. of Engedi.

SELED, son of Nadab, a descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch. 2.[30]).

SELEUCIA, a city on the Syrian seaboard near the mouth of the Orontes, the ancient seaport of Antioch, whence Paul and Barnabas embarked on their first missionary journey (Ac. 13.[4]). It was built by Seleucus Nikator, in a position of great strength, at the base of Mt. Pieria (B.C. 300). The harbour was about 660 yards in length and 450 in breadth, running into the plain, and protected by two great moles. A road connected the harbour with Antioch. It was favourably situated for intercourse with Cyprus and Asia Minor, and it played a considerable part in the commercial life of its time. It was taken by Ptolemy Euergetes, and recovered by Antiochus the Great. Pompey made it free (B.C. 64). Impressive ruins still remain, both of the harbour and of the city.

SEMEI, RV. SEMEIN, father of Mattathias in the genealogy of Christ (Lk. 3.[26]).

SENAAH. Among the people of the various towns who returned fm. exile with Zerubbabel are mentioned the children of S. (Ez. 2.[35]; Ne. 7.[38]). It appears with the article—"Hassenaah"—in Ne. 3.[3]. The people may be identical with the Benjamite clan "Hasennah" (1 Ch. 9.[7]). The site of the town is unknown. OEJ. mentions the village Magdalsenna, seven Rm. miles N. of Jericho, wh. may possibly be the place.

SENATE. The word gerousia (Ac. 5.[21]) is used as explanatory of sunedrion, " council," which has just been used—" all the senate of the children of Israel " (see SANHEDRIN). The word does not occur again in the canonical books. Gerousia is used of the Jewish Council in 2 M. 1.[10], 4.[44]; while the Roman Senate is referred to in 1 M. 8.[17ff.] Senators (Ps. 105.[22]) are lit. " elders," zĕqēnīm.

SENEH, the name given to one of the two imposing cliffs between which ran the pass of Michmash (see BOZEZ). S. was on the south side of the gorge. The name means " acacia," and lingers still in the mod. Wādy Suweinīt, " valley of the little thorn tree." Conder gives an interesting explanation of why the northern cliff was called Bozez, " shining."

"The great valley runs nearly due east, and thus the southern cliff is almost entirely in shade during the day. The contrast is surprising and picturesque between the dark coal colour of the south side, and the ruddy or tawny tints of the northern cliff, crowned with the gleaming white of the upper chalky strata. The picture is unchanged since the days when Jonathan looked over to the white camping-ground of the Philistines, and Bozez must then have shone as brightly as it does now, in the full light of an Eastern sun" (Tent Work, p. 256).

SENIR was the name by wh. Mt. Hermon was known among the Amorites (Dt. 3.[9] AV. " Shenir "). " Hermon " and " Senir," however, appear side by side in 1 Ch. 5.[23] and SS. 4.[8]. The latter term prob. denoted the northern part of the Antilebanon range. In this sense the name appears in an inscription of Shalmaneser. According to Yāqūt, the Arab geographer (c. A.D. 1225), Jebel Sanīr is the range between Homs and Baalkek (Guy le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, p. 79). Mas'udi (A.D. 943) speaks of Baalbek as in the district of Sanīr (Guy le Strange, op. cit., p. 295).

SENNACHERIB (Heb. Sanhērīb, Asyr. Sin-akhi-irba, " the Moon-god has increased brothers," a name that indicates that S. was probably the third son), son and successor of SARGON. The death of his father was the signal for an uprising in BABYLONIA, so when he came to the throne in B.C. 705 he had to begin a campaign and practically reconquer the country fm. Merodach Baladan. His next campaign was against Ellipi and Elam. The tributaries of his father in the west, probably in confederacy with the Babylonians, had refused tribute. He swept through Phœnicia, capturing all the cities but Tyre. Hezekiah appears to have been one of the prominent heads of the rebellion, as into his keeping was given Padi, the tributary k. of EKRON, deposed by the people. Most of the states surrendered and gave tribute, including Moab, Ammon, and Edom; only Hezekiah and some of the Philistine states still held out. Tirhaka, k. of Egp. and Ethiopia, came to encounter S., but was defeated at Eltekeh. Meantime S. devoted his attention to Judæa; the whole country was overrun, every fenced city except Jrs. was captured. Hezekiah gave S. 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver. But. S. wd. not be satisfied with anything short of the surrender of Jrs. S. sent arrogant messages by his officers demanding this, alternately scoffing at God and claiming His commission. Fm. the speeches of Rabshakeh we see how perfectly the Asyr. Foreign Office kept itself acquainted with what was going on among its tributaries; it was known in Nineveh that Hezekiah had taken away the high places of J". (2 K. 18.[22]), and that this wd. be a cause of disaffection among the Jews. At length a terrible disaster overtook S., either on the confines of Egp. as Herodotus relates (ii. 141), or near LIBNAH, as one mt. deduce fm. the Scriptural statement. The mention of mice in Herodotus' account of the event has led some to suppose that the death of 185,000 of S.'s army was due to bubonic plague, wh. is spread by rats (see DISEASE). Of course there is no mention of this in the Annals of S. After his return he engaged in many campaigns, several against Babylonia, in wh. Merodach Baladan had again made his appearance, aided by the Elamites, and had secured the possession of Babylon. He was assassinated by two of his sons, SHAREZER and ADRAMMELECH (2 K. 19.[37]). From the fact that the histories and inscriptions name only one son as murderer, unfair doubts have been thrown on the Scriptural narrative; both mt. be engaged in the conspiracy—the less prominent mt. easily drop out of notice.

SENUAH, RV. HASSENUAH, father of Judah of the sons of Benjamin (Ne. 11.[9]). This clan is probably identical with " Hassenaah " of Ne. 3.[3] (see SENAAH). In 1 Ch. 9.[7], AV. gives the name as " Hasenuah," RV. " Hassenuah."

SEORIM, the fourth of the priestly courses which David instituted (1 Ch. 24.[8]).

SEPARATION, WATER OF. See RED HEIFER.

SEPHAR. The dwelling of the sons of Joktan was " from Mesha as thou goest towards Sephar, the mountain of the east." This is prob. ident. with Ẓafār, on the coast of Shiḥr, to the E. of Ḥadramaut. It is built at the base of a lofty mountain. Although now a poor vill., it is prob. of anct. date.

SEPHARAD. Obadiah speaks of " the captivity of Jrs. wh. is in Sepharad " (v. 20). The inscriptions of Sargon (B.C. 721–705) speak of Shaparda, in SW. Media, towards Babylonia, the identification of wh. with S., Fried. Delitzsch thinks " exceedingly probable " (Wo lag das Paradies? p. 249). If we assume, as certain critics do, the post-exilic date of this portion of the book, we may identify it with Çparda, a Persian satrapy in Asia Minor, mentioned in the inscriptions of Darius (COT. ii. 145; Sayce, Higher Crit. and the Monuments, 483). The Jews

(cp. Tg.O.) identified S. with Spain, hence Spanish Jews are known as "Sephardim."

SEPHARVAIM, lit. "the two Sippars," probably correspond to the two cities of that name associated with the Sun-god and his consort Ananit respectively, which are known from the cuneiform inscriptions. Sippar of the Sun-god was discovered in 1881 by Hormuzd Rassam. The site is now called Abu Ḥabba, and lies on the Euphrates, about 16 miles south-east of Bagdad. Search in the ruins of the temple has brought to light many monuments and tablets of great value. When Israel was taken captive Samaria was colonised from Sepharvaim (2 K. 17.[24, 31]). Sennacherib boasts of the conquest of Sepharvaim despite the gods and the kings who sought to defend it (2 K. 18.[34], 19.[13]; Is. 36.[19], 37.[13]).

SEPTUAGINT ("Seventy," more correctly "Version of the Seventy"), the name ordinarily given to the oldest Greek translation of the OT., after a legend that it was the work of seventy (or rather seventy-two) persons (six from each tribe of Israel), summoned to Egypt for the purpose by King Ptolemy Philadelphus, who died B.C. 247. This story, with the names of the interpreters, is told in the Epistle of Aristeas (called by Josephus Aristæus), a historical romance, ostensibly by King Ptolemy's envoy to the high-priest Eleazar, and the same person who had suggested to the king that the request for translators should be preceded by a wholesale emancipation of Jewish captives, which was carried out. The translators met on an island for seventy-two days, at the end of which time they had accomplished their task. A summary of the same story is given by Philo, who adds some details, as that a feast called Pharia was still kept in his time in commemoration of the event (the island where the work was done being Pharos); and another by Josephus. Since both these writers depend in the main on "Aristeas," the Epistle must be earlier than the first cent. A.D.; and as it teems with improbabilities and absurdities, it must be classed with a small library of fabrications made for the purpose of glorifying the Jewish race in the eyes of the Greeks, by Jews masquerading as Gentiles, whose date and locality cannot be easily identified. The date of this romance has often been placed (on very inadequate grounds) at about B.C. 200; if this were correct, considerable importance would attach to it, owing to its being so near Ptolemy's time; but it is more probable that it is some generations later. A second authority for the connection of the LXX version with Ptolemy is another author of doubtful genuineness, Aristobulus, who in a letter addressed to Ptolemy Philometor (181–145) states that the complete translation was made under Philadelphus, but that there had been an earlier Greek version before the conquest of Alexander. A more serious authority for the existence of the LXX in the middle of the second cent. B.C. is the translator of Ecclesiasticus, who dates his arrival in Egypt B.C. 132, and mentions translations of the Law, the Prophets, and the other Books. These he clearly utilised for his own work, but he gives no hint concerning their origin. The Version of Esther is ascribed in a rather difficult colophon to one Lysimachus, son of Ptolemy, in Jerusalem, whose name does not figure in Aristeas' list; the date at which the book is said to have been "introduced" is given as the fourth year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, which might signify B.C. 201 or some much later year. The Jewish oral tradition preserves the name of Ptolemy in connection with the translation of the Bible, but this may be derived from Aristeas also. The notion that the translation of any part of it was due to Philadelphus' initiative is usually rejected now: (1) Because of the untrustworthy character of the authorities who state it; (2) because the translation seems intended for Jewish rather than pagan readers; (3) because the date of Philadelphus is rather too early for the need of a Greek version of the OT. to have arisen among the Jews. Probably the earliest parts may go back to about B.C. 200. If, however, it could be supposed that the translation had some connection with the attempt made by Onias in the middle of the second cent. B.C., to transfer the headquarters of Judaism from Jerusalem to Heliopolis, its date would have to be considerably brought down.

Content of LXX.—The story of Aristeas appears to recognise the translation of the Law only, though the next writer, Aristobulus (if genuine), implies that the translation included all the canonical writings of the Jews. Josephus also speaks of the Law only, but it is certain that he possessed and utilised the "LXX" translation of other parts of the Bible. As, however, both Jewish and Christian writers use the "Law" in the sense of the whole Canon, as well as of the Pentateuch, some uncertainty attaches to statements in which the phrase occurs. When Gentile Christianity spread, it inherited a body of Jewish literature in Greek, some translated from the Hebrew and some original, and of the former portion some of authority among the Jews, some unauthoritative. The name "LXX version" came to stand for the older Greek version where there was more than one of the same book, and also to include works belonging to the same collection. At some date unknown to us the Jews purged their Canon, and works retained in the Greek (Christian) Bible, but not found in the Hebrew (Jewish) Scriptures, were called Apocrypha. It is noteworthy that the Apocryphal Esdras I. was utilised by Josephus and not Esdras II., which is the translation of the Hebrew Ezra. He also utilised 1 Maccabees, though he would not have regarded it as canonical. It is clear that the translations which ultimately became incorporated in the "LXX" accumulated during at least a century and a half, and probably a much longer period. The Prologue to Ecclesiasticus, quoted above, is the only translator's preface which we possess, and is said to be the only Jewish writing belonging to the first two centuries B.C. which is not pseudepigraphic.

Purpose of the LXX.—The translations made by Jewish scholars of their Scriptures into various languages (e.g. Arabic, Persian, German) have usually been due to the desire to accommodate their religion to some extent to the national life surrounding them, and have been executed when their community has been recognised and placed on an honourable footing in their place of sojourn. The privileges which the Jews enjoyed in Egypt are sufficient to account for the undertaking; but a written translation of the Scriptures appears to have been a great innovation, since, though Hebrew was equally unintelligible in Palestine and Egypt, the translations in use in the former country appear to have been oral and improvised, accompanying the original, whereas the Greek version was intended to oust the original, which it succeeded in doing; for the eminent Alexandrian Philo, in the first century A.D., has clearly no knowledge of the Hebrew (which he calls Chaldee), and treats the Greek as inspired. It appears that the LXX version was used for public worship among the Greek-speaking Jewish communities. Of the horror which this innovation caused among the more conservative sections of the community the oral tradition of the Jews has some traces. A question which we have not at present the means of solving is when this Greek version was abandoned by the Jews; for all the copies that have come down have passed through Christian hands. At first it would seem Jewish controversialists met Christian arguments by producing new translations from the Hebrew, but afterwards they resolved to destroy all books belonging to their community except the Hebrew and Aramaic canon. Hence it is that the Syriac OT. also, which in part at any rate was a Jewish production, has come down through Christian hands.

Language of the LXX.—The Greek of the LXX version is in the main the dialect which was in use in Egypt at the period when the translations were made, and the study of contemporary papyri has shown that many idioms formerly supposed to be Hebraisms were in reality colloquialisms of the time; several of the forms are such as are expressly condemned by the Atticists as vulgar Greek. It is perhaps observable that neither Philo nor Josephus, who both aspired to be Greek stylists, finds fault with the Greek of the LXX for being unclassical. If a Gentile would have had difficulty in understanding it, this would be due to the literalness which caused many Hebrew constructions to be reproduced, but far more to the nature of the matter, which required the creation of a whole vocabulary. At times the translators cut the knot by transliterating the original, e.g. sabbaton (Sabbath), geioras (proselyte), ephod (Jg. 8.[27]), elloulim ("rejoicings," Jg. 9.[27]), sabek ("thicket," Gn. 22.[13]), pascha (Passover); the extent to which this expedient is employed varies very much in different books. More often a conventional translation is adopted and maintained with fair consistency. The elaboration of this whole system of equivalents must have required much time and thought, and rather suggests the labours of an official committee; the bulk of it occurs in the Pentateuch, which in general is better rendered than any other part of the Bible. To some extent the religious technicalities of pagan cults could be adopted, e.g. the words in use for "burnt-offering," "peace-offering," and some others connected with the priestly vocation. For others fresh compounds had to be invented. Care was also taken to obtain correct renderings for legal and medical terms, as well as such as belonged to the weaving, building, and other trades.

It is worthy of note that all our authorities make the translators come from Jerusalem, where it seems unlikely that the requisite knowledge of Greek could have been obtained; the translator of Ecclesiasticus who came thence, studied Greek learning in Egypt for a considerable time before he started translating. The difference between the language of his original prologue and that of his translation (which is in the style of the LXX) is very marked. Since the version of the Biblical books very frequently exhibits the employment of recherché and even poetical expressions, we must suppose that the translators, if they really came from Jerusalem, did as Ben-Sira's grandson afterwards did, or, as would be equally natural, associated with themselves Alexandrian Jews who had enjoyed such training.

Sources of LXX.—While all later versions of the OT. made use (directly or indirectly) of the LXX, it is uncertain what help the Greek translators had for the interpretation of the texts before them. The story of an earlier version (mentioned above) seems to have been a fiction, intended to account for the supposed use of the OT. by Plato and other philosophers; but the custom of paraphrasing the text in Aramaic for the use of Palestinian audiences must have led to the perpetuation of traditional renderings, whence the employment by the LXX of an Aramaic intermediate translation may in a certain sense be held. The difficulty that is evidently felt by them in dealing with solitary expressions shows that such help did not extend very far; but that the Aramaic language was more familiar to them than the Hebrew is indicated by their frequently giving the words of the original their Aramaic sense—e.g., Ps. 60.[8], "Moab is the pot of my hope," for "Moab is my washpot;" Is. 25.[8], "He hath swallowed up death in victory," for "for ever," &c. Much in the way of interpretation must have been the result of original conjecture, made by comparing the unintelligible words of the original with some other language known to the translators, or by speculating on the probabilities of the case. Cases of conjecture based on Greek etymologies occur—e.g. escharîtes (hearth-cake), for the Hebrew eshpâr (2 S. 6.[19]); phoreion (bier), for the Hebrew apiriôn (SS. 3.[9]), of which the latter may be correct; these are not very frequent. They have often been credited with going (like most scholars from the sixth cent. A.D.) to the Arabic for the explanation of hard words, but it is doubtful how far this most valuable source would have been open to them: the examples produced—e.g. Mi. 1.[2], "words," for the Heb. "all of them" (Arab. kalâm, for kullâm)—are far from convincing. They appear occasionally to have obtained help from the Coptic language, where Egyptian matters are dealt with (so Achei for "rushes," Gn. 41.[2], where the Hebrew has a variety of the Egyptian name), but the Egyptian Jews appear ordinarily to have paid very little attention to this subject; they went to Egyptian sources rather for archæological information (e.g. Gn. 46.[28], where "the land of Goshen" is rendered by "Heroopolis in the country of Raamses") than for the explanation of words. Most frequently their conjectures are evidently based on a comparison of Hebrew roots, made with more licence than modern philology approves. It must be confessed that in numerous cases modern scholarship cannot arrive at much more satisfactory results.
